harmony with the Mosaic law, and worthy of a constitutional king of Israel. It was done, however, not from religious, but purely political motives, because he believed that the existence and interests of the Baalites were inseparably bound up with the dynasty of Ahab, and because he hoped that by their extermination he would secure the attachment of the far larger and more influential party who worshipped God in Israel. Jehonadab's concurrence must have been given in the belief of his being actuated solely by the highest principles of piety and zeal. 23. Bring forth vestments for all the worshippers of Baal—The priests of Baal were clad, probably, in robes of white byssus, while they were engaged in the functions of their office, and these were kept under the care of an officer, in a particular wardrobe of Baal's temple. This treacherous massacre, and the means taken to accomplish it, are paralleled by the slaughter of the Janissaries and other terrible tragedies in the modern history of the East. 29. Howbeit from the sins of Jeroboam . . . Jehu departed not from after them—Jehu had no intention of carrying his zeal for the Lord beyond a certain point, and as he considered it impolitic to encourage his subjects to travel to Jerusalem, he re-established the symbolic worship of the calves.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-3. JEHOASH SAVED FROM ATHALIAH'S MASSACRE. 1. Athaliah—(see on 2 Chronicles 22. 2). She had possessed great influence over her son, who, by her counsels, had ruled in the spirit of the house of Ahab. destroyed all the seed-royal—all connected with the royal family who might have urged a claim to the throne, and who had escaped the murderous hands of Jehu (2 Chronicles 21. 2-4; 22. 1; ch. 10. 13, 14). This massacre she was incited to perpetrate—partly from a determination not to let David's family outlive hers—partly as a measure of self-defence to secure herself against the violence of Jehu, who was bent on destroying the whole of Ahab's posterity to which she belonged (ch. 8. 18-26); but chiefly from personal ambition to rule, and a desire to establish the worship of Baal. Such was the sad fruit of the unequal alliance between the son of the pious Jehoshaphat and a daughter of the idolatrous and wicked house of Ahab. 2. Jehosheba—or Jehoshabeath (2 Chronicles 22. 11). daughter of King Joram—not by Athaliah, but by a secondary wife. stole him from among the king's sons which were slain—either from among the corpses, he being considered dead, or out of the palace nursery. hid him in the bed-chamber—For the use of the priests, which was in some part of the temple (v. 3), and of which Jehoiada and his wife had the sole charge. What is called, however, the bed-chamber in the East is not the kind of apartment that we understand by the name, but a small closet, into which are flung during the day the mattresses and other bedding materials spread on the floors or divans of the sitting-rooms by day. Such a lumber-room was well suited to be a convenient place for the recovery of his wounds, and a hiding-place for the royal infant and his nurse.

4-12. HE IS MADE KING. 4. In the seventh year—viz., of the reign of Athaliah, and the rescue of Jehoash. Jehoiada sent and fetched the rulers, &c.—He could scarcely have obtained such a general convocation except at the time, or on pretext, of a public and solemn festival. Having revealed to them the secret of the young king's preservation, and entered into a covenant with them for the overthrow of the tyrant, he then arranged with them the plan and time of carrying their plot into execution (see on 2 Chronicles 22. 10-12; 23). The conduct of Jehoiada, who acted the leading and chief part in this conspiracy, admits of an easy and full justification; for, while Athaliah was a usurper, and belonged to a race devoted by Divine denunciation to destruction, even his own wife had a better and stronger claim to the throne; the sovereignty of Judah had been divinely appropriated to the family of David, and therefore the young prince on whom it was proposed to confer the crown, possessed an inherent right to it, of which a usurper could not deprive him. Moreover, Jeholada was most probably the high priest, whose official duty it was to watch over the due execution of God's laws, and who in his present movement, was encouraged and aided by the countenance and support of the chief authorities, both civil and ecclesiastical, in the country. In addition to all these considerations, he seems to have been directed by an impulse of the Divine Spirit, through the counsels and exhortations of the prophets of the time.

13-16. ATHALIAH SLAIN. 13. Athaliah heard the noise of the guard and of the people—The profound secrecy with which the conspiracy had been conducted rendered the unusual acclamations of the vast assembled crowd the more startling, and roused the suspicions of the tyrant. she came into the temple of the Lord—i. e., the courts, which she was permitted to enter by Jehoiada's directions (v. 8) in order that she might be secured. 14. the king stood by a pillar—or on a platform, erected for that purpose (2 Chronicles 6. 13). 15. without the ranges—i. e., fences, that the sacred place might not be stained with human blood.

17. JEHOIADA RESTORES GOD'S WORSHIP. 17. a covenant between the Lord and the king and the people—The covenant with the Lord was a renewal of the national covenant with Israel (Exodus 19.; 24.; "to be unto him a people of inheritance," Deuteronomy 4. 6; 27. 9). The covenant between the king and the people was the consequence of this, and by it the king bound himself to rule according to the Divine law, while the people engaged to submit, to give him allegiance as the Lord's anointed. The immediate fruit of this renewal of the covenant was the destruction of the temple and the slaughter of the priests of Baal (see on ch. 10. 27); the restoration of the pure worship of God in all its ancient integrity, and the establishment of the young king on the hereditary throne of Judah.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-18. JEHOASH REIGNS WELL WHILE JEHOIADA LIVED. 2. Jehoash did that which was right in the sight of the Lord—So far as related to his outward actions and the policy of his government. But it is evident from the sequel of his history that the rectitude of his administration was owing more to the salutary influence of his preserver and tutor, Jeholada, than to the honest and sincere dictates of his own mind. 3. But the high places were not taken away—The popular fondness for the private and disorderly rites performed in the groves and recesses of hills was so inveterate that even the most powerful monarchs had been unable to accomplish their suppression; no wonder that in the early reign of a young king, and after the gross irregularities that had been allowed during the maladministration of Athaliah, the difficulty of putting an end to the superstitions associated with "the high places" was greatly increased. 4. Jehoash said to the priests, &c.—There is here given an account of the measures which the young king took for repairing the temple by the levying of taxes. 1. "The money of every one that passeth the account," viz., half a shekel, as an offering to the Lord" (Exodus 30. 13). 2. "The money that every man is set at," i. e., the redemption-price of every one who had devoted himself or any thing belonging to him to the Lord, and the amount of which was estimated according to certain rules (Leviticus 27. 1-8). 3. Free-will or voluntary offerings made to the sanctuary. The first two were paid annually (see on 2 Chronicles 24. 5). 7-10. Why repair ye not the breaches of the house?—This mode of collection not proving so productive as was expected, the dilatoriness of the priests was the chief cause of the failure, and a new arrangement was proposed. A chest was placed by the high priest at the entrance into the temple, into which the money given by the people for the repairs of the temple was to be put by the Levites who kept the door. The object of this chest was to make a separation between the money to be raised for the building from the other moneys destined for the general use of the priests, in the hope that the people would be more liberal in their contributions when it was known that their offerings would be devoted to the special purpose of making the necessary repairs; and that the duty of attending to this work was no longer to devolve on the priests, but to be undertaken by the king. 11-13. they gave the money, being told, into the hands of them that did the work—The king sent his secretary along with an agent of the high priest (2 Chronicles 24. 11) to count the money in the chest from time to time, and deliver the amount to the overseers of the building, who paid the workmen and purchased all necessary materials. The custom of putting sums of certain amount in bags, which are labelled and sealed by a proper officer, is a common way of using the currency in Turkey and other Eastern countries. 13-16. Howbeit there were not made bowls, &c.—When the repairs of the temple had been completed, the surplus was appropriated to the purchase of the temple furniture. The integrity of the overseers of the work being undoubted, no account was exacted of the way in which they applied the money given to them, while other moneys levied at the temple were left to the disposal of the priests as the law directed (Leviticus 5. 16; Numbers 5. 8). 17, 18. Then Hazael fought against Gath—(See on 2 Chronicles 24. 23, 24.)

19-21. HE IS SLAIN. 20. his servants arose . . . and slew Joash in the house of Millo—(See also 2 Chronicles 24. 25.)

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-7. JEHOAHAZ'S WICKED REIGN OVER ISRAEL. 1. Jehoahaz reigned seventeen years—Under his government, which pursued the policy of his predecessors regarding the support of the calf-worship, Israel's apostasy from the true God became greater and more confirmed than in the time of his father Jehu. The national chastisement, when it came, was consequently the more severe; and the instruments employed by the Lord in scourging the revolted nation were Hazael and his son and general Ben-hadad, in resisting whose successive invasions the Israelitish army was sadly reduced and weakened. In the extremity of his distress, Jehoahaz besought the Lord, and was heard, not on his own account (Psalm 66. 18; Proverbs 1. 28; 15. 8), but that of the ancient covenant with the patriarchs (v. 23). 4. He saw the oppression of Israel—i. e., commiserated the fallen condition of his chosen people. The Divine honour and the interests of true religion required that deliverance should be granted them to check the triumph of the idolatrous enemy, and put an end to their blasphemous taunts that God had forsaken Israel (Deuteronomy 32. 27; Psalm 12. 4). 5. a saviour—This refers neither to some patriotic defender nor some signal victory, but to the deliverance obtained for Israel by the two successors of Jehoahaz, viz., Joash, who regained all the cities which the Syrians had taken from his father (v. 25); and Jeroboam, who restored the former boundaries of Israel (ch. 14. 25). 6. there remained the grove—Asherah—the idol set up by Ahab (1 Kings 16. 33), and which ought to have been demolished (Deuteronomy 7. 5). 7. made them like the dust in threshing—Threshing in the East is performed in the open air upon a level plot of ground, daubed over with a covering to prevent, as much as possible, the earth, sand, or gravel from rising; a great quantity of them all, notwithstanding this precaution, must unavoidably be taken up with the grain; at the same time the straw is shattered to pieces. Hence it is a most significant figure, frequently employed by Orientals to describe a state of national suffering, little short of extermination (Isaiah 21. 10; Micah 4. 12; Jeremiah 51. 33). The figure originated in a barbarous war custom, which Hazael literally followed (Amos 1. 3, 4; cf. 2 Samuel 8. 31; Judges 8. 7).

8-25. JOASH SUCCEEDS HIM. 8. his might—This is particularly noticed in order to show that the grievous oppression from foreign enemies, by which the Israelites were ground down, was not owing to the cowardice or

THE VALLEY OF SALT, BETWEEN THE TERRITORIES OF JUDAH AND EDM.

THE GIBIONITES OBTAINING A LEAGUE WITH JOSHUA.

Imbecility of their king, but solely to the righteous and terrible judgment of God for their foul apostasy. 12, 13. His might, wherewith he fought against Amaziah—(See on ch. 14, 8-14.) The usual summary of his life and reign occurs rather early, and is again repeated in the account given of the reign of the king of Judah (ch. 14, 15). 14-19. Elisha was fallen sick of his sickness wherewith he died—Every man's death is occasioned by some disease, and so was Elisha's. But in intimating it, there seems a contrast tacitly made between him and his prophetic predecessor, who did not die. Joash the king of Israel came down unto him, and wept over his face—Visited him where he was lying ill of this mortal sickness, and expressed deep sorrow, not from the personal respect he bore for the prophet, but for the incalculable loss his death would occasion to the kingdom. my father, my father! &c.—(See on ch. 2, 12.) These words seem to have been a complimentary phrase applied to one who was thought an eminent guardian and deliverer of his country; and the particular application of them to Elisha, who, by his counsels and prayer, had obtained many glorious victories for Israel, shows that the king possessed some measure of faith and trust, which, though weak, was accepted, and called forth the prophet's dying benediction. 15. Take bow and arrows—Hostilities were usually proclaimed by a herald, sometimes by a king or general making a public and formal discharge of an arrow into the enemy's country. Elisha directed Joash to do this, as a symbolical act, designed to intimate more fully and significantly the victories promised to the king of Israel over the Syrians. His laying his hands upon the king's hands was to represent the power imparted to the bow-shot as coming from the Lord through the medium of the prophet. His shooting the first arrow eastward—to that part of his kingdom which the Syrians had taken, and which was east of Samaria—was a declaration of war against them for the invasion. His shooting the other arrows into the ground was in token of the number of victories he was to gain; but his stopping at the third betrayed the weakness of his faith; for, as the discharged arrow signified a victory over the Syrians, it is evident that the more arrows he shot the more victories he would gain; and as he stopped so soon, his conquests would be incomplete. 20. Elisha died—Enjoying a happier life than Elijah, as he possessed a milder character, and bore a less hard commission—his rough garment was honoured even at the court. coming in of the year—i. e., the spring, the usual season of beginning campaigns in ancient times. Predatory bands from Moab generally made incursions at that time on the lands of Israel. The bearers of a corpse, alarmed by the appearance of one of these bands, hastily deposited, as they passed that way, their load in Elisha's sepulchre, which might be easily done by removing the stone at the mouth of the cave. According to the Jewish and Eastern custom, his body, as well as that of the man who was miraculously restored, was not laid in a coffin, but only swathed; so that the bodies could be brought into contact; and the object of the miracle was to stimulate the king's and people of Israel's faith in the still unaccomplished predictions of Elisha respecting the war with the Syrians. Accordingly the historian forthwith records the historical fulfilment of the prediction (v. 22-25), in the defeat of the enemy, in the recovery of the cities that had been taken, and their restoration to the kingdom of Israel.

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-6. AMAZIAH'S GOOD REIGN OVER JUDAH. 3-6. He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, yet not like David his father—The beginning of his reign was excellent, for he acted the part of a constitutional king, according to the law of God, yet not with perfect sincerity of heart (cf. 2 Chronicles 25, 2), for, as in the case of his father Joash, the early promise was belied by the devious course he personally followed in later life (see on 2 Chronicles 20, 14), as well as by the public irregularities he tolerated in the kingdom. 5. as soon as the kingdom was confirmed in his hand—It was an act of justice no less than of filial piety to avenge the murder of his father; but it is evident that the two assassins must have possessed considerable weight and influence, as the king was obliged to retain them in his service, and durst not, for fear of their friends and supporters, institute proceedings against them until his power had been fully consolidated. 6. But the children of the murderers he slew not—This moderation, inspired by the Mosaic law (Deuteronomy 24, 16), displays the good character of this prince; for the course thus pursued towards the families of the regicides was directly contrary to the prevailing customs of antiquity, according to which all connected with the criminals were doomed to unsparring destruction.

7. HE SMITES EDMOM. 7. He slew of Edom in the valley of salt ten thousand—In the reign of Joram the Edomites had revolted (see on ch. 8, 20). But Amaziah, determined to reduce them to their former subjection, formed a hostile expedition against them, in which he routed their army, and made himself master of their capital. the valley of salt—is that part of the Ghor which comprises the salt and sandy plain to the south of the Dead Sea. Selah—lit., Selah—(rock) generally thought to be Petra. Joktheel—i. e., given or conquered by God. See the history of this conquest more fully detailed (2 Chronicles 25, 6-16).

8-16. JOASH DEFEATS HIM. 8. Amaziah sent messengers to Jehoash, the son of Jehoahaz, son of Jehu, king of Israel—This bold and haughty challenge, which was most probably stimulated by a desire of satisfaction for the outrages perpetrated by the discharged auxiliaries of Israel (2 Chronicles 25, 13) on the towns that lay in their way home, as well as by revenge for the massacre of his ancestors by Jehu (ch. 9, 5) sprang, there is little doubt, from pride and self-confidence, inspired by his victory over the Edomites. 9. Jehoash the king of Israel sent to Amaziah—People in the East very often express their sentiments in a parabolic form, especially when they intend to convey unwelcome truths or a contemptuous sneer. This was the design of the admonitory fable related by Joash in his reply. The thistle, a low shrub, might be chosen to represent Amaziah, a petty prince; the cedar, the powerful sovereign of Israel, and the wild beast that trode down the thistle the overwhelming army with which Israel could desolate Judah. But, perhaps, without making so minute an application, the parable may be explained generally, as describing in a striking manner the effects of pride and ambition, towering far beyond their natural sphere, and sure to fall with a sudden and ruinous crash. The moral of the fable is contained in v. 10. 11. But Amaziah would not hear—The sarcastic tenor of this reply incited the king of Judah the more; for, being in a state of judicial blindness and infatuation (2 Chronicles 25, 20), he was immovably determined on war. But the superior energy of Joash surprised him ere he had completed his military preparations. Pouring a numerous army into the territory of Judah, he encountered Amaziah in a pitched battle, routed his army, took himself prisoner, and having marched to Jerusalem, not only demolished part of the city walls, but plundered the treasures of the palace and temple, and taking hostages to prevent any further molestation from Judah, terminated the war. Without leaving a garrison in Jerusalem, he returned to his capital with all convenient speed, his presence and whole forces being required to repel the troublesome incursions of the Syrians.

17-20. HE IS SLAIN BY A CONSPIRACY. 19. they made a conspiracy against him in Jerusalem—Amaziah's apostasy (2 Chronicles 25, 27) was followed by a general maladministration, especially the disastrous issue of the war with Israel—the ruinous condition of Jerusalem, the plunder of the temple, and the loss of their children who were taken as hostages—lost him the respect and attachment not of the grandees only, but of his subjects generally, who were in rebellion. The king fled in terror to Lachish, a frontier town of the Philistines, where, however, he was traced and murdered. His friends had his corpse brought without any pomp or ceremony, in a chariot to Jerusalem, where he was interred among his royal ancestors.

21, 22. AZARIAH SUCCEEDS HIM. 21. all the people of Judah took Azariah—Or Uzziah (ch. 15. 30; 2 Chronicles 26. 1). The popular opposition had been personally directed against Amaziah as the author of their calamities, but it was not extended to his family or heir. 22. He built Elath—fortified that seaport. It had revolted with the rest of Edom, but was now recovered by Uzziah, his father, who did not complete the conquest of Edom, having left him that work to do.

23-29. JEROBOAM'S WICKED REIGN OVER ISRAEL. 23. Jeroboam, the son of Joash, the king of Israel—This was Jeroboam II. who, on regaining the lost territory, raised the kingdom to great political power (v. 25), but adhered to the favourite religious policy of the Israelitish sovereigns (v. 24); and, while God granted him so great a measure of national prosperity and eminence, the reason is expressly stated (v. 26, 27) to be that the purposes of the Divine covenant forbade as yet the overthrow of the kingdom of the ten tribes (see on ch. 13. 23).

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 1-4. AZARIAH'S REIGN OVER JUDAH. 1. In the twenty and seventh year of Jeroboam—It is thought that the throne of Judah continued vacant eleven or twelve years, between the death of Amaziah and the inauguration of his son Azariah, who, being an infant four years old when his father was murdered, a regency was appointed during his minority. Azariah began to reign—The character of his reign is described by the brief formula employed by the inspired historian, in recording the religious policy of the later kings. But his reign was a very active as well as eventful one, and is fully related (2 Chronicles 26). Elated by the possession of great power, and presumptuously arrogating to himself, as the heathen kings, the functions both of the real and sacerdotal offices, he was punished with leprosy, which, as the offence was capital (Numbers 8. 7), was equivalent to death; for this disease excluded him from all society; and while Jotham, his son, as his viceroy, administered the affairs of the kingdom—being about fifteen years of age (cf. v. 33)—he had to dwell in a place apart by himself (see on ch. 7. 3). After a long reign he died, and was buried in the royal burying-field, though not in the royal cemetery of "the city of David" (2 Chronicles 26. 33).

8-16. ZECHARIAH'S REIGN OVER ISRAEL. 8. In the thirty and eighth year of Azariah king of Judah did Zechariah the son of Jeroboam reign over Israel—There was an Interregnum from some unknown cause between the reign of Jeroboam and the accession of his son, which lasted, according to some, for ten or twelve years, according to others, for twenty-two years, or more. This prince pursued the religious policy of the calf-worship, and his reign was short, being abruptly terminated by the hand of violence. In his fate was fulfilled the prophecy addressed to Jehu (ch. 10. 30; also Hosea 1. 4), that his family would possess the throne of Israel for four generations; and accordingly Jehohaz, Joash, Jehoram, and Zechariah were his successors—but there his dynasty terminated; and perhaps it was the public knowledge of this prediction that prompted the murderous design of Shallum. 13-17. Shallum . . . reigned a full month—Being opposed and slain by Menahem, who, according to Josephus, was commander of the forces, which, on the report of the king's murder, were besieging Tirzah, a town twelve miles east of Samaria, and formerly a seat of the kings of Israel. Raising the siege, he marched directly against the usurper, slew him, and reigned in his stead. 16. Menahem smote Tiphshah—Thapsacus, on the Euphrates, the border city of Solomon's kingdom (1 Kings 4. 24). The inhabitants refusing to open their gates to him, Menahem took it by storm, and having spoiled it, committed the most barbarous excesses, without regard either to age or sex.

17-21. MENAHEM'S. 17. reigned ten years in Samaria—His government was conducted on the religious policy of his predecessors. 19. Pul the king of Assyria—This is the first Assyrian king after Nimrod who is mentioned in biblical history. His name has been recently identified with that of Phalluka on the monuments of Nineveh, and that of Menahem discovered also, came against the land—Elsewhere it is said "Ephraim (Israel) goes to the Assyrian." The two statements may be reconciled thus: "Pul, of his own motion, induced, perhaps, by the expedition of Menahem against Thapsacus, advanced against the kingdom of Israel; then Menahem sent him 1000 talents in order not only to divert him from his plans of conquest, but at the same time to purchase his friendship and aid for the establishment of his own precarious sovereignty, so that Menahem did not properly invite the Assyrian into the land, but only changed the enemy when marching against the country, by this tribute, into a confederate for the security of his usurped dominion; which the prophet Hosea, less concerned about the historical fact than the disposition betrayed therein, might very well censure as a going of Ephraim to the Assyrians (Hosea 5. 13; 7. 1; 8. 9), and a covenant-making with Asshur (ch. 12. 1). [KEIL.] a thousand talents of silver—Equal to £362,200. This tribute, which Menahem raised by a tax on the grandees of Israel, bribed Pul to return to his own country (see on 1 Chronicles 5. 26).

22-24. PEKAHIAH'S. 23. Pekahiah . . . son of Menahem began to reign—On comparing the date given with Azariah's reign, it seems that several months had intervened between the death of Menahem and the accession of Pekahiah, probably owing to a contest about the throne. 25. with Argob and Arich, &c.—Many commentators view these as the captain's accomplices. But it is more probable that they were influential friends of the king, who were murdered along with him.

27-31. PEKAH'S. 29. In the days of Pekah, king of Israel, came Tiglath-pileser—This monarch, who succeeded Pul on the throne of Assyria, is the only one of all the kings who does not give his genealogy, and is therefore supposed to have been an usurper. His annals have been discovered in the Nimroud mound—describing this expedition into Syria. The places taken are here mentioned as they occurred and were conquered in the progress of an invasion. 30. Hoshea the son of Elah made a conspiracy . . . and slew him—He did not, however, obtain possession of the kingdom till about nine or ten years after the perpetration of this crime. [HALES.]

32-38. JOTHAM'S REIGN OVER JUDAH. In the twentieth year of Jotham—Jotham's reign having lasted only sixteen years, the meaning is, that the reign of Hoshea began in the twentieth after the beginning of Jotham's reign—the sacred historian, having not yet introduced the name of Ahaz, reckoned the date by Jotham, whom he had already mentioned (see on 2 Chronicles 27. 8). 33. Five and twenty years old was he when he began to reign—i. e., alone—for he had ruled as his father's viceroy. 35. the higher gate of the house of the Lord—Not the temple itself, but one of its courts—probably that which led into the palace (2 Chronicles 23. 20). 37. the Lord began to send against Judah, Rezin the king of Syria, &c.—This is the first intimation of the hostile feelings of the kings of Israel and Syria, to Judah, which led them to form an alliance and make joint preparations for war, which, however, was not actually waged till the reign of Ahaz.

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 1-16. AHAZ'S WICKED REIGN OVER JUDAH. 1-4. Ahaz did not that which was right in the sight of the Lord—The character of this king's reign, the voluptuousness and religious degeneracy of all classes of the people, are graphically portrayed in the writings of Isaiah, who prophesied at that period. The great increase of worldly wealth and luxury in the reigns of Azariah and Jotham had introduced a host of corruptions, which, during his reign, and by the influence of Ahaz, bore fruit in the idolatrous practices of every kind which prevailed in all parts of the kingdom (see on 2 Chronicles 28. 24).

3. walked in the way of the kings of Israel—this is descriptive of the early part of his reign, when, like the kings of Israel, he patronized the symbolic worship of God by images, but he gradually went farther into gross idolatry (2 Chronicles 28, 2). made his son to pass through the fire—(ch. 23, 10). The hands of the idol Moloch being red-hot, the children were passed through between them, which was considered a form of lustration; but there is reason to believe that, in certain circumstances, the children were burnt to death (Psalm 106, 37). This was strongly prohibited in the law (Leviticus 18, 21; 20, 2-5; Deuteronomy 18, 10), although there is no evidence that it was practised in Israel till the time of Ahaz. 5. Then Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah the son of Remaliah, king of Israel, came up to war against Jerusalem—Notwithstanding their great efforts and military preparations, they failed to take it, and, being disappointed, raised the siege and returned home (cf. Isaiah 7, 1). 6. Rezin recovered Elath—which Azariah had got into his possession (ch. 14, 22). The Syrians came to Elath, and dwelt there unto this day—The Septuagint version has "the Edomites," which the most judicious commentators and travellers (ROBINSON) prefer. 7-9. So Ahaz sent messengers to Tiglath-pileser—In spite of the assurance given him by Isaiah for two signs, the one immediate, the other remote (Isaiah 7, 14; 8, 4), that the confederate kings would not prevail against him, Ahaz sought aid from the Assyrian monarch, to purchase which he sent the treasures of the palace and temple. Tiglath-pileser marched against Damascus, slew Rezin the king, and carried the people of Damascus into captivity to Kir, which is thought to have been the city Karine (now Kerend), in Media. 10-16. Ahaz went to Damascus to meet Tiglath-pileser—This was a visit of respect, and perhaps of gratitude. During his stay in that heathen city, Ahaz saw an altar with which he was greatly captivated. Forthwith a sketch of it was transmitted to Jerusalem, with orders to Urijah the priest to get one constructed according to the Damascus model, and let this new altar supersede the old one in the temple. Urijah, with culpable complaisance, acted according to his instructions (v. 16). The sin in this affair consisted in meddling with, and improving according to human taste and fancy, the altars of the temple, the patterns of which had been furnished by Divine authority (Exodus 25, 40; 26, 30; 27, 1; 1 Chronicles 28, 19). Urijah was one of the witnesses taken by Isaiah to bear his prediction against Syria and Israel (Isaiah 8, 2).

17-19. HE SPOILS THE TEMPLE. 17. cut off the borders of the bases, &c.—It is thought that he did this to employ the elaborate sculpture in adorning his palace. 18. the covert for the Sabbath—the portico through which the priests entered the temple on the Sabbath. the king's entry without—a private external entrance for the king into the temple. The change made by Ahaz consisted in removing both of these into the temple from fear of the king of Assyria, that, in case of a siege, he might secure the entrance of the temple from him.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1-4. HOSHEA'S WICKED REIGN. 1. In the twelfth year of Ahaz king of Judah, began Hoshea to reign—The statement in ch. 15, 30 may be reconciled with the present passage in the following manner: Hoshea conspired against Pekah in the twentieth year of the latter, which was the eighteenth of Jotham's reign. It was two years before Hoshea was acknowledged king of Israel, i. e., in the fourth of Ahaz, and twentieth of Jotham. In the twelfth year of Ahaz his reign began to be tranquil and prosperous. [CALMET.] 2. he hid evil, but not as the kings of Israel—Unlike his predecessors from the time of Jeroboam, he neither established the rites of Baal, nor compelled the people to adhere to the symbolic worship of the calves. But although, in these respects, Hoshea acted as became a constitutional king of Israel; yet, through the influence of the nineteen princes who had swayed the sceptre before him, all of whom had been zealous patrons of idolatry, and many of whom had been also infamous for personal crimes, the whole nation had become so completely demoralized, that the righteous judgment of an angry Providence impeded over it. 3. Against him came up Shalmaneser—or Shalman (Hosea 10, 14), the same as the Sargon of Isalah. Very recently the name of this Assyrian king has been traced on the Ninevite monuments, as concerned in an expedition against a king of Samaria, whose name, though mutilated, Colonel Rawlinson reads as Hoshea. 4. found conspiracy in Hoshea—after having paid tribute for several years, Hoshea, determined on throwing off the Assyrian yoke, withheld the stipulated tribute; and Shalmaneser, incensed at this rebellion, proclaimed war against Israel. This was in the sixth year of Hoshea's reign. he had sent messengers to So, king of Egypt—the Sabaco of the classic historians, a famous Ethiopian who, for fifty years, occupied the Egyptian throne, and through whose aid Hoshea hoped to resist the threatened attack of the Assyrian conqueror. But Shalmaneser, marching against him, scoured the whole country of Israel, besieged the capital Samaria, and carried the principal inhabitants into captivity in his own land, having taken the king himself, and imprisoned him for life. This ancient policy of transplanting a conquered people into a foreign land, was founded on the idea that, among a mixed multitude, differing in language and religion, they would be kept in better subjection, and have less opportunity of combining together to recover their independence. carried Israel away—i. e., the remaining tribes (see on ch. 15, 29). and placed them, &c.—This passage GESENIUS renders thus, omitting the particle by, which is printed in Italics to show it is not in the original: "and placed them in Halah, and on the Chabor, a river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes." Halah, the same as Calah (Genesis 10, 11, 12), in the region of the Laycus or Zab river, about a day's journey from the ruins of Nineveh. Chabor is a river, and it is remarkable that there is a river rising in the central highlands of Assyria which retains this name Khabor unchanged to the present day. Gozan (pasture) or Zozan, are the highlands of Assyria, which afford pasturage. The region in which the Chabor and the Zab rise, and through which they flow, is peculiarly of this character. The Nestorians repair to it with their numerous flocks, spending the summer on the banks or in the highlands of the Chabor or the Zab. Considering the high authority we possess for regarding Gozan and Zozan as one name, there can be no doubt that this is the Gozan referred to in this passage. cities of the Medes—"villages," according to the Syriac and Vulgate versions, or "mountains," according to the Septuagint. The Medish inhabitants of Gozan, having revolted, had been destroyed by the kings of Assyria, and nothing was more natural than that they should wish to place in it an industrious people, like the captive Israelites, while it was well suited to their pastoral life. [GRANT'S NESTORIANS.]

5-41. SAMARIA TAKEN, AND ISRAEL FOR THEIR SINS CARRIED CAPTIVE. 7. For so it was that the children of Israel had sinned—There is here given a very full and impressive vindication of the Divine procedure in punishing his highly privileged, but rebellious and apostate people. No wonder that amid so gross a perversion of the worship of the true God, and the national propensity to do reverence to idols, the Divine patience was exhausted; and that the God whom they had forsaken permitted them to go into captivity, that they might learn the difference between His service and that of their despotic conquerors. 24. the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon, &c.—This was not Shalmaneser, but Esar-haddon (Ezekiel 4, 2). The places vacated by the captive Israelites he ordered to be occupied by several colonies of his own subjects from Babylon, and other provinces. from Cuthah—The Chaldee form of Cush or Susiana, now Khusistan. Ava—Supposed to be Ahivaz, situated on the river Karuns, which falls into the head of the Persian Gulf. Hamath—On the Orontes. Sepharvaim—Siphara, a city on the Euphrates above Babylon. placed them to dwell in the cities of Sa- maria, &c.—It must not be supposed that the Israelites were universally removed to a man. A remnant was left, chiefly, however, of the poor and lower classes, with whom these foreign colonists mingled; so that the prevailing character of society about Samaria was heathen, not Israelite; for the Assyrian colonists became masters of the land, and, forming partial intermarriages with the remnant Jews, the inhabitants became a mongrel race, no longer a people of Ephraim (Isaiah 7. 6), who, imperfectly instructed in the creed of the Jews, acquired also a mongrel doctrine. Being too few to replenish the land, lions, by which the land had been infested (Judges 14. 5; 1 Samuel 17. 34; 1 Kings 13. 24; 20. 36; Song 4. 8), multiplied and committed frequent ravages upon them. Recognizing in these attacks a judgment from the God of the land, whom they had not worshipped, they petitioned the Assyrian court to send them some Jewish priests who might instruct them in the right way of serving Him. The king, in compliance with their request, sent them one of the exiled priests of Israel, who established his headquarters at Beth-el, and taught them how they should fear the Lord. It is not said that he took a copy of the Pentateuch with him, out of which he might teach them. Oral teaching was much better fitted for the superstitious people than instruction out of a written book. He could teach them more effectually by word of mouth. Believing that he would adopt the best and simplest method for them, it is unlikely that he took the written law with him, and so gave origin to the Samaritan copy of the Pentateuch. [DAVIDSON'S CRITICISM.] Besides, it is evident from his being one of the exiled priests, and from his settlement at Beth-el, that he was not a Levite, but one of the calf-worshipping priests, and, consequently, that his instructions would be neither sound nor efficient. 29. Howbeit every nation made gods of their own—These Assyrian colonists, however, though instructed in the worship, and acknowledging the being of the God of Israel, did not suppose him to be the only God. Like other heathens, they combined his worship with that of their own gods, and as they formed a promiscuous society from different nations or provinces, a variety of idols was acknowledged among them. 30. Succoth-benoth—i. e., the "tents or booths of the daughters," similar to those in which the Babylonian damsels celebrated impure rites (Amos 2. 8). Nergal—The Jewish writers say this idol was in the form of a cock, and it is certain that a cock is often associated with a priest on the Assyrian monuments. [LAYARD.] But modern critics, looking to the astrological character of Assyrian idolatry, generally consider Nergal as the planet Mars, the god of war. The name of this idol formed part of the appellation of two of the king of Babylon's princes (Jeremiah 39. 3). Ashima—An idol under the form of an entirely bald he-goat. 31. Nibhaz—Under that of a dog—that Egyptian form of animal-worship having prevailed in ancient Syria, as is evident from the image of a large dog at the mouth of the Nahr-el-Kelb or Dog-river. Tartak—According to the rabbis, was in the form of an ass, but others understand it as a planet of ill-omen, probably Saturn. Adrammelech—Supposed by some to be the same as Molech, and in Assyrian mythology to stand for the sun. It was worshipped in the form of a mule—others maintain in that of a peacock. Anammelech—Worshipped in the form of a hare, others say in that of a goat. 34. Unto this day—The time of the Babylonian exile, when this book was composed. Their religion was a strange medley or compound of the service of God and the service of idols. Such was the first settlement of the people, afterwards called Samaritans, who were sent from Assyria to colonize the land, when the kingdom of Israel, after having continued 356 years, was overthrown.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Ver. 1-3. HEZEKIAH'S GOOD REIGN. Hezekiah . . . began to reign. Twenty and five years old—According to this statement (cf. ch. 16. 2), he must have been born when his father Ahaz was no more than eleven years old. Paternity at an age so early is not unprecedented in the warm climates of the south, where the human frame is matured sooner than in our northern regions. But the case admits of solution in a different way. It was customary for the later kings of Israel to assume their son and heir into partnership in the government during their lives; and as Hezekiah began to reign in the third year of Hoshea (v. 1), and Hoshea in the twelfth year of Ahaz (ch. 17. 1), it is evident that Hezekiah began to reign in the fourteenth year of Ahaz his father, and so reigned two or three years before his father's death. So that, at the beginning of his reign in conjunction with his father, he might be only twenty-two or three, and Ahaz a few years older than the common calculation makes him. Or the case may be solved thus: As the ancient writers, in the computation of time, take notice of the year they mention, whether finished or newly begun, so Ahaz might be near twenty-one years old at the beginning of his reign, and near seventeen years older at his death; while, on the other hand, Hezekiah, when he began to reign, might be just entering into his twenty-fifth year, and so Ahaz would be near fourteen years old when his son Hezekiah was born—no uncommon age for a young man to become a father in southern latitudes. [PATRICK.]

4-37. HE DESTROYS IDOLATRY. 4. He removed the high places and brake the images, &c.—The methods adopted by this good king for extirpating idolatry, and accomplishing a thorough reformation in religion, are fully detailed (2 Chronicles 20. 3; 31. 19). But they are here indicated very briefly, and in a sort of passing allusion. brake in pieces the brazen serpent—The preservation of this remarkable relic of antiquity (Numbers 21. 5-10), might, like the pot of manna and Aaron's rod, have remained an interesting and instructive monument of the Divine goodness and mercy to the Israelites in the wilderness; and it must have required the exercise of no small courage and resolution to destroy it. But in the progress of degeneracy it had become an object of idolatrous worship; and as the interests of true religion rendered its demolition necessary, Hezekiah, by taking this bold step, consulted both the glory of God and the good of his country. unto these days the children of Israel did burn incense to it—It is not to be supposed that this superstitious reverence had been paid to it ever since the time of Moses, for such idolatry would not have been tolerated either by David or by Solomon in the early part of his reign, by Asa or Jehoshaphat had they been aware of such a folly. But the probability is, that the introduction of this superstition does not date earlier than the time when the family of Ahab, by their alliance with the throne of Judah, exercised a pernicious influence in paving the way for all kinds of idolatry. It is possible, however, as some think, that its origin may have arisen out of a misapprehension of Moses' language (Numbers 21. 8). Serpent-worship, how revolting soever it may appear, was an extensively diffused form of idolatry, and it would obtain an easier reception in Israel that many of the neighbouring nations, such as the Egyptians and Phœnicians, adored idol gods in the form of serpents as the emblems of health and immortality. 5. he trusted in the Lord God of Israel—Without invoking the aid or purchasing the succour of foreign auxiliaries like Asa (1 Kings 15. 18, 19) and Ahaz (ch. 16. 17; Isaiah 7), so that after him was none like him among all the kings of Judah—Of course David and Solomon are excepted, they having had the sovereignty of the whole country. In the petty kingdom of Judah, Josiah alone had a similar testimony borne to him (ch. 23. 25). But even he was surpassed by Hezekiah, who set about a national reformation at the beginning of his reign, which Josiah did not. The pious character and the excellent course of Hezekiah was prompted, amongst other secondary influences, by a sense of the calamities his father's wicked career had brought on the country, as well as by the counsels of Isaiah. 7. he rebelled against the king of Assyria—i. e., the yearly tribute his father had stipulated to pay, he, with imprudent haste, withdrew. Pursuing the policy of a truly theocratic sovereign, he was, through the Divine blessing which rested on his government, raised to a position of great public and national strength. Shalmaneser had withdrawn from Palestine, being engaged in a war with Tyre, or probably was dead; and assuming, consequently, that full independent sovereignty which God had settled on the house of David, he both shook off the Assyrian yoke, and, by an energetic movement against the Philistines, recovered from that people the territory which they had taken from his father Ahaz. (2 Chronicles 28. 18.) 13. Sennacherib—The son and successor of Shalmaneser. all the fenced cities of Judah—Not absolutely the whole of them; for, besides the capital, some strong fortresses held out against the invader (v. 17; ch. 19. 8). The following account of Sennacherib's invasion of Judah and the remarkable destruction of his army, is repeated almost verbatim in 2 Chronicles 33.; and Isaiah 36., 37. The expedition seems to have been directed against Egypt, the conquest of which was long a leading object of ambition with the Assyrian monarchs; but the invasion of Judah necessarily preceded, that country being the key to Egypt, the highway through which the conquerors from Upper Asia had to pass, and having at this time formed a league of mutual defence with Egypt (v. 24). Moreover, it was now laid completely open by the transplantation of Israel to Assyria. Overrunning Palestine, Sennacherib laid siege to the fortress of Lachish, which lay seven Roman miles from Eleutheropolis, and therefore south-west of Jerusalem on the way to Egypt. [ROBINSON.] Amongst the interesting illustrations of sacred history furnished by the recent Assyrian excavations, is a series of bas-reliefs, representing the siege of a town, which the inscription on the sculpture shows to be Lachish, and the figure of a king, whose name is given, on the same inscription, as Sennacherib. The legend, sculptured over the head of the king, ran thus: "Sennacherib, the mighty king, king of the country of Assyria, sitting on the throne of judgment before the city of Lachish (Lakhisha), I give permission for its slaughter." [NINEVEH and BABYLON.] This minute confirmation of the truth of the Bible narrative is given not only by the name Lachish, which is contained in the inscription, but from the physiognomy of the captives brought before the king, which is unmistakably Jewish. 14. he sent to Lachish, saying, . . . that which thou puttest on me will I bear—Disappointed in his expectations of aid from Egypt, and feeling himself unable to resist so mightily a conqueror who was menacing Jerusalem itself, Hezekiah made his submission. The payment of 300 talents of silver, and 30 talents of gold—£351,000—brought a temporary respite; but, in raising the imposed tribute, he was obliged not only to drain all the treasures of the palace and the temple, but even to strip the doors and pillars of the sacred edifice of the gold that adorned them.

SENNACHERIB BESIAGES JERUSALEM. 17. king of Assyria sent Tartan—general. (Isaiah 20. 1.) Rabsaris—chief of the eunuchs. Rab-shakeh—chief cup-bearer. These were the great officers employed in delivering Sennacherib's insulting message to Hezekiah. On the walls of the palace of Sennacherib, at Khorsabad, certain figures have been identified with the officers of that sovereign mentioned in Scripture. In particular, the figures, Rab-shakeh, Rabsaris, and Tartan, appear as full-length portraits of the persons holding those offices in the reign of Sennacherib, and probably the very individuals sent on this embassy. with a great host to Jerusalem—Engaged in a campaign of three years in Egypt, Sennacherib was forced by the king of Ethiopia to retreat, and discharging his rage against Jerusalem, sent an immense army to summon it to surrender. (See on 2 Chronicles 32. 30.) the conduit of the upper pool, &c.—Is the conduit which went from the reservoir of the Upper Gihon (Birket el Mamilla) to the lower pool, the Birket es Sultan, the highway of the fuller's field—the public road which passed by that district, which had been assigned them for carrying on their business without the city, on account of the unpleasant smell. [KEIL.] 18. when they had called to the king—Hezekiah did not make a personal appearance, but commissioned his three principal ministers to meet the Assyrian deputies at a conference outside the city walls. Eliakim—Lately promoted to be master of the royal household. (Isaiah 22. 20.) Shebna—Removed for his pride and presumption (Isaiah 22. 15) from that office, though still royal secretary. Joah . . . the recorder—i. e., the keeper of the chronicles, an important officer in Eastern countries. 19. Rab-shakeh said—The insolent tone he assumed appears surprising. But this boasting, both as to matter and manner, his highly coloured picture of his master's powers and resources, and the impossibility of Hezekiah making any effective resistance, heightened by all the arguments and figures which an Oriental imagination could suggest, has been paralleled in all, except the blasphemy, by other messages of defiance sent on similar occasions in the history of the East. 27. that they may eat, &c.—This was designed to show the dreadful extremities to which, in the threatened siege, the people of Jerusalem would be reduced.

CHAPTER XIX.

VER. 1-5. HEZEKIAH IN DEEP AFFLICTION. 1. when King Hezekiah heard it, he rent his clothes, &c.—The rending of his clothes was a mode of expressing horror at the daring blasphemy—the assumption of sackcloth a sign of his mental distress—his entrance into the temple to pray, the refuge of a pious man in affliction, and the forwarding an account of the Assyrian's speech to Isaiah was to obtain the prophet's counsel and comfort. The expression in which the message was conveyed described, by a strong figure, the desperate condition of the kingdom, together with their own inability to help themselves; and it intimated also a hope, that the blasphemous defiance of Jehovah's power by the impious Assyrian might lead to some direct interposition for the vindication of his honour and supremacy to all heathen gods. 4. the living God—Is a most significant expression taken in connection with the senseless deities that Rab-shakeh boasted were unable to resist his master's victorious arms.

6, 7. COMFORTED BY ISAIAH. 6. Isaiah said . . . Be not afraid—The prophet's answer was most cheering, as it held out the prospect of a speedy deliverance from the invader. The blast, the rumour, the fall by the sword, contained a brief prediction that was soon fulfilled in all the three particulars—viz., the alarm that hastened his retreat, the destruction that overtook his army, and the violent death that suddenly ended his career.

8-13. SENNACHERIB SENDS A BLASPHEMOUS LETTER TO HEZEKIAH. 8. Rab-shakeh . . . found the king of Assyria warring against Libnah—whether Lachish had fallen or not, is not said. But Sennacherib had transferred his battering-rams against the apparently neighbouring fortress of Libnah (Joshua 10. 29; cf. 31; 15. 42), where the chief cup-bearer reported the execution of his mission. 9. when he heard say of Tirhakah, Behold, he is come out to fight against thee, &c.—This was the "rumour" to which Isaiah referred. Tirhakah reigned in Upper Egypt, while So or Sabaco ruled in Lower Egypt. He was a powerful monarch, another Sesostris, and both he and Sabaco have left many monuments of their greatness. The name and figure of Tirhakah receiving war-captives, are still seen in the Egyptian temple of Medinet Abou. This was the expected succour which was sneered at (ch. 16. 21) by Rab-shakeh as "a bruised reed." Rage against Hezekiah for allying himself with Egypt, or the hope of being better able to meet this attack from the south, induced him, after hearing the rumour of Tirhakah's advance, to send a menacing letter to Hezekiah, in order that he might force the king of Judah to an immediate surrender of his capital. This letter, couched in the same vaunting and imperious style as the speech of Rab-shakeh, exceeded it in blasphemy, and contained a larger enumeration of conquered places, with the view of terrifying Hezekiah, and showing him the utter hopelessness of all attempts at resistance.

14-31. HEZEKIAH'S PRAYER. 14. Hezekiah received the letter . . . and went up into the house of the Lord—Hezekiah, after reading it, hastened into the temple, spread it in the child-like confidence of faith before the Lord, as containing taunts deeply affecting the Divine honour, and implored deliverance from this proud defier of God and man. The devout spirit of this prayer, the recognition of the Divine being in the plenitude of His majesty—so strikingly contrasted with the fancy of the Assyrians as to his merely local power—his acknowledgment of the conquests obtained over other lands, and of the destruction of their wooden idols which, according to the Assyrian practice, were committed to the flames—because their tutelary deities were no gods; and the object for which he supplicated the Divine interposition, that all the kingdoms of the earth might know that the Lord was the only God;—this was an attitude worthy to be assumed by a pious theocratic king of the chosen people. 20. Then Isaiah . . . sent—A revelation having been made to Isaiah, the prophet announced to the king that his prayer was heard. The prophetic message consisted of three different portions:—First, Sennacherib is apostrophized (v. 21-23) in a highly poetical strain, admirably descriptive of the turgid vanity, haughty pretensions, and presumptuous impiety of the Assyrian despot. Secondly, Hezekiah is addressed (v. 29-31), and a sign given him of the promised deliverance—viz., that for two years the presence of the enemy would interrupt the peaceful pursuits of husbandry, but on the third year the people would be in circumstances to till their fields and vineyards, and reap the fruits as formerly. Thirdly, the issue of Sennacherib's invasion is announced (v. 32-34). 33. shall not come into this city—Nor approach near enough to shoot an arrow, not even from the most powerful engine which throws missiles to the greatest distance, nor shall he occupy any part of the ground before the city by a fence, a mantelet, or covering for men employed in a siege, nor cast (raise) a bank (mound) of earth, overtopping the city walls, whence he may see and command the interior of the city. None of these, which were the principal modes of attack followed in ancient military art, should Sennacherib be permitted to adopt. Though the army under Rab-shakeh marched towards Jerusalem, and encamped at a little distance with a view to blockade it, they delayed laying siege to it, probably waiting till the king, having taken Lachish and Libnah, should bring up his detachment, that with the whole combined forces of Assyria they might invest the capital. So determined was this invader to conquer Judah and the neighbouring countries (Isaiah 10. 7), that nothing but a Divine interposition could have saved Jerusalem. It might be supposed that the powerful monarch who overran Palestine, and carried away the tribes of Israel, would leave memorials of his deeds on sculptured slabs, or votive bulls. A long and minute account of this expedition is contained in the Annals of Sennacherib, a translation of which has recently been made into English, and, in his remarks upon it, Colonel Rawlinson says the Assyrian version confirms the most important features of the Scripture account. The Jewish and Assyrian narratives of the campaign are, indeed, on the whole, strikingly illustrative of each other. [OUTLINES OF ASSYRIAN HISTORY.]

35, 36. AN ANGEL DESTROYS THE ASSYRIANS. 35. in the morning . . . they were all dead corpses—It was the miraculous interposition of the Almighty that defended Jerusalem. As to the secondary agent employed in the destruction of the Assyrian army, it is most probable that it was effected by a hot south wind—the simoom—such as to this day often envelops and destroys whole caravans. This conjecture is supported by v. 7, and Jeremiah 51. 1. The destruction was during night; the officers and soldiers, being in full security, were negligent; their discipline was relaxed; the camp-guards were not alert, or perhaps they themselves were the first taken off, and those who slept, not wrapped up, imbibed the poison plentifully. If this had been an evening of dissolute mirth (no uncommon thing in a camp), their joy (perhaps for a victory), or "the first night of their attacking the city," says Josephus, became, by its effects, one means of their destruction. [CALMET'S FRAGMENT.] 36. So Sennacherib, king of Assyria, went and returned—The same way as he came (v. 33). The route is described (Isaiah 10). The early chariot track near Beyrout is on the rocky edge of Lebanon, which is skirted by the ancient Lycus (Nahr-el Kelb.) On the perpendicular face of the limestone rock, at different heights, are seen slabs with Assyrian inscriptions, which having been deciphered, are found to contain the name of Sennacherib. Thus, by the preservation of these tablets, the wrath of the Assyrian invaders is made to praise the Lord. dwelt at Nineveh—This statement implies a considerable period of time, and his Annals carry on his history at least five years after his disastrous campaign at Jerusalem. No record of his catastrophe can be found, as the Assyrian practice was to record victories alone. The sculptures give only the sunny side of the picture.

37. SENNACHERIB SLAIN. 37. as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch—Assaræ, or Asshur, the head of the Assyrian Pantheon, represented not as a vulture-headed figure—that is now ascertained to be a priest—but as a winged figure in a circle, which was the guardian deity of Assyria. The king is represented on the monuments standing or kneeling beneath this figure, his hand raised in sign of prayer or adoration. his sons smote him with the sword—Sennacherib's temper, exasperated, probably, by his reverses, displayed itself in the most savage cruelty and intolerable tyranny over his subjects and slaves, till at length he was assassinated by his two sons, whom, it is said, he intended to sacrifice to pacify the gods, and dispose them to grant him a return of prosperity. The parricides, taking flight into Armenia, a third son, Esar-haddon, ascended the throne.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1-7. HEZEKIAH'S LIFE LENGTHENED. 1. In those days was Hezekiah sick—As his reign lasted twenty-nine years (ch. 18. 2), and his kingdom was invaded in the fourteenth (ch. 18. 13), it is evident that this sudden and severe illness must have occurred in the very year of the Syrian invasion. Between the threatened attack and the actual appearance of the enemy, this incident in Hezekiah's history must have taken place. But according to the usage of the sacred historian, the story of Sennacherib is completed before entering on what was personal to the king of Judah (see also Isaiah 38. 39). set thine house in order—Isaiah, being of the blood-royal, might have access to the king's private house. But since the prophet was commissioned to make this announcement, the message must be considered as referring to matters of higher importance than the settlement of the king's domestic and private affairs. It must have related chiefly to the state of his kingdom, he having not as yet any son (cf. v. 6 with ch. 21. 1). for thou shalt die, and not live—The disease was of a malignant character, and would be mortal in its effects, unless the healing power of God should miraculously interpose. 2. he turned his face to the wall—Not like Ahab (1 Kings 21. 4), in fretful discontent, but in order to secure a better opportunity for prayer. 3. remember now how I have walked before thee, &c.—The course of Hezekiah's thoughts was evidently directed to the promise made to David and his successors on the throne (1 Kings 8. 25). He had kept the conditions as faithfully as human infirmity admitted, and as he had been all along free from any of those great crimes by which, through the judgment of God, human life was often suddenly cut short, his great grief might arise partly from the love of life, partly from the obscurity of the Mosaic dispensation, where life and immortality had not been fully brought to light, and partly from his plans for the reformation of his kingdom being frustrated by his death. He pleaded the fulfilment of the promise. 4. afore Isaiah was gone out into the middle court—Of the royal castle. 5. Thus saith . . . the God of David thy father—An immediate answer was given to his prayer, containing an assurance that the Lord was mindful of his promise to David, and would accomplish it in Hezekiah's experience, both by the prolongation of his life, and his deliverance from the Assyrians. on the third day—The perfect recovery from a dangerous sleekness, within so short a time, shows the miraculous character of the cure (see his thanksgiving song, Isaiah 38. 9). The disease cannot be ascertained; but the text gives no hint that the plague was raging then in Jerusalem; and although Arab physicians apply a cataplasm of figs to plague-boils, they also do so in other cases, as figs are considered useful in ripening and soothing inflammatory ulcers.

8-20. THE SUN GOES TEN DEGREES BACKWARD. 8. Hezekiah said unto Isaiah, What will be the sign that the Lord shall heal me—His recovery in the course of nature was so unlooked for, that the king asked for some token to justify his reliance on the truth of the prophet's communication; and the sign he specified was granted to him. The shadow of the sun went back upon the dial of Ahaz the ten degrees it had gone down. Various conjectures have been formed as to this dial. The word in the original is "degrees," or "steps," and hence many commentators have supposed that it was a stair, so artfully contrived, that the shadow on the steps indicated the hours and course of the sun. But it is more probable that it was a proper instrument, and, from the Hebrews having no term to designate it, that it was one of the foreign novelties imported from Babylon by Ahaz. It seems to have been of such magnitude, and so placed in the court, that Isaiah could point to it, and the king see it, from his chamber. The retrogression of the sun's shadow on the dial was miraculously accomplished by the omnipotent power of God; but the phenomenon was temporary, local, confined to the notice, and intended for the satisfaction, only of Hezekiah and his court. 12-19. Berodach-baladan—(Isaiah 39.) The first king of Babylon mentioned in sacred history; formerly its rulers were viceroys of the Assyrian monarchs. This individual threw off the yoke, and, asserting his independence, made with varying success, a long and obstinate resistance. [RAWLINSON'S OUTLINES.] The message of congratulation to Hezekiah, was, in all likelihood, accompanied with proposals for a defensive alliance against their common Assyrian enemy. The king of Judah, flattered with this honour, showed the ambassadors all his treasures, his armoury and warlike stores; and his motive for this was evidently that the Babylonian deputies might be the more induced to prize his friendship. the silver and the gold—He paid so much tribute to Sennacherib as exhausted his treasury (ch. 18. 16). But, after the destruction of Sennacherib, presents were brought him from various quarters, out of respect to a king who, by his faith and prayer, saved his country; and besides, it is by no means improbable that from the corpses in the Assyrian camp, all the gold and silver he had paid might be recovered. The vain display, however, was offensive to his Divine liege-lord, who sent Isaiah to reprove him. The answer he gave the prophet (v. 14) shows how he was elated by the compliment of their visit; but it was wrong, as presenting a bait for the cupidity of these rapacious foreigners, who, at no distant period, would return and pillage his country, and transfer all the possessions he ostentatiously displayed to Babylon, as well as his posterity to be court attendants in that country—(see on 2 Chronicles 32. 31). 19. Good is the word of the Lord—Indicating a humble and pious resignation to the Divine will. The concluding part of his reply was uttered after a pause, and was probably an ejaculation to himself, expressing his thankfulness, that, though great afflictions should befall his descendants, the execution of the Divine judgment was to be suspended during his own lifetime. 20. pool and a conduit—(See on 2 Chronicles 32. 30.)

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 1-18. MANASSEH'S WICKED REIGN, AND GREAT IDOLATRY. 1. Manasseh was twelve years old when he began to reign—He must have been born three years after his father's recovery; and his minority, spent under the influence of guardians who were hostile to the religious principles and reforming policy of his father, may account in part for the anti-theocratic principles of his reign. The work of religious reformation which Hezekiah had zealously carried on was but partially accomplished. There was little appearance of its influence on the heart and manners of the people at large. On the contrary, the true fear of God had vanished from the mass of the people; corruption and vice increased, and were openly practised (Isaiah 28. 7, &c.) by the degenerate leaders, who, having got the young prince Manasseh into their power, directed his education, trained him up in their views, and seduced him into the open patronage of idolatry. Hence, when he became sovereign, he introduced the worship of idols, the restoration of high places, and the erection of altars or pillars to Baal, and the placing, in the temple of God itself, a graven image of Asherah, the sacred or symbolic tree, which represented "all the host of heaven." This was not idolatry, but pure star worship, of Chaldaic and Assyrian origin. [KEIL.] The sun, as among the Persians, had chariots and horses consecrated to it (ch. 23. 11), and incense was offered to the stars on the housetops (ch. 23. 12; 2 Chronicles 33. 5; Jeremiah 19. 13; Zephaniah 1. 5), and in the temple area with the face turned toward the sunrise (Ezekiel 8. 16). 5. the two courts of the house of the Lord—The court of the priests and the large court of the people. 6. made his son pass through the fire—(See on ch. 16. 3.) observed times—From an observation of the clouds, used enchantments—Jugglery and spells, dealt with familiar spirits—Sept., ventriloquists, who pretended to ask counsel of a familiar spirit, and gave the response received from him to others, and wizards—Wise or knowing ones, who pretended to reveal secrets, to recover things lost, and hidden treasure, and interpret dreams. A great influx of these impostors had, at various times, poured from Chaldea into the land of Israel to pursue their gainful occupations, especially during the reigns of the latter kings; and Manasseh was not only their liberal patron, but zealous to appear himself an adept in the arts. He raised them to be an influential class at his court, as they were in that of Assyria and Babylon, where nothing was done till they had ascertained the lucky hour and promised a happy issue. 7. And he set a graven image—The placing of the Asherah within the precincts of the temple, which was dedicated to the worship of the true God, is dwelt upon as the most aggravated outrage of the royal idolater. 8. neither will I make the feet of Israel move . . . out of the land which I gave their fathers—Alluding to the promise (2 Samuel 7. 10). only if they will observe, &c.—This condition was expressed from the first plantation of Israel in Canaan. But that people not only did not keep it, but through the pernicious influence of Manasseh, were seduced into greater excesses of idolatrous corruption than even the original Canaanites. 10-17. the Lord spake by his servants the prophets—These were Hosea, Joel, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Isaiah. Their counsels, admonitions, and prophetic warnings, were put on record in the national chronicles (2 Chronicles 33. 18), and now form part of the sacred canon. 12. whosoever heareth of it, both his ears shall tingle—A strong metaphorical form of announcing an extraordinary and appalling event (see 1 Samuel 8. 11; Jeremiah 19. 3; also Habakkuk 1. 5). 13. the line of Samaria, and the plummet of the house of Ahab—Captives doomed to destruction were sometimes grouped together, and marked off by means of a measuring-line and plummet (2 Samuel 8. 2; Isaiah 34. 11; Amos 7. 7); so that the line of Samaria means the line drawn for the destruction of Samaria; the plummet of the house of Ahab, for exterminating his apostate family; and the import or the threatening declaration here is, that Judah would be utterly destroyed, as Samaria and the dynasty of Ahab had been. I will wipe Jerusalem, &c.—The same doom is denounced more strongly in a figure unmistakably significant. 14. I will forsake the remnant of mine inheritance—The people of Judah, who of all the chosen people alone remained. The consequence of the Lord's forsaking them would be their fall into the power of their enemies. 16. Moreover, Manasseh shed innocent blood—Not content with the patronage and the practice of idolatrous abomination, he was a cruel persecutor of all who did not conform. The land was deluged with the blood of good men; amongst whom it is traditionally said Isaiah suffered a horrid death, by being sawn asunder (see on Hebrews 11. 37).

19-26. AMON'S WICKED REIGN. 18. Amon his son reigned in his stead—This prince continued the idolatrous policy of his father; and, after an inglorious reign of two years, was massacred by some of his own domestics. The people slew the regicide conspirators, and placed his son Josiah on the throne.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 1, 2. JOSIAH'S GOOD REIGN. 1. Josiah was eight years old when he began to reign—Happier than his grandfather Manasseh, he seems to have fallen during his minority under the care of better guardians, who trained him in the principles and practice of piety; and so strongly had his young affections been enlisted on the side of true and undefiled religion, that he continued to adhere all his life, with undeviating perseverance, to the cause of God and righteousness.

3-7. HE PROVIDES FOR THE REPAIR OF THE TEMPLE. 3. in the eighteenth year of King Josiah—Previous to this period, he had commenced the work of national reformation. The preliminary steps had been already taken; not only the builders were employed, but money had been brought by all the people, and received by the Levites at the door, and various other preparations had been made. But the course of this narrative turns on one interesting incident which happened in the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign, and hence that date is specified. In fact the whole land was thoroughly purified from every object and all traces of idolatry. The king now addressed himself to the repair and embellishment of the temple, and gave directions to Hilkiah the high priest to take a general survey, in order to ascertain what was necessary to be done (see on 2 Chronicles 34. 8-15).

8-15. HILKIAH FINDS THE BOOK OF THE LAW. 8. Hilkiah said . . . I have found the book of the law in the house of the Lord, &c.—i. e., the law of Moses—the Pentateuch. It was the temple copy—which, having been laid (Deuteronomy 31. 25, 26) beside the ark in the most holy place, and during the ungodly reigns of Manasseh and Amon—perhaps under Ahaz, when the temple itself had been profaned by idols, and the ark also (2 Chronicles 35. 3) removed from its site—was somehow lost, and was now found again during the repair of the temple. [KEIL.] Delivered by Hilkiah the discoverer to Shaphan the scribe, it was by the latter shown and read to the king. It is thought, with great probability, that the passage read to the king, and by which the royal mind was so greatly excited, was a portion of Deuteronomy, the 28th, 29th and 30th chapters, in which is recorded a renewal of the national covenant, and an enumeration of the terrible threats and curses denounced against all who violated the law, whether prince or people. The impressions of grief and terror which the reading produced on the mind of Josiah have seemed to many unaccountable. But, as it is certain from the extensive and familiar knowledge displayed by the prophets, that there were numbers of other copies in popular circulation, the king must have known its sacred contents in some degree. But he might have been a stranger to the passage read him, or the reading of it might, in the peculiar circumstances, have found a way to his heart in a manner that he never felt before. His strong faith in the Divine word, and his painful consciousness that the woeful and long-continued apostasies of the nation had exposed them to the infliction of the judgments denounced, must have come with overwhelming force on the heart of so pious a prince. 13-15. the king commanded . . . go, inquire of the Lord for me, &c.—The agitated feelings of the king prompted him to ask immediate counsel how to avert those curses under which his kingdom lay; and forthwith a deputation of his principal officers was sent to one endowed with the prophetic spirit. Ahikam, a friend of Jeremiah (Jeremiah 26. 24). Achbor—or Abdon (2 Chronicles 34. 20), a man of influence at court (Jeremiah 26. 22). The occasion was urgent, and therefore they were sent—not to Zephaniah (Zephaniah 1. 1), who was perhaps young—nor to Jeremiah, who was probably absent at his house in Anathoth, but to one who was at hand and known for her prophetic gifts—to Huldah, who was probably at this time a widow. Her husband Shallum was grandson of one Harhas, "keeper of the wardrobe." If this means the priestly wardrobe, he must have been a Levite. But it probably refers to the royal wardrobe. she dwelt . . . in the college—Rather in the Misnah, taking the original word as a proper name, not a school or college, but a particular suburb of Jerusalem. She was held in such veneration that Jewish writers say she and Jehoiada the priest were the only persons not of the house of David (2 Chronicles 24. 16) who were ever buried in Jerusalem. 15. she said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, tell the man that sent you—On being consulted, she delivered an oracular response in which judgment was blended with mercy; for it announced the impending calamities that at no distant period were to overtake the city and its inhabitants, but at the same time consoled the king with an assurance that this season of punishment and sorrow should not be during his lifetime, on account of the faith, penitence and pious zeal for the Divine glory and worship which, in his public capacity and with his royal influence, he had displayed.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 1-3. JOSIAH CAUSES THE LAW TO BE READ. 1. the king sent and gathered all the elders—This pious and patriotic king, not content with the promise of his own security, felt, after Huldah's response, an increased desire to avert the threatened calamities from his kingdom and people. Knowing the richness of the Divine clemency and grace to the penitent, he convened the elders of the people, and placing himself at their head, accompanied by the collective body of the inhabitants, went in solemn procession to the temple, where he ordered the book of the law to be read to the assembled audience, and covenanted, with the unanimous concurrence of his subjects, to adhere steadfastly to all the commandments of the Lord. It was an occasion of solemn interest, closely connected with a great national crisis, and the beautiful example of piety in the highest quarter would exert a salutary influence over all classes of the people in animating their devotions and encouraging their return to the faith of their fathers. 2. he read in their ears—i. e., caused to be read. 3. all the people stood to the covenant—i. e., they agreed to the proposals made; they assented to what was required of them.

4-23. HE DESTROYS IDOLATRY. 4. the king commanded Hilkiah, &c.—i. e., the high priest and other priests, for there was not a variety of official gradations in the temple. all the vessels, &c.—the whole apparatus of idol worship. burned them without Jerusalem—The law required them to be consigned to the flames (Deuteronomy 7. 25). in the fields of Kidron—Most probably that part of the valley of Kidron, where lies Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives. It is a level, spacious basin, abounding at present with plantations. [ROBINSON.] The brook winds along the east and south of the city, the channel of which is throughout a large portion of the year almost or wholly dry, except after heavy rains, when it suddenly swells and overflows. There was emptied all the impurities of the temple (2 Chronicles 29. 15, 16) and the city. His reforming predecessors had ordered the mutilated relics of idolatry to be thrown into that receptacle of filth (1 Kings 15. 13; 2 Chronicles 15. 16; 30. 14), but Josiah, while he imitated their piety, far outstripped them in zeal; for he caused the ashes of the burnt wood and the fragments of the broken metal to be collected and conveyed to Beth-el, in order thenceforth to associate ideas of horror and aversion with that place, as odious for the worst pollutions. 5. put down the idolatrous priests—Hebrew, Chemarim, "scorched," i. e., Guebres, or fire-worshippers, distinguished by a girdle (Ezekiel 23. 14-17) or belt of wool and camel's hair, twisted round the body twice and tied with four knots, which had a symbolic meaning, and made it a defence against evil. them also that burned incense unto Baal, to the sun, and to the moon, &c.—or Baal-shemesh—for Baal was sometimes considered the sun. This form of false worship was not by images, but pure star-worship, borrowed from the old Assyrians. and—Rather, even, to all the host of heaven. 6. brought out the grove—i. e., Asherah, the mystic tree, placed by Manasseh in the temple, removed by him after his conversion, and replaced in the sanctuary by his wicked son Amon. Josiah had it taken to Kidron, burnt the wood, ground the metal about it to powder, and strewed the ashes "on the graves of the children of the people." The poor were buried in a common on part of the valley of Kidron. But reference is here made to the graves "of those that had sacrificed" (2 Chronicles 34. 4). 7. brake down the houses of the sodomites—not solid houses, but tents, called elsewhere Sucoth-benothi, the booths of the young women who were devoted to the service of Asherah, for which they made embroidered hangings, and in which they gave themselves to unbridled revelry and lust. Or the hangings might be for Asherah itself, as it is a popular superstition in the East to hang pieces of cloth on trees. 8. he brought all the priests out of the cities of Judah, and defiled the high places, &c.—Numbers of the Levitical order, finding in the reigns of Manasseh and Amon the temple worship abolished, and the tithes and other offerings alienated, had been betrayed into the folly of officiating on high places, and presenting such sacrifices as were brought to them. These irregularities, even though the object of that worship was the true God, were prohibited in the law (Deuteronomy 12. 11). Those who had been guilty of this sin, Josiah brought to Jerusalem, and, regarding them as defiled, debarred them from the service of the temple, but gave them an allowance out of the temple revenues, like the lame and disabled members of the priesthood (Leviticus 21. 21, 22). from Geba to Beersheba—the most northern and the most southern places in Judah—meaning all parts of the kingdom. the high places . . . which were in the entering in of the gate of Joshua—The governor's house and gate were on the left of the city gate, and close by the entrance of that civic mansion-house were public altars, dedicated, it might be, to the true God, but contrary to his own ordinance of worship (Isaiah 57. 8). 10. Topiath—so called from Toph—a drum—the prevailing opinion among Jewish writers being that the cries of the terrified children made to pass through the fire in that place of idolatrous horror were drowned by the sound of that instrument. 11. took away the horses which the kings of Judah had given to the sun—Among the people who anciently worshipped the sun, horses were usually dedicated to that divinity, from the supposed idea that the sun himself was drawn in a chariot by horses. In some cases these horses were sacrificed; but more commonly they were employed either in the sacred processions to carry the images of the sun, or for the worshippers to ride in every morning to welcome his rise. It seems that the idolatrous kings, Ahaz, Manasseh, and Amon, or their great officers, proceeded on these horses early on each day from the east gate of the temple to salute and worship the sun at his appearing above the horizon. 12. the altars that were on the top of the upper chambers of Ahaz—Altars were reared on the flat roofs of houses, where the worshippers of "the host of heaven" burnt incense (Zephaniah 1. 5; Jeremiah 19. 13). Ahaz had reared altars for this purpose on the oleah, or upper chamber of his palace, and Manasseh on some portion of the roof of the temple. Josiah demolished both of these structures. 13. the high places . . . which Solomon had builded—(See on 1 Kings 11. 7.) the right hand of the Mount of Corruption—The Mount of Olives is a hilly range on the east of Jerusalem. This range has three summits, of which the central one is the Mount of Corruption, so called from the idol temples built there, and of course the hill on the right hand denotes the southernmost peak. Josiah is said not to have destroyed, but only defiled, "the high places on the hill of corruption." It is most probable that Hezekiah had long before demolished the idolatrous temples erected there by Solomon; but, as the superstitions people continued to regard the spot as consecrated ground, Josiah defiled it. 14. filled their places with the bones of men—Every monument of idolatry in his dominions he in like manner destroyed, and the places where they stood he defiled by strewing them with dead men's bones. The presence of a dead carcass rendered both persons and places unclean in the eyes both of Jews and heathens. 15-20. Moreover, the altar that was at Beth-el, &c.—Not satisfied with the removal of every vestige of idolatry from his own dominions, this zealous iconoclast made a tour of inspection through the cities of Samaria and all the territory formerly occupied by the ten tribes, destroying the altars and temples of the high places, consigning the Asherim to the flames, putting to death the priests of the high places, and showing his horror at idolatry by ransacking the sepulchres of idolatrous priests, and strewing the burnt ashes of their bones upon the altars before he demolished them. according to the word of the Lord, which the man of God proclaimed, &c.—In carrying on these proceedings, Josiah was prompted by his own intense hatred of idolatry. But it is remarkable that this act was predicted 326 years before his birth, and his name also was expressly mentioned, as well as the very place where it should be done (1 Kings 13. 2). This is one of the most remarkable prophecies contained in the Bible. 17. what title is that that I see?—The king's attention, it is probable, had been arrested by a tombstone more conspicuous than the rest around it, bearing on an inscription the name of him that lay beneath; and this prompted his curiosity to make the inquiry. the men of the city—not the Assyrian colonists—for they could know nothing about the ancient transactions of the place—but some of the old people who had been allowed to remain, and perhaps the tomb itself might not then have been discoverable, through the effects of time and neglect, had not some "Old Mortality" garnished the sepulchre of the righteous. 21-23. the king commanded all the people, saying, Keep the passover unto the Lord your God, &c.—It was observed with great solemnity, and was attended not only by his own subjects, but by the remnant people from Israel (see on 2 Chronicles 35. 1-19). Many of the Israelites who were at Jerusalem might have heard of, if they did not hear, the law read by Josiah. It is probable that they might even have got a copy of the law, stimulated as they were to the better observance of Jehovah's worship by the unusual and solemn transactions at Jerusalem. 26. Notwithstanding, the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his wrath, &c. The national reformation which Josiah carried on was acquiesced in by the people from submission to the royal will; but they entertained a secret and strong hankering after the suppressed idolatries. Though outwardly purified, their hearts were not right towards God, as appears from many passages of the prophetic writings; their thorough reform was hopeless; and God, who saw no sign of genuine repentance, allowed his decree (ch. 21. 12-15) for the subversion of the kingdom to take fatal effect. 29. In his days Pharaoh-nechoh—(See 2 Chronicles 35. 20-27.)

CHAPTER XXIV.

Vcr. 1-7. JEHOIAKIM PROCURES HIS OWN RUIN. 1. Nebuchadnezzar—The son of Nabopolassar, the founder of the Chaldee monarchy. This invasion took place in the fourth year of Jehoiakim's, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar's reign (Jeremiah 25. 1; cf. 46. 2). The young king of Assyria being probably detained at home on account of his father's demise, despatched, along with the Chaldean troops on his border, an army composed of the tributary nations that were contiguous to Judea, to chastise Jehoiakim's revolt from his yoke. But this hostile band was only an instrument in executing the Divine judgment (v.

2) denounced by the prophets against Judah for the sins of the people; and hence, though marching by the orders of the Assyrian monarch, they are described as sent by the Lord (v. 3). 2. the Lord would not pardon—(see on ch. 23. 26; Jeremiah 15. 1). 6. Jehoiakim slept with his fathers—This phraseology can mean nothing more than that he died; for he was not buried with his royal ancestors; and whether he fell in battle, or his body was subjected to posthumous insults, he was, according to the prediction (Jeremiah 22. 19), not honoured with the rites of sepulture (Jeremiah 36. 30). Jehoiachin his son reigned in his stead—The very brief reign of this prince, which lasted only three months, during which he was a humble vassal of the Assyrians, is scarcely deserving to be taken into account, and therefore is no way contradictory to the prophetic menace denounced against his father (Jeremiah 36. 30). 7. the king of Egypt—i. e., Pharaoh-nechoh.

8, 9. JEHOIACHIN SUCCEEDS HIM. 8. Jehoiachin—i. e., God appointed, contracted into Jeconiah and Coniah (Jeremiah 22. 24), eighteen years old when he began to reign—At the age of eight his father took him into partnership in the government (2 Chronicles 36. 9). He began to reign alone at eighteen. 9. he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord—Untaught by experience, and deaf to the prophetic warnings, he pursued the evil courses which had brought so many disasters upon the royal family as well as the people of Judah. This bad character is figuratively but strongly depicted (Ezekiel 19. 5-7).

10-16. JERUSALEM TAKEN. 10. at that time—Within three months after his accession to the throne; it was the spring of the year (2 Chronicles 36. 10); so early did he indicate a feeling hostile to the interests of his Assyrian liege-lord, by forming a league with Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar sent his generals to besiege Jerusalem, as Jeremiah had foretold (22. 13; 24. 30), and soon after followed in person. Convinced of the hopelessness of making any effectual resistance, Jehoiachin, going to the camp of the besiegers, surrendered (v. 12), in the expectation, probably, of being allowed to retain his throne as a vassal of the Assyrian empire. But Nebuchadnezzar's clemency towards the kings of Judah was now exhausted, so that Jehoiachin was sent as a captive to Babylon, according to Jeremiah's prediction (22. 24), accompanied by the queen-mother (the same who had held that dignity under Jehoahaz) (ch. 23. 31), his generals, and officers. This happened in the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, computing from the time when he was associated with his father in the government. Those that were left consisted chiefly of the poorer sort of people, and the unskilled workmen. The palace and the temple were ransacked. The smaller golden vessels had been taken on the first capture of Jerusalem, and placed by Nebuchadnezzar in the temple of his god as tokens of victory, and used by Belshazzar at his impious feast, for the purpose of rewarding his army with these trophies, amongst which were probably the golden candlesticks, ark, &c. (cf. 2 Chronicles 36. 7; Daniel 1. 2). Now the gold plating was torn off all the larger temple furniture. 13. as the Lord had said—(cf. ch. 20. 17; Isaiah 39. 6; Jeremiah 15. 13; 17. 3). The elite of the nation for rank, usefulness, and moral worth, all who might be useful in Babylon or dangerous in Palestine, were carried off to Babylon, to the number of ten thousand (v. 14). These are specified (v. 15, 16), warriors, 7000; craftsmen and smiths, 1000; kings' wives, officers, and princes, also priests and prophets (Jeremiah 29. 1; Ezekiel 1. 1), 2000; equal to 10,000 captives in all.

17-20. ZEDEKIAH'S EVIL REIGN. 17. the king of Babylon made Mattaniah, his father's brother, king in his stead—Adhering to his former policy of maintaining a show of monarchy, Nebuchadnezzar appointed the third and youngest son of Josiah (1 Chronicles 3. 15), full brother of Jehoahaz, and uncle of the captive Jehoiachin. But, according to the custom of conquerors, who changed the names of the great men they took captives in war, in token of their supremacy, he gave him the new name of Zedekiah—i. e., "The righteous of God." This being a purely Hebrew name, it seems that he allowed the puppet king to choose his own name, which was confirmed. His heart towards God was the same as that of Jehoiakim, impenitent and heedless of God's word. 20. through the anger of the Lord . . . he cast them out of his presence—i. e., in the course of God's righteous providence, his policy as king would prove ruinous to his country. Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon—Instigated by ambassadors from the neighbouring states who came to congratulate him on his ascension to the throne (cf. Jeremiah 17. 3, with 28. 1), and at the same time get him to join them in a common league to throw off the Assyrian yoke. Though warned by Jeremiah against this step, the infatuated and perjured (Ezekiel 17. 13) Zedekiah persisted in his revolt.

CHAPTER XXV.

Ver. 1-3. JERUSALEM AGAIN BESIEGED. 1. Nebuchadnezzar . . . came . . . against Jerusalem, and pitched against it—Incensed by the revolt of Zedekiah, the Assyrian despot determined to put an end to the perfidious and inconstant monarchy of Judea. This chapter narrates his third and last invasion, which he conducted in person at the head of an immense army, levied out of all the tributary nations under his sway. Having overrun the northern parts of the country, and taken almost all the fenced cities (Jeremiah 34. 7), he marched direct to Jerusalem to invest it. The date of the beginning as well as of the end of the siege is here carefully marked (cf. Ezekiel 24. 1; Jeremiah 39. 1; 52. 4-6); from which it appears, that, with a brief interruption caused by Nebuchadnezzar's marching to oppose the Egyptians who were coming to its relief, but who retreated without fighting, the siege lasted a year and a half. So long a resistance was owing, not to the superior skill and valour of the Jewish soldiers, but to the strength of the city fortifications, on which the king too confidently relied (cf. Jeremiah 21. 37.; 38). pitched against it, and . . . built forts—Rather, perhaps, drew lines of circumvallation, with a ditch to prevent any going out of the city. On this rampart were erected his military engines for throwing missiles into the city. 3. on the ninth day of the fourth month the famine prevailed—In consequence of the close and protracted blockade, the inhabitants were reduced to dreadful extremities; and, under the maddening influence of hunger, the most inhuman atrocities were perpetrated (Lamentations 2. 20, 22; 4. 9, 10; Ezekiel 5. 10). This was a fulfilment of the prophetic denunciations threatened on the apostasy of the chosen people (Leviticus 26. 29; Deuteronomy 28. 53-57; Jeremiah 15. 2; 27. 13; Ezekiel 4. 16).

4-30. ZEDEKIAH TAKEN. 4. the city was broken up—i. e., a breach was effected, as we are elsewhere informed, in a part of the wall belonging to the lower city (2 Chronicles 32. 5; 33. 14). the men of war fled by night by the way of the gate between two walls, which is by the king's garden—The king's garden was (Nehemiah 3. 15) at the pool of Siloam, i. e., at the mouth of the Tyropæon. A trace of the outermost of these two walls appears to be still extant in the rude pathway which crosses the mouth of the Tyropæon, on a mound hard by the old mulberry tree, which marks the traditional spot of Isaiah's martyrdom. [ROBINSON.] It is probable that the besiegers had overlooked this pass. the king went . . . toward the plain—i. e., the Ghor, or valley of Jordan, estimated at five hours' distance from Jerusalem. The plain near Jericho is about eleven or twelve miles broad. 6. they took the king and brought him . . . to Riblah—Nebuchadnezzar, having gone from the siege to oppose the auxiliary forces of Pharaoh-hophra, left his generals to carry on the blockade, he himself not returning to the scene of action, but taking up his station at Riblah in the land of Hamath (ch. 23. 33). they gave judgment upon him—They, i. e., the council (Jeremiah 39. 3, 13; Daniel 6. 7, 8, 12), regarding him as a seditious and rebellious vassal, condemned him for violating his oath and neglecting the announcement of the Divine will as made known to him by Jeremiah (cf. Jeremiah 32. 5; 34. 2; 38. 17). His sons and the nobles who had joined in his flight were slain before his eyes (Jeremiah 39. 6; 52. 10). In conformity with Fast-* ern notions, which consider a blind man incapable of ruling, his eyes were put out, and being put in chains, he was carried to perpetual imprisonment in Babylon (Jeremiah 52, 11), which, though he came to it, as Ezekiel had foretold, he did not see (Jeremiah 32, 5; Ezekiel 12, 13; 17, 16). 8-18. on the seventh day of the month . . . came Nebuzar-adan—(cf. Jeremiah 52, 12.) In attempting to reconcile these two passages, it must be supposed either that, though he had set out on the 7th, he did not arrive in Jerusalem till the 10th, or that he did not put his orders in execution till that day. His office as captain of the guard (Genesis 37, 36; 39, 1) called him to execute the awards of justice on criminals; and hence, although not engaged in the siege of Jerusalem (Jeremiah 39, 13), Nebuzar-adan was despatched to raze the city, to plunder the temple, to lay both in ruins, demolish the fortifications, and transport the inhabitants to Babylon. The most eminent of these were taken to the king at Riblah (v. 27) and executed, as instigators and abettors of the rebellion, or otherwise obnoxious to the Assyrian government. In their number were Seraiah, the high priest, grandfather of Ezra (Ezra 7, 1), his sagan or deputy, a priest of the second order (Jeremiah 21, 2; 29, 25, 29; 37, 3), the three keepers of the door—not mere porters, but officers of high trust among the Levites (ch. 22, 4; 1 Chronicles 9, 26). 19. five men of them that were in the king's presence—i. e., who belonged to the royal retinue; it is probable that there were five at first, and that other two were found afterwards (Jeremiah 52, 25). 22-26. Nebuchadnezzar . . . made Gedaliah ruler—The people permitted to remain were, besides the king's daughters, a few court attendants and others (Jeremiah 40, 7) too insignificant to be removed, only the peasantry who could till the land and dress the vineyards. Gedaliah was Jeremiah's friend (Jeremiah 26, 24), and having, by the prophet's counsel, probably fled from the city as abandoned of God, he surrendered himself to the conqueror (Jeremiah 38, 2, 17), and being promoted to the government of Judea, fixed his provincial court at Mizpeh. He was well qualified to surmount the difficulties of ruling at such a crisis. Many of the fugitive Jews, as well as the soldiers of Zedekiah who had accompanied the king in his flight to the plains of Jericho, left their retreats (Jeremiah 40, 11, 12) and flocked around the governor; who, having counselled them to submit, promised them on complying with this condition, security on oath that they would retain their possessions and enjoy the produce of their land (Jeremiah 40, 9). 25. Ishmael . . . of the seed-royal came, and ten men with him, and smote Gedaliah—He had found refuge with Baalis, king of the Ammonites, and he returned with a bad design, being either instigated by envy of a governor not descended from the house of David, or bribed by Baalis to murder Gedaliah. The generous governor, though apprised of his intentions, refused to credit the report, much less to sanction the proposal made by an attached friend to cut off Ishmael. The consequence was, that he was murdered by this same Ishmael, when entertaining him in his own house (Jeremiah 41, 1). 26. and all the people came to Egypt—In spite of Jeremiah's dissuasions (Jeremiah 43, 7, 8), and settled in various cities of that country (Jeremiah 44, 1). 27. seven and twentieth year of the captivity of Jehoiachin—corresponding with the year of Nebuchadnezzar's death, and his son Evil-merodach's ascension to the throne. Evil-merodach did lift up the head of Jehoiachin, and spake kindly—gave him liberty upon parole. This kindly feeling is said to have originated in a familiar acquaintance formed in prison, in which Evil-merodach had lain till his father's death, on account of some malversation while acting as regent during Nebuchadnezzar's seven years' illness (Daniel 4, 32, 33). But doubtless the improvement in Zedekiah's condition is to be traced to the overruling providence and grace of Him who still cherished purposes of love to the house of David (2 Samuel 7, 14, 15). 29. he ate continually before him—i. e., according to an ancient usage in Eastern courts, had a seat at the royal table on great days, and had a stated provision granted him for the maintenance of his exiled court.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-23. ADAM'S LINE TO NOAH. 1. Adam, &c.—"Begat" must be understood. Only that one member of the family is mentioned, who came in the direct order of succession. 4-23. Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth—The three sons of this patriarch are enumerated, partly because they were the founders of the new world, and partly because the fulfilment of Noah's prophecy (Genesis 9, 25-27) could not otherwise appear to have been verified. 12. Casluhim (of whom came the Philistines), and Caphtorim—Better rendered, "And Casluhim, of whom came the Philistim and Caphtorim;" they were brethren, the sons of Casluhim, and at first dwelt together, whence their names are used interchangeably; and the Caphtorim are described as inhabiting Azzah, or Gaza, the seat of the Philistines. 14. the Jebusites, &c.—From this verse to v. 17 the names are not those of individuals, but of people who all sprang from Canaan; and as several of them became extinct or were amalgamated with their brethren, their national appellations are given instead of the personal names of their ancestors. 17. Uz, and Hul, and Gether, and Meshech—Or Mash; these were the children of Aram, and grandsons of Shem. (Genesis 10, 23.) 18. Arphaxad begat Selah—Calnan, the father's name, is omitted here. (See on Luke 3, 36.) 19. Peleg—(See on Genesis 10, 25.) 22. Ebal—Or Obal. (Genesis 10, 23.)

24-28. SHEM'S LINE TO ABRAHAM. 24. Shem, &c.—This comprises a list of ten, inclusive of Abraham.

29-31. SONS OF ISHMAEL. 23. These are their generations—The heads of his twelve tribes. The great northern desert of Arabia, including the entire neck, was colonized by these tribes; and if we can recover, in the modern geography of this part of the country, Arab tribes bearing the names of those patriarchs, i. e., names corresponding with those preserved in the original catalogue of Scripture, we obtain at once so many evidences, not of mere similarity, but of absolute identification. [Förster.] Nebaloth—Gave rise to the Nabathæans of the classic, and the Beni Nabat of Oriental writers. Kedar—The Arab tribe, El Khedeyre, on the coast of Hedgar. Abdeel—Abdilla, the name of a tribe in Yemen. 30. Dumah—Dumah and Tema, the great Arab tribes of Beni Teman. Thus this writer [HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY OF ARABIA] traces the names of all the heads of the twelve tribes of Ishmael as perpetuated in the clans or tribes of the Arabs in the present day.

32, 33. SONS OF KETURAH. 32. sons of Keturah—These became founders of nomadic tribes in the north of Arabia and Syria, as Midian of the Midianites. (Genesis 36, 35; Judges 6, 2.) and Shuah—From whom Bildad sprang. (Job 2, 11.)

34-42. POSTERITY OF ABRAHAM BY ESAU. 36. sons of Eliphaz—The tribe Adites, in the centre country of the Saracens, so called from his mother, Adah. (Genesis 36. 10.) Temán—Gave rise to the land of Temán, near the head of the Red Sea. Omar—The tribe Beni-Amma, settled at the northern point of Djebel Shera (Mount Seir). Zephi—The tribe Dzal. Gatam—Katam, inhabited by the tribe Al Saruat, or "people of Sarah." Kenaz—The tribe Aenezes, a tribe whose settlement lies in the neighbourhood of Syria. Amalek—The Beni Malak of Zohran, and the Beni Maledj of the Shat el Arab. 37. Renel—A powerful branch of the great Aenezze tribe, the Rowalla Arabs. Shammah—The great tribe Beni Shammar. In the same way, the names of the other kings and dukes are traced in the modern tribes of Arabia. But it is unnecessary to mention any more of these obscure nomads, except to notice that Jobab (v. 44), one of the kings of Edom, is considered to be Job, and that his seat was in the royal city of Dinahab (Genesis 36. 32), indentified with O'Daeb, a well-known town in the centre of Al Dahna, a great northern desert in the direction of Chaldea and the Euphrates. [FORSTER.]

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1, 2. SONS OF ISRAEL. Ver. 3-12. POSTERITY OF JUDAH. 3. The sons of Judah—His descendants are enumerated first, because the right and privileges of the primogeniture had been transferred to him (Genesis 49. 8), and because from his tribe the Messiah was to spring. 6. Zimri, and Ethan, and Heman, and Carcol, and Dara—these five are here stated to be the sons of Zerah, i. e., of Ezra, whence they were called Ezrahites. (1 Kings 4. 31.) In that passage they are called "the sons of Mahol," which, however, is to be taken not as a proper name, but appellatively for "sons of music, dancing," &c. The traditional fame of their great sagacity and acquirements had descended to the time of Solomon, and formed a standard of comparison for showing the superior wisdom of that monarch. Jewish writers say that they were looked up to as prophets by their countrymen during the abode in Egypt. 7. the sons of Carmi—He was the son of Zimri, or Zabdi, as he is called. (Joshua 7. 1.) Achar—or Achan. (Joshua 7. 1.) This variety in the form of the name is with great propriety used here, since Achar means "troubler."

13-17. CHILDREN OF JESSE. 15. David the seventh—As it appears (1 Samuel 16. 10; 17. 12) that Jesse had eight sons, the presumption is from David being mentioned here as the seventh son of his father, that one of them had died at an early age, without leaving issue. 17. Jether the Ishmaelite—(cf. 2 Samuel 17. 25). In that passage he is called Ithra an Israelite; and there seems no reason why, in the early days of David, any one should be specially distinguished as an Israelite. The presumption is in favour of the reading followed by the Sept., which calls him "Jetra the Jezreelite." The circumstance of his settling in another tribe, or of a woman marrying out of her own tribe, was sufficiently rare and singular to call for the statement that Abigail was married to a man of Jezreel.

18-55. POSTERITY OF CALEB. 18. Caleb the son of Hezron—The notices concerning this person appear confused in our version. In v. 19 he is said to be the father of Hur, whereas in v. 50 he is called "the son of Hur." The words in this latter passage have been transposed in the copying, and should be read thus, "Hur the son of Caleb." begat children of Azubah his wife, and of Jerioth—the former was his spouse, while Jerioth seems to have been a secondary wife, and the mother of the children whose names are here given. On the death of his principal wife, he married Ephrath, and by her had Hur. 21. of Hezron . . . daughter of Machir, father of Gilead—i. e., chief of that town, which with the lands adjacent was no doubt the property of Machir, who was so desirous of a male heir. He was grandson of Joseph. The wife of Machir was of the tribe of Manasseh. (Numbers 26. 29.) 22. Jair, who had three and twenty cities in the land of Gilead—As the son of Segub and the grandson of Hezron, he was of the tribe of Judah; but from his maternal descent he was called (Numbers 32. 41; Deuteronomy 3. 14) "the son of Manasseh." This designation implies that his inheritance lay in that tribe in right of his grandmother; in other words, because his maternal and adopting great-grandfather was Machir the son of Manasseh; and Jair, inheriting his property, was his lineal representative; and accordingly this is expressly stated to be the case; for the village group of "Havoth-Jair" was awarded to him in that tribe, in consequence of his valiant and patriotic exploits. This arrangement, however, took place previous to the law (Numbers 36.), by which it was enacted that heiresses were to marry in their own tribe. But this instance of Jair shows that in the case of a man obtaining an inheritance in another tribe it required him to become thoroughly incorporated with it as a representative of the family through which the inheritance was received. He had been adopted into Manasseh, and it would never have been imagined that he was other than "a son of Manasseh" naturally, had not this passage given information supplementary to that of the passage in Numbers. 23. he took—rather "he had taken." This statement is accounting for his acquisition of so large a territory; he got it by right of conquest from the former possessors. Kenath—this place, along with its group of surrounding villages, was gained by Nobah, one of Jair's officers sent by him to capture it (Numbers 32. 1, 2). all these belonged to the sons of Machir—In their number Jair is included as having completely identified himself by his marriage and residence in Gilead with the tribe of Manasseh. 24. Caleb-ephraiah—so called from uniting the names of husband and wife (v. 19), and supposed to be the same as was afterwards called Bethlehem-ephraiah. Ashur, the father of Tekoa—(2 Samuel 14. 2-4). He is called the father, either from his being the first founder, or perhaps the ruler, of the city. 31. Sheshan had no sons, but daughters—either he had no sons alive at his death, or his family consisted wholly of daughters, of whom Ahlai (v. 31) was one, she being specially mentioned on account of the domestic relations about to be noticed. 35. Sheshan gave his daughter to Jarha his servant to wife—The adoption and marriage of a foreign slave in the family where he is serving, is far from being a rare or extraordinary occurrence in Eastern countries. It is thought, however, by some to have been a connection not sanctioned by the law of Moses. [MICHAELIS.] But this is not a well-founded objection, as the history of the Jews furnishes not a few examples of foreign proselytes in the same manner obtaining an inheritance in Israel; and doubtless Jarha had previously embraced the Jewish faith in place of the grovelling idolatries of his native Egypt. In such a case, therefore, there could be no legal difficulty. Being a foreign slave, he had no inheritance in a different tribe to injure by this connection; while his marriage with Sheshan's daughter led to his adoption into the tribe of Judah, as well as his becoming heir of the family property. 42. the sons of Caleb—(cf. v. 18, 25.) The sons here noticed were the fruit of his union with a third wife. 55. the families of the scribes—either civil or ecclesiastical officers of the Kenite origin, who are here classed with the tribe of Judah, not as being descended from it, but as dwelling within its territory, and in a measure incorporated with its people. Jabez—a place in Judah (ch. 4. 9). Kenites that came of Hemath—who settled in Judah, and were thus distinguished from another division of the Kenite clan which dwelt in Manasseh (Judges 4. 11).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-9. SONS OF DAVID. 1-3. Now these were the sons of David which were born unto him in Hebron—It is of consequence for the proper understanding of events in the domestic history of David, to bear in mind the place and time of his sons' birth. The eldest son, born after his father's accession to the sovereign authority, is, according to Eastern notions, the proper heir to the throne. And hence the natural aspirations of ambition in Amnon, who was long unaware of the alienation of the crown, and could not be easily reconciled to the claims of a younger brother being placed above his own (see on 2 Samuel 3. 1-5). 3. Eglah his wife—Supposed to be another name of Michal, who, though she had no son after her mockery of David for dancing before the ark, might have had one previous to that time. She has the title of wife appended to her name, because she was his proper wife; and the mention of her name last, probably arose from the circumstance that, having been withdrawn from David and married to another husband, but afterwards restored, she had in reality become the last of his wives. 5. four, of Bath-sheba the daughter of Ammiel—Or Bath-sheba (2 Samuel 11. 3), and there her father is called Elam. Of course Solomon was not her "only son," but he is called so (Proverbs 4. 3) from the distinguished affection of which he was the object, and though the eldest, is named the last of Bath-sheba's children. 6. Elishama and Elphelet—Two sons of the same name are twice mentioned (v. 8). They were the children of different mothers, and had probably some title or epithet appended by which the one was distinguished from the other. Or, it might be, that the former two were dead, and their names were given to sons afterwards born to preserve their memories. 8. nine—The number of David's sons born after his removal to Jerusalem, was eleven (2 Samuel 5. 14), but only nine are mentioned here: two of them being omitted, either in consequence of their early deaths, or of their leaving no issue.

10-16. HIS LINE TO ZEDEKIAH. 10. Solomon's son was Rehoboam, &c.—David's line is here drawn down to the captivity, through a succession of good and bad, but still influential and celebrated, monarchs. It has rarely happened that a crown has been transmitted from father to son, in lineal descent, for seventeen reigns. But this was the promised reward of David's piety. There is, indeed, observable some vacillation towards the close of this period—the crown passing from one brother to another, and even from uncle to nephew—a sure sign of disorderly times and a disjointed government. 15. Zedekiah—is called the son of Josiah (cf. Jeremiah 1. 3; 37. 1), but (2 Chronicles 36. 19) he is described as the brother of Jehoiachin, who was the son of Jehoiakim, and consequently the grandson of Josiah. Words expressive of affinity or relationship are used with great latitude in the Hebrew. Shallum—No king of this name is mentioned in the history of Josiah's sons (2 Kings chaps. 23. and 14.), but there is a notice of Shallum the son of Josiah (Jeremiah 22. 11), who reigned in the stead of his father, and who is generally supposed to be Jehoahaz, a younger son, here called the fourth, of Josiah.

17-21. SUCCESSORS OF JECONIAH. 17. the sons of Jeconiah, Assir—Rather, "Jeconiah the prisoner, or captive." This record of his condition was added to show that Salathiel was born during the captivity in Babylon (cf. Matthew 1. 12). Jeconiah was written childless (Jeremiah 22. 30), a prediction which (as the words that follow explain) meant that this unfortunate monarch should have no son succeeding him on the throne. 18. Malchiram also—As far as Jeconiah, everything is plain; but there is reason to suspect that the text in the subsequent verses has been dislocated and disarranged. The object of the sacred historian is to trace the royal line through Zerubbabel, yet, according to the present reading, the genealogical stem cannot be drawn from Jeconiah downwards. The following arrangement of the text is given as removing all difficulties. [DAVIDSON'S HEB.] (v. 17.) And the sons of Jeconiah the captive, Salathiel (Shealtiel, Ezra 3. 2; Nehemiah 12. 1; Haggai 1. 12, 14; 2. 2) his son; v. 18. And the sons of Salathiel; Zerubbabel and Shimei; and the sons of Zerubbabel; Meshullam, Hananiah, and Shelomith their sister. v. 19. And Hashubah, and Ohel, and Berechiah, and Hasadiah, Jushab-hezed. v. 20. And Malchiram, and Rephalah, and Shenazar, Jecamiah, Hoshama, and Nedabiah. v. 21. The sons of Hananiah; Pelatiah and Jesalah; the sons of Rephalah; his son Arnan, his son Obadiah, his son Shecaniah.

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 1-8. POSTERITY OF JUDAH BY CALEB THE SON OF HUR. 1. The sons of Judah—i. e., the descendants—for with the exception of Pharez, none of those here noticed were his immediate sons. Indeed, the others are mentioned solely to introduce the name of Shobal, whose genealogy the historian intended to trace (ch. 2. 52).

9-20. OF JABEZ, AND HIS PRAYER. 9. Jabez—was, as many think, the son of Coz, or Kenaz, and is here eulogized for his sincere and fervent piety, as well, perhaps, as for some public and patriotic works which he performed. The Jewish writers affirm that he was an eminent doctor in the law, whose reputation drew so many scribes around him that a town was called by his name (ch. 2. 55); and to the piety of his character this passage bears ample testimony. The memory of the critical circumstances which marked his birth was perpetuated in his name (cf. Genesis 35. 15); and yet, in the development of his high talents, or distinguished worth in after-life, his mother must have found a satisfaction and delight that amply compensated for all her early trials. The prayer of his which is here recorded, and which, like Jacob's, is in the form of a vow (Genesis 28. 20), seems to have been uttered when he was entering on an important or critical service, for the successful execution of which he placed confidence neither on his own nor his people's prowess, but looked anxiously for the aid and blessing of God. The enterprise was in all probability the expulsion of the Canaanites from the territory he occupied, and as this was a war of extermination, which God himself had commanded, His blessing could be the more reasonably asked and expected in preserving them from all the evils to which the undertaking might expose him. In the words, "that it may not grieve me," and which might be more literally rendered, "that I may have no more sorrow," there is an allusion to the meaning of his name—Jabez—signifying grief; and the import of this petition is, Let me not experience the grief which my name implies, and which my sins may well produce. God granted him that which he requested—Whatever was the kind of undertaking which roused his anxieties, Jabez enjoyed a remarkable degree of prosperity, and God, in his instance, proved that He was not only the hearer, but the answerer of prayer. 13. the sons of Kenaz—the grandfather of Caleb, who from that relationship is called a Kenazite (Numbers 32. 12). 14. Joab, the father of the valley of Carathim—i. e., the father of the inhabitants of the valley—the valley of craftsmen, as the word denotes. They dwelt together, according to a custom which, independently of any law, extensively prevails in Eastern countries for persons of the same trade to inhabit the same street or the same quarter, and to follow the same occupation from father to son, through many generations. Their occupation was probably that of carpenters, and the valley where they lived seems to have been in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (Nehemiah 11. 35). 17. 18. she bare Miriam—It is difficult, as the verses stand at present, to see who is meant. The following readjustment of the text clears away the obscurity: "These are the sons of Bithiah the daughter of Pharaoh, which Mered took, and she bare Miriam, &c., and his wife Jehudjah bare Jezreel," &c. Jehudjah—the Jewess, to distinguish her from his other wife, who was an Egyptian. This passage records a very interesting fact—the marriage of an Egyptian princess to a descendant of Caleb. The marriage must have taken place in the wilderness. The barriers of a different national language and national religion kept the Hebrews separate from the Egyptians; but they did not wholly prevent intimacies, and even occasional intermarriages between private individuals of the two nations. Ere such unions, however, could be sanctioned, the Egyptian party must have renounced idolatry, and this daughter of Pharaoh, as appears from her name, had become a convert to the worship of the God of Israel.

21-23. POSTERITY OF SHELAH. 21. Laadah . . . the father of the house of them that wrought fine linen—

Here, again, is another incidental evidence that in very early times certain trades were followed by particular families among the Hebrews, apparently in hereditary succession. Their knowledge of the art of linen manufacture had been, most probably, acquired in Egypt, where the duty of bringing up families to the occupations of their forefathers was a compulsory obligation, whereas in Israel, as in many parts of Asia to this day, it was optional, though common. 22, 23. had the dominion in Moab, and Jashubi-lehem—"And these are ancient things;" seems a strange rendering of a proper name; and, besides, conveys a meaning that has no bearing on the record. The improved following translation has been suggested: "Sojourned in Moab, but returned to Bethlehem and Adab-erim-athekim. These and the inhabitants of Netalm and Gederah were potters employed by the king in his own work." Gederah or Gederoth, and Netalm, belonged to the tribe of Judah, and lay on the south-east border of the Philistines' territory (Joshua 15. 36; 2 Chronicles 28. 18).

24-43. OF SIMEON. 24. The sons of Simeon—They are classed along with those of Judah, as their possession was partly taken out of the extensive territory of the latter (Joshua 19. 1). The difference in several particulars of the genealogy given here from that given in other passages is occasioned by some of the persons mentioned having more than one name. 27. his brethren had not many children—(see on Numbers 1. 22; 26. 14). 31-43. These were their cities unto the reign of David—In consequence of the sloth or cowardice of the Simeonites, some of the cities within their allotted territory were only nominally theirs; but were never taken from the Philistines until David's time, when, the Simeonites having forfeited all claim to them, he assigned them to his own tribe of Judah (1 Samuel 27. 6). 38, 39. increased greatly, and they went to the entrance of Gedor—Simeon having only a part of the land of Judah, they were forced to seek accommodation elsewhere; but their establishment in the new and fertile pastures of Gederah was soon broken up, for, being attacked by a band of nomad plunderers, they were driven from place to place till some of them effected by force a settlement on Mount Seir.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-10. THE LINE OF REUBEN. 1. Now the sons of Reuben—In proceeding to give this genealogy, the sacred historian states, in a parenthesis (v. 1, 2), the reason why it was not placed first, as Reuben was the eldest son of Jacob. The birth-right, which by a foul crime he had forfeited, implied not only dominion, but a double portion (Deuteronomy 21. 17), and both of these were transferred to Joseph, whose two sons having been adopted as the children of Jacob (Genesis 48. 5), received each an allotted portion, as forming two distinct tribes in Israel. Joseph then was entitled to the precedence; and yet, as his posterity was not mentioned first, the sacred historian judged it necessary to explain that "the genealogy was not to be reckoned after the birth-right," but with a reference to a superior honour and privilege that had been conferred on Judah—not the man, but the tribe, whereby it was invested with the pre-eminence over all the other tribes, and out of it was to spring David with his royal lineage, and especially the great Messiah (Hebrews 7. 14). These were the two reasons why, in the order of enumeration, the genealogy of Judah is introduced before that of Reuben. 9. Eastward he inhabited unto the entering in of the wilderness from the river Euphrates—The settlement was on the east of Jordan, and the history of this tribe, which never took any part in the public affairs or movements of the nation, is comprised in "the multiplication of their cattle in the land of Gilead," in their wars with the Bedouin sons of Hagar, and in the simple labours of pastoral life. They had the right of pasture over an extensive mountain range—the great wilderness of Kedemoth (Deuteronomy 2. 26) and the Euphrates being a security against their enemies.

11-26. THE LINE OF GAD. 11-15. the children of Gad dwelt over against them—the genealogy of the Gadites and the half-tribe of Manasseh (v. 24) is given along with that of the Reubenites, as these three were associated in a separate colony. 16. Sharon—The term Sharon was applied as descriptive of any place of extraordinary beauty and productiveness. There were three places in Palestine so called. This Sharon lay east of the Jordan. upon their borders—i. e., of Gilead and Bashan: Gilead proper, or at least the largest part, belonged to the Reubenites; and Bashan, the greatest portion of it, belonged to the Manassites. The Gadites occupied an intermediate settlement on the land which lay upon their borders. 17. All these were reckoned in the days of Jotham—his long reign and freedom from foreign wars, as well as intestine troubles, were favourable for taking a census of the people. and in the days of Jeroboam—the second of that name. 18-22. Hagarites—or Hagarenes, originally synonymous with Ishmaelites, but afterwards applied to a particular tribe of the Arabs (cf. Psalm 83. 6). Jetur—his descendants were called Itureans, and the country Auranitis, from Hauran, its chief city. These, who were skilled in archery, were invaded in the time of Joshua by a confederate army of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, who, probably incensed by the frequent raids of those marauding neighbours, took reprisals in men and cattle, dispossessed almost the whole of the original inhabitants, and colonized the district themselves. Divine Providence favoured, in a remarkable manner, the Hebrew army in this just war. 26. the God of Israel stirred up the spirit of Pul—the Phal-luka of the Ninevite monuments (see on 2 Kings 15. 19). and the spirit of Tiglath-pileser—the son of the former. By them the transjordanic tribes, including the other half of Manasseh, settled in Galilee, were removed to Upper Media. This was the first captivity (2 Kings 15. 29).

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-48. LINE OF THE PRIESTS. 5. Uzzi—It is supposed that, in his days, the high priesthood was, for unrecorded reasons, transferred from Eleazar's family to Ithamar's, in which it continued for several generations. 10. he it is that executed the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built in Jerusalem—It is doubtful whether the person in favour of whom this testimony is borne be Jehoiada or Azariah. If the former, he is the same as Jehoiada, who rendered important public services (2 Kings 11); if the latter, it refers to the worthy and independent part he acted in resisting the unwarrantable encroachments of Uzziel (2 Chronicles 26. 17). in the temple that Solomon built—described in this particular manner to distinguish it from the second temple, which was in existence at the time when this history was written. 14. Azariah begat Seraiah—He filled the supreme pontifical office at the destruction of Jerusalem, and, along with his deputy and others, was executed by Nebuchadnezzar's orders at Riblah (2 Kings 25. 18, 21). The line of high priests, under the first temple, which from Zadok amounted to twelve, terminated with him. 16-48. The sons of Levi; Gershom, &c.—This repetition (see v. 1) is made, as the historian here begins to trace the genealogy of the Levitical families who were not priests. The list is a long one, comprising the chiefs or heads of their several families until David's reign, who made a new and different classification of them by courses. 20. Zimnah his son—His grandson (v. 42). 24. Uriel—or Zephaniah (v. 36). 27. Elkanah—The father of the prophet Samuel (1 Samuel 1. 1). 28. the sons of Samuel—Are here named Vashni and Abiah. The first-born is called (1 Samuel 8. 2) Joel; and this name is given to him in v. 33 of this chapter. It is now generally thought by the best critics that, through an error of the copyists, an omission has been made of the eldest son's name, and that Vashni, which is not the name of a person, merely signifies "and the second." This critical emendation of the text makes all clear, as well as consistent with other passages relating to the family of Samuel. 32. in the house of the Lord—i. e., in the tent which David had erected for receiving the ark after it was removed from the house of Obad-edom. This was a considerable time before the temple was built, they waited on their office according to their order—Which David, doubtless by the direction of the Holy Spirit, had instituted for the better regulation of Divine worship. 33. Shemuel—i. e., Samuel. This is the exact representation of the Hebrew name. 39. his brother Asaph—They were brothers naturally, both being descended from Levi, as well as officially, both being of the Levitical order. 42. Ethan—Or Jeduthun (ch. 9, 16; 2 Chronicles 35, 15). 48. their brethren also, the Levites, were appointed unto all manner of service—Those of them who were endowed with musical tastes and talents were employed in various other departments of the temple service.

49-51. OFFICE OF AARON AND HIS SONS. 49. But Aaron and his sons offered, &c.—The office and duties of the high priests having been already described, the names of those who successively filled that important office are recorded. 60. thirteen cities—No more than eleven are named here; but two additional ones are mentioned (Joshua 21, 16, 17), which makes up the thirteen. 61. unto the sons of Kohath which were left—i. e., in addition to the priests belonging to the same family and tribe of Levi. by lot ten cities—(Joshua 21, 26.) The sacred historian gives an explanation (v. 66). Eight of these are mentioned, but only two of them are taken out of the half tribe of Manasseh (v. 70); the names of the other two are given (Joshua 21, 21), where full and detailed notices of these arrangements may be found. 62. unto the sons of Gershom—Supply “the children of Israel gave.” 67. they gave unto them of the cities of refuge—The names of the cities given here are considerably different from those applied to them (Joshua 21, 14). In the lapse of centuries, and from the revolutions of society, changes might have been expected to take place in the form or dialectic pronunciation of the names of those cities; and this will sufficiently account for the variations that are found in the lists as enumerated here and in an earlier book. As to these cities themselves, that were assigned to the Levites, they were widely remote and separated—partly in fulfilment of Jacob’s prophecy (Genesis 49, 7), and partly that the various districts of the country might obtain a competent supply of teachers who might instruct the people in the knowledge, and animate them to the observance of a law which had so important a bearing on the promotion both of their private happiness and their national prosperity.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-5. SONS OF ISSACHAR. 1. Jashub—Or Job (Genesis 46, 13). 2. whose number was in the days of David two and twenty thousand and six hundred—Although a census was taken in the reign of David by order of that monarch, it is not certain that the sacred historian had it in his eye, since we find here the tribe of Benjamin enumerated, which was not taken in David’s time; and there are other points of dissimilarity. 3. five; all of them chief men—Four only are mentioned; so that as they are stated to be five, in this number the father, Izrahlah, must be considered as included, otherwise one of the names must have dropped out of the text. They were each at the head of a numerous and influential division of their tribe. 5. fourscore and seven thousand—Exclusive of the 53,600 men which the Tola branch had produced (v. 24), so that in the days of David the tribe would have contained a population of 45,600. This large increase was owing to the practice of polygamy, as well as the fruitfulness of the women. A plurality of wives, though tolerated among the Hebrews, was confined chiefly to the great and wealthy; but it seems to have been generally esteemed a privilege by the tribe of Issachar, “for they had many wives and sons.”

6-12. OF BENJAMIN. 6. The sons of Benjamin—Ten are reckoned (Genesis 46, 21), but only five (ch. 8, 1; Numbers 26, 35). Perhaps five of them were distinguished as chiefs of illustrious families, but two having fallen in the bloody wars waged against Benjamin (Judges 20, 46), there remained only three branches of this tribe, and these only are enumerated. Jedlael—Or Asbel (Genesis 46, 21). 7. the sons of Bela—Each of them was chief or leader of the family to which he belonged. In an earlier period seven great families of Benjamin are mentioned (Numbers 26, 35), five of them being headed by these five sons of Benjamin, and two descended from Bela. Here five families of Bela are specified, whence we are led to conclude that time or the ravages of war had greatly changed the condition of Benjamin, or that the five families of Bela were subordinate to the other great divisions that sprang directly from the five sons of the patriarch. 12. Shuppin also, and Huppin—They are called (Genesis 46, 21) Muppin and Huppin, and (Numbers 26, 39) Iupham and Shupham; they were the children of Ir, or Irl (v. 7). and Hushim, the sons (son) of Aher—Aher signifies “another,” and some eminent critics, taking Aher as a common noun, render the passage thus, “and Hushim, another son.” Shuppin, Muppin and Hushim are plural words, and therefore denote not individuals, but the heads of their respective families; and as they were not comprised in the above enumeration (v. 7, 9) they are inserted here in the form of an appendix. Some render the passage, “Hushim, the son of another,” i. e., tribe or family: the name occurs among the sons of Dan (Genesis 46, 23), and it is a presumption in favour of this being the true rendering, that after having recorded the genealogy of Naphtali (v. 13) the sacred historian adds, “the sons of Bilhah, the handmaid, who was the mother of Dan and Naphtali.” We naturally expect, therefore, that these two will be noticed together, but Dan is not mentioned at all, if not in this passage.

13. OF NAPHTALI. 13. Shallum—Or Shillem (Genesis 46, 24). sons of Bilhah—as Dan and Naphtali were her sons, Hushim, as well as these enumerated in v. 13, were her grandsons.

14-40. OF MANASSEH. 14. The sons of Manasseh—or descendants; for Ashriel was a grandson, and Zelophehad was a generation farther removed in descent (Numbers 26, 33). The text, as it stands, is so confused and complicated that it is exceedingly difficult to trace the genealogical thread, and a great variety of conjectures have been made with a view to clear away the obscurity. The passage should probably be rendered thus: “The sons of Manasseh were Ashriel, whom his Syrian concubine bare to him, and Machir, the father of Gilead (whom his wife bare to him). Machir took for a wife Maachah, sister to Huppin and Shuppin.” 21. whom the men of Gath slew, &c.—This interesting little episode gives us a glimpse of the state of Hebrew society in Egypt; for the occurrence narrated seems to have taken place before the Israelites left that country. The patriarch Ephraim was then alive, though he must have arrived at a very advanced age; and the Hebrew people, at all events those of them who were his descendants, still retained their pastoral character. It was in perfect consistency with the ideas and habits of Oriental shepherds that they should have made a raid on the neighbouring tribe of the Philistines for the purpose of plundering their flocks, for nothing is more common among them than hostile incursions on the inhabitants of towns, or on other nomad tribes with whom they have no league of amity. But a different view of the incident is brought out, if, instead of “because,” we render the Hebrew particle “when” they came down to take their cattle, for the tenor of the context leads rather to the conclusion that “the men of Gath” were the aggressors, who, making a sudden foray on the Ephraimite flocks, killed the shepherds including several of the sons of Ephraim. The calamity spread a deep gloom around the tent of their aged father, and was the occasion of his receiving visits of condolence from his distant relatives, according to the custom of the East, which is remarkably exemplified in the history of Job (Job 2, 11; cf. Job 11, 19).

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-32. SONS AND CHIEF MEN OF BENJAMIN. 1. Now Benjamin begat, &c.—This chapter contains some supplementary particulars in addition to what has been already said regarding the tribe of Benjamin (ch. 7. 6). The names of many of the persons mentioned are different from those given by Moses—a diversity which may be accounted for in part on grounds formerly stated, viz., either that the persons had more than one name, or that the word "sons" is used in a loose sense for grandsons or descendants. But there are other circumstances to be taken into account in considering the details of this chapter, viz., first, that the genealogies of the Benjamites were disordered or destroyed by the almost total extermination of this tribe (Judges 20.); secondly, that a great number of Benjamites, born in Assyria, are mentioned here, who returned from the long captivity in Babylon, and established themselves—some in Jerusalem, others in different parts of Judea. There were more returned from Babylon of the families belonging to this tribe than to any other except Judah; and hence many strange names are here introduced; some of which will be found in the list of the restored exiles (cf. Ezra 2). 6. these are the sons of Ehud—Most probably the judge of Israel (Judges 3. 15). His descendants, who had at first been established in Geba in Benjamin, emigrated in a body under the direction of Gera (v. 7) to Manahath, where their increased numbers would find more ample accommodation. Manahath was within the territory of Judah. 8. Shabaraïm begat children in the country of Moab—He had probably been driven to take refuge in that foreign land on the same calamitous occasion that forced Elimelech to emigrate thither (Ruth 1. 1). But, destitute of natural affection, he forsook or divorced his two wives, and in the land of his sojourn married a third, by whom he had several sons. But there is another explanation given of the conduct of this Benjamite polygamist. His children by Hushim are mentioned (v. 11), while his other wife is unnoticed. Hence it has been thought probable that it is Baara who is mentioned under the name of Hodesh, so called because her husband, after long desertion, returned and cohabited with her as before. 28. These dwelt in Jerusalem—The ordinary and stated inhabitants of Jerusalem were Judahites, Benjamites, and Levites. But at the time referred to here, the chiefs or heads of the principal families who are enumerated (v. 14-27) established themselves in the city after their return from the captivity.

33-40. STOCK OF SAUL AND JONATHAN. 33. Ner begat Kish—The father of Ner, though not mentioned here, is stated (ch. 9. 35) to have been Jehiel. Moreover, the father of Kish is said (1 Samuel 9. 1) to have been Abiel, the son of Zeror, whence it would seem that Abiel and Nei were names of the same person. Abinadab—the same as Ishul (1 Samuel 14. 49). Esh-baal—that is, Ish-bosheth. 34. Merib-baal—that is, Mephibosheth. 36. Jehoadā—or Jara (ch. 9. 42). 40. mighty men of valour, archers—(see on Judges 20. 16). Great strength as well as skill was requisite in ancient archery, as the bow, which was of steel, was bent by treading with the feet, and pulling the string with both hands.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-26. ORIGINAL REGISTERS OF ISRAEL AND JUDAH'S GENEALOGIES. 1. All Israel were reckoned by genealogies—From the beginning of the Hebrew nation, public records were kept, containing a registration of the name of every individual, as well as the tribe and family to which he belonged. "The book of the kings of Israel and Judah" does not refer to the two canonical books that are known in Scripture by that name, but to authenticated copies of those registers, placed under the official care of the sovereigns; and as a great number of the Israelites (v. 3) took refuge in Judah during the invasion of Shalmaneser, they carried the public records along with them. The genealogies given in the preceding chapters were drawn from the public records in the archives both of Israel and Judah; and those given in this chapter relate to the period subsequent to the restoration; whence it appears (cf. ch. 3. 17-24) that the genealogical registers were kept during the captivity in Babylon. These genealogical tables, then, are of the highest authority for truth and correctness, the earlier portion being extracted from the authenticated records of the nation; and as to those which belong to the time of the captivity, they were drawn up by a contemporary writer, who, besides enjoying the best sources of information, and being of the strictest integrity, was guided and preserved from all error by Divine inspiration. 2. the first inhabitants that dwelt in their possessions—This chapter relates wholly to the first returned exiles. Almost all the names recur in Nehemiah (chap. 11.), although there are differences which will be explained there. The same division of the people into four classes was continued after, as before the captivity, viz., the priests, Levites, natives who now were called by the common name of Israelites and Nethinims (Joshua 9. 27; Ezra 2. 43; 8. 20). When the historian speaks of "the first inhabitants that dwelt in their possessions," he implies that there were others who afterwards returned and settled in possessions not occupied by the first. Accordingly, we read of a great number returning successively under Ezra, Nehemiah, and at a later period. And some of those who returned to the ancient inheritance of their fathers, had lived before the time of the captivity (Ezra 3. 12; Haggai 2. 4, 10). 18. the king's gate—The king had a gate from his palace into the temple (2 Kings 16. 18), which doubtless was kept constantly closed except for the monarch's use; and although there was no king in Israel on the return from the captivity, yet the old ceremonial was kept up, probably in the hope that the sceptre would, ere long, be restored to the house of David. It is an honour by which Eastern kings are distinguished, to have a gate exclusively devoted to their own special use, and which is kept constantly closed, except when he goes out or returns (Ezekiel 44. 2). There being no king then in Israel, this gate would be always shut.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-7. SAUL'S OVERTHROW AND DEATH. 1. Now the Philistines fought against Israel—The details of this chapter have no relation to the preceding genealogies, and seem to be inserted solely to introduce the narrative of David's elevation to the throne of the whole kingdom. The parallel between the books of Samuel and Chronicles commences with this chapter, which relates the issue of the fatal battle of Gilboa almost in the very same words as 1 Samuel 31. 3. the battle went sore against Saul; and the archers hit him, and he was wounded—The Heb. words may be thus rendered: The archers found (attacked) him, and he feared the archers. He was not wounded, at least dangerously, when he resolved on committing suicide. The deed was the effect of sudden terror and overwhelming depression of spirits. [CALMET.] 4. his armour-bearer would not; for he was sore afraid—He was, of course, placed in the same perilous condition as Saul. But it is probable that the feelings that restrained him from complying with Saul's wish were a profound respect for royalty, mingled with apprehension of the shock which such a catastrophe would give to the national feelings and interests. 6. Saul died, and his three sons, and all his house—His sons and courtiers who were here engaged in the battle. But it appears that Ish-bosheth and Mephibosheth were kept at Gibeah on account of their youth.

8-14. THE PHILISTINES TRIUMPH OVER HIM. 10. put his armour in the house of their gods—It was common among the heathen to vow to a national or favourite deity, that, in the event of a victory, the armour of the enemy's king, or of some eminent leader, should be dedicated to him as an offering of gratitude. Such trophies were usually suspended on the pillars of the temple. fastened his head in the temple of Dagon—While the trunk or headless corpse was affixed to the wall of Beth-shan (1 Samuel 31. 10). 13. Saul died for his transgression which he committed against the Lord—In having spared the king of the Amalekites, and taken the flocks of the people as spoils, as well as in having consulted a pythoness. Both of these acts were great sins—the first as a violation of God's express and positive command, and the second as contrary to a well-known statute of the kingdom (Leviticus 19. 31). 14. And inquired not of the Lord—He had done so in form (1 Samuel 23. 6), but not in the spirit of a humble penitent, nor with the believing confidence of a sincere worshipper. His inquiry was, in fact, a mere mockery, and his total want of all right religious impressions was manifested by his rushing from God to a wretched impostor in the service of the devil.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-3. DAVID MADE KING. 1. Then all Israel gathered themselves to David unto Hebron—This event happened on the death of Ish-bosheth (see on 2 Samuel 5. 1-3). The convention of the estates of the kingdom, the public and solemn homage of the representatives of the people, and the repeated anointing of the new king in their presence and by their direction, seem to have been necessary to the general acknowledgment of the sovereign on the part of the nation (cf. 1 Samuel 11. 15).

4-9. HE WINS THE CASTLE OF ZION FROM THE JEBUSITES BY JOAB'S VALOUR. 4. David and all Israel went to . . . Jebus—(see on 2 Samuel 5. 6-13). 8. Joab repaired the rest of the city—David built a new town to the north of the old one on Mount Zion; but Joab was charged with a commission to restore the part that had been occupied by the ancient Jebus, to repair the breaches made during the siege, to rebuild the houses which had been demolished, or burned in the sacking of the town, and to preserve all that had escaped the violence of the soldiery. This work of reconstruction is not noticed elsewhere. [CALMET.]

10-17. A CATALOGUE OF HIS WORTHIES. 10. These . . . are the chief of the mighty men—(see on 2 Samuel 23. 8-39). They are here described as those who held strongly with him (Marg.) to make him king, &c. In these words the sacred historian assigns a reason for introducing the list of their names, immediately after his account of the election of David as king, and the conquest of Jerusalem—viz., that they assisted in making David king. In the original form of the list, and the connection in which it occurs in Samuel, there is no reference to the choice of a king, and even in this passage it is only in the clause introduced into the superscription that such a reference occurs. [KEIL.] 11-13. Jashobeam, an Hachmonite—Or son of Hachmoni. He is called also son of Zabdiel (ch. 27. 2), so that, strictly speaking, he was the grandson of Hachmoni (cf. ch. 27. 32). lifted up his spear against three hundred, slain by him at one time—The feat is said (2 Samuel 23. 8) to have been a slaughter of eight hundred in one day. Some endeavour to reconcile the statements in that passage and in this by supposing that he slew eight hundred on one occasion and three hundred on another; while others conjecture that he attacked a body of eight hundred, and, having slain three hundred of them, the rest fled. [LIGHTFOOT.] 12. the three mighties—Only two are mentioned, viz., Jashobeam and Eleazar—the third, Shammah (2 Samuel 23. 11), is not named in this passage. 13. He was with David at Pas-dammim—It was at the time when he was a fugitive in the wilderness, and, parched with thirst under the burning heat of noonday, he wistfully thought of the cool fountain of his native village. This is a notice of the achievement to which Eleazar owed his fame, but the details are found only in 2 Samuel 23. 9-11, where it is further said that he was aided by the valour of Shammah, a fact corroborated in the passage before us (v. 14), where it is recorded of the heroes, that "they set themselves in the midst of that parcel." As the singular number is used in speaking of Shammah (2 Samuel 23. 12), the true view seems to be that when Eleazar had given up from exhaustion, Shammah succeeded, and by his fresh and extraordinary prowess preserved the field. barley—Or lentils (2 Samuel 23. 11). Ephes-dammim was situated between Shochoh and Azekah, in the west of the Judahite territory. These feats were performed when David acted as Saul's general against the Philistines. 15-19. David longed and said, Oh that one would give me drink . . . of the well of Beth-lehem—(See 2 Samuel 23. 15).

This chivalrous act evinces the enthusiastic devotion of David's men, that they were ready to gratify his smallest wish at the risk of their lives. It is probable that, when uttering the wish, David had no recollection of the military posted at Beth-lehem. It is generally taken for granted that those who fought a way to the well of Beth-lehem were the three champions just mentioned. But this is far from being clear, and, on the contrary, it would seem that three different heroes are referred to, for Abishai (v. 20) was one of them. The camp of the Philistines was in the valley of Rephaim (v. 15), which lay on the west of Jerusalem, but an outpost was stationed at Beth-lehem (v. 16), and through this garrison they had to force a passage. 21. howbeit he attained not to the first three—(See on 2 Samuel 23. 19.) 22. Benaiah . . . of Kabzeel—A town in the south of Judah (Joshua 15. 21; Nehemiah 11. 25). It is said that "he had done many acts"—though three only are mentioned as specimens of his daring energy and fearless courage. slew two lion-like men of Moab—lit., lions of God, i. e., great lions or champions. This gallant feat was probably achieved in David's hostile invasion of Moab (2 Samuel 8. 2). also he went down and slew a lion in a pit in a snowy day—Probably a cave into which Benaiah had taken refuge from the snow-storm, and in which he encountered a savage lion which had its lair there. In a spacious cave the achievement would be far greater than if the monster had been previously snared or caged in a pit. 23. he went down—The ordinary phraseology for expressing an engagement in battle. The encounter of Benaiah with this gigantic Egyptian reminds us, in some respects, of David's combat with Goliath. At least, the height of this giant, which is about eight feet, and his armour, resembled his of Gath. with a staff—i. e., having no other weapon in his hand than his walking-stick. 25. David set him over his guard—The Cherethites and Pelethites that composed the small body-guard in immediate attendance on the king. 26. also the valiant men of the armies—This was the third degree of military rank, and Asahel was their chief; the names of few of those mentioned are historically known. 27. Shammoth—Between this name and Hebez, that of Elikah has evidently fallen out, as we may see (2 Samuel 23. 25). [BERTHEAU.] 30. Naharai—Chief of the detachment of the guards who attended on the king in the tenth month—January—(ch. 27. 13; 2 Samuel 23. 28). 39. Naharai—Armour-bearer to Joab (2 Samuel 23. 37). The non-occurrence of Joab's name in any of the three catalogues is most probably to be accounted for by the circumstance that his office as commander-in-chief raised him to a position superior to all these orders of military knighthood. 41. Uriah the Hittite—The enrolment of this name in such a list, attesting, as it does, his distinguished merits as a brave and devoted officer, aggravates the criminality of David's outrage on his life and honour. The number of the names from v. 26 to 41 (exclusive of Asahel and Uriah, who were dead) is thirty, and from v. 41 to 47 is sixteen—making together forty-eight (see on ch. 27). Of those mentioned (v. 26-41), the greater part belonged to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin; the sixteen names (v. 41-47) are all associated with places unknown, or with cities and districts on the east of the Jordan. The northern tribes do not appear to have furnished any leaders. [BERTHEAU.]

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-22. THE COMPANIES THAT CAME TO DAVID AT ZIKLAG. 1-7. Now these are they that came to David to Ziklag—There are three lists given in this chapter, arranged, apparently, according to the order of time when the parties joined the standard of David. while he yet kept himself close because of Saul—i. e., when the king's jealousy had driven him into exile from the court and the country. Ziklag—(See on 1 Samuel 27. 6.) It was during his retirement in that Philistine town that he was joined in rapid succession by the heroes who afterwards contributed so much to the glory of his reign. 2. of Saul's brethren of Benjamin—i. e., of the tribe of Benjamin (cf. v. 29), but some of them might be relatives of the king. This movement to which the parties were led, doubtless by the secret impulse of the Spirit, was of vast importance to the cause of David, as it must have been founded on their observation of the evident withdrawal of God's blessing from Saul, and His favouring presence with David, to whom it was universally known the Divine King of Israel had given the crown in reversion. The accession of the Benjamites who came first and their resolution to share his fortunes must have been particularly grateful to David, as it was a public and emphatic testimony by those who had enjoyed the best means of information to the unblemished excellence of his character, as well as a decided protest against the grievous wrong inflicted by causelessly outlawing a man who had rendered such eminent services to his country.

4. Imaiah the Gibeonite—It appears that not only the Canaanites who were admitted into the congregation (Joshua 9.), but people of the tribe of Benjamin, were among the inhabitants of Gibeon. The mention of "the Gederathite," probably from Gaderah (Joshua 15.36), in the lowlands of Judah; of the Korhites (v. 6), from Korah (ch. 2.43), and of Gedor (v. 7), a town in Judah, to the south-west of Bethlehem (cf. ch. 4.4), shows that this first list contains men of Judah as well as Benjamin. [BERTHEAU.]

8-13. of the Gadites there separated themselves unto David—i. e., from the service of Saul and from the rest of the Gadites who remained steadfast adherents of his cause. into the hold—or fortress, i. e., of Ziklag, which was in the wilderness of Judah. whose faces were like the faces of lions, &c.—A fierce, lionlike countenance (2 Samuel 1. 23), and great agility in pursuit (2 Samuel 2. 18), were qualities of the highest estimation in ancient warfare. 14. one of the least was over an hundred, and the greatest was over a thousand—David, while at Ziklag, had not so large an amount of forces as to give to each of these the command of so many men. Another meaning, therefore, must obviously be sought, and excluding was, which is a supplement by our translators, the import of the passage is, that one of the least could discomfit a hundred, and the greatest was worth a thousand ordinary men; a strong hyperbole to express their uncommon valour. 15. These are they that went over Jordan in the first month—i. e., in spring, when the swollen river generally fills up the banks of its channel (see on Joshua 3. 15; 4. 19; 5. 10). they put to flight all them of the valleys—This was probably done at the time of their separating themselves; and their purpose being discovered, they had to cut their passage through the opposing adherents of Saul, both on the eastern and western banks. The impossibility of taking the fords at such a time, and the violent rapidity of the current, make this crossing of the Jordan—in whatever way these Gadites accomplished it—a remarkable feat. 16. the children of Benjamin and Judah—It is probable that the Benjamites invited the Judahites to accompany them, in order to prevent David being suspicious of them. Their anticipations, as the result showed, were well founded. He did suspect them, but the doubts of David as to their object in repairing to him, were promptly dispelled by Amasai or Amasa, who, by the secret impulse of the Spirit, assured him of their strong attachment and their zealous service from a unanimous conviction that his cause was owned and blessed of God (1 Samuel 18. 12-14). 19-22. there fell some of Manasseh—The period of their accession is fixed as the time when David came with the Philistines against Saul to battle, "but they helped them not" (see on 1 Samuel 29. 4). 20. As he went to Ziklag—If those Manassites joined him on his return to Ziklag, after his dismissal from the Philistine army, then their arrival took place before the battle of Gilboa could have been fought (cf. 1 Samuel 29. 11). Convinced of the desperate state of Saul's affairs, they abandoned him, and resolved to transfer their allegiance to David. But some learned men think that they came as fugitives from that disastrous field. [CALMET and EWALD.] captains of the thousands of Manasseh—Those seven were commanders of the large military divisions of their tribe. 21, 22. they helped David against the band—i. e., the Amalekites who had pillaged Ziklag in David's absence. This military expedition was made by all his men (1 Samuel 30. 9), who, as David's early helpers, are specially distinguished from those who are mentioned in the latter portion of the chapter. the host of God—i. e., a great and powerful army.

23-40. THE ARMIES THAT CAME TO HIM AT HEBRON. 23. these are the numbers of the bands . . . that came to David to Hebron—after the death of Ish-bosheth (2 Samuel 5. 1). to turn the kingdom of Saul to him according to the word of the Lord—(Ch. 10. 14; 11. 3, 10.) The account commences with the southern tribes, Levi being associated with Judah and Simeon, as the great majority of the leading men in this tribe resided in Judah, and, after recounting the representatives of the northern tribes, concludes with those on the east of Jordan. 27. Jehoiada, the leader of the Aaronites—not the high priest, for that was Abiathar (1 Samuel 23. 9), but the leader of the Aaronite warriors, supposed to be the father of Benalah (ch. 11. 22). 29. Benjamin . . . 3000—This small number shows the unpopularity of the movement in this tribe; and, indeed, it is expressly stated that the mass of the population had, even after Ish-bosheth's death, anxiously endeavoured to secure the crown in the family of Saul. 32. children of Issachar, that had understanding of the times, &c.—Jewish writers say that the people of this tribe were eminent for their acquirements in astronomical and physical science; and the object of the remark was probably to show that the intelligent and learned classes were united with the military, and had declared for David. 33. Zebulun . . . could keep rank—i. e., were more disciplined soldiers than the rest. not of double heart—Though their numbers were large, all were in a high degree well affected to David. 38. all the rest of Israel were of one heart to make David king—i. e., entertained a unanimous desire for his elevation. 39, 40. there they were with David three days, eating and drinking—According to the statements made in the preceding verses, the number of armed warriors assembled in Hebron on this occasion amounted to 300,000. Supplies of provisions were abundantly furnished, not only by the people of the neighbourhood, but from distant parts of the country, for all wished the festivities to be on a scale of liberality and magnificence suitable to the auspicious occasion.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-8. DAVID FETCHES THE ARK FROM KIRJATH-JEARIM. 1-3. David consulted . . . And let us bring again the ark of our God—Gratitude for the high and splendid dignity to which he had been elevated would naturally, at this period, impart a fresh animation and impulse to the habitually fervent piety of David; but, at the same time, he was animated by other motives; he fully understood his position as ruler under the theocracy, and, on entering on his duties, was resolved to fulfil his mission as a constitutional king of Israel. Accordingly, his first act as a sovereign related to the interests of religion, and the ark being then the grand instrument and ornament of it, he takes the opportunity of the official representatives of the nation being with him, to consult them about the propriety of establishing it in a more public and accessible locality. The assembly at which he spoke of this consisted of the Sheloshim, princes of thousands (2 Samuel 6. 1). During the reign of the late king, the ark had been left in culpable neglect, and the consequence was that the people had, to a great extent, been careless about the ordinances of Divine worship, or had contented themselves with offering sacrifices at Gibeon, without any thought of the ark, though it was the chief and most vital part of the tabernacle. The duty and advantages of this religious movement suggested by the king were apparent, and the proposal met with universal approval. 2. If it seem good unto you, and . . . it be of the Lord—i. e., I shall conclude that this favourite measure of mine is agreeable to the mind of God, if it receive your hearty concurrence. let us send abroad to our brethren everywhere—He wished to make it known throughout the country, in order that there might be a general assembly of the nation, and that preparations might be made on a scale and of a kind suitable to the inauguration of the august ceremonial, and with them also the priests and Levites . . . in their cities and suburbs—(See on Numbers 35.) The original terms, "Let us send," imply immediate execution; and, doubtless, the publication of the royal edict would have been followed by the appointment of an early day for the contemplated solemnity, had it not been retarded by a sudden invasion of the Philistines, who were twice repulsed with great loss (2 Samuel 5. 17); by the capture of Jerusalem, and the transference of the seat of government to that city. Finding, however, soon after, peace restored and his throne established, he resumed his preparations for removing the ark to the metropolis. 5. from Shihor of Egypt—(Joshua 15. 4, 47; Numbers 34. 5; 1 Kings 8. 65; 2 Kings 24. 7; 2 Chronicles 7. 8.) A small brook flowing into the Mediterranean, near the modern El-arish, which forms the southern boundary of Palestine, unto the entering of Hamath—The defile between the mountain ranges of Syria and the extreme limit of Palestine on the north. 6-14. David went up, and all Israel, to Baalah—(See on 2 Samuel 6. 1-11.) 6. whose name is called on it—Rather, "who is worshipped there?" (2 Samuel 6. 2).

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1, 2. HIRAM'S KINDNESS TO DAVID; DAVID'S FELICITY. 1. Now Hiram king of Tyre—The alliance with this neighbouring king, and the important advantages derived from it, were amongst the most fortunate circumstances in David's reign. The providence of God appeared concurrent with His promise in smoothing the early course of his reign. Having conquered the Jebusites, and made Zion the royal residence, he had now, along with internal prosperity, established an advantageous treaty with a neighbouring prince; and hence, in immediate connection with the mention of this friendly league, it is said, "David perceived that the Lord had confirmed him king over Israel." 2. his kingdom was lifted up on high, because of his people Israel—This is an important truth, that sovereigns are invested with royal honour and authority, not for their own sakes so much as for that of their people. But while it is true of all kings, it was especially applicable to the monarchs of Israel, and even David was made to know that all his glory and greatness were given only to fit him, as the minister of God, to execute the Divine purposes towards the chosen people.

3-7. HIS WIVES. 3. David took more wives at Jerusalem—(see on 2 Samuel 3. 5). His concubines are mentioned (ch. 3. 9), where also is given a list of his children (v. 5-8), and those born in Jerusalem (2 Samuel 5. 14-16). In that, however, the names of Eliphalet and Nogah do not occur, and Beellada appears to be the same as Eliada.

8-17. HIS VICTORIES OVER THE PHILISTINES. 8. all the Philistines went up to seek David—In the hope of accomplishing his ruin (for so the phrase is used, 1 Samuel 23. 15; 24. 2, 3) before his throne was consolidated. Their hostility arose, both from a belief that his patriotism would lead him, ere long, to wipe out the national dishonour at Gilboa, and by fear, that in any invasion of their country, his thorough knowledge of their weak points would give him superior advantages. They resolved, therefore, to surprise and crush him ere he was fairly seated on his throne. 11. they came to Baal-perazim; and David smote them there—In an engagement fought at Mount Perazim (Isaiah 28. 21), in the valley of Rephaim, a few miles west of Jerusalem, the Philistines were defeated and put to flight. 12. when they had left their gods—(see on 2 Samuel 5. 21). 13. the Philistines yet again spread themselves—They renewed the campaign the next season, taking the same route. David, according to Divine directions, did not confront them. 14. Go not up after them—The text in 2 Samuel 5. 23, more correctly has, "Go not up," turn away from them—i. e., by stealing round a baccagrove, come upon their rear, for God is gone forth before thee—"The sound of the going in the tops of the mulberry trees," i. e., the rustling of the leaves by a strong breeze suddenly rising, was the sign by which David was divinely apprised of the precise moment for the attack. The impetuosity of his onset was like the gush of a pent-up torrent, which sweeps away all in its course; and in allusion to this incident the place got its name. 16. From Gibeon . . . to Gazer—Geba or Gibeon (2 Samuel 5. 25), now Yefa, in the province of Judah. The line from this to Gazer was intersected by the roads which led from Judah to the cities of the Philistines, and to recover possession of it, therefore, as was effected by this decisive battle, was equivalent to setting free the whole mountains of Judah as far as their most westerly slope. [BERTHEAU.]

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 1-24. DAVID BRINGS THE ARK FROM OBED-EDOM. 1. David made him houses in the city of David—Through the liberality of his Tyrian ally (ch. 14. 1), David was enabled to erect not only a palace for himself, but to furnish suitable accommodation for his numerous family. Where polygamy prevails, each wife has a separate house or suite of apartments for herself and children. prepared a place for the ark of God, and pitched for it a tent—i. e., made an entirely new one upon the model of the former—the old tabernacle, which Moses had constructed in the wilderness, and which had hitherto served the purpose of a sacred covering, being to be left at Gibeon, in consequence either of the unwillingness of the inhabitants to part with such a venerable relic, or of there being no use for it in Jerusalem, where a more solid and sumptuous edifice was contemplated. If it appear surprising that David "made him houses" before he prepared this new tabernacle, it should be remembered that he had received no Divine intimation respecting such a work. 2. Then David said, None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites—After the lapse of three months (ch. 13. 14) the purpose of transporting the ark to Jerusalem was resumed. Time and reflection had led to a discovery of the cause of the painful catastrophe that marred the first attempt, and in preparing for the solemn procession that was now to usher the sacred symbol into its resting-place, David took special care that the carriage should be regulated in strict conformity to the law (Numbers 4. 5, 15; 7. 9; 10. 17). 3. David gathered all Israel together—Some are of opinion that this was done on one of the three great festivals, but at whatever time the ceremonial took place, it was of great importance to summon a general convocation of the people, many of whom, from the long-continued disorders of the kingdom, might have had little or no opportunity of knowing anything of the ark, which had been allowed to remain so long in obscurity and neglect. 4. David assembled the children of Aaron, and the Levites—The children of Aaron were the two priests (v. 11), Zadok and Abiathar, heads of the two priestly houses of Eleazar and Ithamar, and colleagues in the high priesthood (2 Samuel 20. 25). The Levites were the chiefs of their father's house (v. 12); four belonging to the Kohathite branch, on whose shoulders the ark was to be borne, viz., Uriei, Shemalah—descended from Eliazaphan or Elzaphan—(Exodus 6. 22), Hebron (Exodus 6. 18; ch. 6. 2), and Amminadab from Uzziel (Exodus 6. 22). 12. sanctify yourselves—This special sanctification, which was required on all grave and important occasions, consisted in observing the strictest abstinence, as well as cleanliness, both in person and dress (see on Genesis 35. 2; Exodus 19. 10, 15); and in the neglect of these rules no step could have been taken (2 Chronicles 30. 3). 16-24. David spake to the chief of the Levites . . . to appoint singers with instruments—These eminent Levites were instructed to train the musicians and singers who were under them, for the solemn procession. The performers were ranged in three choirs or bands, and the names of the principal leaders are given (v. 17, 18, 21), with the instruments respectively used by each. Ben (v. 18) is omitted (v. 20). Either it was used merely as a common noun, to intimate that Zechariah was the son of Jaaziel or Aziel, or Ben is the same as Azaziah. 23. Chenaniah, chief of the Levites—He was not of the six heads of the Levitical families, but a chief in consequence of his office, which required learning, without regard to birth or family. Instructed about the song—He directed all these bands as to the proper time when each was to strike in or change their notes; or, as some render the passage, "He led the burdens, for he was skilled," i. e., in the custom which it was necessary to observe in the carriage of the holy things. [BERTHEAU.] 23. Berechiah and Elkanah were door-keepers—Who marched immediately in front, while Obed-edom and Jeiel went in the rear, of the ark. 25. So David and the elders . . . and captains . . . went—The pious design of David in ordering all his principal ministers and officers to take part in this solemn work, and imparting so much pomp and imposing ceremony to the procession, was evidently to inspire the popular mind with a profound veneration for the ark, and to give the young especially salutary impressions of religion, which would be renewed by the remembrance that they had been witnesses of the august solemnity in which the king and the highest aristocracy of the land participated, vying with all other classes to do honour to the God of Israel. 26. It came to pass, &c.—(see on 2 Samuel 6, 13-23). they offered seven bullocks and seven rams—The Levites seem to have entered on this duty with fear and trembling; and finding that they might advance without any such indications of Divine wrath as Uzza had experienced (ch. 13, 10), they offered an ox and a fatted sheep immediately after starting (2 Samuel 6, 13), and seven bullocks and seven rams—a perfect sacrifice—at the close of the procession (ch. 16, 1). It is probable that preparations had been made for the offering of similar sacrifices at regular intervals along the way. 27. a robe of fine linen—Hebrew, Butz—is rather supposed in the later books to denote cotton. an ephod—A shoulder garment, a cincture or cape over his dress. It was worn by the priests, but was not so peculiar to them as to be forbidden others (1 Samuel 2, 18; 22, 18). 29. Michal . . . saw . . . David dancing and playing—His movements would be slow and solemn, suitable to the grave and solemn character of the music. Though his royal robes were laid aside, he was attired like the other officials, showing a becoming humility in the immediate presence of God. The feelings manifested by Michal were only an ebullition of spleen from a proud and passionate woman.

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 1-6. DAVID'S FESTIVAL SACRIFICE AND LIBER-ALITY TO THE PEOPLE. 2. he blessed the people in the name of the Lord—the king commended their zeal, supplicated the Divine blessing upon them, and ordered the remains of the thank offerings which had been profusely sacrificed during the procession, to be distributed in certain proportions to every individual, that the ceremonial might terminate with appropriate festivities (Deuteronomy 12, 7). 3. flagon of wine—the two latter words are a supplement by our translators, and the former is, in other versions, rendered not a "flagon," but a "cake"; a confection, as the Septuagint renders it, made of flour and honey. 4-6. he appointed certain of the Levites to minister before the ark of the Lord—No sooner was the ark deposited in its tent than the Levites, who were to officiate in the choirs before it, entered upon their duties; a select number of the musicians being chosen for the service from the list (ch. 15, 19-21) of those who had taken a prominent part in the recent procession. The same arrangement was to be observed in their duties, now that the ark was again stationary; Asaph, with his associates, composing the first or principal company, played with cymbals; Zechariah and his colleagues, with whom were conjoined Jeiel and Obed-edom, forming the second company, used harps and similar instruments. 5. Jeiel—is the same as Aziel (ch. 15, 20). 6. Benaiah also and Jehaziel—the name of the former is mentioned among the priests (ch. 15, 24), but not the latter. The office assigned to them was that of blowing trumpets at regular intervals before the ark and in the tabernacle.

7-43. HIS PSALM OF THANKSGIVING. 7. Then on that day David delivered first this psalm—Amongst the other preparations for this solemn inauguration, the royal bard had composed a special hymn for the occasion. Doubtless it had been previously in the hands of Asaph and his assistants, but it was now publicly committed to them as they entered for the first time on the performance of their sacred duties. It occupies the greater part of this chapter (v. 8-36), and seems to have been compiled from other psalms of David, previously known to the Israelites, as the whole of it will be found, with very slight variations, in psalm 96.; 105, 1-15; 106, 47, 48. In the form, however, in which it is given by the sacred historian, it seems to have been the first psalm given for use in the tabernacle service; and abounding, as it does, with the liveliest ascriptions of praise to God for the revelation of His glorious character and the display of His marvellous works; containing, as it does, so many pointed allusions to the origin, privileges and peculiar destiny of the chosen people, it was admirably calculated to animate the devotions and call forth the gratitude of the assembled multitude. 36. all the people said, Amen—(cf. Psalm 72, 19, 20; 106, 48.) In the former, the author of the doxology utters the amen himself, while in the latter the people are exhorted to say amen. This may arise from the fact that the latter psalm originally concluded with the injunction to say amen. But in this historical account of the festival, it was necessary to relate that the people obeyed this injunction on the occasion referred to, and therefore the words "let them praise," were altered into "and they praised." [BERTHEAU.] 37-43. So he left there, before the covenant of the Lord, Asaph and his brethren, &c.—The sequel of the chapter describes the appointment of the sacred musicians and their respective duties. 38. Obed-edom with their brethren—Hosah, mentioned at the close of the verse, and a great number besides (see on ch. 26). to be porters—doorkeepers. 39, 40. And Zadok . . . before the tabernacle . . . at Gibeon—While the officers above-mentioned, under the superintendance of Abiathar, were appointed to officiate in Jerusalem, whither the ark had been brought—Zadok and the priests subordinate to him were stationed at Gibeon to perform the sacred service before the ancient tabernacle which still remained there. continually morning and evening—as the law enjoined (Exodus 29, 38; Numbers 28, 3, 6), and do according to all that is written in the law—(See Numbers 28.) Thus, in the time of David, the worship was performed at two places, where the sacred things that had been transmitted from the age of Moses were preserved. Before the ark in Jerusalem, Asaph and his brethren officiated as singers—Obed-edom and Hosah served as door-keepers—Benaiah and Jehaziel blew the trumpets—while at the tabernacle and burnt offering is: Gibeon, Heman and Jeduthun presided over the sacred music; the sons of Jeduthun were door-keepers, and Zadok, with his suite of attendant priests, offered the sacrifices.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1-10. DAVID FORBIDDEN TO BUILD GOD AN HOUSE. 1. as David sat in his house—The details of this chapter were given in nearly similar terms (2 Samuel 7). The date was towards the latter end of David's reign, for it is expressly said in the former book to have been at the cessation of all his wars. But as to narrate the preparations for the removal of the ark and the erection of the temple was the principal object of the historian, the exact chronology is not followed. 5. I have gone from tent to tent, and from one tabernacle to another—The llz. rendering is, "I was walking in a tent and in a dwelling." The evident intention (as we may see from v. 6) was to lay stress upon the fact that God was a Mithallek (a travelling God) and went from one place to another with his tent and his entire dwelling (the dwelling included not merely the tent, but the fore-courts with the altar of burnt offerings, &c.) [BERTHEAU.] 6. spake I a word to any of the judges—In 2 Samuel 7. 7 it is "any of the tribes" of Israel. Both are included. But the judges "who were commanded to feed the people," form the more suitable antithesis to David. Why have ye not built me an house of cedars?—i. e., a solid and magnificent temple. 7. Thus saith the Lord, I took thee from the sheep-cote—a round tower of rude construction, high walled, but open at the top, in which sheep are often enclosed at night to protect them from wild beasts. The meaning is, Elevated you to the throne from a humble condition solely by an act of Divine grace, and not from any antecedent merits of your own (see on 1 Samuel 16. 11), and enabled you to acquire renown, equal or superior to any other monarch. Your reign will ever be afterwards regarded as the best and brightest era in the history of Israel, for it will secure to the nation a settled inheritance of prosperity and peace, without any of the oppressions or disorders that afflicted them in early times. 9, 10, at the beginning, and since the time I commanded judges—i. e., including the whole period from Joshua to Saul. I tell thee, The Lord will build thee an house—this was the language of Nathan himself, who was specially directed to assure David, not only of personal blessing and prosperity, but of a continuous line of royal descendants. 11. I will raise up thy seed—(2 Samuel 7. 12.) 13. I will not take my iniquity away from him, as I took it from him that was before thee—My procedure in dealing with him will be different from my disposal of Saul. Should his misconduct call for personal chastisement, I shall spare his family. If I see it necessary to withdraw my favour and help for a time, it will be a corrective discipline only to reform and restore, not to destroy. (On this passage some have founded an argument for Solomon's repentance and return to God.) 14. I will settle him in my house—over my people Israel. and in my kingdom—God here asserts His right of supreme sovereignty in Israel. David and Solomon, with their successors, were only the viceregents whom He nominated, or, in His providence, permitted. His throne shall be established for ever—The posterity of David inherited the throne in a long succession—but not always. In such a connection as this, the phrase "for ever" is employed in a restricted sense (see on Lamentations 3. 31). We naturally expect the prophet to revert to David before concluding, after having spoken (v. 12) of the building of Solomon's temple. The promise that his house should be blessed was intended as a compensation for the disappointment of his wish to build the temple, and hence this assurance is appropriately repeated at the conclusion of the prophet's address. [BERTHEAU.] 15. According to all . . . this vision—The revelation of the Divine will was made to the prophet in a dream. 16. David the king sat before the Lord, and said—(See on 2 Samuel 7. 18-29.)

CHAPTER XVIII.

Ver. 1, 2. DAVID SUBDUES THE PHILISTINES AND MOABITES. 1. David took Gath and her towns—The full extent of David's conquests in the Philistine territory is here distinctly stated, whereas in the parallel passage (2 Samuel 8. 1) it was only described in a general way. Gath was the "Metheg-ammah," or "arm-bridle," as it is there called—either from its supremacy as the capital over the other Philistine towns, or because, in the capture of that important place and its dependencies, he obtained the complete control of his restless neighbours. 2. he smote Moab—The terrible severities by which David's conquest of that people was marked, and the probable reason of their being subjected to such a dreadful retribution, are narrated (2 Samuel 8. 2). the Moabites brought gifts—i. e., became tributary to Israel.

3-17. SMITES HADADEZER AND THE SYRIANS. 3. Hadadezer—Or Hadadezer (2 Samuel 8. 3), which was probably the original form of the name, was derived from Hadad, a Syrian deity. It seems to have become the official and hereditary title of the rulers of that kingdom. Zobah—Its situation is determined by the words "unto" or "towards Hamath," a little to the north-east of Damascus, and is supposed by some to be the same place as in earlier times was called Hobah (Genesis 14. 15). Previous to the rise of Damascus, Zobah was the capital of the kingdom which held supremacy among the petty states of Syria. as he went to establish his dominions by the river Euphrates—Some refer this to David, who was seeking to extend his possessions in one direction towards a point bordering on the Euphrates, in accordance with the promise (Genesis 15. 18; Numbers 24. 17). But others are of opinion that, as David's name is mentioned (v. 4), this reference is most applicable to Hadadezer. 4-8. David took from him a thousand chariots—(See on 2 Samuel 8. 3-14.) In that passage David is said to have taken 700 horsemen, whereas here it is said that he took 7000. This great discrepancy in the text of the two narratives seems to have originated with a transcriber in confounding the two Hebrew letters which indicate the numbers, and in neglecting to mark or obscure the points over one of them. We have no means of ascertaining whether 700 or 7000 be the more correct. Probably the former should be adopted. [DAVIDSON'S HERM.] but reserved of them an hundred chariots—Probably to grace a triumphal procession on his return to Jerusalem, and after using them in that way, destroy them like the rest. 8. from Tibhath and from Chum—These places are called Betah and Berthah (2 Samuel 8. 8). Perhaps the one might be the Jewish, the other the Syrian name of these towns. Neither their situation nor the connection between them is known. The Arabic version makes them to be Emesa (now Hems) and Baal-bek, both of which agree very well with the relative position of Zobah. 9-13. Tou—Or Toi—whose dominions border on those of Hadadezer. (See on 2 Samuel 8. 9-12; 1 Kings 11. 15.) 17. the Cherethites and the Pelethites—Who formed the royal body-guard. The Cherethites were, most probably, those brave men who all along accompanied David while among the Philistines, and from that people derived their name (1 Samuel 30. 14; Ezekiel 25. 16; Zephaniah 12. 5) as well as their skill in archery—while the Pelethites were those who joined him at Ziklag, took their name from Pelet, the chief man in the company (ch. 12. 3), and, being Benjamites, were expert in the use of the sling.

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 1-5. DAVID'S MESSENGERS, SENT TO COMFORT HANUN, ARE DISGRACEFULLY TREATED. 1. after this—This phrase seems to indicate that the incident now to be related took place immediately, or soon after the wars described in the preceding chapter. But the chronological order is loosely observed, and the only just inference that can be drawn from the use of this phrase is, that some farther account is to be given of the wars against the Syrians. Nahash the king of the children of Ammon died—There had subsisted a very friendly relation between David and him, begun during the exile of the former, and cemented, doubtless, by their common hostility to Saul. 3. are not his servants come unto thee for to search?—i. e., thy capital, Rabbah. (2 Samuel 10. 3.) 4. shaved them—Not completely, but only the half of their face. This disrespect to the beard, and indecent exposure of their persons by their clothes being cut off from the girdle downwards, was the grossest indignity to which Jews, in common with all Orientals, could be subjected. No wonder that the men were ashamed to appear in public—that the king recommended them to remain in seclusion on the border till the mark of their disgrace had disappeared—and then they might, with propriety, return to the court.

6-15. JOAB AND ABISHAI OVERCOME THE AMMONITES. 6. when the children of Ammon saw that they made themselves odious to David—One universal feeling of indignation was roused throughout Israel, and all classes supported the king in his determination to avenge this unprovoked insult on the Hebrew nation. Hannu . . . sent a thousand talents of silver—a sum equal to £342,400, to procure the services of foreign mercenaries, chariots and horsemen out of Mesopotamia, . . . Syria-maachah, and . . . Zobah—The Mesopotamian troops did not arrive during this campaign (v. 16). Syria-maachah lay on the north of the possessions of the transjordanic Israelites, near Gilead, Zobah—(see on ch. 18, 3). 7. they hired thirty and two thousand chariots—Heb., riders, or cavalry, accustomed to fight either on horseback or in chariots, and occasionally on foot, and accepting this as the true rendering, the number of hired auxiliaries mentioned in this passage agrees exactly with the statement in 2 Samuel 10. 6. 20,000, 12,000 (from Tob), equal to 32,000, and 1000 with the King of Maachah. 8. David . . . sent Joab, and all the host of the mighty men—The whole forces of Israel, including the great military orders, were engaged in this war. 9. children of Ammon put the battle in array before the gate of the city—i. e., outside the walls of Medebah, a frontier town on the Arnon, the kings that were come were by themselves in the field—The Israelitish army being thus beset by the Ammonites in front, and by the Syrian auxiliaries behind, Joab resolved to attack the latter—the more numerous and formidable host—while he directed his brother Abishai, with a suitable detachment, to attack the Ammonites. Joab's address before the engagement displays the faith and piety that became a commander of the Hebrew people. The mercenaries being defeated, the courage of the Ammonites failed; so that, taking flight, they entrenched themselves within the fortified walls.

16-19. SHOPHACH SLAIN BY DAVID. 16. And when the Syrians saw that they were put to the worse—(See on 2 Samuel 10. 15-19.) 18. David slew of the Syrians seven thousand men—(Cf. 2 Samuel 10. 13, which has seven hundred chariots.) Either the text in one of the books is corrupt [KEIL, DAVIDSON], or the accounts must be combined, giving this result—7000 horsemen, 7000 chariots, and 40,000 footmen. [KENNICOTT, HEBBIGANT, CALMET.]

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1-3. RABBAH BESIEGED BY JOAB, SPOILED BY DAVID, AND THE PEOPLE TORTURED. 1. at this time when kings go out to battle—in spring, the usual season in ancient times for entering on a campaign;—i. e., a year subsequent to the Syrian war. Joab led forth the power of the army, and wasted the country . . . of Ammon—The former campaign had been disastrous, owing chiefly to the hired auxiliaries of the Ammonites; and as it was necessary, as well as just, that they should be severely chastised for their wanton outrage on the Hebrew ambassadors, Joab ravaged their country, invested their capital, Rabbah, and having, after a protracted siege, taken one part of it, the lower town or "city of waters," insulated by the winding course of the Jabbok, he knowing that the fort called "the royal city" would soon fall, invited the king to come in person, and have the honour of storming it. The knowledge of this fact (mentioned 2 Samuel 12. 26) enables us to reconcile the two statements—"David tarried at Jerusalem" (v. 1), and "David and all the people returned to Jerusalem" (v. 3). 2. David took the crown of their king, and found it to weigh a talent of gold—Equal to 125 lbs. Some think that Malcom, rendered in our version "their king," should be taken as a proper name, Milcom or Molech, the Ammonite idol, which, of course, might bear a heavy weight. But, like many other state crowns of Eastern kings, the crown got at Rabbah was not worn on the head, but suspended by chains of gold above the throne. precious stones—Heb., a stone, or cluster of precious stones, which was set on David's head. 3. cut them with saws, &c.—The Heb. word, "cut them," is, with the difference of the final letter, the same as that rendered "put them," in the parallel passage of Samuel; and many consider that putting them to saws, axes, &c., means nothing more than that David condemned the inhabitants of Rabbah to hard and penal servitude.

4-8. THREE OVERTHROWS OF THE PHILISTINES, AND THREE GIANTS SLAIN. 4. war at Geza—or Gob (see 2 Samuel 21. 18-22).

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 1-13. DAVID SINS IN NUMBERING THE PEOPLE. 1. Satan stood up against Israel—God, by withdrawing His grace at this time from David (see on 2 Samuel 24. 1), permitted the tempter to prevail over him, and as the result of this successful temptation was the entail of a heavy calamity as a punishment from God upon the people, it might be said that "Satan stood up against Israel." number Israel—In the act of taking the census of a people, there is not only no evil, but much utility. But numbering Israel—that people who were to become as the stars for multitude, implying a distrust of the Divine promise, was a sin; and though it had been done with impunity in the time of Moses, at that enumeration each of the people had contributed "half a shekel towards the building of the tabernacle," that there might be no plague among them when he numbered them (Exodus 30. 12). Hence the numbering of that people was in itself regarded as an undertaking by which the anger of God could be easily aroused; but when the arrangements were made by Moses for the taking of the census, God was not angry because the people were numbered for the express purpose of the tax for the sanctuary, and the money which was thus collected ("the atonement money," Exodus 30. 16) appeased Him. Everything depended, therefore, upon the design of the census. [BERTHEAU.] The sin of David numbering the people consisted in its being either to gratify his pride to ascertain the number of warriors he could muster for some meditated plan of conquest, or, perhaps, more likely still, to institute a regular and permanent system of taxation, which he deemed necessary to provide an adequate establishment for the monarchy, but which was regarded as a tyrannical and oppressive exaction—an innovation on the liberty of the people—a departure from ancient usage unbecoming a king of Israel. 3. why will he be a cause of trespass to Israel?—or bring an occasion of punishment on Israel. In Heb., the word sin is often used synonymously with the punishment of sin. In the course of Providence, the people frequently suffer for the misconduct of their rulers. 5. Joab gave the sum of the number of the children of Israel—It amounted to one million one hundred thousand men in Israel, capable of bearing arms, inclusive of the 300,000 military (ch. 27.), which, being already enlisted in the royal service, were not reckoned (2 Samuel 24. 9), and to 370,000 men in Judah, omitting 30,000 which formed an army of observation stationed on the Philistine frontier (2 Samuel 6. 1). So large a population at this early period, considering the limited extent of the country, and comparing it with the earlier census (Numbers 26.), is a striking proof of the fulfilment of the promise (Genesis 15. 5). 6. Levi and Benjamin counted he not—If this census was ordered with a view to the imposition of taxes, this alone would account for Levi, who were not warriors (v. 5), not being numbered (see on Numbers 1. 47-55). The population of Benjamin had been taken (see on ch. 7. 6-11), and the register preserved in the archives of that tribe. This, however, was taken on another occasion, and by other agency than that of Joab. The non-numbering of these two tribes might have originated in the special and gracious providence of God, partly because Levi was devoted to His service, and Benjamin had become the least of all the tribes (Judges 21.); and partly because God foresaw that they would remain faithful to the house of David in the division of the tribes, and therefore would not have them diminished. [POOLE.] From the course followed in this survey (see on 2 Samuel 24. 4-8), it would appear that Judah and Benjamin were the last tribes that were to be visited, and that, after the census in Judah had been finished, Joab, before entering on that of Benjamin, had to return to Jerusalem, where the king, now sensible of his great error, gave orders to stop all further proceedings in the business. Not only the remonstrance of Joab at the first, but his slow progress in the survey (2 Samuel 24.8) showed the strong repugnance and even horror of the old general at this unconstitutional measure. 9. The Lord spake unto Gad, David's seer—Although David was himself endowed with a prophetic gift, yet, in matters relating to himself or his kingdom, he was in the habit of consulting the Lord through the medium of the priests, and when he failed to do so, a prophet was sent on extraordinary occasions to admonish or chastise him. Gad, a private friend, was occasionally employed as the bearer of these prophetic messages. 11, 12. Choose thee, &c.—To the three evils these correspond in beautiful agreement: three years, three months, three days. [BERTHEAU.] (See on 2 Samuel 24.13.) 13. let me fall now into the hand of the Lord . . . let me not fall into the hand of man—Experience had taught him that human passion and vengeance had no bounds, whereas our wise and gracious Father in heaven knows the kind, and regulates the extent, of chastisement which every one needs. 14, 15. So the Lord . . . sent an angel unto Jerusalem to destroy it—The infliction only of the pestilence is here noticed, without any account of its duration or its ravages, while a minute description is given of the visible appearance and menacing attitude of the destroying angel. stood by the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite—Ornan was probably his Hebrew or Jewish, Araannah his Jebusite or Canaanitish, name. Whether he was the old king of Jebus, as that title is given to him (2 Samuel 24.23), or not, he had been converted to the worship of the true God, and was possessed both of property and influence. 16. David and the elders . . . clothed in sackcloth, fell upon their faces—They appeared in the garb and assumed the attitude of humble penitents, confessing their sins, and deprecating the wrath of God.

18-30. HE BUILDS AN ALTAR. 18. the angel of the Lord commanded Gad to say—The order about the erection of an altar, as well as the indication of its site, is described (2 Samuel 24.18) as brought directly by Gad. Here we are informed of the quarter whence the prophet got his commission. It is only in the later stages of Israel's history that we find angels employed in communicating the Divine will to the prophets. 20, 21. Ornan was threshing wheat—If the census was entered upon in autumn, the beginning of the civil year, the nine and a half months it occupied would end at wheat-harvest. The common way of threshing corn is by spreading it out on a high level area, and driving backwards and forwards upon it two oxen harnessed to a clumsy sledge with three rollers and some sharp spikes. The driver sits on his knees on the box, while another present is employed in drawing back the straw and separating it from the grain underneath. By this operation the chaff is very much chopped, and the grain threshed out. 23. I give thee . . . the threshing instruments for wood—i. e., to burn the sacrifice of the oxen. Very little real import—the haste and the value of the present offered—can be understood in this country. The offering was made for instant use. Ornan, hereby hoping to terminate the pestilence without a moment's delay, "gave all," oxen, the large threshing machine, and the wheat. 25. David . . . gave for the place six hundred shekels of gold—At first he bought only the cattle and the threshing instruments, for which he paid fifty shekels of silver (2 Samuel 24.24); afterwards he purchased the whole property, Mount Moriah, on which the future temple stood. High in the centre of the mountain platform rises a remarkable rock, now covered by the dome of "the Sakrah." It is irregular in its form, and measures about sixty feet in one direction and fifty feet in the other. It is the natural surface of Mount Moriah, and is thought by many to be the rock of the threshing-floor of Araunah, selected by David, and continued by Solomon and Zerubbabel as "the unhewn stone" on which to build the altar. [BARTLETT'S "WALKS ABOUT JERUSALEM." STANLEY.] 26. David built there an altar—He went in procession with his leading men from the royal palace, down Mount Zion, and through the intervening city; and, having plenty of space on his own property, he was commanded, under peremptory direction, to go a considerable distance from his home, up Mount Moriah, to erect an altar on premises which he had to buy. It was on or close to the spot where Abraham had offered up Isaac. answered him by fire from heaven—(See Leviticus 9.24; 1 Kings 18.21-23; 2 Kings 1.12; 2 Chronicles 7.1.) 28. when David saw that the Lord had answered him, he sacrificed there—Or, he continued to sacrifice there. Perceiving his sacrifice was acceptable, he proceeded to make additional offerings there, and seek favour by prayer and expiatory rites; for the dread of the menacing angel destroying Jerusalem while he was absent in the centre of worship at Gibeon, especially reverence for the Divine Being, led him to continue his adorations in that place which God (2 Chronicles 3.1) had hallowed by the tokens of His presence and gracious acceptance.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 1-5. DAVID PREPARES FOR BUILDING THE TEMPLE. 1. David said, This is the house of the Lord God—By the miraculous sign of fire from heaven, and perhaps other intimations, David understood it to be the will of God that the national place of worship should be fixed there, and he forthwith proceeded to make preparations for the erection of the temple on that spot. 2. David commanded to gather together the strangers—Partly the descendants of the old Canaanites (2 Chronicles 8.7-10), from whom was exacted a tribute of bond-service, and partly war captives (2 Chronicles 2.7), reserved for the great work he contemplated.

6-19. HE INSTRUCTS SOLOMON. 6. Then he called for Solomon . . . and charged him—The earnestness and solemnity of this address creates an impression that it was given a little before the old king's decease. He unfolded his great and long-cherished plan, enjoined the building of God's house as a sacred duty on him as his son and successor, and described the resources that were at command for carrying on the work. The vast amount of personal property he had accumulated in the precious metals must have been spoil taken from the people he had conquered, and the cities he had sacked.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 1. DAVID MAKES SOLOMON KING. 1. when David was old . . . he made Solomon king—This brief statement, which comprises the substance of 1 Kings 1.32-48, is made here solely to introduce an account of the preparations carried on by David during the latter years of his life for providing a national place of worship.

2-6. NUMBER AND DISTRIBUTION OF THE LEVITES. 2. he gathered together all the princes of Israel—All important measures relating to the public interest were submitted for consideration to a general assembly of the representatives of the tribes (ch. 13.1; 15.25; 22.17; 26). 3. the Levites were numbered . . . thirty and eight thousand—Four times their number at the early census taken by Moses (see on Numbers 4. and 26). It was, in all likelihood, this vast increase that suggested and rendered expedient that classification, made in the last year of David's reign, which the present and three subsequent chapters describe. by their polls, man by man—Women and children were not included. 4. twenty and four thousand were set forward the work of the house of the Lord—They were not to preside over all the services of the temple. The Levites were subject to the priests, and they were superior to the Nethinims and other servants, who were not of the race of Levi. But they had certain departments of duty assigned, some of which are here specified. 5. praised the Lord with the instruments which I made—David seems to have been an inventor of many of the musical instruments used in the temple (Amos 6.5). 6. David divided them into courses among the sons of Levi—These are enumerated according to their fathers' houses, but no more of these are mentioned here than the twenty-four thousand who were engaged in the work connected with the Lord's house. The fathers' houses of those Levites corresponded with the classes into which they [JOSEPHUS' ANTIQUITIES] as well as the priests were divided (see on ch. 24, 20-31; 26, 20-28).

7-11. SONS OF GERSHON. 7-11. the Gershonites—They had nine fathers' houses, six descended from Laadan, and three from Shmel.

12-20. OF KOHATH. 12. The sons of Kohath—He was the founder of nine Levitical fathers' houses. 13. Aaron was separated—As high priest (see on ch. 25, 1-19). 14. concerning Moses—His sons were ranked with the Levites generally, but not introduced into the distinctive portion of the descendants of Levi, who were appointed to the special functions of the priesthood.

21-23. OF MERARI. 21-23. The sons of Merari—They comprised six fathers' houses. Summing them together, Gershon founded nine fathers' houses, Kohath nine, and Merari six: total, twenty-four.

24. OFFICE OF THE LEVITES. 24. These were the sons of Levi . . . that did the work . . . from twenty years and upwards—The enumeration of the Levites was made by David (v. 3) on the same rule as that followed by Moses (Numbers 4, 3), viz., from thirty years. But he saw afterwards that this rule might be beneficially relaxed, and that the enrolment of Levites for their proper duties might be made from twenty years of age. The ark and tabernacle being now stationary at Jerusalem, the labour of the Levites was greatly diminished, as they were no longer obliged to transport its heavy furniture from place to place. The number of 38,000 Levites, exclusive of priests, was doubtless more than sufficient for the ordinary service of the tabernacle. But this pious king thought that it would contribute to the glory of the Lord to employ as many officers in his Divine service as possible. These first rules, however, which David instituted, were temporary, as very different arrangements were made after the ark had been deposited in the tabernacle of Zion.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Ver. 1-19. DIVISION OF THE SONS OF AARON INTO FOUR AND TWENTY ORDERS. 1. Now these are the divisions of the sons of Aaron—(See on ch. 23, 6.) 2. Nadab and Abihu died before their father—i. e., not in his presence, but during his lifetime (see Marg. Ref.). therefore Eleazar and Ithamar executed the priest's office—In consequence of the death of his two eldest sons without issue, the descendants of Aaron were comprised in the families of Eleazar and Ithamar. Both of these sons discharged the priestly functions as assistants to their father. Eleazar succeeded him, and in his line the high priesthood continued until it was transferred to the family of Ithamar, in the person of Eli. 3. Zadok . . . and Ahimelech of the sons of Ithamar—This statement, taken in connection with v. 6, is not a little perplexing, since (2 Samuel 15, 24, 35; 20, 25) Abiathar is mentioned as the person conjoined in David's time with Zadok, in the collegiate exercise of the high priesthood. Some think that the words have been transposed, reading Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech. But there is no ground for regarding the text as faulty. The high priests of the line of Ithamar were the following: Ahiah or Ahimelech, his son Abiathar, his son Ahimelech. We frequently find the grandfather and grandson called by the same name (see list of high priests of the line of Eleazar, ch. 5, 30-41). Hence the author of the Chronicles was acquainted with Ahimelech, son of Abiathar, who, for some reason, discharged the duties of high priest in David's reign, and during the lifetime of his father (for Abiathar was living in the time of Solomon, 1 Kings 2, 27). [KEIL.] 4. there were more chief men found—The Heb. may be translated, "There were more men as to heads of the sons of Eleazar." It is true, in point of fact, that by the census the number of individuals belonging to the family of Eleazar was found greater than in that of Ithamar. And this, of necessity, led to there being more fathers' houses, and consequently more chiefs or presidents in the former. 5. they were divided by lot—This method of allocation was adopted manifestly to remove all cause of jealousy as to precedence and the right of performing particular duties. 6. one principal household—The marg. reading is preferable, "one house of the father." The lot was cast in a deliberate and solemn manner in presence of the king, the princes, the two high priests, and the chiefs of the priestly and Levitical families—the heads of families belonging to Eleazar and Ithamar were alternately brought forward to draw, and the name of each individual, as called, registered by an attendant secretary. To accommodate the casting of the lots to the inequality of the number, there being sixteen fathers' houses of Eleazar, and only eight of Ithamar, it was arranged that every house of Ithamar should be followed by two of Eleazar, or, what is the same thing, that every two houses of Eleazar should be followed by one of Ithamar. If, then, we suppose a commencement to have been made by Eleazar, the order would be as follows: one and two, Eleazar; three, Ithamar; four and five, Eleazar; six, Ithamar; seven and eight, Eleazar; nine, Ithamar; and so forth. [BERTHEAU.] The lot determined also the order of the priests' service. That of the Levites was afterwards distributed by the same arrangement (v. 31).

CHAPTER XXV.

Ver. 1-7. NUMBER AND OFFICE OF THE SINGERS. 1. David and the captains of the host—i. e., the princes (ch. 23, 2; 24, 6). It is probable that the king was attended on the occasion of arranging the singers by the same parties that are mentioned as having assisted him in regulating the order of the priests and Levites. 2. according to the order of the king—Heb., "by the hands of the king," i. e., "according to the king's order," under the personal superintendence of Asaph and his colleagues, which prophesied—i. e., in this connection, played with instruments. This metaphorical application of the term "prophecy" most probably originated in the practice of the prophets, who endeavoured to rouse their prophetic spirit by the animating influence of music (see on 2 Kings 3, 15). It is said that Asaph did this "according to David's order," because by royal appointment he officiated in the tabernacle on Zion (ch. 16, 37-41), while other leaders of the sacred music were stationed at Gibeon. 5. Heman the king's seer—The title of seer or prophet of David is also given to Gad (ch. 21, 9), and to Jeduthun (2 Chronicles 29, 15), in the words (marg. matters) of God. To lift up the horn—i. e., to blow loudly in the worship of God; or perhaps it means nothing more than that he presided over the wind instruments, as Jeduthun over the harp. Heman had been appointed at first to serve at Gibeon (ch. 16, 41). But his destination seems to have been changed at a subsequent period. God gave to Heman fourteen sons and three daughters—The daughters are mentioned, solely because from their musical taste and talents they formed part of the choir (Psalm 68, 25). 6, 7. all these were under the hands of their father—Asaph had four sons, Jeduthun six, and Heman fourteen, equal to twenty-four; making, the musicians with their brethren the singers, an amount of 288. For, like the priests and Levites, they were divided into twenty-four courses of twelve men each, equal to 288, who served a week in rotation; and these, half of whom officiated every week with a proportionate number of assistants, were skilful and experienced musicians, capable of leading and instructing the general musical corps, which comprised no less than 4000 (ch. 23, 5).

8-31. THEIR DIVISION BY LOT INTO FOUR AND TWENTY ORDERS. 8. they cast lots, ward against ward—"Ward" is an old English word for division or company. The lot was cast to determine the precedence of the classes or divisions over which the musical leaders presided; and, in order to secure an impartial arrangement of their order, the master and his assistants, the teacher and his scholars, in each class or company took part in this solemn casting of lots. In the first catalogue given in this chapter the courses are classed according to their employment as musicians—in the second, they are arranged in the order of their service.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Ver. 1-12. DIVISIONS OF THE PORTERS. 1, 2. Concerning the divisions of the porters—There were 4000 (ch. 23. 6), all taken from the families of the Kohathites and Merarites (v. 14), divided into twenty-four courses—as the priests and musicians. Meshelemiah the sons of Kore, of the sons of Asaph—Seven sons of Meshelemiah are mentioned (v. 2), whereas eighteen are given (v. 9), but in this latter number his relatives are included. 5. God blessed him—i. e., Obed-edom. The occasion of the blessing was his faithful custody of the ark (2 Samuel 6. 11, 12), and the nature of the blessing (Psalm 127. 5) consisted in the great increase of progeny by which his house was distinguished; seventy-two descendants are reckoned. 6. mighty men of valour—The circumstance of physical strength is prominently noticed in this chapter, as the office of the porters required them not only to act as sentinels of the sacred edifice and its precious furniture against attacks of plunderers or popular insurrection—to be, in fact, a military guard—but, after the temple was built, to open and shut the gates, which were extraordinarily large and ponderous. 10. Simri the chief . . . though . . . not the first-born—Probably because the family entitled to the right of primogeniture had died out, or because there were none of the existing families which could claim that right. 12. Among these were the divisions of the porters, even among the chief men—These were charged with the duty of superintending the watches, being heads of the twenty-four courses of porters.

13-19. THE GATES ASSIGNED BY LOT. 13. they cast lots—Their departments of duty, such as the gates they should attend to, were allotted in the same manner as those of the other Levitical bodies, and the names of the chiefs or captains are given, with the respective gates assigned them. 15. the house of Asuppim—Or collections, probably a storehouse, where were kept the grain, wine, and other offerings for the sustenance of the priests. 16. the gate Shallecheth—Probably the rubbish gate, through which all the accumulated filth and sweepings of the temple and its courts were poured out. By the causeway of the going up—Probably the ascending road which was cast up or raised from the deep valley between Mount Zion and Moriah, for the royal egress to the place of worship (2 Chronicles 9. 4). ward against ward—Some refer these words to Shuppim and Hosah, whose duty it was to watch both the western gate and the gate Shallecheth, which was opposite, while others take it as a general statement applicable to all the guards, and intended to intimate that they were posted at regular distances from each other, or that they all mounted and relieved guard at the same time in uniform order. 17-19. Eastward were six Levites—Because the gate there was the most frequented. Four at the north gate; four at the south, at the storehouse which was adjoining the south, and which had two entrance-gates, one leading in a south-westerly direction to the city, and the other direct west, two porters each—at the Parbar towards the west, there were six men posted—four at the causeway or ascent (v. 16), and two at Parbar, amounting to twenty-four in all, who were kept daily on guard. Parbar—is, perhaps, the same as Parvar (suburbs, 2 Kings 23. 11), and if so, this gate might be so called as leading to the suburbs. [CALMET.]

20-23. LEVITES THAT HAD CHARGE OF THE TREASURES. 20. of the Levites, Ahijah—The heading of this section is altogether strange as it stands, for it looks as if the sacred historian were going to commence a new subject different from the preceding. Besides, "Ahijah, whose name occurs after" the Levites, is not mentioned in the previous lists; it is totally unknown, and is introduced abruptly without further information; and lastly, Ahijah must have united in his own person those very offices of which the occupants are named in the verses that follow. The reading is incorrect. The Septuagint has this very suitable heading, "And their Levitical brethren over the treasures," &c. [BERTHEAU.] The names of those who had charge of the treasure-chambers at their respective wards are given, with a general description of the precious things committed to their trust. Those treasures were immense, consisting of the accumulated spoils of Israelitish victories, as well as of voluntary contributions made by David and the representatives of the people.

29-32. OFFICERS AND JUDGES. 29. officers and judges—The word rendered "officers" is the term which signifies scribes or secretaries, so that the Levitical class here described were magistrates, who, attended by their clerks, exercised judicial functions; there were 6000 of them (ch. 23. 4), who probably acted like their brethren on the principle of rotation, and these were divided into three classes—one (v. 29) for the outward business over Israel; one (v. 30), consisting of 1700, for the west of Jordan "In all business of the Lord, and in the service of the king;" and the third (v. 31, 32), consisting of 2700, were "rulers for every matter pertaining to God, and affairs of the king."

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 1-15. TWELVE CAPTAINS FOR EVERY SEVERAL MONTH. 1. came in and went out month by month—Here is an account of the standing military force of Israel. A militia formed, it would seem, at the beginning of David's reign (see on v. 7) was raised in the following order: Twelve legions, corresponding to the number of tribes, were enlisted in the king's service. Each legion comprised a body of 24,000 men, whose term of service was a month in rotation, and who were stationed either at Jerusalem or in any other place where they might be required. There was thus always a force sufficient for the ordinary purposes of state, as well as for resisting sudden attacks or popular tumults; and when extraordinary emergencies demanded a larger force, the whole standing army could easily be called to arms, amounting to 288,000, or to 300,000, including the 12,000 officers that naturally attended on the twelve princes (v. 16-24). Such a military establishment would be burdensome neither to the country nor to the royal exchequer; for attendance on this duty being a mark of honour and distinction, the expense of maintenance would be borne probably by the militiaman himself, or furnished out of the common fund of his tribe. Nor would the brief period of actual service produce any derangement of the usual course of affairs; for, on the expiry of the term, every soldier returned to the pursuits and duties of private life during the other eleven months of the year. Whether the same individuals were always enrolled, cannot be determined. The probability is, that provided the requisite number was furnished, no stricter scrutiny would be made. A change of men might, to a certain degree, be encouraged, as it was a part of David's policy to train all his subjects to skill in arms; and to have made the enlistment fall always on the same individuals would have defeated that purpose, as to have confined each month's levy rigidly within the limits of one tribe might have fallen hard upon those tribes which were weak and small. The rotation system being established, each division knew its own month, as well as the name of the commander under whom it was to serve. These commanders are styled, "the chief fathers," i. e., the hereditary heads of tribes who, like chieftains of clans, possessed great power and influence. captains of thousands and hundreds—The legions of 24,000 were divided into regiments of 1000, and these again into companies of 100 men, under the direction of their respective subalterns, there being, of course, twenty-four captains of thousands, and 240 centurions, and their officers—The Shoterim, who in the army performed the duty of the commissariat, keeping the muster-roll, &c. 2, 3. Jashobeam the son of Zabdiel—(See on ch. 11. 11; 2 Samuel 23. 8.) Hachmoni was his father, Zabdiel probably one of his ancestors; or there might be different names of the same individual. In the rotation of the military courses, the dignity of precedence, not of authority, was given to the hero. 4. second month was Dodai

Or Dodo. Here the text seems to require the supplement of "Eleazar the son of Dodo" (2 Samuel 23. 9). 7. Asahel—This officer having been slain at the very beginning of David's reign, his name was probably given to this division in honour of his memory, and his son was invested with the command.

16-24. PRINCES OF THE TWELVE TRIBES. 16. over the tribes of Israel; the ruler—This is a list of the hereditary chiefs or rulers of tribes at the time of David's numbering the people. Gad and Asher are not included; for what reason is unknown. The tribe of Levi had a prince (v. 17), as well as the other tribes; and although it was ecclesiastically subject to the high priest, yet in all civil matters it had a chief or head, possessed of the same authority and power as in the other tribes, only his jurisdiction did not extend to the priests. 18. Elihu—Probably the same as Eliab (1 Samuel 16. 16). 23. But David took not the number of them from twenty years old and under—The meaning is, that the census which David ordered did not extend to all the Israelites; for to contemplate such an enumeration would have been to attempt an impossibility (Genesis 23. 14), and besides would have been a daring offence to God. The limitation to a certain age was what had probably quieted David's conscience as to the lawfulness of the measure, while its expediency was strongly pressed upon his mind by the army arrangements he had in view. 24. neither was the number put in the account of the chronicles of King David—Either because the undertaking was not completed, Levi and Benjamin not having been numbered (ch. 21. 6), or the full details in the hands of the enumerating officers were not reported to David, and, consequently, not registered in the public archives. the chronicles—Were the daily records or annals of the king's reign. No notice was taken of this census in the historical register, as from the public calamity with which it was associated it would have stood a painful record of the Divine judgment against the king and the nation. 25. over the king's treasures—Those treasures consisted of gold, silver, precious stones, cedar-wood, &c.; those which he had in Jerusalem as distinguished from others without the city. the storehouses in the fields—Grain covered over with layers of straw is frequently preserved in the fields under little earthen mounds, like our potato pits. 27. the vineyards—These seem to have been in the vine-growing districts of Judah, and were committed to two men of that quarter. wine-cellars—Stores; the wine is deposited in jars sunk in the court of the house. 28. olive . . . and . . . sycamore trees . . . in the low plains—i. e., the Shephelah, the rich low-lying ground between the Mediterranean and the mountains of Judah. 29. herds that fed in Sharon—A fertile plain between Caesarea and Joppa. sheep and camels—These were probably in the countries east of the Jordan, and hence an Ishmaelite and Nazarite were appointed to take charge of them. 31. rulers of the substance that was King David's—How and when the king acquired these demesnes and this variety of property—whether it was partly by conquests, or partly by confiscation, or by his own active cultivation of waste lands—is not said. It was probably in all these ways. The management of the king's private possessions was divided into twelve parts, like his public affairs and the revenue derived from all these sources mentioned must have been very large.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 1-8. DAVID EXHORTS THE PEOPLE TO FEAR GOD. 1. David assembled all the princes of Israel—i. e., the representatives of the people, the leading men of the kingdom, who are enumerated in this verse according to their respective rank or degree of authority. princes of the tribes—(Ch. 27. 16-22.) Those patriarchal chiefs are mentioned first as being the highest in rank—a sort of hereditary noblesse. the captains of the companies—The twelve generals mentioned (ch. 27. 1-15). the stewards, &c.—(Ch. 27. 25-31.) the officers—Hebrew, eunuchs, or attendants on the court (1 Samuel 8. 15; 1 Kings 22. 9;

2 Kings 22. 18); and besides Joab, the commander-in-chief of the army, the heroes who had no particular office (ch. 11; 2 Samuel 23). This assembly, a very mixed and general one, as appears from the parties invited, was more numerous and entirely different from that mentioned (ch. 23. 2). 2. Hear me, my brethren—This was the style of address becoming a constitutional king of Israel (Deuteronomy 17. 20; 1 Samuel 30. 23; 2 Samuel 5. 1). I had it in mine heart—I proposed or designed. to build an house of rest—A solid and permanent temple. for the footstool of our God—God seated between the cherubim. at the two extremities of the ark, might be said to be enthroned in His glory, and the coverlet of the ark to be His footstool. and had made ready for the building—The immense treasures which David had amassed, and the elaborate preparations he had made, would have been amply sufficient for the erection of the temple of which he presented the model to Solomon. 3. thou hast been a man of war, and hast shed much blood—The church or spiritual state of the world, of which the temple at Jerusalem was to be a type, would be presided over by One who was to be pre-eminently the Prince of Peace, and therefore would be represented not so fitly by David, whose mission had been a preparatory one of battle and conquest, as by his son, who should reign in unbroken peace. 4, 5. he hath chosen Solomon—The spirit of David's statement is this:—It was not my ambition, my valour, or my merit that led to the enthronement of myself and family; it was the grace of God which chose the tribe, the family, the person—myself in the first instance, and now Solomon, to whom, as the Lord's anointed, you are all bound to submit. Like that of Christ, of whom he was a type, the appointment of Solomon to the kingdom above all his brethren was frequently pre-intimated (ch. 17. 12; 22. 9; 2 Samuel 7. 12-14; 12. 24, 25; 2 Kings 1. 13). 7. I will establish his kingdom for ever, if he be constant to do my commandments—The same condition is set before Solomon by God (1 Kings 3. 14; 9. 4). 8. Now . . . in the sight of all Israel, . . . keep, and seek for all the commandments of the Lord, &c.—This solemn and earnest exhortation to those present, and to all Israel through their representatives, to continue faithful in observing the Divine law as essential to their national prosperity and permanence, is similar to that of Moses (Deuteronomy 30. 15-20).

9-20. HE ENCOURAGES SOLOMON TO BUILD THE TEMPLE. 9, 10. And thou, Solomon my son—The royal speaker now turns to Solomon, and in a most impressive manner presses upon him the importance of sincere and practical piety. know thou—He did not mean head-knowledge, for Solomon possessed that already, but that experimental acquaintance with God which is only to be obtained by loving and serving Him. 11. Then David gave to Solomon . . . the pattern—He now put into the hands of his son and successor the plan or model of the temple, with the elevations, measurements, apartments, and chief articles of furniture, all of which were designed according to the pattern given him by Divine revelation (v. 19). 12. the pattern of all that he had by the spirit—Rather, with him in spirit; i. e., he was floating in his mind. 15, 16. the candlesticks of silver—Solomon made them all of gold—in this and a few minor particulars departing from the letter of his father's instructions, where he had the means of executing them in a more splendid style. There was only one candlestick and one table in the tabernacle, but ten in the temple. 18. the chariot of the cherubim—The expanded wings of the cherubim formed what was figuratively styled the throne of God, and as they were emblematical of rapid motion, the throne or seat was spoken of as a chariot (Psalm 18. 10; 99. 1). It is quite clear that in all these directions David was not guided by his own taste, or by a desire for taking any existing model of architecture, but solely by a regard to the express revelation of the Divine will. In a vision, or trance, the whole edifice, with its appurtenances, had been placed before his eyes so vividly and permanently, that he had been able to take a sketch of them in the models delivered to Solomon. 20. Be strong and of good courage—The address begun v. 9 is resumed and concluded in the same strain. 21. behold the courses of the priests and Levites—They were, most probably, represented in this assembly, though they are not named. also the princes and all the people—i. e., as well the skilful, expert, and zealous artisan, as the workman who needs to be directed in all his labours.

CHAPTER XXIX.

VER. 1-9. DAVID CAUSES THE PRINCES AND PEOPLE TO OFFER FOR THE HOUSE OF GOD. 1. Solomon . . . is yet young and tender—Though Solomon was very young when he was raised to the sovereignty, his kingdom escaped the woe pronounced (Ecclesiastes 10. 16). Mere childhood in a prince is not always a misfortune to a nation, as there are instances of the government being wisely administered during a minority, and Solomon himself is a most illustrious proof that a young prince may prove a great blessing; for when he was but a mere child, with respect to his age, no nation was happier. His father, however, made this address before Solomon was endowed with the Divine gift of wisdom, and David's reference to his son's extreme youth, in connection with the great national undertaking he had been divinely appointed to execute, was to apologize to this assembly of the estates—or, rather, to assign the reason of his elaborate preparations for the work. 3, 4. Moreover . . . I have of mine own proper good, &c.—In addition to the immense amount of gold and silver treasure which David had already bequeathed for various uses in the service of the temple, he now made an additional contribution destined to a specific purpose—that of overlaying the walls of the house. This voluntary gift was from the private fortune of the royal donor, and had been selected with the greatest care. The gold was "the gold of Ophir," then esteemed the purest and finest in the world (Job 22. 24; 28. 16; Isaiah 13. 12). The amount was 3000 talents of gold, and 7000 talents of refined silver. 5. who then is willing to consecrate his service—Heb., fill his hand; i. e., make an offering (Exodus 32. 29; Leviticus 8. 33; 1 Kings 13. 33). The meaning is, that whoever would contribute voluntarily, as he had done, would be offering a free-will offering to the Lord. It was a sacrifice which every one of them could make, and in presenting which the offerer himself would be the priest. David, in asking free-will offerings for the temple, imitated the conduct of Moses in reference to the tabernacle (Exodus 25. 1-8). 6-8. Then the chief of the fathers—Or heads of the fathers (ch. 24. 31; 27. 1). princes of the tribes—(ch. 27. 16-22). the rulers of the king's work—Those who had charge of the royal demesnes and other possessions (ch. 27. 25-31). offered willingly—Influenced by the persuasive address and example of the king, they acted according to their several abilities, and their united contributions amounted to the gross sum—of gold 5000 talents and 10,000 drams; and of silver, 10,000 talents, besides brass and iron. drams—Rather, darics. A Persian coin, with which the Jews from the time of the captivity became familiar, and which was afterwards extensively circulated in the countries of Western Asia. It is estimated as equal in value to 25s. of British currency. 7. of brass eighteen thousand talents, and one hundred thousand talents of iron—In Scripture, iron is always referred to as an article of comparatively low value, and of greater abundance and cheaper than bronze. [NAPIER.] 8. and they with whom precious stones were found—Rather, "whatever was found along with it of precious stones they gave." [BERTHEAU.] These gifts were deposited in the hands of Jehieli, whose family were charged with the treasures of the house of the Lord (ch. 26. 21).

10-25. HIS THANKSGIVING. 10. Wherefore David blessed the Lord—This beautiful thanksgiving prayer was the effusion overflowing with gratitude and delight at seeing the warm and widespread interest that was now taken in forwarding the favourite project of his life. Its piety is displayed in the fervour of devotional feeling—in the ascription of all worldly wealth and greatness to God as the giver, in tracing the general readiness in contributing to the influence of His grace, in praying for the continuance of this happy disposition among the people, and in solemnly and earnestly commending the young king and his kingdom to the care and blessing of God. 16. All this store that we have prepared—It may be useful to exhibit a tabular view of the treasure laid up, and contributions stated by the historian as already made towards the erection of the proposed temple. Omitting the brass and iron, and precious stones, which, though specified partly (v. 7), is represented in other portions as "without weight" (ch. 22. 3, 14), we shall give in this table only the amount of gold and silver; and taking the talent of gold as worth £5475 (the talent being 125 lbs. in weight), the value of the gold will be about 73s. per oz. The talent of silver is given at £312 3s. 9d., or 4s. 4½d. per oz. The total amount of the contributions will be:

Sum accumulated, and in the public treasury (ch. 22. 41).....	gold,	£517,500,000
	silver,	342,187,500
Contributed by David from his private resources	gold,	16,425,000
	silver,	2,395,312
Contributed by the assembled rulers	{ gold,	28,000,000
	{ silver,	3,421,875
		£980,929,687

Though it has been the common practice of Eastern monarchs to hoard vast sums for the accomplishment of any contemplated project, this amount so far exceeds not only every Oriental collection on record, but even the bounds of probability, that it is very generally allowed that either there is a corruption of the text in ch. 22. 14, or that the reckoning of the historian was by the Babylonian, which was only a half, or the Syrian, which was only a fifth part, of the Hebrew talent. This would bring the Scripture account more into accordance with the statements of Josephus, as well as within the range of credibility. 20. All the congregation worshipped the Lord, and the king—Though the external attitude might be the same, the sentiments of which it was expressive were very different in the two cases—of Divine worship in the one, of civil homage in the other. 21, 22. they sacrificed . . . And did eat and drink—After the business of the assembly was over, the people, under the exciting influence of the occasion, still remained, and next day engaged in the performance of solemn rites, and afterwards feasted on the remainder of the sacrifices. before the Lord—either in the immediate vicinity of the ark, or, perhaps, rather in a religious and devout spirit, as partaking of a sacrificial meal. made Solomon . . . king the second time—In reference to the first time, which was done precipitately on Adonijah's conspiracy (1 Kings 1. 35). they . . . anointed . . . Zadok—The statement implies that his appointment met the popular approval. His elevation as sole high priest was on the disgrace of Ablathar, one of Adonijah's accomplices. 23. Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord—As king of Israel, he was the Lord's vicegerent. 24. submitted themselves—Heb., put their hands under Solomon, according to the custom still practised in the East, of putting a hand under the king's extended hand, and kissing the back of it (2 Kings 10. 15).

29-30. HIS REIGN AND DEATH. 26. Thus David reigned—(See 1 Kings 2. 11.)

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-6. SOLEMN OFFERING OF SOLOMON AT GIBEON. 2. Then Solomon spake unto all Israel—viz., the heads, or leading officers, that are afterwards specified, were summoned to attend their sovereign in a solemn religious procession. The date of this occurrence was the second year of Solomon's reign, and the high place at Gibeon was chosen for the performance of the sacred rites, from the tabernacle and all the ancient furniture connected with the national worship being deposited there. Zadok was the officiating high priest (1 Chronicles 16, 39). It is true that the ark had been removed, and placed in a new tent which David had made for it at Jerusalem. But the brazen altar, "before the tabernacle of the Lord," on which the burnt offerings were appointed by the law to be made, was at Gibeon; and although David had been led by extraordinary events and tokens of the Divine presence to sacrifice on the threshing-floor of Araunah, Solomon considered it his duty to present his offerings on the legally appointed spot "before the tabernacle," and on the time-honoured altar prepared by the skill of Bezaleel in the wilderness (Exodus 38, 1). 6. offered a thousand burnt offerings—This holocaust he offered, of course, by the hands of the priests. The magnitude of the oblation became the rank of the offerer on this occasion of national solemnity.

7-13. HIS CHOICE OF WISDOM IS BLESSED BY GOD. 7. In that night did God appear unto Solomon—(see on 1 Kings 3, 5).

14-17. HIS STRENGTH AND WEALTH. 14. Solomon gathered chariots and horsemen—His passion for horses was greater than that of any Israelitish monarch before or after him. His stud comprised 1400 chariots and 12,000 horses. This was a prohibited indulgence, whether as an instrument of luxury or power. But it was not merely for his own use that he imported the horses of Egypt. The immense equestrian establishment he erected was not for show merely, but also for profit. The Egyptian breed of horses was highly valued; and being as fine as Arabians, but larger and more powerful, they were well fitted for being yoked in chariots. These were light, but compact and solid vehicles, without springs. From the price stated (v. 17) as given for a chariot and a horse, it appears that the chariot cost four times the value of a horse. A horse brought 150 shekels, which, estimating the shekels at 2s. 3d. or 2s. 6d., amount to £17 2s. or £18 15s., while a chariot brought 600 shekels, equal to £68 9s. or £75; and as an Egyptian chariot was usually drawn by two horses, a chariot and pair would cost £112 sterling. As the Syrians, who were fond of the Egyptian breed of horses, could import them into their own country only through Judea, Solomon early perceived the commercial advantages to be derived from this trade, and established a monopoly. His factors or agents purchased them in the markets or fairs of Egypt, and brought them to the "chariot cities"—the depots and stables he had erected on the frontiers of his kingdom, such as Beth-marcaboth, "the house of chariots," and Hazor-susah, "the village of horses" (Joshua 19, 5; 1 Kings 10, 28). 17. brought . . . for all the kings of the Hittites—A branch of this powerful tribe, when expelled from Palestine, had settled north of Lebanon, where they acquired large possessions contiguous to the Syrians.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1, 2. SOLOMON'S LABOURERS FOR BUILDING THE TEMPLE. 1. Solomon determined to build—The temple is the grand subject of this narrative, while the palace—here and in other parts of this book—is only incidentally noticed. The duty of building the temple was reserved for Solomon before his birth. As soon as he became king he addressed himself to the work, and the historian, in proceeding to give an account of the edifice, begins with relating the preliminary arrangements.

3-10. HIS MESSAGE TO HURAM FOR SKILFUL ARTIFICERS. 3. Solomon sent to Hiram—The correspondence was probably conducted on both sides in writing (v. 11; see also on 1 Kings 5, 8). As thou didst deal with David my father—This would seem decisive of the question whether the Hiram then reigning in Tyre was David's friend (see on 1 Kings 5, 1-6). In opening the business, Solomon grounded his request for Tyrian aid on two reasons:—1. The temple he proposed to build must be a solid and permanent building, because the worship was to be continued in perpetuity, and therefore the building materials required to be of the most durable quality. 2. It must be a magnificent structure, because it was to be dedicated to the God who was greater than all gods; and, therefore, as it might seem a presumptuous idea to erect an edifice for a Being "whom the heaven and the heaven of heavens do not contain," it was explained that Solomon's object was not to build an house for Him to dwell in, but a temple in which His worshippers might offer sacrifices to His honour. No language could be more humble and appropriate than this. The pious strain of sentiment was such as became a king of Israel. 7. send me now, therefore, a man cunning to work—Masons and carpenters were not asked for; those whom David had obtained (1 Chronicles 14, 1) were, probably, still remaining in Jerusalem, and had instructed others. But he required a master of works; a person capable, like Bezaleel (Exodus 35, 31), of superintending and directing every department; for, as the division of labour was at that time little known or observed, an overseer had to be possessed of very versatile talents and experience. The things specified in which he was to be skilled, relate not to the building, but the furniture of the temple. Iron, which could not be obtained in the wilderness when the tabernacle was built, was now, through intercourse with the coast, plentiful, and much used. The cloths intended for curtains were, from the crimson or scarlet-red and hyacinth colours named, evidently, those stuffs, for the manufacture and dyeing of which the Tyrians were so famous. "The graving," probably, including embroidery of figures like cherubims in needlework, as well as wood carving of pomegranates and other ornaments. 8. Send me . . . cedar trees, &c.—The cedar and cypress were valued as being both rare and durable; the algum or almu trees (likewise a foreign wood), though not got on Lebanon, is mentioned as being procured through Hiram (see on 1 Kings 10, 11). 10. Behold, I will give thy servants beaten wheat—Wheat, stripped of the husk, boiled, and saturated with butter, forms a frequent meal with the labouring people in the East (cf. 1 Kings 5, 11). There is no discrepancy between that passage and this. The yearly supplies of wine and oil, mentioned in the former, were intended for Hiram's court in return for the cedars sent him; while the articles of meat and drink specified here were for the workmen on Lebanon.

11-18. HURAM'S KIND ANSWER. 11. Because the Lord hath loved his people, &c.—This pious language creates a presumption that Hiram might have attained some knowledge of the true religion from his long familiar intercourse with David. But the presumption, however pleasing, may be delusive (see on 1 Kings 5, 7-12). 13, 14. I have sent a cunning man—(see on 1 Kings 7, 13-51). 17, 18. Solomon numbered all the strangers, &c.—(see on 1 Kings 5, 13, 18).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1, 2. PLACE AND TIME OF BUILDING THE TEMPLE.

1. Mount Moriah, where the Lord appeared unto David—These words seem to intimate that the region where the temple was built was previously known by the name of Moriah (Genesis 22, 2), and do not afford sufficient evidence for affirming, as has lately been done [STANLEY], that the name was first given to the mount, in consequence of the vision seen by David. Mount Moriah was one summit of a range of hills which went under the general name of Zion. The platform of the temple is now, and has long been, occupied by the haram, or sacred enclosure, within which stand the three mosques of Omar (the smallest), of El Aksa, which in early times was a Christian church, and of Kubbet el Sakhara, "The dome of the rock," so called from a huge block of limestone rock in the centre of the floor, which, it is supposed, formed the elevated threshing-floor of Arannah, and on which the great brazen altar stood. The site of the temple, then, is so far established, for an almost universal belief is entertained in the authenticity of the tradition regarding the rock El Sakhara, and it has also been conclusively proved that the area of the temple was identical on its western, eastern, and southern sides, with the present enclosure of the haram. [ROBINSON.] "That the temple was situated somewhere within the oblong enclosure on Mount Moriah, all topographers are agreed, although there is not the slightest vestige of the sacred fane now remaining; and the greatest diversity of sentiment prevails as to its exact position within that large area, whether in the centre of the haram, or in its south-west corner. [BARCLAY.] Moreover, the full extent of the temple area is a problem that remains to be solved, for the platform of Mount Moriah being too narrow for the extensive buildings and courts attached to the sacred edifice, Solomon resorted to artificial means of enlarging and levelling it, by erecting vaults, which, as Josephus states, rested on immense earthen mounds raised from the slope of the hill. It should be borne in mind at the outset, that the grandeur of the temple did not consist in its colossal structure, so much as in its internal splendour, and the vast courts and buildings attached to it. It was not intended for the reception of a worshipping assembly, for the people always stood in the outer courts of the sanctuary.

3-7. MEASURES AND ORNAMENTS OF THE HOUSE. 3. these are the things wherein Solomon was instructed for the building of the house of God—by the written plan and specifications given him by his father. The measurements are reckoned by cubits, "after the first measure," i. e., the old Mosaic standard. But there is great difference of opinion about this, some making the cubit eighteen, others twenty-one inches. The temple, which embodied in more solid and durable materials the ground-form of the tabernacle, only being twice as large, was a rectangular building, seventy cubits long from east to west, and twenty cubits wide from north to south. 4. the porch—The breadth of the house, whose length ran from east to west, is here given as the measure of the length of the piazza. The portico would thus be from thirty to thirty-five feet long, and from fifteen to seventeen and a half feet broad, the height was an hundred and twenty cubits—This, taking the cubit at eighteen inches, would be 180 feet; at twenty-one inches, 210 feet; so that the porch would rise in the form of a tower, or two pyramidal towers, whose united height was 120 cubits, and each of them about 90 or 105 feet high. [STIEGLITZ.] This porch would thus be like the propylæum or gateway of the palace of Khorsabad [LAYARD], or at the temple of Edfon. 5. the greater house—i. e., the holy places, the front or outer chamber (see on 1 Kings 6, 17). 6. he garnished the house with precious stones for beauty—Better, He paved the house with precious and beautiful marble. [KITTO.] It may be, after all, that these were stones with veins of different colours for decorating the walls. This was an ancient and thoroughly Oriental kind of embellishment. There was an under pavement of marble, which was covered with planks of fir. The whole interior was lined with boards, richly decorated with carved work, clusters of foliage and flowers, among which the pomegranate and lotus, or water-lily, were conspicuous; and overlaid, excepting the floor, with gold, either by gilding or in plates (1 Kings 6).

8-13. DIMENSIONS, &c., OF THE MOST HOLY HOUSE. 8. the most holy house—It was a perfect cube (cf. 1 Kings 6, 20). overlaid it with . . . gold, amounting to six hundred talents—at £4 per oz., equal to £3,600,000. 10-13. two cherubim—These figures in the tabernacle were of pure gold (Exodus 25,), and overshadowed the mercy-seat. The two placed in the temple were made of olive wood, overlaid with gold. They were of colossal size, like the Assyrian sculptures; for each, with expanded wings, covered a space of ten cubits in height and length—two wings touched each other, while the other two reached the opposite walls; their faces were inward, i. e., towards the most holy house, conformably to their use, which was to veil the ark.

14-17. VEIL AND PILLARS (see on 1 Kings 6, 21). The united height is here given; and though the exact dimensions would be thirty-six cubits, each column was only seventeen cubits and a half, a half cubit being taken up by the capital or the base. They were probably described as they were lying together in the mould before they were set up. [POOLE.] They would be from eighteen to twenty-one feet in circumference, and stand forty feet in height. These pillars, or obelisks, as some call them, were highly ornamented, and formed an entrance in keeping with the splendid interior of the temple.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1. ALTAR OF BRASS. 1. he made an altar of brass —Steps must have been necessary for ascending so elevated an altar, but the use of these could be no longer forbidden (Exodus 20, 26) after the introduction of an official costume for the priests (Exodus 28, 42). It measured thirty-five feet by thirty-five, and in height seventeen and a half feet. The thickness of the metal used for this altar is nowhere given; but supposing it to have been three inches, the whole weight of the metal would not be under two hundred tons. [NAPIER.]

2-5. MOLTEN SEA. 2. he made a molten sea—(see on 1 Kings 7, 23-26), as in that passage "knops" occur instead of "oxen;" it is generally supposed that the rows of ornamental knops were in the form of ox heads. 3. Two rows of oxen were cast, when it was cast—The meaning of which is, that the circular basin and the brazen oxen which supported it were all of one piece, being cast in one and the same mould. There is a difference in the accounts given of the capacity of this basin, for while in 1 Kings 7, 26 it is said that two thousand baths of water could be contained in it, in this passage no less than three thousand are stated. It has been suggested that there is here a statement not merely of the quantity of water which the basin held, but that also which was necessary to work it, to keep it flowing as a fountain; that which was required to fill both it and its accompaniments. In support of this view, it may be remarked that different words are employed: the one in 1 Kings 7, 26 rendered contained; the two here rendered, received and held. There was a difference between receiving and holding. When the basin played as a fountain, and all its parts were filled for that purpose, the latter, together with the sea itself, received 3000 baths; but the sea exclusively held only 2000 baths, when its contents were restricted to those of the circular basin. It received and held 3000 baths. [CALMET'S FRAGMENT.]

6-8. THE TEN LAVERS, CANDLESTICKS, AND TABLES. 6. ten lavers—(see on 1 Kings 7, 27-39). The laver of the tabernacle had probably been destroyed. The ten new ones were placed between the porch and the altar, and while the molten sea was for the priests to cleanse their hands and feet, these were intended for washing the sacrifices. 7. ten candlesticks—(see on 1 Kings 7, 49). The increased number was not only in conformity with the characteristic splendour of the edifice, but to be a standing emblem to the Hebrews, that the growing light of the word was necessary to counteract the growing darkness in the world. [LIGHTFOOT.] 11. Hiram made—(see on 1 Kings 7, 40-45).

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1. THE DEDICATED TREASURES. 1. Solomon brought in all things that David his father had dedicated—The immense sums and the store of valuable articles which his father and other generals had reserved and appropriated for the temple (1 Chronicles 22, 14; 26, 26).

2-13. BRINGING UP OF THE ARK OF THE COVENANT. 2, 3. Then Solomon assembled . . . in the feast which was in the seventh month—The feast of the dedication of the temple was on the eighth day of that month. This is related, word for word, the same as in 1 Kings 8, 1-10. 9. there it is unto this day—i. e., at the time when this history was composed; for after the Babylonian captivity there is no trace of either ark or staves. 11. all the priests that were present . . . did not then wait by course—The rotation system of weekly service introduced by David was intended for the ordinary duties of the priesthood; on extraordinary occasions, or when more than wonted solemnity attached to them, the priests attended in a body. 12. the Levites which were the singers—On great and solemn occasions, such as this, a full choir was required, and their station was taken with scrupulous regard to their official parts; the family of Heman occupied the central place, the family of Asaph stood on his right, and that of Jeduthun on his left; the place allotted to the vocal department being a space between the court of Israel and the altar in the east end of the priests' court, with them an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets—The trumpet was always used by the priests, and in the Divine service it was specially employed in calling the people together during the holy solemnities, and in drawing attention to new and successive parts of the ritual. The number of trumpets used in the Divine service could not be less than two (Numbers 10, 2), and their greatest number never exceeded the precedent set at the dedication of the temple. The station where the priests were sounding with trumpets was apart from that of the other musicians; for while the Levite singers occupied an orchestra east of the altar, the priests stood at the marble table on the south-west of the altar. There both of them stood with their faces to the altar. The manner of blowing the trumpets was, first, by a long plain blast, then by one with breakings and quaverings, and then by a long plain blast again. [BROWN'S JEWISH ANTIQUITIES.] 13. the house was filled with a cloud—(see on 1 Kings 8, 10, 11).

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-41. SOLOMON BLESSES THE PEOPLE AND PRAISES GOD. 1. The Lord hath said that he would dwell in thick darkness—This introduction to Solomon's address was evidently suggested by the remarkable incident recorded at the close of the last chapter; the phenomenon of a densely opaque and uniformly shaped cloud, descending in a slow and majestic manner, and filling the whole area of the temple. He regarded it himself, and directed the people also to regard it, as an undoubted sign and welcome pledge of the Divine presence and acceptance of the building reared to His honour and worship. He referred not to any particular declaration of God, but to the cloud having been all along in the national history of Israel the recognized symbol of the Divine presence (Exodus 16, 10; 24, 16; 40, 34; Numbers 9, 15; 1 Kings 8, 10, 11). 13. Solomon had made a brazen scaffold—A sort of platform; but the Hebrew term rendered scaffold, being the same as that used to designate the basin, suggests the idea that this throne might bear some resemblance, in form or structure, to those lavens in the temple, being a sort of round and elevated pulpit, placed in the middle of the court, and in front of the altar of burnt offering. upon it he stood, and kneeled down upon his knees—After as-ending the brazen scaffold, he assumed those two attitudes in succession, and with different objects in view. He stood while he addressed and blessed the surrounding multitude (v. 3-11); afterwards he knelt down and stretched out his hands towards heaven, with his face probably turned towards the altar, while he gave utterance to the beautiful and impressive prayer which is recorded in the remainder of this chapter. It is deserving of notice that there was no seat in this pulpit—for the king either stood or knelt all the time he was in it. It is not improbable that it was surmounted by a canopy, or covered by a veil, to screen the royal speaker from the rays of the sun. 18-21. how much less this house which I have built! Have respect therefore to the prayer of thy servant—No person who entertains just and exalted views of the spiritual nature of the Divine Being will suppose that he can raise a temple for the habitation of Deity, as a man builds a house for himself. Nearly as improper and inadmissible is the idea that a temple can contribute to enhance the glory of God, as a monument may be raised in honour of a great man. Solomon described the true and proper use of the temple, when he entreated that the Lord "would hearken unto the supplications of His servant and His people Israel, which they should make towards this place." In short, the grand purpose for which the temple was erected was precisely the same as that contemplated by churches—to afford the opportunity and means of public and social worship, according to the ritual of the Mosaic dispensation—to supplicate the Divine mercy and favour—to render thanks for past instances of goodness, and offer petitions for future blessings (see on 1 Kings 8, 22-61). This religious design of the temple—the ONE temple in the world—is in fact its stand-point of absorbing interest. 22. If a man sin against his neighbour, and an oath be laid upon him to make him swear, and the oath come before thine altar in this house, &c.—In cases where the testimony of witnesses could not be obtained, and there was no way of settling a difference or dispute between two people but by accepting the oath of the accused, the practice had gradually crept in, and had acquired the force of consuetudinary law, for the party to be brought before the altar, where his oath was taken with all due solemnity, together with the imprecation of a curse to fall upon himself if his disavowal should be found untrue. There is an allusion to such a practice in this passage. 33. If they return to thee . . . in the land of their captivity . . . and pray toward their land which thou gavest unto their fathers—These words gave rise to the favourite usage of the ancient as well as modern Jews, of turning in prayer toward Jerusalem, in whatever quarter of the world they might be, and of directing their faces toward the temple when in Jerusalem itself, or any part of the holy land (1 Kings 8, 44). 41. arise, O Lord God, into thy resting-place—These words are not found in the record of this prayer in the First Book of Kings; but they occur in the 132d Psalm, which is generally believed to have been composed by David, or rather by Solomon, in reference to this occasion. "Arise" is a very suitable expression to be used when the ark was to be removed from the tabernacle in Zion to the temple on Mount Moriah. into thy resting-place—The temple so called (Isaiah 66, 1), because it was a fixed and permanent mansion (Psalm 132, 14). the ark of thy strength—The abode by which thy glorious presence is symbolized, and whence thou dost issue thine authoritative oracles, and manifest thy power on behalf of thy people when they desire and need it. It might well be designated the ark of God's strength, because it was through means of it the mighty miracles were wrought, and the brilliant victories were won, that distinguish the early annals of the Hebrew nation. The sight of it inspired the greatest animation into the breasts of His people, while it diffused terror and dismay through the ranks of their enemies (cf. Psalm 78, 61). let thy priests be clothed with salvation—Or with righteousness (Psalm 132, 9), i. e., be equipped not only with the pure white linen garments thou hast appointed for their robe of office, but also adorned with the moral beauties of true holiness, that their person and services may be accepted, both for themselves and all the people. Thus they would be "clothed with salvation," for that is the effect and consequence of a sanctified character. 42. turn not away the face of thine anointed—i. e., of me, who by thy promise and appointment have been installed as king and ruler of Israel. The words are equivalent in meaning to this: Do not reject my present petitions; do not send me from thy throne of grace dejected in countenance and disappointed in heart. remember the mercies of David thy servant—i. e., the mercies promised to David, and in consideration of that promise hear and answer my prayer (cf. Psalm 132. 10).

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-3. GOD GIVES TESTIMONY TO SOLOMON'S PRAYER; THE PEOPLE WORSHIP. 1. the fire came down from heaven and consumed the burnt offering—Every act of worship was accompanied by a sacrifice. The preternatural stream of fire kindled the mass of flesh, and was a token of the Divine acceptance of Solomon's prayer (see on Leviticus 9. 24; 1 Kings 18. 38). the glory of the Lord filled the house—i. e., the cloud, which was the symbol of God's presence and majesty, filled the interior of the temple (Exodus 40. 35). 2. the priests could not enter—Both from awe of the miraculous fire that was burning on the altar, and from the dense cloud that enveloped the sanctuary, they were unable for some time to perform their usual functions (see on 1 Kings 8. 10, 11). But afterwards, their courage and confidence being revived, they approached the altar, and busied themselves in the offering of an immense number of sacrifices. 3. all the children of Israel . . . bowed themselves with their faces to the ground upon the pavement—This form of prostration, viz., that of lying on one's knees with the forehead touching the earth, is the manner in which the Hebrews, and Orientals in general, express the most profound sentiments of reverence and humility. The courts of the temple were densely crowded on the occasion, and the immense multitude threw themselves on the ground. What led the Israelites suddenly to assume that prostrate attitude on the occasion referred to, was the spectacle of the symbolical cloud slowly and majestically descending upon the temple, and then entering it.

4-11. SOLOMON'S SACRIFICES. 4. Then the king and all the people offered sacrifices—Whether the individual worshippers slaughtered their own cattle, or a certain portion of the vast number of the Levitical order in attendance performed that work, as they sometimes did, in either case the offerings were made through the priests, who presented the blood and the fat upon the altar (see on 1 Kings 8. 62-64). 5. So the king and all the people dedicated the house of God—The ceremonial of dedication consisted principally in the introduction of the ark into the temple, and in the sacrificial offerings that were made on a scale of magnitude suitable to the extraordinary occasion. All present, the king, the people, and the priests, took part according to their respective stations in the performance of the solemn service. The duty, of course, devolved chiefly on the latter, and hence in proceeding to describe their several departments of work, the historian says, generally, "the priests waited on their offices;" while great numbers would be occupied with the preparation and offering of the victims, others sounded with their trumpets, and the different bands of the Levites praised the Lord with vocal and instrumental music, by the 136th Psalm, the oft-recurring chorus of which is, "for His mercy endureth for ever." 7. Solomon hallowed the middle of the court—On this extraordinary occasion, when a larger number of animals were offered than one altar and the usual place of rings to which the animals were bound would admit of, the whole space was taken in that was between the place of rings and the west end of the court to be used as a temporary place for additional altars, on that part of the spacious court holocausts were burning all round. 8. Solomon kept the feast seven days—The time chosen for the dedication of the temple was immediately previous to the feast of tabernacles (see on 1 Kings 8. 1-12). That season, which came after the harvest, corresponding to our September and October, lasted seven days, and during so prolonged a festival there was time afforded for the offering of the immense sacrifices enumerated. A large proportion of these were peace offerings, which afforded to the people the means of festive enjoyment. all Israel . . . from the entering in of Hamath—i. e., the delta at Lebanon, unto the river of Egypt—i. e., Rhinocorura, now El-Arish, the south boundary of Palestine. 10. on the three and twentieth day of the seventh month—This was the last day of the feast of tabernacles.

12-22. GOD APPEARS TO HIM. 12. the Lord appeared to Solomon by night—(See on 1 Kings 9. 1-9.) The dedication of the temple must have been an occasion of intense national interest to Solomon and his subjects. Nor was the interest merely temporary or local. The record of it is read and thought of with an interest that is undiminished by the lapse of time. The fact that this was the only temple of all nations in which the true God was worshipped imparts a moral grandeur to the scene, and prepares the mind for the sublime prayer that was offered at the dedication. The pure theism of that prayer—its acknowledgment of the unity of God as well as of His moral perfections in providence and grace, came from the same Divine source as the miraculous fire. They indicated sentiments and feelings of exalted and spiritual devotion, which sprang not from the unaided mind of man, but from the fountain of revelation. The reality of the Divine presence was attested by the miracle, and that miracle stamped the seal of truth upon the theology of the temple worship.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-6. SOLOMON'S BUILDINGS. 2. cities which Hiram had restored . . . Solomon built them, &c.—These cities lay in the north-west of Galilee, and, though included within the limits of the promised land, had never been conquered. The right of occupying them Solomon granted to Hiram, who, after consideration, refused them as unsuitable to the commercial habits of his subjects (see on 1 Kings 9. 11). Solomon having wrested them from the possession of the Canaanite inhabitants, repaired them and filled them with a colony of Hebrews. 3-6. Solomon went to Hamath-zobah—Hamath was on the Orontes, in Cele-Syria. Its king, Toi, had been the ally of David; but from the combination, Hamath and Zobah, it would appear that some revolution had taken place which led to the union of these two petty kingdoms of Syria into one. For what cause the resentment of Solomon was provoked against it, we are not informed, but he sent an armed force which reduced it. He made himself master also of Tadmor, the famous Palmyra in the same region—various other cities along the frontiers of his extended dominions he repaired and fitted up, either to serve as store-places for the furtherance of his commercial enterprises, or to secure his kingdom from foreign invasion (see on ch. 1. 14; 1 Kings 9. 15-24).

7-11. THE CANAANITES MADE TRIBUTARIES. 7. all the people that were left, &c.—The descendants of the Canaanites who remained in the country were treated as war prisoners, being obliged to "pay tribute or to serve as galley slaves" (ch. 2. 18), while the Israelites were employed in no works but such as were of an honourable character. 10. two hundred and fifty that bare rule—(Cf. 1 Kings 9. 23.) It is generally agreed that the text of one of these passages is corrupt. 11. Solomon brought up the daughter of Pharaoh out of the city of David, unto the house he had built for her—On his marriage with the Egyptian princess at the beginning of his reign, he assigned her a temporary abode in the city of David, i. e., Jerusalem until a suitable palace for his wife had been erected. While that palace was in progress, he himself lodged in the palace of David, but he did not allow her to occupy it, because he felt that she being a heathen proselyte, and having brought from her own country an establishment of heathen maid-servants, there would have been an impropriety in her being domiciled in a mansion which was or had been hallowed by the reception of the ark. It seems she was received on her arrival into his mother's abode (Song 3. 4; 8. 2).

15-18. SOLOMON'S FESTIVAL SACRIFICES. 15. they departed not from the commandment of the king—i. e., David, in any of his ordinances, which by Divine authority he established, either in regulating the courses of the priests and Levites, or in the destination of his accumulated treasures to the construction and adornment of the temple. 17. Then went Solomon to Ezion-geber, and to Eloth—These two maritime ports were situated at the eastern gulf of the Red Sea, now called the Gulf of Akaba. Eloth is seen in the modern Akaba, Ezion-geber in El Gudyan. [ROBINSON.] Solomon, determined to cultivate the arts of peace, was sagacious enough to perceive that his kingdom could become great and glorious only by encouraging a spirit of commercial enterprise among his subjects; and, accordingly, with that view he made a contract with Huram for ships and seamen to instruct his people in navigation. 18. Hiram sent him . . . ships—Either sent him ship-men, able seamen, overland; or, taking the word "sent" in a looser sense, supplied him, i. e., built him ships—viz., in docks at Eloth (cf. 1 Kings 9. 26, 27). This navy of Solomon was manned by Tyrians, for Solomon had no seamen capable of performing distant expeditions. The Hebrew fishermen, whose boats plied on the Sea of Tiberias or coasted the shores of the Mediterranean, were not equal to the conducting of large vessels laden with valuable cargoes on long voyages and through the wide and unfrequented ocean. four hundred and fifty talents of gold—(Cf. 1 Kings 9. 28.) The text in one of these passages is corrupt.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-12. THE QUEEN OF SHEBA VISITS SOLOMON; SHE ADMIRES HIS WISDOM AND MAGNIFICENCE. 1. when the queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon—(See on 1 Kings 10. 1-13.) It is said that among the things in Jerusalem which drew forth the admiration of Solomon's royal visitor was "his ascent by which he went up into the house of the Lord." This was the arched viaduct that crossed the valley from Mount Zion to the opposite hill. In the commentary on the passage quoted above, allusion was made to the recent discovery of its remains. Here we give a full account of what, for boldness of conceptions for structure and magnificence, was one of the greatest wonders in Jerusalem. "During our first visit to the south-west corner of the area of the mosque, we observed several of the large stones jutting out from the western wall, which at first seemed to be the effect of a bursting of the wall from some mighty shock or earthquake. We paid little regard to this at the moment; but on mentioning the fact not long after to a circle of our friends, the remark was incidentally dropped that the stones had the appearance of having once belonged to a large arch. At this remark, a train of thought flashed across my mind, which I hardly dared to follow out until I had again repaired to the spot, in order to satisfy myself with my own eyes as to the truth or falsehood of the suggestion. I found it even so. The courses of these immense stones occupy their original position; their external surface is hewn to a regular curve; and, being fitted one upon another, they form the commencement or foot of an immense arch which once sprung out from this western wall in a direction towards Mount Zion, across the Tyropœon valley. This arch could only have belonged to the bridge, which, according to Josephus, led from this part of the temple to the Xystus (covered colonnade) on Zion; and it proves incontestably the antiquity of that portion from which it springs." [ROBINSON.] The distance from this point to the steep rock of Zion he calculates to be about three hundred and fifty feet, the probable length of this ancient viaduct.

Another writer adds, that "the arch of this bridge, if its curve be calculated with an approximation to the truth, would measure sixty feet, and must have been one of five sustaining the viaduct (allowing for the abutments on either side), and that the piers supporting the centre arch of this bridge must have been of great altitude—not less, perhaps, than one hundred and thirty feet. The whole structure, when seen from the southern extremity of the Tyropœon, must have had an aspect of grandeur, especially as connected with the lofty and sumptuous edifices of the temple, and of Zion to the right and to the left. [ISAAC TAYLOR'S EDITION OF TRAILL'S JOSEPHUS.]

19-28. HIS RICHES. 13. Now the weight of gold that came to Solomon in one year—(See on 1 Kings 10. 14-20.) six hundred and threescore and six talents of gold—The sum named is equal to £3,646,350; and if we take the proportion of silver (v. 14), which is not taken into consideration, at 1 to 9, there would be about £200,000, making a yearly supply of nearly £6,000,000, being a vast amount for an infant effort in maritime commerce. [NAPIER.] 21. the king's ships went to Tarshish—rather "the king's ships of Tarshish went" with the servants of Hiram. ships of Tarshish—i. e., in burden and construction like the large vessels built for or used at Tarshish. [CALMET'S FRAGMENTS.] 25. Solomon had four thousand stalls—It has been conjectured [GESENIUS' HEBREW LEXICON] that the original term may signify not only stall or stable, but a number of horses occupying the same number of stalls. Supposing that ten were put together in one part, this would make 40,000. According to this theory of explanation, the historian in Kings refers to horses; while the historian in Chronicles speaks of the stalls in which they were kept. But more recent critics reject this mode of solving the difficulty, and, regarding the four thousand stalls as in keeping with the general magnificence of Solomon's establishments, are agreed in considering the text in Kings as corrupt, through the error of some copyist. 28. they brought unto Solomon horses out of Egypt—(See on ch. 1. 17.) Solomon undoubtedly carried the Hebrew kingdom to its highest pitch of worldly glory, and his completion of the grand work, the centralizing of the national worship at Jerusalem, whither the natives went up three times a year, has given his name a prominent place in the history of the ancient church. But his reign had a disastrous influence upon "the peculiar people," and the example of his deplorable idolatries, the connections he formed with foreign princes, the commercial speculations he entered into, and the luxuries introduced into the land, seem in a great measure to have altered and deteriorated the Jewish character.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-15. REHOBAM REFUSING THE OLD MEN'S GOOD COUNSEL. 1. Rehoboam went to Shechem—(See on 1 Kings 12. 1.) This chapter is, with a few verbal alterations, the same as in that book. 3. And they sent—rather, "for they had sent," &c. This is stated as the reason of Jeroboam's return from Egypt. 7. If thou be kind to this people, and please them, and speak good words to them—In the Book of Kings, the words are, "If thou wilt be a servant unto this people, and wilt serve them." The meaning in both is the same, viz., If thou wilt make some reasonable concessions, redress their grievances, and restore their abridged liberties, thou wilt secure their strong and lasting attachment to thy person and government. 15. the king hearkened not unto the people, for the cause was of God—Rehoboam, in following an evil counsel, and the Hebrew people in making a revolutionary movement, each acted as free agents, obeying their own will and passions. But God, who permitted the revolt of the northern tribes, intended it as a punishment of the house of David for Solomon's apostasy. That event demonstrates the immediate superintendence of His providence over the revolutions of kingdoms, and thus it affords an instance, similar to many other striking Instances that are found in Scripture, of Divine predictions, uttered long before, being accomplished by the operation of human passions, and in the natural course of events.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-17. REHOBAM, RAISING AN ARMY TO SUBDUE ISRAEL, IS FORBIDDEN BY SHEMAIAH. 1-4. Rehoboam . . . gathered of the house of Judah and Benjamin, to fight against Israel.—(See on 1 Kings 12, 21-24.) 5. built cities for defence in Judah.—This is evidently used as the name of the southern kingdom. Rehoboam, having now a bitter enemy in Israel, deemed it prudent to lose no time in fortifying several cities that lay along the frontier of his kingdom. Jeroboam, on his side, took a similar precaution. (1 Kings 12, 25.) Of the fifteen cities named, Ajalon, now Yalo, and Zorah, now Surah, between Jerusalem and Jabneh [ROBINSON], lay within the province of Benjamin. Gath, though a Philistine city, had been subject to Solomon. And Etham, which was on the border of Simeon, now incorporated with the kingdom of Israel, was fortified to repel danger from that quarter. These fortresses Rehoboam placed under able commanders, and stocked them with provisions and military stores, sufficient, if necessary, to stand a siege. In the crippled state of his kingdom, he seems to have been afraid lest it might be made the prey of some powerful neighbours. 13-17. the priests and the Levites . . . resorted to him out of all their coasts.—This was an accession of moral power, for the maintenance of the true religion is the best support and safeguard of any nation; and as it was peculiarly the grand source of the strength and prosperity of the Hebrew monarchy, the great numbers of good and pious people who sought an asylum within the territories of Judah contributed greatly to consolidate the throne of Rehoboam. The cause of so extensive an emigration from the kingdom of Israel was the deep and daring policy of Jeroboam, who set himself to break the national unity by entirely abolishing, within his dominions, the religious institutions of Judaism. He dreaded an eventual reunion of the tribes, if the people continued to repair thrice a year to worship in Jerusalem as they were obliged by law to do; and accordingly, on pretence that the distance of that city was too great for multitudes of his subjects, he fixed upon two more convenient places, where he established a new mode of worshipping God under gross and prohibited symbols. The priests and Levites, refusing to take part in the idolatrous ceremonies, were ejected from their livings; and along with them a large body of the people who faithfully adhered to the instituted worship of God—offended and shocked by the impious innovations—departed from the kingdom. 15. he ordained him priests.—the persons he appointed to the priesthood were low and worthless creatures (1 Kings 12, 31; 13, 33); any were consecrated who brought a bullock and seven rams. (Ch. 13, 9; Exodus 29, 37.) for the high places.—those favourite places of religious worship were encouraged throughout the country. for the devils.—a term sometimes used for idols in general (Leviticus 17, 7), but here applied distinctively to the goat deities, which were probably worshipped chiefly in the northern parts of his kingdom, where the heathen Canaanites still abounded, and for the calves.—figures of the ox gods Aps and Muevis, with which Jeroboam's residence in Egypt had familiarized him. (See on 1 Kings 12, 26-33.) 17. they strengthened the kingdom of Judah.—The innovating measures of Jeroboam were not introduced all at once. But as they were developed, the secession of the most excellent of his subjects began, and continuing to increase for three years, lowered the tone of religion in his kingdom, while it proportionally quickened its life and extended its influence in that of Judah.

18-23. HIS WIVES AND CHILDREN. 18. Rehoboam took Mahath.—The names of her father and mother are given. Jerimoth, the father, must have been the son of one of David's concubines. (1 Chronicles 3, 9.) Adhail was, of course, his cousin, previous to their marriage. 20. after her he took Maachah . . . daughter.—i. e., grand-daughter

(2 Samuel 14, 27) of Absalom, Tamar being, according to Josephus, her mother. (Cf. 2 Samuel 18, 18.) 21. he took eighteen wives, and seventy concubines.—This royal harem, though far inferior to his father's, was equally in violation of the law, which forbade a king to "multiply wives unto himself." 22. made Abijah . . . chief . . . ruler among his brethren.—This preference seems to have been given to Abijah solely from the king's dotting fondness for his mother, and through her influence over him. It is plainly implied that Abijah was not the eldest of the family, and in destining a younger son for the kingdom, without a Divine warrant, as in Solomon's case, Rehoboam acted in violation of the law. (Deuteronomy 21, 15.) 23. he dealt wisely.—i. e., with deep and calculating policy. (Exodus 1, 10.) and dispersed of all his children unto every fenced city.—The circumstance of twenty-eight sons of the king being made governors of fortresses would, in our quarter of the world, produce jealousy and dissatisfaction. But Eastern monarchs ensure peace and tranquillity to their kingdom by bestowing government offices on their sons and grandsons. They obtain an independent provision, and being kept apart, are not likely to cabal in their father's lifetime. Rehoboam acted thus, and his sagacity will appear still greater if the wives he desired for them belonged to the cities where each son was located. These connections would bind them more closely to their respective places. In the modern countries of the East, particularly Persia and Turkey, younger princes were, till very lately, shut up in the harem during their father's lifetime; and, to prevent competition, were blinded or killed when their brother ascended the throne. In the former country the old practice of dispersing them through the country like Rehoboam, has been again revived.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-12. REHOBAM, FORSAKING GOD, IS PUNISHED BY SHISHAK. 1. when Rehoboam had established the kingdom, and had strengthened himself.—(see on ch. 11, 17). During the first three years of his reign his royal influence was exerted in the encouragement of the true religion. Security and ease led to religious decline, which, in the fourth year, ended in open apostasy. The example of the court was speedily followed by his subjects, for "all Israel was with him;" i. e., the people in his own kingdom. The very next year, viz., the fifth of his reign, punishment was inflicted by the invasion of Shishak. 2. Shishak, king of Egypt, came up against Jerusalem.—He was the first king of the Twenty-second or Bubastic Dynasty. What was the immediate cause of this invasion? Whether it was in resentment for some provocation from the king of Judah, or in pursuance of ambitious views of conquest, is not said. But the invading army was a vast horde, for Shishak brought along with his native Egyptians an immense number of foreign auxiliaries. 3. the Libyans.—the Libyans of north-eastern Africa. the Sukkims.—Some think these were the Kenite Arabs, dwellers in tents, but others maintain more justly that these were Arab troglodytes, who inhabited the caverns of a mountain range on the western coast of the Red Sea. the Ethiopians.—from the regions south of Egypt. By the overwhelming force of numbers, they took the fortresses of Judah which had been recently put in a state of defence, and marched to lay siege to the capital. While Shishak and his army was before Jerusalem, the prophet Shemalah addressed Rehoboam and the princes, tracling this calamity to the national apostasy, and threatening them with utter destruction in consequence of having forsaken God (v. 6). 6. the princes of Israel.—(cf. v. 5, "the princes of Judah"). 7, 8. when the Lord saw that they humbled themselves.—Their repentance and contrition was followed by the best effects; for Shemalah was commissioned to announce that the plial of Divine judgment would not be fully poured out on them—that the entire overthrow of the kingdom of Judah would not take place at that time, nor through the agency of Shishak; and yet, although it should enjoy a respite from total subversion, it should become a tributary province of Egypt, in order that the people might learn how much lighter and better is the service of God than that of idolatrous foreign despots. 9. So Shishak . . . came up against Jerusalem—After the parenthetical clause (v. 5-8) describing the feelings and state of the beleaguered court, the historian resumes his narrative of the attack upon Jerusalem, and the consequent pillage both of the temple and the palace. he took all—i. e., everything valuable he found. The cost of the targets and shields has been estimated at about £239,000. [NAPIER'S METAL.] the shields of gold—(ch. 9. 16) made by Solomon, were kept in the house of the forest of Lebanon (ch. 9. 16). They seem to have been borne, like maces, by the owners or guard of the palace, when they attended the king to the temple or on other public processions. Those splendid insignia having been plundered by the Egyptian conqueror, others were made of inferior metal, and kept in the guard-room of the palace, to be ready for use, as, notwithstanding the tarnished glory of the court, the old state etiquette was kept up on public and solemn occasions. An account of this conquest of Judah, with the name of "king of Judah" in the cartouche of the principal captive, according to the interpreters, is carved and written in hieroglyphics on the walls of the great palace of Karnak, where it may be seen at the present day. This sculpture is about 2700 years old, and is of peculiar interest as a striking testimony from Egypt to the truth of Scripture history. 12. when he humbled himself, the wrath of the Lord turned from him—The promise contained (v. 7) was verified—Divine providence preserved the kingdom in existence, a reformation was made in the court, while true religion and piety were diffused throughout the land.

13-16. HIS REIGN AND DEATH. 13. Rehoboam strengthened himself . . . and reigned—The Egyptian invasion had been a mere predatory expedition, not extending beyond the limits of Judah, and probably, ere long, repelled by the invaded. Rehoboam's government acquired new life and vigour by the general revival of true religion, and his reign continued many years after the departure of Shishak. But "he prepared not his heart to seek the Lord," i. e., he did not adhere firmly to the good course of reformation he had begun, "and he did evil," for through the unhappy influence of his mother, a heathen foreigner, he had received in his youth a strong bias towards idolatry (see on 1 Kings 14. 21-24).

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-20. ABIJAH, SUCCEEDING, MAKES WAR AGAINST JEROBOAM, AND OVERCOMES HIM. 2. His mother's name was Michajah, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah—The same as Maachah (see on 1 Kings 15. 2). She was "the daughter," i. e., grand-daughter of Absalom (1 Kings 15. 2; cf. 2 Samuel 14), mother of Abijah, "mother," i. e., grandmother (1 Kings 15. 10, margin.) of Asa. "Of Gibeah," probably implies that Uriel was connected with the house of Saul. there was war between Abijah and Jeroboam—The occasion of this war is not recorded (see 1 Kings 15. 6, 7), but it may be inferred from the tenor of Abijah's address, that it arose from his youthful ambition to recover the full hereditary dominion of his ancestors. No prophet now forbade a war with Israel (ch. 11. 23), for Jeroboam had forfeited all claim to protection. 3. Abijah set the battle in array—i. e., took the field and opened the campaign. Abijah set the battle in array with four hundred thousand chosen men . . . Jeroboam with eight hundred thousand—These are, doubtless, large numbers, considering the smallness of the two kingdoms. It must be borne in mind, however, that Oriental armies are mere mobs—vast numbers accompanying the camp in hope of plunder, so that the gross numbers described as going upon an Asiatic expedition are often far from denoting the exact number of fighting men. But in accounting for the large number of soldiers enlisted in the respective armies of Abijah and Jeroboam, there is no need of resorting to this mode of explanation; for we know by the census of David the immense amount of the population that was capable of bearing arms (1 Chronicles 21. 5; cf. ch. 14. 8; 17. 14). 4-12. Abijah stood up on Mount Zemaraim—He had entered the enemy's territory, and was encamped on an eminence near Beth-el (Joshua 18. 22). Jeroboam's army lay at the foot of the hill, and as a pitched battle was expected, Abijah, according to the singular usage of ancient times, harangued the enemy. The speakers in such circumstances, while always extolling their own merits, poured out torrents of invective and virulent abuse upon the adversary. So did Abijah. He dwelt on the Divine right of the house of David to the throne; and sinking all reference to the heaven-condemned offences of Solomon and the Divine appointment of Jeroboam, as well as the Divine sanction of the separation, he upbraided Jeroboam as a usurper, and his subjects as rebels, who took advantage of the youth and inexperience of Rehoboam. Then contrasting the religious state of the two kingdoms, he drew a black picture of the impious innovations and gross idolatry introduced by Jeroboam, with his expulsion and impoverishment (ch. 11. 14) of the Levites; dwelt with reasonable pride on the pure and regular observance of the ancient institutions of Moses in his own dominions, and concluded with this emphatic appeal: "O, children of Israel, fight not against Jehovah, the God of your fathers, for ye shall not prosper." 13-17. But Jeroboam caused an ambushment to come about behind them—The oration of Abijah, however animating an effect it might have produced on his own troops, was unheeded by the party to whom it was addressed; for while he was wasting time in useless words, Jeroboam had ordered a detachment of his men to move quietly round the base of the hill, so that when Abijah stopped speaking, he and his followers found themselves surprised in the rear, while the main body of the Israelitish forces remained in front. A panic might have ensued, had not the leaders "cried unto the Lord," and the priests "sounded with the trumpets"—the pledge of victory (Numbers 10. 9; 31. 6); and, reassured by the well-known signal, the men of Judah responded with a war shout, which, echoed by the whole army, was followed by an impetuous rush against the foe. The shock was resistless. The ranks of the Israelites were broken, for "God smote Jeroboam and all Israel." They took to flight, and the merciless slaughter that ensued can be accounted for only by tracing it to the rancorous passions kindled by a civil war. 19. Abijah pursued after Jeroboam—This sanguinary action widened the breach between the people of the two kingdoms. Abijah abandoned his original design of attempting the subjugation of the ten tribes, contenting himself with the recovery of a few border towns, which, though lying within Judah or Benjamin, had been alienated to the new or northern kingdom. Amongst these was Beth-el, which, with its sacred associations, he might be strongly desirous to wrest from profanation. 20. Neither did Jeroboam recover strength again in the days of Abijah—The disastrous action at Zemaraim, which caused the loss of the entire flower and chivalry of his army, broke his spirits and crippled his power. the Lord struck him, and he died—i. e., Jeroboam. He lived, indeed, two years after the death of Abijah (1 Kings 14. 20; 15. 9). But he had been threatened with great calamities upon himself and his house, and it is apparently to the execution of these threatenings, which issued in his death, an anticipatory reference is here made.

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-5. ASA DESTROYS IDOLATRY. 1. In his days the land was quiet ten years—This long interval of peace was the continued effect of the great battle of Zemaraim (cf. 1 Kings 15. 11-14). 2. Asa did that which was good and right—(cf. 1 Kings 15. 14). Still his character and life were not free from faults (ch. 16. 7, 10, 12). 3. brake down the images—Of Baal (see on ch. 34. 4; Leviticus 26. 30). cut down the groves—Rather, Asherim. 5. he took away the high places—i. e., those devoted to idolatrous rites. took away out of all the cities of Judah the high places and the image—All public objects and relics of idolatry in Jerusalem and other cities through his kingdom were destroyed; but those high places where God was worshipped under the figure of an ox, as at Beth-el, were suffered to remain (1 Kings 15. 14); so far the reformation was incomplete.

6-8. HAVING PEACE, HE STRENGTHENS HIS KINGDOM WITH FORTS AND ARMIES. 6. he built fenced cities in Judah—(see on 1 Kings 15. 22). 7. while the land is yet before us—i. e., while we have free and undisputed progress everywhere; no foe is near; but, as this happy time of peace may not last always, and the kingdom is but small and weak, let us prepare suitable defences in case of need. He had also an army of 580,000 men. Judah furnished the heavy armed soldiers, and Benjamin the archers. This large number does not mean a body of professional soldiers such as compose European armies, but all capable of bearing arms, and liable to be called into service.

9-15. HE OVERCOMES ZERAH, AND SPOILS THE ETHIOPIANS. 9. there came out against them Zerah the Ethiopian—This could not have been from Ethiopia south of the cataracts of the Nile, for in the reign of Osorkon I., successor of Shishak, no foreign army would have been allowed a free passage through Egypt. Zerah must, therefore, have been chief of the Cushites, or Ethiopians of Arabia, as they were evidently a nomad horde who had a settlement of tents and cattle in the neighbourhood of Gerar. a thousand thousand and three hundred chariots—"Twenty camels employed to carry couriers upon them might have procured that number of men to meet in a short time. As Zerah was the aggressor, he had time to choose when he would summon these men, and attack the enemy. Every one of these Cushite shepherds, carrying with them their own provisions of flour and water, as is their invariable custom, might have fought with Asa without eating a loaf of Zerah's bread or drinking a pint of his water." [BRUCE'S TRAVELS.] 10. Asa went out against him, and they set the battle in array . . . at Marshah—One of the towns which Rehoboam fortified (ch. 11. 8); near a great southern pass in the low country of Judah (Joshua 15. 44). The engagement between the armies took place in a plain near the town called "the valley of Zephathah," supposed to be the broad way coming down Beit Jibrin towards Tell Es-Safreh. [ROBINSON.] 11-13. Asa cried unto the Lord his God—Strong in the confidence that the power of God was able to give the victory equally with few as with many, the pious king marched with a comparatively small force to encounter the formidable host of marauders at his southern frontier. Committing his cause to God, he engaged in the conflict—completely routed the enemy, and succeeded in obtaining, as the reward of his victory, a rich booty in treasure and cattle from the tents of this pastoral horde.

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 1-15. JUDAH MAKES A SOLEMN COVENANT WITH GOD. 1. Azariah the son of Oded—This prophet, who is mentioned no where else, appears at this stage of the sacred story in the discharge of an interesting mission. He went to meet Asa, as he was returning from his victorious pursuit of the Ethiopians, and the congratulatory address here recorded was publicly made to the king in presence of his army. 2. The Lord is with you, while ye be with him—You have had, in your recent signal success, a remarkable proof that God's blessing is upon you; your victory has been the reward of your faith and piety. If you steadfastly adhere to the cause of God, you may expect a continuance of His favour; but if you abandon it you will soon reap the bitter fruits of apostasy. 3-6. Now for a long season Israel hath been without the true God, &c.—Some think that Azariah was referring to the sad and disastrous condition to which superstition and idolatry had brought the neighbouring kingdom of Israel. His words should rather be taken in a wider sense, for it seems manifest that the prophet had his eye upon many periods in the national history, when the people were in the state described—a state of spiritual destitution and ignorance—and exhibited its natural result as widespread anarchy, mutual dissension among the tribes, and general suffering (Judges 9. 23; 12. 4; 20. 21; 2 Chronicles 13. 17). These calamities God permitted to befall them as the punishment of their apostasy. Azariah's object in these remarks was to establish the truth of his counsel (v. 2), and threatening, in case of neglecting it by describing the uniform course of the Divine procedure towards Israel, as shown in all periods of their history; and then after this appeal to national experience, he concluded with an earnest exhortation to the king to prosecute the work of reformation so well begun. 7. Be ye strong—Great resolution and indomitable energy would be required to persevere in the face of the opposition your reforming measures will encounter. your work shall be rewarded—i. e., what you do in the cause and for the glory of God will assuredly be followed by the happiest results both to yourself and your subjects. 8. When Asa heard . . . the prophecy of Oded the prophet—The insertion of these words, "of Oded the prophet," is generally regarded as a corruption of the text. "The sole remedy is to erase them. They are, probably, the remains of a note, which crept in from the margin into the text." [BERTHEAU.] he took courage—animated by the seasonable and pious address of Azariah, Asa became a more zealous reformer than ever, employing all his royal authority and influence to extirpate every vestige of idolatry from the land. and out of the cities which he had taken from Ephraim—He may have acquired cities of Ephraim, the conquest of which is not recorded (ch. 17. 2); but it has been commonly supposed that the reference is to cities which his father Abijah had taken in that quarter (ch. 13. 19). renewed the altar of the Lord . . . before the porch—i. e., the altar of burnt-offering. As this was done on or about the fifteenth year of the reign of this pious king, the renewal must have consisted in some splendid repairs or embellishments, which made it look like a new dedication, or in a re-construction of a temporary altar, like that of Solomon (ch. 7. 7), for extraordinary sacrifices to be offered on an approaching occasion. 9-15. he gathered all Judah and Benjamin—Not satisfied with these minor measures of purification and improvement, Asa meditated a grand scheme which was to pledge his whole kingdom to complete the work of reformation, and with this view waited for a general assembly of the people. and the strangers with them out of Ephraim and Manasseh—The population of Asa's kingdom had been vastly increased by the continued influx of strangers, who, prompted by motives either of interest or of piety, sought in his dominions that security and freedom which they could not enjoy amid the complicated troubles which distracted Israel. and out of Simeon—Although a portion of that tribe, located within the territory of Judah, were already subjects of the southern kingdom, the general body of the Simeonites had joined in forming the northern kingdom of Israel. But many of them now returned of their own accord. 10. the third month—When was held the feast of Pentecost, which, on this occasion, was celebrated at Jerusalem by an extraordinary sacrifice of 700 oxen and 7000 sheep, the spoil of the Ethiopians being offered; and the assembled worshippers entered with great and holy enthusiasm into a national covenant "to seek the Lord their God with all their heart and with all their soul;" and, at the same time, to execute with rigour the laws which made idolatry punishable with death (Deuteronomy 17. 2-5; Hebrews 10. 28). The people testified unbounded satisfaction with this important religious movement, and its moral influence was seen in the promotion of piety, order and tranquility throughout the land. 15. the things which his father had dedicated—Probably part of the booty obtained by his signal victory over Jeroboam, but which, though dedicated, had hitherto been unrepresented. and that he himself had dedicated—Of the booty taken from the Ethiopians. Both of these were now deposited in the temple as votive offerings to Him whose right hand and holy arm had given them the victory.

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 1-14. ASA, BY A LEAGUE WITH THE SYRIANS, DIVERTS BAASHA FROM BUILDING RAMAH. 1-6. In the six and thirtieth year of the reign of Asa, Baasha came up—Baasha had died several years before this date (1 Kings 15, 33), and the best biblical critics are agreed in considering this date to be calculated from the separation of the kingdoms, and coincident with the sixteenth year of Asa's reign. This mode of reckoning was, in all likelihood, generally followed in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel, the public annals of the time (v. 11), the source from which the inspired historian drew his account. Baasha . . . built Ramah—i. e., fortified it. The blessing of God which manifestly rested at this time on the kingdom of Judah, the signal victory of Asa, the freedom and purity of religious worship, and the fame of the late national covenant, were regarded with great interest throughout Israel, and attracted a constantly increasing number of emigrants to Judah. Baasha, alarmed at this movement, determined to stem the tide; and as the high road to and from Jerusalem passed by Ramah, he made that frontier town, about six miles north of Asa's capital, a military station, where the vigilance of his sentinels would effectually prevent all passage across the boundary of the kingdom (see on 1 Kings 15, 16-22; also Jeremiah 41, 9). 4. Benhadad . . . sent the captains of his armies . . . and they smote . . . Abel-maima—"The meadow of waters," supposed to have been situated on the marshy plain near the uppermost lake of the Jordan. The other two towns were also in the northern district of Palestine. These unexpected hostilities of his Syrian ally interrupted Baasha's fortifications at Ramah, and his death, happening soon after, prevented his resuming them. 7-10. Hanani the seer came to Asa . . . and said—His object was to show the king his error in forming his recent league with Benhadad. The prophet represented the appropriation of the temple treasures to purchase the services of the Syrian mercenaries, as indicating a distrust in God most blameable with the king's experience, and he added, that in consequence of this want of faith, Asa had lost the opportunity of gaining a victory over the united forces of Baasha and Benhadad, more splendid than that obtained over the Ethiopians—a victory which, by destroying their armies, would have deprived them of all power to molest him in future; whereas by his foolish and worldly policy, so unworthy of God's vicegerent, to misapply the temple treasures, and corrupt the fidelity of an ally of the king of Israel, he had tempted the cupidity of the one, and increased the hostility of the other, and rendered himself liable to renewed troubles (1 Kings 15, 32). This rebuke was pungent and, from its truth and justness, ought to have penetrated and afflicted the heart of such a man as Asa. But his pride was offended at the freedom taken by the honest reprover of royalty, and in a burst of passionate resentment he ordered Hanani to be thrown into prison. 10. Asa oppressed some of the people the same time—What was the form or degree of this oppression, is not recorded. The cause of his oppressing them was, probably, the same offence as Hanani—for a strong expression of their dissatisfaction with his conduct in leaguering with Benhadad, or it may be his maltreatment of the Lord's servant. 12. Asa was . . . diseased in his feet—Probably the gout. his disease was exceeding great—Better, "moved upwards" in his body, which proves the violent and dangerous type of the malady. yet in his disease he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians—Most probably Egyptian physicians, who were anciently in high repute at foreign courts, and who pretended to expel diseases by charms, incantations, and mystic arts. Asa's fault consisted in his trusting to such physicians, while he neglected to supplicate the aid and blessing of God. The best and holiest men have been betrayed for a time into sins, but through repentance have risen again, and as Asa is pronounced a good man (ch. 15, 17), it may be presumed that he also was restored to a better state of mind. 14. they buried him in his own sepulchre—The tombs in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem were excavated in the side of a rock. One cave contained several tombs or sepulchres. laid him in the bed . . . filled with sweet odours and divers kinds of spices—It is evident that a sumptuous public funeral was given him as a tribute of respect and gratitude for his pious character and patriotic government. But whether "the bed" means a state couch on which he lay exposed to public view, the odoriferous perfumes being designed to neutralize the offensive smell of the corpse, or whether it refers to an embalment, in which aromatic spices were always used in great profusion, it is impossible to say. they made a very great burning for him—According to some, for consuming the spices; but according to others, it was a magnificent pile for the cremation of the corpse—a usage which was at that time, and long after, prevalent among the Hebrews, and the omission of which in the case of royal personages was reckoned a great indignity (ch. 21, 19; 1 Samuel 31, 12; Jeremiah 34, 5; Amos 6, 10).

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1-6. JEHOSEPHAT REIGNS WELL, AND PROSPERS. 1. Jehoshaphat strengthened himself against Israel—the temper and proceedings of the kings of Israel rendered it necessary for him to prepare vigorous measures of defence on the northern frontier of his kingdom, and these consisted in filling all the fortresses with their full complement of troops, and establishing military stations in various parts of the country, as well as in the cities of Mount Ephraim, which belonged to Jehoshaphat (ch. 15, 8). 3-5. He walked in the first ways of his father David—He imitated the piety of his great ancestor in the early part of his reign, before he made those unhappy lapses which dishonoured his character, and sought not unto Baalim—a term used for idols generally in contradistinction to the Lord God of his father. and not after the doings of Israel—he observed with scrupulous fidelity, and employed his royal influence to support the Divine institutions as enacted by Moses, abhorring that spurious and unlawful calf-worship that formed now the established religion in Israel. Being thus far removed, alike from gross idolatry and Israelitish apostasy, and adhering zealously to the requirements of the Divine law, the blessing of God rested on his government; for, ruling in the fear of God, and for the good of his subjects, "the Lord established the kingdom in his hand." all Judah brought . . . presents—This was customary with the people generally at the beginning of a reign (1 Samuel 10, 27), and with the nobles and high functionaries yearly afterwards. They were given in the form of voluntary offerings, to avoid the odious idea of a tax or tribute. 6. his heart was lifted up in the ways of the Lord—full of faith and piety, he possessed zeal and courage to undertake the reformation of manners, to suppress all the works and objects of idolatry (see on ch. 20, 33), and held out public encouragement to the pure worship of God.

7-11. HE SENDS LEVITES TO TEACH IN JUDAH. 7-11. Also in the third year of his reign he sent to his princes, to teach in the cities of Judah—The ordinary work of teaching devolved on the priests. But extraordinary commissioners were appointed, probably to ascertain whether the work had been done or neglected. This deputa- tion of five princes, assisted by two priests and nine Levites, were to make a circuit of the towns in Judah; and it is the first practical measure we read of as being adopted by any of the kings for the religious instruction of the people. Time and unbroken opportunities were afforded for carrying fully out this excellent plan of home education, for the kingdom enjoyed internal tranquility as well as freedom from foreign wars. It is conformable to the pious style of the sacred historian to trace this profound peace to the "fear of the Lord having fallen on all kingdoms of the lands that were round about Judah." the book of the law—i. e., either the whole Pentateuch, or only the book of Deuteronomy, which contains an abridgment of it. 11. Also some of the Philistines brought Jehoshaphat presents, and tribute silver—Either they had been his tributaries, or they were desirous of securing his valuable friendship, and now made a voluntary offer of tribute. Perhaps they were the Philistines who had submitted to the yoke of David (2 Samuel 8. 1; Psalm 60. 8). the Arabians—the nomad tribes on the south of the Dead Sea, who, seeking the protection of Jehoshaphat after his conquest of Edom, paid their tribute in the way most suitable to their pastoral habits—the tale of so many heads of cattle.

12-19. HIS GREATNESS, CAPTAINS, AND ARMIES. 14. these are the numbers—the warriors were arranged in the army according to their fathers' houses. The army of Jehoshaphat, commanded by five great generals, and consisting of five unequal divisions, comprised eleven hundred and sixty thousand men, without including those who garrisoned the fortresses. No monarch, since the time of Solomon, equalled Jehoshaphat in the extent of his revenue—in the strength of his fortifications, and the number of his troops.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Ver. 1-34. JEHOSHAPHAT AND AHAH GO AGAINST RAMOTH-GILEAD. 2. after certain years he went down to Ahab to Samaria—This is word for word, the same as 1 Kings 22. (See commentary on that chapter.)

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 1-4. JEHOSHAPHAT VISITS HIS KINGDOM. 1. Jehoshaphat returned to his house in peace—(See on ch. 13. 16.) Not long after he had resumed the ordinary functions of royalty in Jerusalem, he was one day disturbed by an unexpected and ominous visit from a prophet of the Lord. This was Jehu, of whose father a notice occurred (ch. 16. 7). He himself had been called to discharge the prophetic office in Israel; but probably for his bold rebuke to Baasha (1 Kings 16. 1), had been driven by that arbitrary monarch within the territory of Judah, where we now find him with the privileged license of his order, taking the same religious supervision of Jehoshaphat's proceedings, as he had formerly done of Baasha's. At the interview here described, he condemned in the strongest terms, the king of Judah's imprudent and incongruous league with Ahab—God's open enemy (1 Kings 22. 2)—as an unholy alliance that would be conducive neither to the honour and comfort of his house nor to the best interests of his kingdom; and he apprised Jehoshaphat that, on account of that grave offence, "wrath was upon him from before the Lord;" a judgment that was inflicted soon after (see on ch. 20). The prophet's rebuke, however, was administered in a mingled strain of severity and mildness; for he interposed "a nevertheless" (v. 3), which implied that the threatened storm would be averted, in token of the Divine approval of his public efforts for the promotion of the true religion, as well as of the sincere piety of his personal character and life. 4. he went out again through the people—This means his re-appointing the commissioners of public instruction (ch. 17. 7-9), perhaps with new powers and a larger staff of assistants to undertake every part of the land. The complement of teachers required for that purpose would be easily obtained from the whole tribe of Levites being now concentrated within the kingdom of Judah.

5-7. HIS INSTRUCTIONS TO THE JUDGES. 5-7. He set judges in the land—There had been judicial courts established at an early period. But Jehoshaphat was the first king who modified these institutions according to the circumstances of the now fragmentary kingdom of Judah. He fixed local courts in each of the fortified cities, these being the provincial capitals of every district (see on Deuteronomy 16. 18-20).

8-11. TO THE PRIESTS AND LEVITES. 8. set of the Levites . . . priests and chief of the fathers of Israel—A certain number of these three classes constituted a supreme court, which sat in Jerusalem to review appellate cases from the inferior courts. It consisted of two divisions: the first of which had jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters; the second, in civil, fiscal, and criminal cases. According to others, the two divisions of the supreme court adjudicated the one according to the law contained in the sacred books, the other to the law of custom and equity, as in Eastern countries at the present day, the written and unwritten law are objects of separate jurisdiction.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1-21. JEHOSHAPHAT, INVADIED BY THE MOABITES, PROCLAIMS A FAST. 1. the children of Moab . . . Ammon, and with them other beside the Ammonites—supposed to be rather the name of a certain people called Mohammonim or Mehanim (ch. 26. 7), who dwelt in Mount Seir—either a branch of the old Edomite race, or a separate tribe who were settled there. 2. from beyond sea, on this side Syria—Instead of Syria, some versions read "Edom," and many able critics prefer this reading, both because the nomad tribes here mentioned were far from Syria, and because express mention is made of Mount Seir, i. e., Edom. The meaning then is, that this confederate horde was composed of the different tribes that inhabited the far distant regions bordering on the northern and eastern coasts of the Red Sea. Their progress was apparently by the southern point of the Dead Sea, as far as En-gedi, which, more anciently, was called Hazezon-tamar (Genesis 14. 7). This is the uniform route taken by the Arabs in their marauding expeditions at the present day; and in coming round the southern end of the Dead Sea, they can penetrate along the low-lying Ghor far north, without letting their movements be known to the tribes and villages west of the mountain chain. [ROBINSON.] Thus, anciently, the invading horde in Jehoshaphat's time had marched as far north as En-gedi, before intelligence of their advance was conveyed to the court. En-gedi is recognized in the modern Ainjdy, and is situated at a point of the western shore, nearly equidistant from both extremities of the lake. [ROBINSON.] 3. 4. Jehoshaphat proclaimed a fast throughout all Judah—Alarmed by the intelligence, and conscious of his total inability to repel this host of invaders, Jehoshaphat felt his only refuge was at the horns of the altar. He resolved to employ the aid of his God, and, in conformity with this resolution, summoned his whole subjects to observe a solemn fast at the sanctuary. It was customary with the Hebrew kings to proclaim fasts in perilous circumstances, either in a city, a district, or throughout the entire kingdom, according to the greatness of the emergency. On this occasion, it was a universal fast, which extended to infants (v. 13; see also Joel 2. 15, 16; Jonah 3. 7). 5-13. Jehoshaphat stood in the house of the Lord, before the new court—i. e., the great or outer court (ch. 4. 9) called the new court, probably from having been at that time enlarged or beautified. 6. and said, O Lord God of our fathers—This earnest and impressive prayer embraces every topic and argument which, as king and representative of the chosen people, he could urge; and then concludes with an earnest appeal to the Justice of God to protect those who, without provocation, were attacked, and who were unable to defend themselves against overwhelming numbers. 14-18. Then upon Jahaziel . . . came the spirit of the Lord—This prophet is not elsewhere mentioned, but his claim to the inspiration of a prophetic spirit was verified by the calm and distinct announcement he gave, both of the manner and the completeness of the deliverance he predicted. 16. they came up by the cliff of Ziz—This seems to have been nothing else than the present pass which leads northwards, by an ascent from En-gedi to Jerusalem, issuing a little below Tekoa. The wilderness of Jeruel was, probably, the large flat district adjoining the desert of Tekoa, called el-Husasah, from a wady on its northern side. [ROBINSON.] 18. Jehoshaphat bowed his head . . . and all Judah, &c.—This attitude was expressive of reverence to God and His Word, of confidence in His promise, and thankfulness for so extraordinary a favour. 19. the Levites stood up to praise the Lord—Doubtless by the king's command; and their anthem was sung with such a joyful acclaim as showed that they universally regarded the victory as already obtained. 20, 21. as they went forth, Jehoshaphat stood . . . Hear me, O Judah, and ye inhabitants of Jerusalem—Probably in the gate of Jerusalem, the place of general rendezvous; and as the people were on the eve of setting out, he exhorted them to repose implicit trust in the Lord and His prophet, not to be timid or desponding at sight of the enemy, but to remain firm in the confident assurance of a miraculous deliverance, without their striking a single stroke. he appointed singers . . . that they should praise . . . as they went before the army—Having arranged the line of procession, he gave the signal to move forwards; when the Levites, leading the van with their musical instruments, and singing the 138th Psalm, the people went on, not as an army marching against an enemy, but returning in joyful triumph after a victory.

22-30. THE OVERTHROW OF HIS ENEMIES. 22. when they began to sing and to praise, the Lord set abashments against the children of Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir—Some think that this was done by angels in human form, whose sudden appearance diffused an uncontrollable panic; others entertain the more probable opinion that, in the camp of this vast horde, composed of different tribes, jealousies and animosities had sprung up, which led to wide-spread dissensions and fierce feuds, in which they drew the sword against each other. The consequence was, that as the mutual strife commenced when the Hebrew procession set out from Jerusalem, the work of destruction was completed before Jehoshaphat and his people arrived at the battlefield. Thus easy is it for God to make the wrath of man to praise Him, to confound the counsels of His enemies, and employ their own passions in defeating the machinations they have devised for the overthrow of His Church and people. 24. when Judah came to the watch-tower in the wilderness—Most probably the conical hill, Jebel Fereidis, or Frank Mountain, from the summit of which they obtained the first view of the scene of slaughter. Jehoshaphat and his people found the field strewn with dead bodies, so that they had not to fight at all, but to take possession of an immense booty, the collection of which occupied three days. On the fourth they set out on their return to Jerusalem in the same order and joyful mood as they came. The place where they mustered previous to departure was, from their public thanksgiving service, called, "The Valley of Berachah" (benediction), now Wady Bereikut.

31-37. HIS REIGN. 31. Jehoshaphat reigned over Judah—(See ch. 24. 1.) 32. he walked in the way of Asa his father, and departed not from it—He was more steadfast and consistently religious (cf. ch. 15. 18). 33. the high places were not taken away—Those on which idolatry was practised were entirely destroyed (ch. 17. 6), but those where the people, notwithstanding the erection of the temple, continued to worship the true God, prudence required to be slowly and gradually abolished, in deference to popular prejudice. 35-37. after this did Jehoshaphat . . . join himself with Ahaziah . . . to make ships—A combined fleet was built at Ezion-geber, the destination of which was to voyage to Tartessus, but it was wrecked. Jehoshaphat's motive for entering into this partnership was to secure a free passage through Israel, for the vessels were to be conveyed across the Isthmus of Suez, and to sail to the west of Europe from one of the ports of Palestine on the Mediterranean. Eliezar, a prophet, denounced this unholy alliance, and foretold, as Divine judgment, the total wreck of the whole fleet. The consequence was, that although Jehoshaphat broke off—in obedience to the Divine will—his league with Ahaziah, he formed a new scheme of a merchant fleet, and Ahaziah wished to be admitted a partner. The proposal of the Israelitish king was respectfully declined. The destination of this new fleet was to Ophir, because the Israelitish seaports were not accessible to him for the Tartessus trade; but the ships, when just off the docks, were wrecked in the rocky creek of Ezion-geber.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 1-4. JEHORAM SUCCEEDS JEHOSEPHAT. 1. Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers . . . Jehoram reigned—The late king left seven sons; two of them are in our version named Azarlah; but in the Hebrew they appear considerably different, the one being spelt Azarlah, and the other Azariah. Though Jehoshaphat had made his family arrangements with prudent precaution, and while he divided the functions of royalty in his lifetime (cf. 2 Kings 8, 16), as well as fixed the succession to the throne in his eldest son, he appointed each of the others to the government of a fenced city, thus providing them with an honourable independence. But his good intentions were frustrated; for no sooner did Jehoram find himself in the sole possession of sovereign power than, from jealousy, or on account of their connections, he murdered all his brothers, together with some leading influential persons who, he suspected, were attached to their interest, or would avenge their deaths. Similar tragedies have been sadly frequent in Eastern courts, where the heir of the crown looks upon his brothers as his most formidable enemies, and is therefore tempted to secure his power by their death.

5-7. HIS WICKED REIGN. 6. he walked . . . as did the house of Ahab, for he had the daughter of Ahab to wife—The precepts and examples of his excellent father were soon obliterated by his matrimonial alliance with a daughter of the royal house of Israel. Through the influence of Athaliah he abolished the worship of the Lord, and encouraged an introduction of all the corruptions prevalent in the sister kingdom. The Divine vengeance was denounced against him, and would have utterly destroyed him and his house, had it not been for a tender regard to the promise made to David (2 Samuel 7.; 2 Kings 8, 19).

8-17. EDMO AND LIBNAH REVOLT. 8. the Edomites revolted—That nation had been made dependent by David, and down to the time of Jehoshaphat was governed by a tributary ruler (1 Kings 22, 47; 2 Kings 3. 9). But that king having been slain in an insurrection at home, his successor thought to ingratiate himself with his new subjects by raising the flag of independence. [JOSEPHUS.] The attempt was defeated in the first instance by Jehoram, who possessed all the military establishments of his father; but being renewed unexpectedly, the Edomites succeeded in completely emancipating their country from the yoke of Judah (Genesis 27, 40). Libnah, which lay on the southern frontier and towards Edom, followed the example of that country. 12-15. there came a writing to him from Elijah—That prophet's translation having taken place in the reign of Jehoshaphat, we must conclude that the name of Elijah has, by the error of a transcriber, been put for that of Elisha. 13. has made Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem . . . like the whoredoms of the house of Ahab—i. e., introduced the superstitions and vices of Phœnician idolatry (see on Deuteronomy 13, 6-14). On this account, as well as for his unnatural cruelties, Divine vengeance was denounced against him, which was soon after executed exactly as the prophet had foretold. A series of overwhelming calamities befel this wicked king; for in addition to the revolts already mentioned, two neighbouring tribes (see ch. 17. 11) made hostile incursions on the southern and western portions of his kingdom; his country was ravaged, his capital taken, his palace plundered, his wives carried off, all his children slain except the youngest, himself was seized with an incurable dysentery, which, after subjecting him to the most painful suffering for the unusual period of two years, carried him off, a monument of the Divine judgment; and, to complete his degradation, his death was unlamented, his burial unhonoured by his subjects. This usage, similar to what obtained in Egypt, seems to have crept in among the Hebrews, of giving funeral honours to their kings, or withholding them, according to the good or bad characters of their reign.

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 1-9. AHAZIAH, SUCCEEDING, REIGNS WICKEDLY. 1. the inhabitants of Jerusalem made Ahaziah . . . king—Or Jehoahaz (ch. 21. 17). All his elder brothers having been slaughtered by the Arab marauders, the throne of Judah rightfully belonged to him as the only legitimate heir of Joram. 2. Forty and two years old was Ahaziah when he began to reign—(cf. 2 Kings 8. 26). According to that passage, the commencement of his reign is dated in the twenty-second year of his age, and, according to this, in the forty-second year of the kingdom of his mother's family. [LIGHTFOOT.] "If Ahaziah ascended the throne in the twenty-second year of his life, he must have been born in his father's nineteenth year. Hence, it may seem strange that he had elder brothers; but in the East they marry early, and royal princes had, besides the wife of the first rank, usually concubines, as Jehoram had (ch. 21. 17); he might, therefore, in the nineteenth year of his age, very well have several sons" [KEIL] (cf. ch. 21. 20; 2 Kings 8. 17). Athaliah, the daughter of Omri—More properly, grand-daughter. The expression is used loosely, as the statement was made simply for the purpose of intimating that she belonged to that idolatrous race. 3, 4. his mother was his counsellor . . . they were his counsellors—The facile king surrendered himself wholly to the influence of his mother and her relatives. Athaliah and her son introduced a universal corruption of morals, and made idolatry the religion of the court and the nation. By them he was induced not only to conform to the religion of the northern kingdom, but to join a new expedition against Ramoth-gilead (see on 2 Kings 9. 10). 5. went . . . to war against Hazael, king of Syria—It may be mentioned as a very minute and therefore important confirmation of this part of the sacred history, that the names of Jehu and Hazael his contemporary have both been found on Assyrian sculptures; and there is also a notice of Ithbaal, king of Sidon, who was the father of Jezebel. 6. Azariah went down—i. e., from Ramoth-gilead, to visit the king of Israel, who was lying ill of his wounds at Jezreel, and fled there on the alarm of Jehu's rebellion. 9. he sought Ahaziah, and caught him (for he was hid in Samaria)—(cf. 2 Kings 9. 27-29). The two accounts are easily reconciled. "Ahaziah fled first to the garden-house and escaped to Samaria; but was here, where he had hid himself, taken by Jehu's men who pursued him, brought to Jehu, who was still near or in Jezreel, and at his command slain at the hill Gur, beside Ibleam, in his chariot; that is, mortally wounded with an arrow, so that he, again fleeing, expired at Megiddo." [KEIL.] Jehu left the corpse at the disposal of the king of Judah's attendants, who conveyed it to Jerusalem, and out of respect to his grandfather Jehoshaphat's memory, gave him an honourable interment in the tombs of the kings. So the house of Ahaziah had no power to keep still the kingdom—His children were too young to assume the reins of government, and all the other royal princes had been massacred by Jehu (v. 8).

10-12. ATHALIAH, DESTROYING THE SEED-ROYAL, SAVE JOASH, USURPS THE KINGDOM. 10. Athaliah . . . arose and destroyed all the seed-royal—(See on 2 Kings 11. 1-3.) Maddened by the massacre of the royal family of Ahab, she resolved that the royal house of David should have the same fate. Knowing the commission which Jehu had received to extirpate the whole of Ahab's posterity, she expected that he would extend his sword to her. Anticipating his movements, she resolved, as her only defence and security, to usurp the throne and destroy "the seed-royal," both because they were hostile to the Phœnician worship of Baal, which she was determined to uphold, and because, if one of the young princes became king, his mother would supersede Athaliah in the dignity of queen-mother. 12. he was with them hid in the house of God—Certain persons connected with the priesthood had a right to occupy the buildings in the outer wall, and all within the outer wall was often called the temple. Jehoiada and his family resided in one of these apartments.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 1-11. JEHOIADA MAKES JOASH KING. 1. in the seventh year Jehoiada . . . took the captains of hundreds, &c.—(See on 2 Kings 11. 4, 17.) The five officers mentioned here had been probably of the royal guard, and were known to be strongly disaffected to the government of Athaliah. 2. chief of the fathers of Israel—This name is frequently used in Chronicles for Judah and Benjamin, now all that remained of Israel. Having cautiously entrusted the secret of the young prince's preservation to all the leading men in the kingdom, he enlisted their interest in the royal cause, and got their pledge to support it by a secret oath of fidelity. they came to Jerusalem—The time chosen for the grand discovery was, probably, one of the annual festivals, when there was a general concourse of the nation at the capital. 4. This is the thing that ye shall do—The arrangements made for defence are here described. The people were divided into three bodies; one attended as guards to the king, while the other two were posted at all the doors and gates, and the captains and military officers who entered the temple unarmed to lull suspicion, were furnished with weapons out of the sacred armoury, where David had deposited his trophies of victory, and which was reopened on this occasion. 8. Jehoiada . . . dismissed not the courses—As it was necessary to have as large a disposable force as he could command on such a crisis, the high priest detained those who, in other circumstances, would have returned home on the expiry of their week of service. 11. then they brought out the king's son, and put upon him the crown, and gave to him the testimony—Some think that the original word rendered "testimony," as its derivation warrants, may signify here the regalia, especially the bracelet (2 Samuel 1. 10); and this view they support on the ground that "gave him" being supplemented, the text properly runs thus, "put upon him the crown and testimony." At the same time, it seems equally pertinent to take "the testimony" in the usual acceptance of that term; and, accordingly, many are of opinion that a roll containing a copy of the law (Deuteronomy 17. 18) was placed in the king's hands, which he held as a sceptre or truncheon; while others, referring to a custom of Oriental people, when receiving a letter or document from a highly respected quarter, lifting it up to their heads before opening it, consider that Joash, besides the crown, had the book of the law laid upon his head (see Job 31. 35, 36). God save the king—lit., Long live the king.

12-15. ATHALIAH SLAIN. 12. when Athaliah heard the noise of the people—The unusual commotion indicated by the blast of the trumpets, and the vehement acclamations of the people, drew her attention, or excited her fears. She might have flattered herself that, having slain all the royal family, she was in perfect security; but it is just as likely that, finding on reflection, one had escaped her murderous hands, she might not deem it expedient to institute any inquiries; but the very idea would keep her constantly in a state of jealous suspicion and irritation. In that state of mind, the wicked usurper, hearing across the Tyropœon the outburst of popular joy, rushed across the bridge to the temple grounds, and, penetrating from a single glance the meaning of the whole scene, raised a shriek of "Treason!" 13. behold, the king stood at his pillar at the entering in—The king's pillar was in the people's court, opposite that of the priests'. The young king, arrayed in the royal insignia, had been brought out of the inner, to stand forth in the outer court, to the public view. Some think that he stood on the brazen scaffold of Solomon, erected beside the pillar. 14, 15. Slay her not in the house of the Lord . . . And when she was come to the entering of the horse-gate by the king's house, they slew her there—The high priest ordered her immediately to be taken out of the temple grounds and put to death; "and they laid hands on her, and she went by the way by the which horses came into the king's house, and there she was slain" (2 Kings 11. 16). "Now, we are not to suppose that horses came into" the king's house "of residence, but into the king's (horses') house or hippodrome (the gate of the king's mules) [JOSEPHUS], he had built for them on the south-east of the temple, in the immediate vicinity of the horse-gate in the valley of Kedron—a valley which was at that time a kind of desecrated place by the destruction of idols and their appurtenances" (2 Kings 23. 2, 6, 12). [BARCLAY'S CITY OF THE GREAT KING.]

16. JEHOIADA RESTORES THE WORSHIP OF GOD, AND SETTLES THE KING. 16. Jehoiada made a covenant—(See on 2 Kings 11. 17.)

CHAPTER XXIV.

Ver. 1-14. JOASH REIGNS WELL ALL THE DAYS OF JEHOIADA. 1-3. Joash began to reign—(See on 2 Kings 12. 1-3.) Jehoiada took for him two wives—As Jehoiada was now too old to contract such new alliances, the generality of interpreters apply this statement to the young king. 4-14. Joash was minded to repair the house of the Lord—(See on 2 Kings 12. 4-16.)

15, 16. JEHOIADA BEING DEAD. 15, 16. Jehoiada waxed old . . . and died—His life protracted to unusual longevity, and spent in the service of his country, deserved some tribute of public gratitude, and this was rendered in the posthumous honours that were bestowed on him. Among the Hebrews, intramural interment was prohibited in every city but Jerusalem, and there the exception was made only to the royal family and persons of eminent merit, on whom the distinction was conferred of being buried in the city of David, among the kings, as in the case of Jehoiada.

17-22. JOASH FALLS INTO IDOLATRY. 17-22. Now up came the princes of Judah, and made obeisance to the king—Hitherto, while Joash occupied the throne, his uncle had held the reins of sovereign power, and by his excellent counsels had directed the young king to such measures as were calculated to promote both the civil and religious interests of the country. The fervent piety, practical wisdom, and inflexible firmness of that sage counsellor exerted immense influence over all classes. But now that the helm of the state-ship was no longer steered by the sound head and firm hand of the venerable high priest, the real merits of Joash's administration appear; and for want of good and enlightened principle, as well as, perhaps, of natural energy of character, he allowed himself to be borne onward in a course which soon wrecked the vessel upon hidden rocks. the king hearkened unto them, &c.—They were secretly attached to idolatry, and their elevated rank affords sad proof how extensively and deeply the nation had become corrupted during the reigns of Jehoram, Ahaziah, and Athaliah. With strong professions of allegiance they humbly requested that they might not be subjected to the continued necessity of frequent and expensive journeys to Jerusalem, but allowed the privilege their fathers had enjoyed of worshipping God in high places at home; and they framed their petition in this plausible and least offensive manner, well knowing that, if excused attendance at the temple, they might—without risk of discovery or disturbance—indulge their tastes in the observance of any private rites they pleased. The weak-minded king granted their petition; and the consequence was, that when they left the house of the Lord God of their fathers, they soon "served groves and idols." wrath came upon Judah and Jerusalem—The particular mention of Jerusalem as involved in the sin implies that the neglect of the temple and the consequent idolatry received not only the king's toleration, but his sanction; and it naturally occurs to ask how, at his mature age, such a total abandonment of a place with which all his early recollections were associated can be accounted for. It has been suggested that what he had witnessed of the conduct of many of the priests in the careless performance of the worship, and especially their unwillingness to collect the money, as well as apply a portion of their revenues for the repairs of the temple, had alienated and disgusted him. [LECLERC.] 19. Yet he sent prophets—Elisha, Mlchah, Jehu son of Hanani, Jahaziel son of Zechariah (ch. 20. 14), Eliezar son of Dodavah (ch. 20. 37), lived and taught at that time. But all their prophetic warnings and denunciations were unheard and unheeded. 20. the Spirit of God came upon Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada—probably a younger son, for his name does not occur in the list of Aaron's successors (1 Chronicles 6). stood above the people—Being of the priestly order, he spoke from the inner court, which was considerably higher than that of the people. and said unto them, Thus saith God, Why transgress ye the commandments of the Lord, that ye cannot prosper, &c.—His near relationship to the king might have created a feeling of delicacy and reluctance to interfere; but at length he, too, was prompted by an irresistible impulse to protest against the prevailing impiety. The bold freedom and energy of his remonstrance, as well as his denunciation of the national calamities that would certainly follow, were most unpalatable to the king; while they so roused the fierce passions of the multitude that a band of miscreants, at the secret instigation of Joash, stoned him to death. This deed of violence involved complicated criminality on the part of the king. It was a horrid outrage on a prophet of the Lord—base ingratitude to a family who had preserved his life—atrocious treatment of a true Hebrew patriot—an illegal and unrighteous exercise of his power and authority as a king. 22. when he died, he said, The Lord look upon it and require it—These dying words, if they implied a vindictive imprecation, exhibit a striking contrast to the spirit of the first Christian martyr (Acts 7. 60). But, instead of being the expression of a personal wish, they might be the utterance of a prophetic doom.

23-27. HE IS SLAIN BY HIS SERVANTS. 23. at the end of the year the host of Syria came up—This invasion took place under the personal conduct of Hazael, whom Joash, to save the miseries of a siege, prevailed on to withdraw his forces by a large present of gold (2 Kings 12. 18). Most probably, also, he promised the payment of an annual tribute, on the neglect or refusal of which the Syrians returned the following year, and with a mere handful of men inflicted a total and humiliating defeat on the collected force of the Hebrews. 25. they left him in sore diseases—The close of his life was embittered by a painful malady, which long confined him to bed. his own servants conspired against him—These two conspirators (whose fathers were Jews, but their mothers aliens) were probably courtiers, who, having constant access to the bed-chamber, could the more easily execute their design. for the blood of the sons—read "the son" of Jehoiada. Public opinion seems to have ascribed the disasters of his life and reign to that foul crime, and as the king had long lost the esteem and respect of his subjects, neither horror nor sorrow was expressed for his miserable end!

CHAPTER XXV.

Ver. 1-4. AMAZIAH BEGINS TO REIGN WELL. 1. Amaziah was twenty and five years old, &c.—(See on 2 Kings 4. 1-6.)

5-10. HAVING HIRED AN ARMY OF ISRAELITES AGAINST THE EDMOMITES, AT THE WORD OF A PROPHET HE LOSES AN HUNDRED TALENTS AND DISMISSES THEM. 5. Amaziah made captains, &c.—As all who were capable of bearing arms were liable to serve, it was quite natural in making up the muster-roll to class them according to their respective families, and to appoint the officers of each corps from the same quarter; so that all the soldiers who formed a regiment were brothers, relatives, friends. Thus the Hebrew troops were closely linked together, and had strong inducements to keep steady in their ranks. found them three hundred thousand choice men—This was only a fourth part of Jehoshaphat's army (ch. 17. 14-19), showing how sadly the kingdom of Judah had, in the space of eighty-two years, been reduced in population by foreign wars, no less than by internal corruptions. But the full amount of Amaziah's troops may not be here stated. 6. He hired also an hundred thousand mighty men of valour for an hundred talents of silver—This sum was paid into the exchequer of Jehoahaz—not given as bounty to the mercenaries who were obliged to serve at the sovereign's call; their remuneration consisting only in the booty they might obtain. It was about £50,000 sterling, being 10s. per man, including officers—a very paltry pay, compared with the bounty given for a soldier in this country. But it must be remembered that in ancient times campaigns were short, and the hazards of the service comparatively small. 7, 8. there came a man of God—sent to dissuade Amaziah from the course he was following, on the ground that "the Lord was not with Israel." This statement was perfectly intelligible to the king. But the historian, writing long after, thought it might require explanation, and therefore added the comment, "with all the children of Ephraim." Idolatry had long been the prevailing religion in that kingdom, and Ephraim its headquarters. As to the other part of the prophet's advice (v. 8), considerable obscurity hangs over it, as the text stands; and hence some able critics have suggested the insertion of "not" in the middle clause, so that the verse will be thus: "But if thou wilt go (alone), do, be strong for the battle; God shall not make thee fall before the enemy." 10. separated them . . . the army out of Israel . . . their anger was kindled against Judah—Amaziah, who knew his position as the Lord's viceroy, complied with the prophet's counsel, and, consenting to forfeit the purchase-money of the Israelitish soldiers, discharged them. Exasperated at this treatment, they resolved to indemnify themselves for the loss of their expected booty, and so on their return home they plundered all the towns in their way, committing great havoc both of life and property without any stoppage, as the king of Judah and his army had set out on their expedition (2 Kings 14. 7). 11. valley of Salt—This ravine lies to the south of the Dead Sea. The arms of Amaziah, in reward for his obedience to the Divine will, were crowned with victory—ten thousand of the Edomites were slain on the field, and as many taken prisoners, who were put to death by precipitation "from the top of the rock." This rock might be situated in the neighbourhood of the battle-field, but more probably it formed one of the high craggy cliffs of Selah (Petra), the capital of the Edomites, whither Amaziah marched directly from the valley of Salt, and which he captured (2 Kings 14. 7). The savage cruelty dealt out to them was either in retaliation for similar barbarities inflicted on the Hebrews, or to strike terror into so rebellious a people for the future. The mode of execution, by dashing against stones (Psalm 137. 9), was common among many ancient nations. 14-16. Amaziah brought the gods of the children of Seir—The Edomites worshipped the sun under different forms and with various rites. But burning incense upon altars was a principal act of worship, and this was the very thing Amaziah is described as having with strange infatuation performed. Whether he had been captivated with the beauty of the images, or hoped by honouring the gods to disarm their spite at him for his conquest and harsh treatment of their votaries, his conduct in establishing these objects of religious homage in Jerusalem was foolish, ignorant, and highly offensive to God, who commissioned a prophet to rebuke him for his apostasy, and threaten him with the calamity that soon after befel him. 16. as he talked with him, &c.—Those who were invested with the prophetic character were entitled to counsel kings, and Amaziah, had he not been offended by unwelcome truths, would have admitted the claim of this prophet, who was probably the same that had given him counsel previous to the war with Edom. But victory had elated and blinded him.

17. HE PROVOKES JOASH TO HIS OVERTHROW. 17. Then Amaziah sent to Jehoahaz . . . Come, let us see one another in the face—(see on 2 Kings 14. 8-20).

CHAPTER XXVI.

Ver. 1-8. UZZIAH SUCCEEDS AMAZIAH, AND REIGNS WELL IN THE DAYS OF ZECHARIAH. 1. Then all the people of Judah took Uzziah—(see on 2 Kings 14. 21, 22; 15. 1-3). 2. He built Eloth—or "He it was who built Eloth." The account of the fortifications of this port on the Red Sea which Uzziah restored to the kingdom of Judah (ch. 33. 13), is placed before the chronological notices (v. 3), either on account of the importance attached to the conquest of Eloth, or from the desire of the historian to introduce Uzziah as the king, who was known as the conqueror of Eloth. Besides, it indicates that the conquest occurred in the early part of his reign—that it was important as a port, and that Hebrew merchants maintained the old trade between it and the countries of the East [BERTHEAU.] 5. he sought God in the days of Zechariah—A wise and pious counsellor, who was skilled in understanding the meaning and lessons of the ancient prophecies, and who wielded a salutary influence over Uzziah. 6, 7. went forth and warred against the Philistines—He overcame them in many engagements—dismantled their towns, and erected fortified cities in various parts of the country, to keep them in subjection. Jabneh, the same as Jabneel (Joshua 15. 11). Gur-baal is thought by some to be Gerar, and by others Gebal. 8. the Ammonites gave gifts—The countries east of the Jordan became tributary to him, and by the rapid succession and extent of his victories, his kingdom extended to the Egyptian frontier.

9, 10. HIS BUILDINGS. 9. Uzziah built towers in Jerusalem, &c.—Where resistance could be made, or missiles discharged against assailants. The sites of the principal of these towers were—at the corner gate (ch. 25. 23), the north-west corner of the city; at the valley gate on the west, where the Joppa gate now is; at the "turning"—a curve in the city wall on the eastern side of Zion. The town, at this point, commanded the horse-gate which defended Zion and the temple hill on the south-east. [BERTHEAU.] 10. also he built towers in the desert—for the threefold purpose of defence—of observation—and of shelter to his cattle; he dug also a great many wells, for he loved and encouraged all branches of agriculture. Some of these "were in the desert," i. e., in the district to the south-east of Jerusalem, on the west of the Dead Sea, an extensive grazing district "in the low country" lying between the mountains of Judah and the Mediterranean; "and in the plains," east of the Jordan, within the territory of Reuben (Deuteronomy 4. 43; Joshua 20. 8). in Carmel—This mountain being within the boundary of Israel, did not belong to Uzziah; and as it is here placed in opposition to the vine-bearing mountains, it is probably used, not as a proper name, but to signify, as the word denotes, "fruitful fields" (Margin.)

11-15. HIS HOST, AND ENGINES OF WAR. 11-15. an host of fighting men who went out to war by bands—He raised a strong body of militia, divided into companies or regiments of uniform militia, which served in rotation. The enumeration was performed by two functionaries expert in the drawing up of military muster-rolls, under the superintendence of Hananiah, one of the high officers of the crown. The army consisted of 307,500 picked men, under the command of two thousand gallant officers, chiefs or heads of fathers' houses, so that each fathers' house formed a distinct band. They were fully equipped with every kind of military accoutrements, from brazen helmets, a habergeon or coat of mail, to a sling for stones. 15. made engines, invented by cunning men, to shoot arrows and great stones—This is the first notice that occurs in history of the use of machines for throwing projectiles. The invention is apparently ascribed to the reign of Uzziah, and PLINY expressly says they originated in Syria. he was marvellously helped till he was strong—He conducted himself as became the viceroy of the Divine King, and prospered.

16-21. HE INVADES THE PRIEST'S OFFICE, AND IS SMITTEN WITH LEPROSY. 16-21. he transgressed against the Lord, &c.—(see on 2 Kings 15. 5). This daring and wicked act is in both records traced to the intoxicating influence of overweening pride and vanity. But here the additional circumstances are stated, that his entrance was opposed, and strong remonstrances made (1 Chronicles 6. 10) by the high priest, who was accompanied by eighty inferior priests. Rage and threats were the only answers he deigned to return, but God took care to vindicate the sacredness of the priestly office, and at the moment of the king's lifting the censor, struck him with leprosy. The earthquake mentioned (Amos 1. 1) is said to have been felt at the moment. [JOSEPHUS.] 21. dwelt in a several house—in an infirmary, [BERTHEAU.] 23. they buried him . . . in the field of the burial which belonged to the kings—He was interred not in, but near, the sepulchre of the kings, as the corpse of a leper would have polluted it.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 1-4. JOTHAM, REIGNING WELL, PROSPERS. 1. Jotham was twenty and five years old—(See on 2 Kings 15. 32-35.) His mother's name . . . was Jerushah, the daughter of Zadok—or descendant of the famous priest of that name. 2. he did that which was right—The general rectitude of his government is described by representing it as conducted on the excellent principles which had guided the early part of his father's reign. the people did yet corruptly—(see 2 Kings 15. 35); but the description here is more emphatic, that though Jotham did much to promote the good of his kingdom, and aimed at a thorough reformation in religion, the widespread and inveterate wickedness of the people frustrated all his laudable efforts. 3. He built the high gate of the house of the Lord—Situated on the north—that portion of the temple hill which was high compared with the southern part—hence "the higher," or upper gate (2 Kings 15. 35). He built, i. e., repaired or embellished. and on the wall of Ophel—Hebrew, the Ophel, i. e., the mound, or eminence on the south-eastern slope of the temple mount, a ridge lying between the valleys Kedron and Tyropœon, called "the lower city." [JOSEPHUS.] He "built much," having the same desire as his father to secure the defence of Jerusalem in every direction. 4. in the mountains of Judah, and in the forests he built castles and towers—i. e.*, in the elevated and wooded spots where fortified cities could not be placed, he erected castles and towers.

5-9. HE SUBDUES THE AMMONITES. 5. He fought with the king of the Ammonites—This invasion he not only repelled, but, pursuing the Ammonites into their own territory, imposed on them a yearly tribute, which, for two years, they paid; but when Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, combined to attack the kingdom of Judah, they took the opportunity of revolting, and Jotham was too distracted by other matters to attempt the re-conquest (see on 2 Kings 15. 37).

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 1-21. AHAZ, REIGNING WICKEDLY, IS AFFLICTED BY THE SYRIANS. 1-4. Ahaz was twenty years old—(see on 2 Kings 16. 1-4). This prince, discarding the principles and example of his excellent father, early betrayed a strong bias to idolatry. He ruled with an arbitrary and absolute authority, and not as a theocratic sovereign: he not only forsook the temple of God, but embraced first the symbolic worship established in the sister kingdom, and afterwards the gross idolatry practised by the Canaanites. 5, 6. the Lord . . . delivered him into the hand of the king of Syria . . . he was also delivered into the hand of the king of Israel—These verses, without alluding to the formation of a confederacy between the Syrian and Israelitish kings to invade the kingdom of Judah, or relating the commencement of the war in the close of Jotham's reign (2 Kings 15. 37), give the issue only of some battles that were fought in the early part of the campaign. delivered him . . . smote him . . . he was also delivered—i. e.*, his army, for Ahaz was not personally included in the number either of the slain or the captives. The slaughter of 120,000 in one day was a terrible calamity, which, it is expressly said (v. 6), was inflicted as a judgment on Judah, "because they had forsaken the Lord God of their fathers." Among the slain were some persons of distinction, "Maaseiah the king's son." The sons of Ahaz being too young to take part in a battle, this individual must have been a younger son of the late king Jotham. "Azrikam, the governor of the house," i. e., the palace; and "Elkanah that was next to the king," i. e., the vizier or prime minister (Genesis 41. 40; Esther 10. 3). These were all cut down on the field by Zichri, an Israelitish warrior, or as some think, ordered to be put to death after the battle. A vast number of captives also fell into the power of the conquerors; and an equal division of war prisoners being made between the allies, they were sent off under a military escort to the respective capitals of Syria and Israel. 8. the children of Israel carried away captive of their brethren two hundred thousand—These captives included a great number of women, boys, and girls, a circumstance which creates a presumption that the Hebrews, like other Orientals, were accompanied in the war by multitudes of non-combatants (see on Judges 4. 8). The report of these "brethren," being brought as captives to Samaria, excited general indignation among the better-disposed inhabitants; and Oded, a prophet, accompanied by the princes (v. 12, compared with v. 14), went out, as the escort was approaching, to prevent the disgraceful outrage of introducing such prisoners into the city. The officers of the squadron were, of course, not to blame; they were simply doing their military duty in conducting those prisoners of war to their destination. But Oded clearly showed that the Israelitish army had gained the victory—not by the superiority of their arms, but in consequence of the Divine judgment against Judah; he forcibly exposed the enormity of the offence of keeping "their brethren" as slaves got in war; he protested earnestly against adding this great offence of unnatural and sinful cruelty (Leviticus 25. 43, 44; Micah 2. 8, 9) to the already overwhelming amount of their own national sins; and such was the effect of his spirited remonstrance, and the opposing tide of popular feeling, "that the armed men left the captives and the spoil before the princes and all the congregation." 15. the men which were expressed by name rose up—These were either the "heads of the children of Ephraim" (mentioned v. 12), or some other leading individuals chosen for the benevolent office. Under their kindly superintendence, the prisoners were not only released, but out of the spoils were comfortably relieved with food and clothing, and conveyed as far as Jericho on their way back to their own homes. This is a beautiful incident, and full of interest, as showing that even at this period of national decline there were not a few who steadfastly adhered to the law of God. 16. At that time did King Ahaz send unto the kings of Assyria—"Kings," the plural for the singular, which in many ancient versions is found. "At that time," refers to the period of Ahaz's great distress, when, after a succession of defeats, he retreated within the walls of Jerusalem, whither—either in the same or a subsequent campaign—the Syrian and Israelitish allies marched to besiege him (see on 2 Kings 16. 7-9). Though delivered from this danger, other enemies infested his dominions both on the south and the west. 17. again the Edomites had come and smitten Judah—This invasion must have been after Rezin (at the beginning of the late Syro-Israelitish war), had released that people from the yoke of Judah (ch. 15. 11; cf. 2 Kings 16. 6). 18. Gederoth—On the Philistine frontier (Joshua 15. 41). Shocho—or Socah (Joshua 15. 35), now Shuweikeh, a town in the Valley of Judah (see on 1 Samuel 17. 1). Gimso—Now Jimza, a little east of Ludd (Lydda). [ROBINSON.] All these disasters, by which the "Lord brought Judah low," was because of Ahaz, king of Israel (Judah), see ch. 21. 2; 24. 16; 28. 27, who made Judah naked, and transgressed sore against the Lord. 20. Tilgath-pilneser . . . distressed him, but strengthened him not—i. e.*, Notwithstanding the temporary relief which Tilgath-pilneser afforded him by the conquest of Damascus and the slaughter of Rezin (2 Kings 16. 9), little advantage resulted from it, for Tilgath-pilneser spent the winter in voluptuous revelry at Damascus; and the connection formed with the Assyrian king was eventually a source of new and greater calamities and humiliation to the kingdom of Judah (v. 2, 3).

22-27. HIS IDOLATRY IN HIS DISTRESS. 22. in the time of his distress did he trespass yet more against the Lord—This infuriated king surrendered himself to the influence of idolatry, and exerted his royal authority to extend it, with the intensity of a passion—with the ignorance and servile fear of a heathen (v. 23) and a ruthless defiance of God (see on 2 Kings 16. 10-20).

CHAPTER XXIX.

Ver. 1, 2. HEZEKIAH'S GOOD REIGN. 1. Hezekiah began to reign, &c.—(see on 2 Kings 18. 1-3.) His mother's name, which, in the passage referred to, appears in an abridged form, is here given in full.

3-11. HE RESTORES RELIGION. 3. in the first year of his reign, in the first month—Not the first month after his accession to the throne, but in Nisan, the first month of the sacred year, the season appointed for the celebration of the passover. he opened the doors of the house of the Lord—Which had been closed up by his father (ch. 28. 24). and he repaired them—or embellished them (cf. 2 Kings 18. 16). 4. the east street—The court of the priests, which fronted the eastern gate of the temple. Assembling the priests and Levites there, he enjoined them to set about the immediate purification of the temple. It does not appear that the order referred to the removal of idols, for objects of idolatrous homage could scarcely have been put there, seeing the doors had been shut up; but in its forsaken and desolate state the temple and its courts had been polluted by every kind of impurities. 6. our fathers have trespassed—Ahaz and the generation contemporary with him were specially meant, for "they turned away their faces from the habitation of the Lord," and whether or not they turned east to the rising sun, they abandoned the worship of God. "They shut up the doors of the porch," so that the sacred ritual was entirely discontinued. 8. Wherefore the wrath of the Lord was upon Judah and Jerusalem—This pious king had the discernment to ascribe all the national calamities that had befallen the kingdom to the true cause, viz., apostasy from God. The country had been laid waste by successive wars of invasion, and its resources drained, many families mourned members of their household still suffering the miseries of foreign captivity, all their former prosperity and glory had fled, and to what was this painful and humiliating state of affairs to be traced, but the manifest judgment of God upon the kingdom for its sins? 10. 11. Now it is in mine heart to make a covenant with God—Convinced of the sin and bitter fruits of idolatry, Hezekiah intended to reverse the policy of his father, and to restore, in all its ancient purity and glory, the worship of the true God. His commencement of this resolution at the beginning of his reign attests his sincere piety, and it also proves the strength of his conviction that righteousness exalteth a nation, for, instead of waiting till his throne was consolidated, he devised measures of national reformation at the beginning of his reign, and vigorously faced all the difficulties which, in such a course, he had to encounter, after the people's habits had so long been moulded to idolatry. His intentions were first disclosed to this meeting of the priests and Levites—for the agency of these officials was to be employed in carrying them into effect.

12-36. THE HOUSE OF GOD CLEANSSED. 12. Then the Levites arose—Fourteen chiefs undertook the duty of collecting and preparing their brethren for the important work of "cleansing the Lord's house." Beginning with the outer courts—that of the priests and that of the people—the cleansing of these occupied eight days, after which they set themselves to purify the interior; but as the Levites were not allowed to enter within the walls of the temple, the priest brought all the sweepings out to the porch, where they were received by the Levites, and thrown into the brook Kedron. This took eight days more; and, at the end of this period they repaired to the palace, and announced that not only had the whole of the sacred edifice, within and without, undergone a thorough purification, but all the vessels which the late king had taken away and applied to a common use in his palace, had been restored, "and sanctified." 20. Then Hezekiah the king rose early, and gathered the rulers of the city—His anxiety to enter upon the expiatory service with all possible despatch, now that the temple had been properly prepared for it, prevented his summoning the whole representatives of Israel. The requisite number of victims having been provided, and the officers of the temple having sanctified themselves according to the directions of the law, the priests were appointed to offer sacrifices of atonement successively for "the kingdom," i. e., for the sins of the king and his predecessors—"for the sanctuary," i. e., for the sins of the priests themselves, and for the desecration of the temple—"and for Judah," i. e., for the people who, by their voluntary consent, were involved in the guilt of the national apostasy. Animals of the kinds used in sacrifice were offered by sevens—that number indicating completeness. The Levites were ordered to praise God with musical instruments, which, although not originally used in the tabernacle, had been enlisted in the service of Divine worship by David on the advice of the prophets Gad and Nathan, as well calculated to animate the devotions of the people. At the close of the special services of the occasion, viz., the offering of atonement sacrifices, the king and all civic rulers who were present joined in the worship. A grand anthem was sung (v. 30) by the choir, consisting of some of the psalms of David and Asaph, and a great number of thank offerings, praise offerings, and free-will burnt offerings were presented at the invitation of the king. 31. Hezekiah . . . said, Now ye have consecrated yourselves unto the Lord, come near—This address was made to the priests as being now, by the sacrifice of the expiation offerings, anew consecrated to the service of God, and qualified to resume the functions of their sacred office (Exodus 28. 41; 29. 32). the congregation brought in—i. e., the body of civic rulers present. 34. the priests were too few, wherefore their brethren the Levites did help them—The skins of beasts intended as peace offerings might be taken off by the officers, because, in such cases, the carcass was not wholly laid upon the altar; but animals meant for burnt offerings which were wholly consumed by fire could be flayed by the priests alone, not even the Levites being allowed to touch them, except in cases of unavoidable necessity (ch. 35. 11). The duty being assigned by the law to the priests (Leviticus 1. 6), was construed by consuetudinary practice as an exclusion of all others not connected with the Aaronic family. for the Levites were more upright in heart to sanctify themselves than the priests—i. e., displayed greater alacrity than the priests. This service was hastened on by the irrepressible solicitude of the king; and whether it was that many of the priests being absent in the country, had not arrived in time—whether from the long interruption of the public duties, some of them had relaxed in their wonted attentions to personal cleanliness, and had many preparations to make, or whether from some having participated in the idolatrous services introduced by Ahaz, they were backward in repairing to the temple—a reflection does seem to be cast upon their order as dilatory and not universally ready for duty (cf. ch. 30. 15). Thus was the newly-consecrated temple reopened to the no small joy of the pious king and all the people.

CHAPTER XXX.

Ver. 1-12. HEZEKIAH PROCLAIMS A PASSOVER. 1. Hezekiah sent to all . . . Judah . . . to come to . . . Jerusalem, to keep the passover—This great religious festival had not been regularly observed by the Hebrews in their national capacity for a long time, in consequence both of the division of the kingdom, and the many disorders that had followed that unhappy event. Hezekiah longed extremely to see its observance revived; and the expression of his wishes having received a hearty response from the princes and chief men of his own kingdom, the preparatory steps were taken for a renewed celebration of the national solemnity. Letters to Ephraim and Manasseh—The names of these leading tribes are used for the whole kingdom of Israel. It being judged impossible, however, that the temple, the priests, and people could be all duly sanctified at the usual time appointed for the anniversary, viz., the fourteenth day of the first month (Nisan), it was resolved, instead of postponing the feast till another year, to observe it on the fourteenth day of the second month; a liberty which, being in certain circumstances (Numbers 9. 6-13) granted to individuals, might, it was believed, be allowed to the whole people. Hezekiah's proclamation was, of course, authoritative in his own kingdom, but it could not have been made and circulated in all the towns and villages of the neighbouring kingdom without the concurrence, or at least the permission, of the Israelitish sovereign. Hoshea, the reigning king, is described as though evil in some respects, yet more favourably disposed to religious liberty than any of his predecessors since the separation of the kingdom. This is thought to be the meaning of the mitigating clause in his character (2 Kings 17. 2). the posts—i. e., runners, or royal messengers, who were taken from the king's body-guard (ch. 23. 1, 2). Each, well mounted, had a certain number of miles to traverse, and, having performed his course, was relieved by another, who had to scour an equal extent of ground; so that, as the government messengers were despatched in all directions, public edicts were speedily diffused throughout the country. The proclamation of Hezekiah was followed by a verbal address from himself, piously urging the duty, and setting forth the advantages of a return to the pure faith and institutions which God had delivered to their ancestors through Moses. the remnant of you that are escaped out of the hand of the kings of Assyria—This implies that several expeditions against Israel had already been made by Assyrian invaders—by Pul (2 Kings 15. 19), but none of the people were then removed; at a later period by Tiglath-pileser, when it appears that numbers among the tribes east of Jordan (1 Chronicles 5. 26), and afterwards in the northern parts of Israel (2 Kings 15. 20), were carried into foreign exile. The invasion of Shalmaneser cannot be alluded to, as it did not take place till the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign (2 Kings 17. 6; 18. 9-12). 10. The posts passed from city to city—It is not surprising that after so long a discontinuance of the sacred festival, this attempt to revive it should, in some quarters, have excited ridicule and opposition; and, accordingly, among the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Zebulun, Hezekiah's messengers met with open insults and ill usage. Numbers, however, in these very districts, as well as throughout the kingdom of the ten tribes, generally complied with the invitation; while, in the kingdom of Judah, there was one unanimous feeling of high expectation and pious delight. The concourse that repaired to Jerusalem on the occasion was very great, and the occasion was ever after regarded as one of the greatest passovers that had ever been celebrated.

13-27. THE ASSEMBLY DESTROY THE ALTARS OF IDOLATRY. 14. they arose, and took away the altars that were in Jerusalem—As a necessary preparation for the right observance of the approaching solemnity, the removal of the altars was resolved upon, which Ahaz had erected in the city (ch. 23. 24); for, as being the people of God, the Hebrews were bound to extirpate all traces of idolatry; and it was a happy sign and pledge of the influence of the Spirit pervading the minds of the people when they voluntarily undertook this important preliminary work. 15. the priests and Levites were ashamed—Though the Levites are associated in this statement, the priests were principally referred to; those of them who had been dilatory or negligent in sanctifying themselves (ch. 29. 34) were put to the blush and stimulated to their duty by the greater alacrity and zeal of the people. 16-18. the priests sprinkled the blood which they received of the hand of the Levites—This was a deviation from the established rules and practices in presenting the offerings of the temple; and the reason was, that numbers present on the occasion having not sanctified themselves, the Levites slaughtered the paschal victims (see on ch. 35. 5) for every one that was unclean; while at other times the heads of families killed the lambs themselves, the priests receiving the blood from their hands and presenting it on the altar. Multitudes of the Israelites, especially from certain tribes (v. 18), were in this unsanctified state, and yet they ate the passover—an exceptional feature and one opposed to the law (Numbers 9. 6); but this exception was allowed in answer to Hezekiah's prayer (v. 18-20). the Lord . . . healed the people—We imagine the whole affair to have been the following: In consequence of their transgressions they had cause to fear disease and even death (Leviticus 15. 31). Hezekiah prayed for the nation, which was on the point of being diseased, and might therefore be regarded as sick already. [BERTHEAU.] 21. the children of Israel . . . kept the feast—The time appointed by the law for the continuance of the feast was seven days; but in consequence of its having been allowed to fall so long into desuetude, they doubled the period of celebration, and kept it fourteen days with unabated satisfaction and joy, materials for the additional sacrificial meals being supplied by the munificence of the king and the princes. and a great number of priests sanctified themselves—So that there would be a sufficient number of hands for the additional services.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Ver. 1-10. THE PEOPLE FORWARD IN DESTROYING IDOLATRY. 1. all Israel . . . present went out into the cities of Judah—The solemnities of this paschal season left a deep and salutary impression on the minds of the assembled worshippers; attachment to the ancient institutions of their country was extensively revived; ardour in the service of God animated every bosom; and under the impulse of the devout feelings inspired by the occasion, they took measures at the close of the passover for extirpating idolatrous statues and altars out of every city, as at the beginning of the festival they had done in Jerusalem. Judah and Benjamin—denote the southern kingdom. Ephraim and Manasseh—refer to the northern kingdom. This unsparing demolition of the monuments of idolatry would receive all encouragement from the king and public authorities of the former; and the force of the popular movement was sufficient to effect the same results among the tribes of Israel, whatever opposition the power of Hoshea or the invectives of some profane brethren might have made. Thus the reign of idolatry being completely overthrown, and the pure worship of God re-established throughout the land, the people returned every one to his own home, in the confident expectation that, through the Divine blessing, they would enjoy a happy future of national peace and prosperity. 2. Hezekiah appointed the courses of the priests, &c.—The king now turned his attention to provide for the orderly performance of the temple-worship—arranging the priests and Levites in their courses, assigning to every one his proper place and functions—and issuing edicts for the regular payment of those dues from which the revenues of the sanctuary were derived. To set a proper example to his subjects, his own proportion was announced in the first instance, for to the king it belonged, out of his privy purse, to defray the expenses of the altar, both stated and occasional (Numbers 28. 3, 4, 9, 11, 19); and in making this contribution from his own means, Hezekiah followed the course which David and Solomon had taken before him (see on ch. 8. 14; 1 Kings 9. 25). Afterwards he reappointed the people's dues to the temple; and from its being necessary to issue a royal mandate in reference to this matter, it appears that the sacred tribute had been either totally neglected or as the idolatrous princes were known to appropriate it to their own purposes, the people had in many cases refused or evaded the duty. But on the improved state of public feeling, Hezekiah's commandment was readily obeyed, and contributions of first-fruits and tithes were poured in with great liberality from all parts of Judah, as well as from Israel. The first-fruits, even of some articles of produce that were unfit for sacrifice (Leviticus 2, 11), such as honey (Marg. dates), were appropriated to the priests (Numbers 18, 12, 13; Deuteronomy 18, 4); the tithes (Leviticus 27, 31) were intended for the support of the whole Levitical tribe. (Numbers 18, 8, 20, 24.) 6. and laid them by heaps—The contributions began to be sent in shortly after the celebration of the passover, which had taken place in the middle of the second month. Some time would elapse before the king's order reached all parts of the kingdom. The wheat harvest occurred in the third month, so that the sheaves of that grain, being presented before any other, formed "the foundation," an under-layer in the corn stores of the temple, and the first-fruits of their land produce being successively sent in all the summer till the close of the fruit and vintage season, i. e., the seventh month, continued to raise heap upon heap. 9. Hezekiah questioned with the priests and the Levites concerning the heaps—The object of his inquiries was to ascertain whether the supplies afforded the prospect of a sufficient maintenance for the members of the sacred order. 10. Azaziah . . . answered . . . we have had enough—This is probably the person mentioned (ch. 26, 17), and his reply was to the following purport: There has been an abundant harvest, and a corresponding plenty in the incoming of first-fruits and tithes; the people have testified their gratitude to Him who has crowned the year with His goodness by their liberality towards His servants.

11-19. HEZEKIAH APPOINTS OFFICERS TO DISPOSE OF THE TITHES. 11. Hezekiah commanded to prepare chambers in the house of the Lord—storehouses, granaries, or cellars; either the old ones, which had been allowed through neglect to fall into decay, were to be repaired, or additional ones built. Private individuals brought their own first-fruits to the temple; but the tithes were levied by the Levites, who kept a faithful account of them in their several places of abode, and transmitted the allotted proportion to the priests. Officers were appointed to distribute equal rations to all in the cities of the priests who, from age or other reasons, could not repair to the temple. With the exception of children under three years of age—an exception made probably from their being considered unfit to receive solid food—lists were kept of the number and age of every male; of priests according to their fathers' house, and Levites from twenty years (see Numbers 4, 3; 28, 21; 1 Chronicles 23, 24). But, besides, provision was also made for their wives, daughters, and servants. 18. for in their set office they sanctified themselves—This is the reason assigned for providing for the wives and children out of the revenues of the sanctuary, that priests, withdrawing from those secular pursuits by which they might have maintained their households, devoted themselves entirely to the functions of the ministry.

20, 21. HIS SINCERITY OF HEART. 20. Hezekiah wrought that which was good and right—He displayed the qualities of a constitutional king, in restoring and upholding the ancient institutions of the kingdom, while his zealous and persevering efforts to promote the cause of true religion and the best interests of his subjects entitled him to be ranked with the most illustrious of his predecessors (2 Kings 18, 15).

CHAPTER XXXII.

Ver. 1-20. SENNACHERIB INVADES JUDAH. 1. After these things, and the establishment thereof—i. e., the restoration of the temple-worship. The precise date is given, 2 Kings 18, 13. Determined to recover the independence of his country, Hezekiah had determined to refuse to pay the tribute which his father had bound himself to pay to Assyria. Sennacherib . . . entered into Judah, and encamped against the fenced cities—The whole land was ravaged; the strong fortresses of Ashdod (Isalah 20, 1) and Lachish had fallen; the siege of Libnah had commenced, when the king of Judah, doubting his ability to resist, sent to acknowledge his fault, and offer terms of submission by paying the tribute. The commencement of this Assyrian war was disastrous to Hezekiah (2 Kings 18, 13). But the misfortunes of the early period of the war are here passed over, as the historian hastens to relate the remarkable deliverance which God wrought for his kingdom of Judah, 2-8. when Hezekiah saw that Sennacherib . . . was purposed to fight against Jerusalem—An account of the means taken to fortify Jerusalem against the threatened siege is given only in this passage. The polluting or filling up of wells, and the altering of the course of rivers, is an old practice that still obtains in the wars of the East. Hezekiah's plan was to cover the fountain-heads, so that they might not be discovered by the enemy, and to carry the water by subterranean channels or pipes into the city—a plan which, while it would secure a constant supply to the inhabitants, would distress the besiegers, as the country all round Jerusalem was very destitute of water. 4. So there was gathered much people . . . who stopped all the fountains, and the brook that ran through the midst of the land—"Where these various fountains were, we have now no positive means of ascertaining; though En-rogel, and the spring now called the Virgin's Fount, may well be numbered amongst them. Josephus mentions the existence of various fountains without the city, but does not mention any of them in this connection but Siloam. 'The brook,' however, is located with sufficient precision to enable us to trace it very definitely. We are told that 'it ran through the midst of the land.' Now a stream running through either the Kedron or Hinnom Valley, could, in no proper sense, be said to run 'through the midst of the land;' but one flowing through the true Gihon valley, and separating Akra and Zion from Bezetha, Moriah, and Ophel, as a stream once, doubtless, did, could, with peculiar propriety, be said to run through the midst of the land on which the (Holy) City was built. And that this is the correct meaning of the phrase is not only apparent from the force of circumstances, but is positively so declared in the Septuagint, where, moreover, it is called a 'river,' which, at least, implies a much larger stream than the Kedron, and comports well with the marginal reading, where it is said to 'overflow through the midst of the land.' Previous to the interference of man, there was, no doubt, a very copious stream that gushed forth in the upper portion of that shallow, basin-like concavity north of Damascus Gate, which is unquestionably the upper extremity of the Gihon valley, and pursuing its meandering course through this valley, entered the Tyropeon at its great southern curve, down which it flowed into the valley of the Kedron." [BARCLAY'S CITY OF THE GREAT KING.] 5, 6. he strengthened himself—he made a careful inspection of the city defences for the purpose of repairing breaches in the wall here, renewing the masonry there, raising projecting machines to the towers, and especially fortifying the lower portion of Zion, i. e., Millo, "(in) the original city of David." "In" is a supplement of our translators, and the text reads better without it, for it was not the whole city that was repaired, but only the lower portion of Zion, or the original "city of David." he . . . gathered them together . . . in the street—i. e., the large open space at the gate of Eastern cities, and having equipped his soldiers with a full suit of military accoutrements, he addressed them in an animating strain, dwelling on the motives they had to inspire courage and confidence of success, especially on their consciousness of the favour and helping power of God. 9-20. (See on 2 Kings 18, 17-25; also 19, 8-31.) 16. they cried with a loud voice . . . to the people of Jerusalem . . . on the wall—It appears that the wall on the west side of the city reached as far to the side of the uppermost pool of Gihon at that time as it does now, if not farther, and the wall was so close to that pool that those sent to negotiate with the Assyrian general answered him in their own tongue (see on 2 Kings 18, 27).

21-23. AN ANGEL DESTROYS THE ASSYRIANS. 21. an angel . . . cut off all the mighty men—(see on 2 Kings 19. 35-37).

24-26. HEZEKIAH'S SICKNESS AND RECOVERY. 24. In those days Hezekiah was sick to the death—(see on 2 Kings 20. 1-11).

27-33. HIS RICHES AND WORKS. he had exceeding much riches and honour—(cf. 2 Kings 20. 13; Isaiah 39. 2). A great portion of his personal wealth, like that of David and Uzziah, consisted in immense possessions of agricultural and pastoral produce. Besides, he had accumulated large treasures in gold, silver, and precious things, which he had taken as spoils from the Philistines, and which he had received as presents from neighbouring states, amongst which he was held in great honour as a king under the special protection of Heaven. Much of his great wealth he expended in improving his capital, erecting forts, and promoting the internal benefit of his kingdom. 30. stopped the . . . water-course of Gihon, and brought it . . . to the west side of the city, &c.—(cf. 2 Kings 20. 20). Particular notice is here taken of the aqueduct, as amongst the greatest of Hezekiah's works. "In exploring the subterranean channel conveying the water from Virgin's Fount to Siloam, I discovered a similar channel entering from the north, a few yards from its commencement; and on tracing it up near the Mugrabin gate, where it became so choked with rubbish that it could be traversed no farther, I there found it turn to the west in the direction of the south end of the cleft, or saddle, of Zion, and if this channel was not constructed for the purpose of conveying the waters of Hezekiah's aqueduct, I am unable to suggest any purpose to which it could have been applied. Perhaps the reason why it was not brought down on the Zion side, was that Zion was already well watered in its lower portion by the Great Pool, 'the lower pool of Gihon.' And accordingly Williams (HOLY CITY) renders this passage, 'He stopped the upper outflow of the waters of Gihon, and led them down westward to the city.' [BARCLAY'S CITY OF THE GREAT KING.] The construction of this aqueduct required not only masonic but engineering skill; for the passage was bored through a continuous mass of rock. Hezekiah's pool or reservoir made to receive the water within the north-west part of the city still remains. It is an oblong quadrangular tank, 240 feet in length, from 144 to 150 in breadth, but, from recent excavations, appears to have extended somewhat farther towards the north. 31. in the business of the ambassadors who sent . . . to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land, &c.—They brought a present (v. 23) (see on 2 Kings 20. 12, 13), and a letter of congratulation on his recovery, in which particular inquiries were made about the miracle of the sun's retrocession—a natural phenomenon that could not fail to excite great interest and curiosity at Babylon, where astronomy was so much studied. At the same time, there is reason to believe that they proposed a defensive league against the Assyrians. God left him, to try him, &c.—Hezekiah's offence was not so much in the display of his military stores and treasures, as in not giving to God the glory both of the miracle and of his recovery, and thus leading those heathen ambassadors to know Him.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Ver. 1-10. MANASSEH'S WICKED REIGN. 1, 2. Manasseh . . . did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord—(see on 2 Kings 21. 1-16.)

11-19. HE IS CARRIED UNTO BABYLON, WHERE HE HUMBLING HIMSELF BEFORE GOD, AND IS RESTORED TO HIS KINGDOM. 11. the captains of the host of the king of Assyria—This king was Esar-haddon, who, after having devoted the first years of his reign to the consolidation of his government at home, turned his attention to repair the loss of the tributary provinces west of the Euphrates, which, on the disaster and death of Sennacherib, had taken the opportunity of shaking off the Assyrian yoke, having overrun Palestine and removed the remnant that were left in the kingdom of Israel, he despatched his generals, the chief of whom was Tartan (Isaiah 20. 1), with a portion of his army for the reduction of Judah also. In a successful attack upon Jerusalem, they took multitudes of captives, and got a great prize, including the king himself, among the prisoners. took Manasseh among the thorns—This may mean, as is commonly supposed, that he had hid himself among a thicket of briars and brambles, and we know that the Hebrews sometimes took refuge from their enemies in thickets (1 Samuel 13. 6). But, instead of the Hebrew, Bacochim, "among the thorns," some versions read Bechayim, "among the living," and so the passage would be "took him alive." bound him with fetters, and carried him to Babylon—The Hebrew word rendered fetters denotes properly two chains of brass. The humiliating state in which Manasseh appeared before the Assyrian monarch may be judged of by a picture on a tablet in the Khorsabad palace, representing prisoners led bound into the king's presence. "The captives represented appear to be inhabitants of Palestine. Behind the prisoners stand four persons with inscriptions on the lower part of their tunics; the first two are bearded, and seem to be accusers; the remaining two are nearly defaced; but behind the last appears the eunuch, whose office it seems to be to usher into the presence of the king those who are permitted to appear before him. He is followed by another person of the same race as those under punishment; his hands are manacled, and on his ankles are strong rings fastened together by a heavy bar." [NINEVEH AND ITS PALACES.] No name is given, and, therefore, no conclusion can be drawn that the figure represents Manasseh; but the people appear to be Hebrews, and this pictorial scene will enable us to imagine the manner in which the royal captive from Judah was received in the court of Babylon. Esar-haddon had established his residence there, for though from the many revolts that followed the death of his father, he succeeded at first only to the throne of Assyria, yet having some time previous to his conquest of Judah, recovered possession of Babylon, this enterprising king had united under his sway the two empires of Babylon and Chaldea, and transferred the seat of his government to Babylon. 12, 13. when he was in affliction, he besought the Lord his God—In the solitude of exile or imprisonment, Manasseh had leisure for reflection. The calamities forced upon him a review of his past life, under a conviction that the miseries of his dethronement and captive condition were owing to his awful and unprecedented apostasy (v. 7) from the God of his fathers. He humbled himself, repented, and prayed for an opportunity of bringing forth the fruits of repentance. His prayer was heard; for his conqueror not only released him, but, after two years' exile, restored him, with honour and the full exercise of royal power, to a tributary and dependent kingdom. Some political motive, doubtless, prompted the Assyrian king to restore Manasseh, and that was most probably to have the kingdom of Judah as a barrier between Egypt and his Assyrian dominions. But God overruled this measure for higher purposes. Manasseh now showed himself, by the influence of sanctified affliction, a new and better man; for he made a complete reversal of his former policy, by not only destroying all the idolatrous statues and altars he had formerly erected in Jerusalem, but displaying the most ardent zeal in restoring and encouraging the worship of God. 14. he built a wall without the city . . . on the west side of Gihon . . . even to the entering in at the fish-gate—"The well-ascertained position of the fish-gate, shows that the valley of Gihon could be no other than that leading north-west of Damascus gate, and gently descending southward, uniting with the Tyropœon at the north-east corner of Mount Zion, where the latter turns at right angles and runs towards Siloam. The wall thus built by Manasseh on the west side of the valley of Gihon, would extend from the vicinity of the north-east corner of the wall of Zion in a northerly direction, until it crossed over the valley to form a junction with the outer wall at the trench of Antonia, precisely in the quarter where the temple would be most easily assailed." [BARCLAY.] 17. the people did sacrifice still in the high places, yet unto the Lord their God only—Here it appears that the worship on high places, though it originated in a great measure from the practice of heathenism, and too often led to it, did not necessarily imply idolatry.

20-25. HE DIES, AND AMON SUCCEEDS HIM. 20, 21. Manasseh slept with his fathers . . . Amon . . . began to reign—(see on 2 Kings 21. 17-26).

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Ver. 1, 2. JOSIAH'S GOOD REIGN. 1. Josiah was eight years old—(see on 2 Kings 22. 1, 2). The testimony borne to the undeviating steadfastness of his adherence to the cause of true religion places his character and reign in honourable contrast with those of many of his royal predecessors.

3-7. HE DESTROYS IDOLATRY. 3. In the eighth year of his reign—This was the sixteenth year of his age, and, as the kings of Judah were considered minors till they had completed their thirteenth year, it was three years after he had attained majority. He had very early manifested the piety and excellent dispositions of his character. In the twelfth year of his reign, but the twentieth of his age, he began to take a lively interest in the purgation of his kingdom from all the monuments of idolatry which, in his father's short reign, had been erected; and, at a later period, his increasing zeal for securing the purity of Divine worship led him to superintend the work of demolition in various parts of his dominions. The course of the narrative in this passage is somewhat different from that followed in the book of Kings. For the historian, having made allusion to the early manifestation of Josiah's zeal, goes on with a full detail of all the measures this good king adopted for the extirpation of idolatry, whereas the author of the book of Kings sets out with the cleansing of the temple, immediately previous to the celebration of the passover, and embraces that occasion to give a general description of Josiah's policy for freeing the land from idolatrous pollution. The exact chronological order is not followed either in Kings or Chronicles. But it is clearly recorded in both that the abolition of idolatry began in the twelfth and was completed in the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign. Notwithstanding Josiah's undoubted sincerity and zeal, and the people's apparent compliance with the king's orders, he could not extinguish a strongly-rooted attachment to idolatries introduced in the early part of Manasseh's reign. This latent predilection appears unmistakably developed in the subsequent reigns, and the Divine decree for the removal of Judah, as well as Israel, into captivity was irrevocably passed. 4. the graves of them that had sacrificed unto them. He treated the graves themselves as guilty of the crimes of those who were lying in them. [BERTHEAU.] 5. he burnt the bones of the priests upon their altars—a greater brand of infamy could not have been put on idolatrous priests than the disinterment of their bones, and a greater defilement could not have been done to the altars of idolatry than the burning upon them the bones of those who had there officiated in their lifetime. 6. with their mattocks—or "in their deserts"—so that the verse will stand thus: "And so did (viz., break the altars, and burn the bones of priests) he in the cities of Manasseh, and Ephraim, and Simeon, even unto Naphtali, in their deserted suburbs." The reader is apt to be surprised on finding that Josiah, whose hereditary possessions were confined to the kingdom of Judah, exercised as much authority among the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, Simeon, and others as far as Naphtali, as he did within his own dominions; and, therefore, it is necessary to observe that, after the destruction of Samaria, by Shalmaneser, the remnant that continued on the mountains of Israel maintained a close intercourse with Judah, and looked to the sovereigns of that kingdom as their natural protectors. Those kings acquired great influence over them, which Josiah exercised in removing every vestige of idolatry from the land. He could not have done this without the acquiescence of the people in the propriety of this proceeding, conscious that this was conformable to their ancient laws and institutions. The Assyrian kings, who were now masters of the country, might have been displeased at the liberties Josiah took beyond his own territories. But either they were not informed of his doings, or they did not trouble themselves about his religious proceedings, relating, as they would think, to the god of the land, especially as he did not attempt to seize upon any place or to disturb the allegiance of the people. [CALMET.]

8-18. HE REPAIRS THE TEMPLE. In the eighteenth year of his reign . . . he sent Shaphan—(see on 2 Kings 22. 3-9).

19-33. AND, CAUSING THE LAW TO BE READ, RENEWS THE COVENANT BETWEEN GOD AND THE PEOPLE. 19. when the king had heard the words of the law, &c.—(see on 2 Kings 22. 11-20; 23. 1-3).

CHAPTER XXXV.

Ver. 1-19. JOSIAH KEEPS A SOLEMN PASSOVER. 1. Moreover Josiah kept a passover—(see on 2 Kings 23. 21-23). The first nine verses give an account of the preparations made for the celebration of the solemn feast. The day appointed by the law was kept on this occasion (cf. ch. 30. 2, 13). The priests were ranged in their courses, and exhorted to be ready for their duties in the manner, that legal purity required (cf. ch. 29. 5). The Levites, the ministers or instructors of the people in all matters pertaining to the Divine worship, were commanded (v. 3) to "put the holy ark in the house which Solomon did build." Their duty was to transport the ark from place to place according to circumstances. Some think that it had been ignominiously put away from the sanctuary by order of some idolatrous king, probably Manasseh, who set a carved image in the house of God (ch. 33. 7), or Amon; while others are of opinion that it had been temporarily removed by Josiah himself into some adjoining chamber, during the repairs on the temple. In replacing it, the Levites had evidently carried it upon their shoulders, deeming that still to be the duty which the law imposed on them. But Josiah reminded them of the change of circumstances, when, as the service of God was now performed in a fixed and permanent temple, they were not required to be bearers of the ark any longer, and, being released from the service, they should address themselves with the greater alacrity to the discharge of other functions. 4. prepare yourselves by the houses of your fathers, after your courses—i. e., each course or division was to be composed of those who belonged to the same fathers' house. according to the writing of David and . . . Solomon. Their injunctions are recorded (ch. 8. 14; 1 Chronicles 23. ; 24. ; 25. ; 26). 5. stand in the holy place—in the court of the priests, the place where the victims were killed. The people were admitted according to their families in groups or companies of several households at a time. When the first company entered the court (which consisted commonly of as many as it could well hold), the gates were shut and the offering was made. The Levites stood in rows from the slaughtering-places to the altar, and handed the blood and fat from one to another of the officiating priests (ch. 30. 16-18). 6. So kill the passover, &c.—The design of the minute directions given here was to facilitate the distribution of the paschal lambs. These were to be eaten by the respective families according to their numbers (Exodus 12. 3). But multitudes of the people, especially those from Israel, having been reduced to poverty through the Assyrian devastations, were to be provided with the means of commemorating the passover; and, therefore, the king enjoined the Levites that when the paschal lambs were brought to them to be killed (7-9) they should take care to have every thing put in so orderly a train, that the lambs, after due presentation, might be easily delivered to the various families to be roasted and eaten by themselves apart. 7. Josiah gave to the people . . . lambs and kids—these were in all probability destined for the poor; a lamb or a kid might be used at convenience (Exodus 12. 5). and bullocks—which were offered after the lambs on each of the successive days of the feast. 8. his princes—They gave to the priests and Levites; as those of Hezekiah's princes (ch. 30. 24). They were ecclesiastical princes, viz., Hilkiah the high priest (ch. 34. 9), Zechariah, probably the second priest of the Eleazar (2 Kings 16. 18), and Jehiel of the Ithamar, line. And as the Levitical tribes were not yet sufficiently provided (v. 9), some of their eminent brethren who had been distinguished in Hezekiah's time (ch. 31. 12-15), gave a large additional contribution for the use of the Levites exclusively. 10. So the service was prepared, &c.—All the necessary preparations having been completed, and the appointed time arrived for the passover, the solemnity was celebrated. One remarkable feature in the account is the prominent part that was taken by the Levites in the preparation of the sacrifices, viz., the killing and stripping of the skins, which were properly the peculiar duties of the priests; but as those functionaries were not able to overtake the extraordinary amount of work, and the Levites had been duly sanctified for the service, they were enlisted for the time in this priestly employment. At the passover in Hezekiah's time, the Levites officiated in the same departments of duty, the reason assigned for that deviation from the established rule being the unprepared state of many of the people (ch. 30. 17). But on this occasion the whole people had been duly sanctified, and therefore the exceptional enlistment of the Levites' services must have been rendered unavoidably necessary from the multitudes engaged in celebrating the passover. 13. they removed the burnt offerings—Some of the small cattle being designed for burnt offerings were put apart by themselves, that they might not be intermingled with the paschal lambs, which were carefully selected according to certain rules, and intended to be sacramentally eaten; and the manner in which those burnt offerings were presented seems to have been the following: "All the subdivisions of the different fathers' houses came one after another to the altar in solemn procession to bring to the priests the portions which had been cut off, and the priests laid these pieces upon the fire of the altar of burnt offering." 13. they roasted the passover according to the ordinance—(see Exodus 12. 7-9). This mode of preparation was prescribed by the law exclusively for the paschal lamb, the other offerings and thank-offerings were cooked in pots, kettles and pans (1 Samuel 2. 14). divided them speedily among the people—The haste was either owing to the multiplicity of the priests' business, or because the heat and flavour of the viands would have been otherwise diminished. Hence it appears that the meal consisted not of the paschal lambs alone, but of the meat of the thank offerings—for part of the flesh fell to the portion of the offerer, who, being in this instance, the king and the princes, were by them made over to the people, who were recommended to eat them the day they were offered, though not absolutely forbidden to do so on the next (Leviticus 7. 15-18). 14. afterwards they made . . . for themselves and for the priests—The Levites rendered this aid to the priests solely from their being so engrossed the entire day that they had no leisure to provide any refreshments for themselves. 15. And the singers, &c., were in their place—While the priests and people were so much engaged, the choir were not idle. They had to sing certain psalms, viz., 113. to 118. inclusive, once, twice, and even a third time, during the continuance of each company of offerers. As they could not leave their posts, therefore, for the singing was resumed as every fresh company entered, the Levites prepared for them also; for the various bands relieved each other in turns, and while the general choir were doing duty, a portion of the tuneless brethren, relieved for a time, partook of the viands that were brought them. 18. there was no passover like to that kept in Israel from the days of Samuel—One feature by which this passover was distinguished was the liberality of Josiah. But what distinguished it above all preceding solemnities was, not the imposing grandeur of the ceremonies, nor the immensity of the assembled concourse of worshippers, for these, with the exception of a few from the kingdom of Israel, were confined to two tribes; but it was the ardent devotion of the king and people, the disregard of purely traditional customs, and the unusually strict adherence, even in the smallest minutiae, to the forms of observance prescribed in the book of the law, the discovery of an original copy of which had produced so great a sensation. Instead of "from the days of Samuel," the author of the book of Kings says, "from the days of the judges who judged Israel." The meaning is the same in both passages, for Samuel concluded the era of the judges. all Israel that were present—the great majority of the people of the northern kingdom were in exile, but some of the remaining inhabitants performed the journey to Jerusalem on this occasion. 37,600 paschal lambs and kids were used, which, at ten to a company, would make 376,000 persons attending the feast. 19. In the eighteenth year of the reign of Josiah was this passover kept—"It is said (2 Kings 22. 3) that Josiah sent Shaphan to Hilkiah in the eighth month of that year." If this statement rests upon an historical basis, all the events narrated here (from ch. 34. 8 to ch. 35. 19) must have happened in about the space of five months and a half. We should then have a proof that the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign was reckoned from the autumn (cf. ch. 29. 3). "The eighth month" of the sacred year in the eighteenth year of his reign, would be the second month of his eighteenth year, and the first month of the new year would be the seventh month. [BERTHEAU.]

20-27. HIS DEATH. 20. After all this, when Josiah had prepared the temple—he most probably calculated that the restoration of the Divine worship, with the revival of vital religion in the land, would lead, according to God's promise, and the uniform experience of the Hebrew people, to a period of settled peace and increased prosperity. His hopes were disappointed. The bright interval of tranquillity that followed his re-establishment of the true religion was brief. But it must be observed that this interruption did not proceed from any unfaithfulness in the Divine promise, but from the state into which the kingdom of Judah had brought itself by the national apostasy, which was drawing down upon it the long threatened but long deferred judgments of God. Necho king of Egypt came . . . to fight against Carchemish by Euphrates—Necho, son of Psammetichus, succeeded to the throne of Egypt in the twentieth year of Josiah. He was a bold and enterprising king, who entered with all his heart into the struggle which the two great powers of Egypt and Assyria had long carried on for the political ascendancy. Each, jealous of the aggressive movements of its rival, was desirous to maintain Palestine as a frontier barrier. After the overthrow of Israel, the kingdom of Judah became in that respect doubly important, and although the king and people had a strong bias for alliance with Egypt, yet from the time of Manasseh it had become a vassal of Assyria, and Josiah, true to his political no less than his religious engagements, thought himself bound to support the interests of his Assyrian liege-lord. Hence, when "Necho king of Egypt came up to fight against Carchemish, Josiah went out against him." Carchemish, on the eastern side of the Euphrates, was the key of Assyria on the west, and in going thither the king of Egypt would transport his troops by sea along the coast of Palestine, northwards. Josiah, as a faithful vassal, resolved to oppose Necho's march across the northern parts of that country. They met in the "valley of Megiddo," i. e., the valley or plain of Esdraelon. The Egyptian king had come either by water or through the plains of Philistia, keeping constantly along the coast, round the north-west corner of Carmel, and so to the great plain of Megiddo. This was not only his direct way to the Euphrates, but the only route fit for his chariots, while thereby also he left Judah and Jerusalem quite to his right. In this valley, however, the Egyptian army had necessarily to strike across the country, and it was on that occasion that Josiah could most conveniently intercept his passage. To avoid the difficulty of passing the river Kishou, Necho kept to the south of it, and must, therefore, have come past Megiddo. Josiah, in following with his chariots and horsemen from Jerusalem, had to march northwards along the highway through Samaria by Kefer-Kud (the ancient Capar-Cotla) to Megiddo. [VAN DE VELDE.] 21. But he sent ambassadors . . . What have I to do with thee, thou king of Judah?—Not wishing to spend time or strength in vain, Necho informed the king of Judah that he had no intention of molesting the Jews; that his expedition was directed solely against his old Assyrian enemy; and that he had undertaken it by an express commission from God. Commentators are not agreed whether it was really a Divine commission given him through Jeremiah, or whether he merely used the name of God as an authority that Josiah would not refuse to obey. As he could not know the truth of Necho's declaration, Josiah did not sin in opposing him, or, if he sinned at all, it was a sin of ignorance. The engagement took place. Josiah was mortally wounded. 24. took him out of that chariot, and put him in the second chariot—the carriage he had for ordinary use, and which would be more comfortable for the royal sufferer than the war-chariot. The death of this good king was the subject of universal and lasting regret. 25. Jeremiah lamented for Josiah, &c.—The elegy of the prophet has not reached us; but it seems to have been long preserved among his countrymen, and chaunted on certain public occasions by the professional singers, who probably got the dirges they sang from a collection of funeral odes composed on the death of good and great men of the nation. The spot in the valley of Megiddo where the battle was fought was near the town of Hadad-rimmon; hence the lamentation for the death of Josiah was called "the lamentation of Hadad-rimmon in the valley of Megiddo," which was so great and so long continued, that the lamentation of Hadad passed afterwards into a proverbial phrase to express any great and extraordinary sorrow (Zechariah 12. 11).

CHAPTER XXXVI.

VER. 1-4. JEHOAHAZ, SUCCEEDING, IS DEPOSED BY PHARAOH. 1. the people of the land took Jehoahaz—Immediately after Josiah's overthrow and death, the people raised to the throne Shallum (1 Chronicles 3. 15), afterwards called Jehoahaz, in preference to his elder brother Eliakim, from whom they expected little good. Jehoahaz is said (2 Kings 23. 30) to have received at Jerusalem the royal anointing—a ceremony not usually deemed necessary in circumstances of regular and undisputed succession. But, in the case of Jehoahaz, it seems to have been resorted to in order to impart greater validity to the act of popular election, and, it may be, to render it less likely to be disturbed by Necho, who, like all Egyptians, would associate the idea of sanctity with the regal anointing. He was the youngest son of Josiah, but the popular favourite, on account, probably, of his martial spirit (Ezekiel 19. 3) and determined opposition to the aggressive views of Egypt. At his accession the land was free from idolatry; but this prince, instead of following the footsteps of his excellent father, adopted the criminal policy of his apostatising predecessors, and through his influence, directly or indirectly used, idolatry rapidly increased (see on 2 Kings 23. 32). 2. he reigned three months in Jerusalem—His possession of sovereign power was of but very brief duration; for Necho determined to follow up the advantage he gained in Judah, and, deeming it expedient to have a king of his own nomination on the throne of that country, he deposed the popularly elected monarch, and placed his brother Eliakim or Jehoiakim on the throne, whom he anticipated to be a mere obsequious vassal. The course of events seems to have been this: on receiving intelligence after the battle of the accession of Jehoahaz to the throne, and perhaps also in consequence of the complaint which Ellakim brought before him in regard to this matter, Necho set out with a part of his forces to Jerusalem, while the remainder of his troops pursued their way at leisure towards Riblah, laid a tribute on the country, raised Eliakim (Jehoiakim) as his vassal to the throne, and on his departure brought Jehoahaz captive with him to Riblah. The old expositors mostly assumed that Necho, after the battle of Megiddo, marched directly against Carchemish, and then on his return came to Jerusalem. The improbability, indeed the impossibility, of his doing so appears from this: that Carchemish was from four hundred to five hundred miles from Megiddo, so that within "three months" an army could not possibly make its way thither, conquer the fenced city of Carchemish, and then march back a still greater distance to Jerusalem, and take that city. [KEIL.] an hundred talents of silver—£318 15s. and a talent of gold—£5475; total amount of tribute, £8893 15s. carried him (Jehoahaz) to Egypt—there he died (Jeremiah 22. 10-12).

5-8. JEHOIAKIM, REIGNING ILL, IS CARRIED INTO BABYLON. 5. Jehoiakim . . . did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord—i. e., he followed the course of his idolatrous predecessors, and the people, to a great extent, disinclined to the reforming policy of his father, eagerly availed themselves of the vicious license which his lax administration restored. His character is portrayed with a masterly hand in the prophecy of Jeremiah (ch. 22. 13-19). As the deputy of the king of Egypt, he departed further than his predecessor from the principles of Josiah's government; and, in trying to meet the insatiable cupidity of his master by grinding exactions from his subjects, he recklessly plunged into all evil. 6. Against him came up Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon—This refers to the first expedition of Nebuchadnezzar against Palestine, in the lifetime of his father Nabopolassar, who, being old and infirm, adopted his son as joint-sovereign, and despatched him, with the command of his army, against the Egyptian invaders of his empire. Nebuchadnezzar defeated them at Carchemish, and drove them out of Asia, and reduced all the provinces west of the Euphrates to obedience—among the rest the kingdom of Jehoiakim, who became a vassal of the Assyrian empire (2 Kings 24. 1). Jehoiakim at the end of three years threw off the yoke, being probably instigated to revolt by the solicitations of the king of Egypt, who planned a new expedition against Carchemish. But he was completely vanquished by the Babylonian king, who stripped him of all his possessions between the Euphrates and the Nile (2 Kings 24. 7). Then marching against the Egyptian's ally in Judah, he took Jerusalem, carried away a portion of the sacred vessels of the temple, perhaps in lieu of the unpaid tribute, and deposited them in the temple of his god, Belus, at Babylon (Daniel 1. 2; 5. 2). Though Jehoiakim had been taken prisoner, and it was designed at first to transport him in chains to Babylon, he was allowed to remain in his tributary kingdom. But having given not long after some new offence, Jerusalem was besieged by a host of Assyrian dependants—in a sally against whom Jehoiakim was killed (see on 2 Kings 24. 2-7; also Jeremiah 22. 18, 19; 36. 30). 9. Jehoiachin was eight years old—called also Jeconiah or Coniah (Jeremiah 22. 23)—"eight" should have been "eighteen," as appears from 2 Kings 24. 8, and also from the full development of his ungodly principles and habits (see Ezekiel 19. 5-7). His reign being of so short duration cannot be considered at variance with the prophetic denunciation against his father (Jeremiah 36. 30). But his appointment by the people gave umbrage to Nebuchadnezzar, who, "when the year was expired" (v. 10)—i. e., in the spring, when campaigns usually began—came in person against Jerusalem, captured the city, and sent Jehoiachin in chains to Babylon, removing at the same time all the nobles and most skillful artisans, pillaging all the remaining treasures both of the temple and palace (see on 2 Kings 24. 8-17).

11-21. ZEDEKIAH'S REIGN. 11. Zedekiah—Nebuchadnezzar appointed him. His name, originally Mattaniah, was, according to the custom of Oriental conquerors, changed into Zedekiah, and though the son of Josiah (1 Chronicles 3. 15; Jeremiah 1. 2, 3; 37. 1), he is called (v. 10) the brother of Jehoiachin, i. e., according to the latitude of Hebrew style in words expressing affinity, his relative or kinsman (see on 2 Kings 24, 13; 26, 1-21). 13. who had made him swear—Zedekiah received his crown on the express condition of taking a solemn oath of fealty to the king of Babylon (Ezekiel 17, 13), so that his revolt by joining in a league with Pharaoh-hophra, king of Egypt, involved the crime of perjury. His own pride and obdurate impiety, the incurable idolatry of the nation, and their reckless disregard of prophetic warnings, brought down on his already sadly reduced kingdom the long threatened judgments of God. Nebuchadnezzar, the executioner of the Divine vengeance, commenced a third siege of Jerusalem, which, after holding out for a year and a half, was taken in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, resulting in the burning of the temple, with, most probably, the ark, and in the overthrow of the kingdom of Judah (see on 2 Kings 25.; Ezekiel 12, 13; 17, 16). 21. until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths—The return of every seventh was to be held as a sabbatic year, a season of rest to all classes, even to the land itself, which was to be fallow. This Divine institution, however, was neglected—how soon and how long, appears from the prophecy of Moses (Leviticus 26, 34), and of Jeremiah in this passage (see also Marginal Reference), which told that for Divine retribution it was now to remain desolate seventy years. As the Assyrian conquerors usually colonized their conquered provinces, so remarkable a deviation in Palestine from their customary policy must be ascribed to the overruling providence of God.

EZRA.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-6. PROCLAMATION OF CYRUS FOR BUILDING THE TEMPLE. 1. in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia—The Persian empire, including Persia, Media, Babylonia, and Chaldea, with many smaller dependencies, was founded by Cyrus, B. C. 536. [HALES.] that the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled—(See Jeremiah 25, 12; 29, 10.) This reference is a parenthetic statement of the historian, and did not form part of the proclamation. 2. The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth—though this is in the Oriental style of hyperbole (see also Daniel 4, 1), it was literally true that the Persian empire was the greatest ruling power in the world at that time. he hath charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem—The phraseology of this proclamation, independently of the express testimony of Josephus, affords indisputable evidence that Cyrus had seen, probably through means of Daniel, his venerable prime minister and favourite, those prophecies in which, 200 years before he was born, his name, his victorious career, and the important services he should render to the Jews were distinctly foretold (Isaiah 44, 28; 46, 1-4). The existence of predictions so remarkable led him to acknowledge that all his kingdoms were gifts bestowed on him by "the Lord God of heaven," and prompted him to fulfil the duty which had been laid upon him long before his birth. This was the source and origin of the great favour he showed to the Jews. The proclamation, though issued "in the first year of Cyrus," did not take effect till the year following. 3. Who is there among you of all his people—the purport of the edict was to grant full permission to those Jewish exiles, in every part of his kingdom, who chose, to return to their own country, as well as to recommend those of their countrymen who remained to aid the poor and feeble on their way, and contribute liberally towards the rebuilding of the temple. 5, 6. Then rose up the chief of the fathers, &c.—The paternal and ecclesiastical chiefs of the later captivity, those of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, with some also from other tribes (1 Chronicles 9, 3), who retained their attachment to the pure worship of God, naturally took the lead in this movement, and their example was followed by all whose piety and patriotism were strong enough to brave the various discouragements attending the enterprise. They were liberally assisted by multitudes of their captive countrymen, who, born in Babylonia, or comfortably established in it by family connections or the possession of property, chose to remain. It seems that their Assyrian friends and neighbours, too, either from a favourable disposition toward the Jewish faith, or from imitation of the court policy, displayed hearty good-will and great liberality in aiding and promoting the views of the emigrants.

7-11. CYRUS RESTORES THE VESSELS. 7. Cyrus . . . brought forth the vessels of the house of the Lord—though it is said (2 Kings 24, 13) that these were cut in pieces, that would not be done to the large and magnificent vases, and, if they had been divided, the parts could be reunited. But it may be doubted whether the Hebrew word rendered cut in pieces, does not signify merely cut off, i. e., from further use in the temple. 11. All the vessels of gold and of silver were five thousand and four hundred—The vessels here specified amount only to the number of 2499. Hence it is probable that the larger vases only are mentioned, while the inventory of the whole, including great and small, came to the gross sum stated in the text. Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah—i. e., Zerubbabel, son of Salathiel (cf. ch. 3, 8; 5, 16). He was born in Babylon, and called by his family Zerubbabel, i. e., stranger or exile in Babylon. Sheshbazzar, signifying "fire-worshipper," was the name given him at court, as other names were given to Daniel and his friends. He was recognized among the exiles as hereditary prince of Judah. them of the captivity that were brought up from Babylon to Jerusalem—all the Jewish exiles did not embrace the privilege which the Persian king granted them. The great proportion, born in Babylon, preferred continuing in their comfortable homes to undertaking a distant, expensive, and hazardous journey to a desolate land. Nor did the returning exiles all go at once. The first band went with Zerubbabel, others afterwards with Ezra, and a large number with Nehemiah at a still later period.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-70. NUMBER OF THE PEOPLE THAT RETURNED. 1. children of the province—i. e., Judea (ch. 5, 8), so called as being now reduced from an illustrious, independent, and powerful kingdom to an obscure, servile, tributary province of the Persian empire. This name is applied by the sacred historian to intimate that the Jewish exiles, though now released from captivity and allowed to return into their own land, were still the subjects of Cyrus, inhabiting a province dependent upon Persia. came again unto Jerusalem and Judah, every one unto his city—either the city that had been occupied by his ancestors, or, as most parts of Judea were then either desolate or possessed by others, the city that was rebuilt and allotted to him now. 2. Which came with Zerubbabel—he was the chief or leader of the first band of returning exiles. The names of other influential persons who were associated in the conducting of the caravans are also mentioned, being extracted probably from the Persian archives, in which the register was preserved: conspicuous in the number are Jeshua, the high priest, and Nehemiah. 3. the children—this word, as used throughout this catalogue, means posterity or descendants. 4. children of Arah, seven hundred seventy and five—the number is stated in Nehemiah 7. to have been only 652. It is probable that all mentioned as belonging to this family repaired to the general place of rendezvous, or had enrolled their names at first as intending to go; but in the interval of preparation, some died, others were prevented by sickness or insurmountable obstacles, so that ultimately no more than 652 came to Jerusalem. 23. The men of Anathoth—it is pleasant to see so many of this Jewish town returning. It was a city of the Levites; but the people spured the prophetic warning, and called forth against themselves one of his severest predictions (Jeremiah 32. 27-35). This prophecy was fulfilled in the Assyrian conquest. Anathoth was laid and continued a heap of ruins. But the people having been brought during the captivity to a better state of mind, returned, and their city was rebuilt. 36-39. The priests—each of their families was ranged under its prince or head, like those of the other tribes. It will be remembered that the whole body was divided into twenty-four courses, one of which, in rotation, discharged the sacerdotal duties every week, and each division was called after the name of its first prince or chief. It appears from this passage, that only four of the courses of the priests returned from the Babylonish captivity; but these four courses were afterwards, as the families increased, divided into twenty-four, which were distinguished by the names of the original courses appointed by David. Hence we find the course of Abijah or Abia (1 Chronicles 24. 10) subsisting at the commencement of the Christian era (Luke 1. 5). 55. The children of Solomon's servants—either the strangers that monarch enlisted in the building of the temple, or those who lived in his palace, which was deemed a high honour. 61, 62. The children of Barzillai—he preferred that name to that of his own family, deeming it a greater distinction to be connected with so noble a family, than to be of the house of Levi. But by this worldly ambition he forfeited the dignity and advantages of the priesthood. 63. Tirshatha—a title borne by the Persian governors of Judea (see also Nehemiah 7. 65-70; 8. 9; 10. 1). It is derived from the Persic torsh, severe, and is equivalent to "your severity," "your awfulness." 64. the whole congregation together was forty-two thousand three hundred and threescore—this gross amount is 12,000 more than the particular numbers given in the catalogue, when added together, come to. Reckoning up the smaller numbers, we shall find that they amount to 29,818 in this chapter, and to 31,089 in the parallel chapter of Nehemiah. Ezra also mentions 494 persons omitted by Nehemiah, and Nehemiah mentions 1765 not noticed by Ezra. If, therefore, Ezra's surplus be added to the sum in Nehemiah, and Nehemiah's surplus to the number in Ezra, they will both become 31,583. Subtracting this from 42,360, there will be a deficiency of 10,777. These are omitted, because they did not belong to Judah and Benjamin, or to the priests, but to the other tribes. The servants and singers, male and female, are reckoned separately (v. 65), so that putting all these items together, the number of all who went with Zerubbabel amounted to 50,000, with 8000 beasts of burden. (ALTING, quoted DAVIDSON'S HERMENEUTICS.) 68. some of the chief of the fathers, when they came to the house of the Lord, offered freely for the house of God, &c.—The sight of a place hallowed by the most endearing and sacred associations, but now lying in desolation and ruins, made the well-springs of their piety and patriotism gush out afresh, and before taking any active measures for providing accommodation to themselves and their families, the chief among them raised a large sum by voluntary contributions towards the restoration of the temple. 69. drams of gold—rather darics, a Persian coin (see on 1 Chronicles 29. 7). priests' garments (cf. Nehemiah 7. 70). This—in the circumstances—was a very appropriate gift. In general, it may be remarked that presents of garments, or of any other usable commodities, however singular it may seem to us, is in unison with the established notions and customs of the East.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-13. THE ALTAR SET UP. 1. When the seventh month was come—the departure of the returning exiles from Babylon took place in spring, and for some time after their arrival they were occupied in the necessary work of rearing habitations to themselves amid the ruins of Jerusalem and its neighbourhood. This preliminary work being completed, they addressed themselves to rebuild the altar of burnt offering, and as the seventh month of the sacred year was at hand—corresponding to the latter end of our September—when the feast of tabernacles (Leviticus 23), fell to be observed, they resolved to celebrate that religious festival, just as if the temple had been fully restored. 2. Jeshua—was the grandson of Seraiah, the high priest, put to death by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (2 Kings 25. 18-21). His father, Josedech, had been carried captive to Babylon, and died there, some time before this. Zerubbabel—was, according to the order of nature, son of Pedalah (1 Chronicles 3. 17-19), but having been brought up by Salathiel, was called his son. built the altar of the God of Israel, to offer burnt offerings thereon—This was of urgent and immediate necessity, in order, first, to make atonement for their sins; secondly, to obtain the Divine blessing on their preparations for the temple, as well as animate their feelings of piety and patriotism for the prosecution of that national work. 3. they set the altar upon his bases—i. e., they reared it upon its old foundation, so that it occupied as nearly as possible the site on which it had formerly stood. they offered burnt offerings . . . morning and evening—Deeming it their duty to perform the public rites of religion, they did not wait till the temple should be rebuilt and dedicated; but, at the outset, resumed the daily service prescribed by the law (Exodus 29. 38, 39; Leviticus 6. 9, 11), as well as observed the annual seasons of solemn observance.

4-7. OFFERINGS RENEWED. 4. They kept also the feast of tabernacles . . . From the first day of the seventh month—They revived at that time the daily oblation, and it was on the fifteenth day of that month the feast of tabernacles was held. 7. They gave . . . meat . . . drink, and oil, unto them of Zidon—they opened negotiations with the Tyrians for workmen, as well as for timber, on the same terms and with the same views as Solomon had done (1 Kings 5. 11; 2 Chronicles 2. 15, 16).

8-13. THE FOUNDATION OF THE TEMPLE LAID. 8. appointed the Levites . . . to set forward the work—i. e., to act as overseers of the workmen, and to direct and animate the labourers in the various departments. 9. Jeshua with his sons—not the high priest, but a Levite (ch. 2. 40). To these, as probably distinguished for their mechanical skill and taste, the duty of acting as overseers was particularly committed. 12. But many of the priests and Levites, and chief of the fathers . . . wept with a loud voice—Those painful emotions were excited by the sad contrast between the prosperous circumstances in which the foundations of the first temple had been laid, and the desolate, reduced state of the country and city when the second was begun; between the inferior size and costliness of the stones used in the foundations of the second (1 Kings 7. 9, 10), and the much smaller extent of the foundation itself, including all the appurtenances of the building (Haggai 2. 3); between the comparative smallness of their present means and the immense resources of David and Solomon. Perhaps, however, the chief cause of grief was, that the second temple would be destitute of those things which formed the great and distinguishing glory of the first, viz., the ark, the shechinah, the Urin and Thummim, &c. Not that this second temple was not a very grand and beautiful structure. But how great soever its material splendour, it was inferior in this respect to that of Solomon. Yet the glory of the second far outshone that of the first temple in another and more important point of view, viz., the receiving within its walls the incarnate Saviour (Haggai 2. 9). 13. the people could not discern the shout of joy from the noise of the weeping—Among Eastern people, expressions of sorrow are always very loud and vehement. It is indicated by wailing, the howl of which is sometimes not easily distinguishable from joyful acclamations.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-6. THE BUILDING HINDERED. 1. the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin—i. e., strangers settled in the land of Israel. 2. we seek your God, as ye do; and we do sacrifice unto him since the days of Esarhaddon . . . which brought us up hither—A very interesting explanation of this passage has been recently obtained from the Assyrian sculptures. On a large cylinder, deposited in the British Museum, there is inscribed a long and perfect copy of the annals of Esarhaddon, in which the details are given of a large deportation of Israelites from Palestine, and a consequent settlement of Babylonian colonists in their place. It is a striking confirmation of the statement made in this passage. Those Assyrian settlers intermarried with the remnant of Israelite women, and their descendants, a mongrel race, went under the name of Samaritans. Though originally idolaters, they were instructed in the knowledge of God, so that they could say, "We seek your God;" but they served Him in a superstitious way of their own (see on 2 Kings 17. 26-34, 41). 3. But Zerubbabel and Jeshua . . . said . . . Ye have nothing to do with us to build an house unto our God—This refusal to co-operate with the Samaritans, from whatever motives it sprang, was overruled by Providence to ultimate good; for, had the two peoples worked together, familiar acquaintanceship and intermarriage would have ensued, and the result might have been a relapse of the Jews into idolatry, and most certainly, confusion and obscurity in the genealogical evidence that proved the descent of the Messiah; whereas, in their hostile and separate condition, they were jealous observers of each other's proceedings, watching with mutual care over the preservation and integrity of the sacred books, guarding the purity and honour of the Mosiac worship, and thus contributing to the maintenance of religious knowledge and truth. 4. Then the people of the land weakened the hands of the people of Judah, &c.—Exasperated by this repulse, the Samaritans endeavoured by every means to molest the workmen as well as obstruct the progress of the building; and, though they could not alter the decree which Cyrus had issued regarding it, yet by bribes and clandestine arts indefatigably plied at court, they laboured to frustrate the effects of the edict. Their success in those underhand dealings was great, for Cyrus, being frequently absent, and much absorbed in his warlike expeditions, left the government in the hands of his son Cambyses, a wicked prince, and extremely hostile to the Jews and their religion. The same arts were assiduously practised during the reign of his successor, Smerdis, down to the time of Darius Hystaspes. In consequence of the difficulties and obstacles thus interposed, for a period of twenty years, the progress of the work was very slow. 6. in the reign of Ahasuerus, in the beginning of his reign, wrote they . . . an accusation—Ahasuerus was a regal title, and the king referred to was successor of Darius, the famous Xerxes.

7-21. LETTER TO ARTAXERXES. 7. in the days of Ahasuerus wrote Bishlam, &c.—The three officers named are supposed to have been deputy-governors appointed by the king of Persia over all the provinces subject to his empire west of the Euphrates. the Syrian tongue—or Aramaean language, called sometimes in our version Chaldee. This was made use of by the Persians in their decrees and communications relative to the Jews (cf. 2 Kings 18. 26; Isaiah 36. 11). The object of their letter was to press upon the royal notice the inexpediency and danger of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem. They laboured hard to prejudice the king's mind against that measure. 12. the Jews which came up from thee to us —The name "Jews" was generally used after the return from the captivity, because the returning exiles belonged chiefly to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and although the edict of Cyrus permitted all who chose to return, a permission of which some of the Israelites availed themselves, the great body who went to settle in Judea were the men of Judah. 13. toll, tribute, and custom—the first was a poll-tax; the second was a property-tax; the third the excise-ducs on articles of trade and merchandise. Their letter, and the edict that followed, commanding an immediate cessation of the work at the city walls, form the exclusive subject of narrative from v. 7 to v. 23. And now from this digression he returns at v. 24 to resume the thread of his narrative concerning the building of the temple. 9. the Dnaites—The people named were the colonists sent by the Babylonian monarch to occupy the territory of the ten tribes. "The great and noble Asnapper" was Esar-haddon. Immediately after the murder of Sennacherib, the Babylonians, Medes, Armenians, and other tributary people seized the opportunity of throwing off the Assyrian yoke. But Esar-haddon having, in the thirtieth year of his reign, recovered Babylon, and subdued the other rebellious dependants, transported numbers of them into the waste cities of Samaria, most probably as a punishment of their revolt. [HALES.] 14. we have maintenance from the king's palace—lit., we are salted with the king's salt. "Eating a prince's salt" is an Oriental phrase, equivalent to "receiving maintenance from him." 24. Then ceased the work of the house of God—It was this occurrence that first gave rise to the strong religious antipathy between the Jews and the Samaritans, which was afterwards greatly aggravated by the erection of a rival temple on Mount Gerizim.

CHAPTER V.

VER. 1-17. ZERUBBABEL AND JESHUA SET FORWARD THE BUILDING OF THE TEMPLE IN THE REIGN OF DARIUS 1. Then the prophets . . . prophesied . . . in the name of the God of Israel—From the recorded writings of Haggai and Zechariah, it appears that the difficulties experienced, and the many obstacles thrown in the way, had first cooled the zeal of the Jews in the building of the temple, and then led to an abandonment of the work, under a pretended belief that the time for rebuilding it had not yet come (Haggai 1. 2-11). For fifteen years the work was completely suspended. These two prophets upbraided them with severe reproaches for their sloth, negligence, and worldly selfishness (Haggai 1. 4), threatened them with severe judgments if they continued backward, and promised that they would be blessed with great national prosperity if they resumed and prosecuted the work with alacrity and vigour. Zechariah, the son of Iddo—i. e., grandson (Zechariah 1. 1). 2. Then rose up Zerubbabel . . . and Jeshua . . . and began to build the house of God—The strong appeals and animating exhortations of these prophets gave a new impulse to the building of the temple. It was in the second year of the reign of Darius Hystaspes that the work, after a long interruption, was resumed. 3, 4. at the same time came to them Tatnai, governor on this side the river—The Persian empire west of the Euphrates included at this time Syria, Arabia, Egypt, Phœnicia, and other provinces subject to Darius. The empire was divided into twenty provinces, called satrapies. Syria formed one satrapy, inclusive of Palestine, Phœnicia, and Cyprus, and furnished an annual revenue of 350 talents. It was presided over by a satrap or viceroy, who at this time resided at Damascus, and though superior to the native governors of the Jews appointed by the Persian king, never interfered with their internal government, except when there was a threatened disturbance of order and tranquillity. Tatnai, the governor (whether this was a personal name or an official title is unknown), had probably been incited by the complaints and turbulent outrages of the Samaritans against the Jews; but he suspended his judgment, and he prudently resolved to repair to Jerusalem, that he might ascertain the real state of matters by personal inspection and inquiry, in company with another dignified officer and his provincial council. 5. But the eye of their God was upon the elders of the Jews, &c.—The unusual presence, the imposing suite, the authoritative inquiries of the satrap appeared formidable, and might have produced a paralyzing influence or led to disastrous consequences, if he had been a partial and corrupt judge, or actuated by unfriendly feelings towards the Jewish cause. The historian, therefore, with characteristic piety, throws in this parenthetical verse to intimate that God averted the threatening cloud and procured favour for the elders or leaders of the Jews, that they were not interrupted in their proceedings till communications with the court should be made and received. Not a word was uttered to dispirit the Jews or afford cause of triumph to their opponents. Matters were to go on till contrary orders arrived from Babylon. After surveying the work in progress, he inquired, first, by what authority this national temple was undertaken; and, secondly, the names of the principal promoters and directors of the undertaking. To these two heads of inquiry the Jews returned ready and distinct replies. Then having learned that it originated in a decree of Cyrus, who had not only released the Jewish exiles from captivity, and permitted them to return to their own land for the express purpose of rebuilding the house of God, but, by an act of royal grace, had restored to them the sacred vessels which Nebuchadnezzar had carried off as trophies from the former temple, Tatnai transmitted all this information in an official report to his imperial master, accompanying it with a recommendatory suggestion that search should be made among the national archives at Babylon for the original decree of Cyrus, that the truth of the Jews' statement might be verified. The whole conduct of Tatnai, as well as the general tone of his despatch, is marked by a sound discretion and prudent moderation, free from any party bias, and evincing a desire only to do his duty. In all respects he appears in favourable contrast with his predecessor, Rehun (ch. 4.9). 8. the house of the great God, which is builded with great stones—lit., "stones of rolling"—i. e., stones of such extraordinary size that they could not be carried—they had to be rolled or dragged along the ground. 13. Cyrus the king . . . made a decree—The Jews were perfectly warranted according to the principles of the Persian government to proceed with the building in virtue of Cyrus' edict. For everywhere a public decree is considered as remaining in force until it is revoked; but the "laws of the Medes and Persians changed not." 16. Then came . . . Sheshbazzar . . . since that time even until now hath it been in building—This was not a part of the Jews' answer—they could not have said this, knowing the building had long ceased. But Tatnai used these expressions in his report, either looking on the stoppage as a temporary interruption, or supposing that the Jews were always working a little, as they had means and opportunities.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-12. DARIUS' DECREE FOR ADVANCING THE BUILDING. 1. Darius the king—This was Darius Hystaspes. Great and interesting light has been thrown on the history of this monarch and the transactions of his reign, by the decipherment of the cuneatic inscriptions on the rocks at Behistun. in the house of the rolls, where the treasures were laid up in Babylon—An idea of the form of this Babylonian register house, as well as the manner of preserving public records within its repositories, can be obtained from the recent discoveries at Nineveh. Two small chambers were discovered in the palace of Koyunjik, which, from the fragments found in them, Mr. Layard considers "as a house of the rolls." After reminding his readers that the historical records and public documents of the Assyrians were kept on tablets and cylinders of baked clay, many specimens of which have been brought to this country, he goes on to say, "The chambers I am describing appear to have been a depository in the palace of Nineveh for such documents. To the height of a foot or more from the floor they were entirely filled with them; some entire, but the greater part broken into many fragments, probably by the falling in of the upper part of the building. They were of different sizes; the largest tablets were flat, and measured about 9 inches by $6\frac{1}{2}$ inches; the smaller were slightly convex, and some were not more than an inch long, with but one or two lines of writing. The cuneiform characters on most of them were singularly sharp and well defined, but so minute in some instances as to be almost illegible without a magnifying glass. These documents appear to be of various kinds. The documents that have thus been discovered 'in the house of rolls' at Nineveh probably exceed all that have yet been afforded by the monuments of Egypt, and when the innumerable fragments are put together and transcribed, the publication of these records will be of the greatest importance to the history of the ancient world.' [NINEVEH and BABYLON.] 2. Achmetha—Long supposed to be the capital of Greater Media—the Ecbatana of classical, the Hamadan of modern times, at the foot of the Elwund range of hills, where, for its coolness and salubrity, Cyrus and his successors on the Persian throne established their summer residence. There was another city, however, of this name, the Ecbatana of Atropatene, and the most ancient capital of northern Media, and recently identified by Colonel Rawlinson in the remarkable ruins of Takht-i-Soleiman. Yet as everything tends to show the attachment of Cyrus to his native city, the Atropatenean Ecbatana, rather than to the stronger capital of Greater Media, Colonel Rawlinson is inclined to think that he deposited there, in his war or fortress, the famous decree relating to the Jews, along with the other records and treasures of his empire. [NINEVEH and PERSEPOLIS.] 8-10. of the king's goods, even of the tribute beyond the river . . . expenses be given them—The decree granted them the privilege of drawing from his provincial treasury of Syria, to the amount of whatever they required for the furthering of the work and providing sacrifice for the service of the temple, that the priests might daily pray for the health of the king and the prosperity of the empire. 11. whosoever shall alter this word—The warning was specially directed against the turbulent and fanatical Samaritans. The extremely favourable purport of this edict was no doubt owing in some measure to the influence of Cyrus, of whom Darius entertained a high admiration, and whose two daughters he had married. But it proceeded still more from the deep impressions made even on the idolatrous people of that country and that age, as to the being and providence of the God of Israel.

13-15. THE TEMPLE FINISHED. 13. Then Tatnai . . . did speedily—A concurrence of favourable events is mentioned as accelerating the restoration of the temple, and infusing a new spirit and energy into the workmen, who now laboured with unabating assiduity till it was brought to a completion. Its foundation was laid in April, 536 B. C. (ch. 3. 8-10), and it was completed on 21st February, 515 B. C., being 21 years after it was begun. [LIGHTFOOT.]

16-18. FEASTS OF THE DEDICATION. 16. the children of Israel . . . kept the dedication . . . with joy—The ceremonial was gone through with demonstrations of the liveliest joy. The aged who had wept at the laying of the foundation were most, if not all of them, now dead; and all rejoiced at the completion of this national undertaking. 17. twelve he-goats—as at the dedication of the tabernacle (Numbers 8. 17). 18. they set the priests in their divisions, and the Levites in their courses . . . as it is written in the book of Moses—Although David arranged the priests and Levites in courses according to their families, it was Moses who assigned to the priests and Levites their rights and privileges, their stations and several duties.

19-22. AND OF THE PASSOVER. 21. all such as had separated themselves . . . from the filthiness of the heathen—i. e., who had given satisfactory evidence of being true proselytes but not only renouncing the impure worship of idolatry, but by undergoing the rite of circumcision, a condition indispensable to a participation of the passer. 22. kept the feast . . . with joy : for the Lord . . . turned the heart of the king of Assyria unto them—i. e., king of the Persian empire, which now included the possessions, and had surpassed the glory, of Assyria. The favourable disposition which Darius had evinced towards the Jews secured them peace and prosperity, and the privileges of their own religion during the rest of his reign. The religious joy that so remarkably characterized the celebration of this feast, was testified by expressions of lively gratitude to God, whose overruling power and converting grace had produced so marvellous a change on the hearts of the mighty potentates, and disposed them, heathens though they were, to aid the cause and provide for the worship of the true God.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-10. EZRA GOES UP TO JERUSALEM. 1. in the reign of Artaxerxes—the Ahasuerus of Esther. Ezra the son of Seraiah—i. e., grandson or great-grandson. Seraiah was the high priest put to death by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (2 Kings 25. 18). A period of 130 years had elapsed between that catastrophe and the journey of Ezra to Jerusalem, and as a grandson of Seraiah, viz., Jeshua, who held the office of high priest, had accompanied Zerubbabel in the first caravan of returning exiles, Ezra must have been in all probability a grandson, descended, too, from a younger son, the elder branch being in possession of the pontificate. 6. This Ezra . . . was a ready scribe in the law of Moses—The term "scribe" does not mean a penman, nor even an attorney well versant in forms of law, and skilled in the method of preparing public or private deeds. He was a rabbi, or doctor, learned in the Mosaic law, and in all that related to the civil and ecclesiastical polity and customs of the Hebrew people. Scribes of this description possessed great authority and influence (cf. Matthew 23. 25; Mark 12. 28). the king granted him all his request—He left Babylon entrusted with an important commission to be executed in Jerusalem. The manner in which he obtained this office is minutely related in a subsequent passage. Here it is noticed, but with a pious acknowledgment of the Divine grace and goodness which disposed the royal mind in favour of Ezra's patriotic objects. The Levites, &c., did not go at that time, and are mentioned here by anticipation. 8. he came to Jerusalem in the fifth month—i. e., corresponding to the end of our July or beginning of our August. As he left Babylon on New Year's Day (v. 9), the journey must have occupied not less than four months—a long period—but it was necessary to move at a slow pace, and by short, easy stages, as he had to conduct a large caravan of poor people, including women, children, and all their household gear (see on ch. 8). 10. Ezra had prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, &c.—His reigning desire had been to study the Divine law—its principles, institutions, privileges, and requirements; and now from love and zeal, he devoted himself, as the business of his life, to the work of instructing, reforming, and edifying others.

11-26. GRACIOUS COMMISSION OF ARTAXERXES. 11. this is the copy of the letter that the King Artaxerxes gave—The measure which this document authorized, and the remarkable interest in the Jews displayed in it, were most probably owing to the influence of Esther, who is thought to have been raised to the high position of queen a few months previous to the departure of Ezra. [HALES.] According to others, who adopt a different chronology, it was more probably pressed upon the attention of the Persian court by Ezra, who, like Daniel, showed the prophecies to the king; or by some leading Jews on his accession, who, seeing the unsettled and disordered state of the colony after the death of Zerubbabel, Jeshua, Haggai, and Zechariah, recommended the appointment of a commission to reform abuses, suppress disorder, and enforce the observance of the law. 12. Artaxerxes, king of kings—That title might have been assumed as, with literal truth, applicable to him, since many of the tributary princes of his empire still retained the name and authority of kings. But it was as probably a mere Orientalism, denoting a great and powerful prince, as the heaven of heavens signified the highest heaven, and vanity of vanities, the greatest vanity. This vainglorious title was assumed by the kings of Assyria, from whom it passed to the sovereigns of Persia. unto Ezra the priest, a scribe of the law of the God of heaven—The appointment of Ezra to this influential mission was of the highest importance to the Hebrew people, as a large proportion of them were become, in a great measure, strangers both to the language and the institutions of their forefathers. 14. sent of the king, and of his seven counsellors—This was the fixed number of the privy council of the kings of Persia (Esther 1. 10, 14). The document describes, with great clearness and precision, the nature of Ezra's commission and the extent of power and prerogatives with which he was invested. It gave him authority, in the first place, to organize the colony in Judea, and institute a regular government, according to the laws of the Hebrew people, and by magistrates and rulers of their own nation (v. 25, 26), with power to punish offenders by fines, imprisonment, exile, or death, according to the degree of their criminality. Secondly, he was empowered to carry a large donation in money, partly from the royal treasury, and partly raised by voluntary contributions among his countrymen to create a fund out of which to make suitable provision for maintaining the regular worship of God in Jerusalem (v. 16, 17). Thirdly, the Persian officers in Syria were commanded to afford him every assistance by gifts of money within a certain specified limit, in carrying out the objects of his patriotic mission (v. 21). 22. an hundred talents of silver—£22,000, according to the rate of the silver talent of Babylon. Fourthly, Artaxerxes gave his royal sanction in establishment of the Divine law, which exempted priests and Levites from taxation or tribute, and confirmed to them the exclusive right to officiate in the sacred services of the sanctuary. And, finally, in the expression of the king's desire for the Divine blessing upon the king and his government (v. 23), we see the strong persuasion which pervaded the Persian court, and had been produced by the captivity of the Hebrew people, as to the being and directing providence of the God they worshipped. It will be observed, however, that the commission related exclusively to the rebuilding of the temple—not of the walls. The Samaritans (ch. 4. 20-22) had succeeded in alarming the Persian court by their representations of the danger to the empire of fortifying a city notorious for the turbulent character of its inhabitants and the prowess of its kings.

27, 23. EZRA BLESSES GOD FOR THIS FAVOUR. 27. Blessed be the Lord God of our fathers—This devout thanksgiving is in unison with the whole character of Ezra, who discerns the hand of God in every event, and is always ready to express a pious acknowledgment for the Divine goodness.

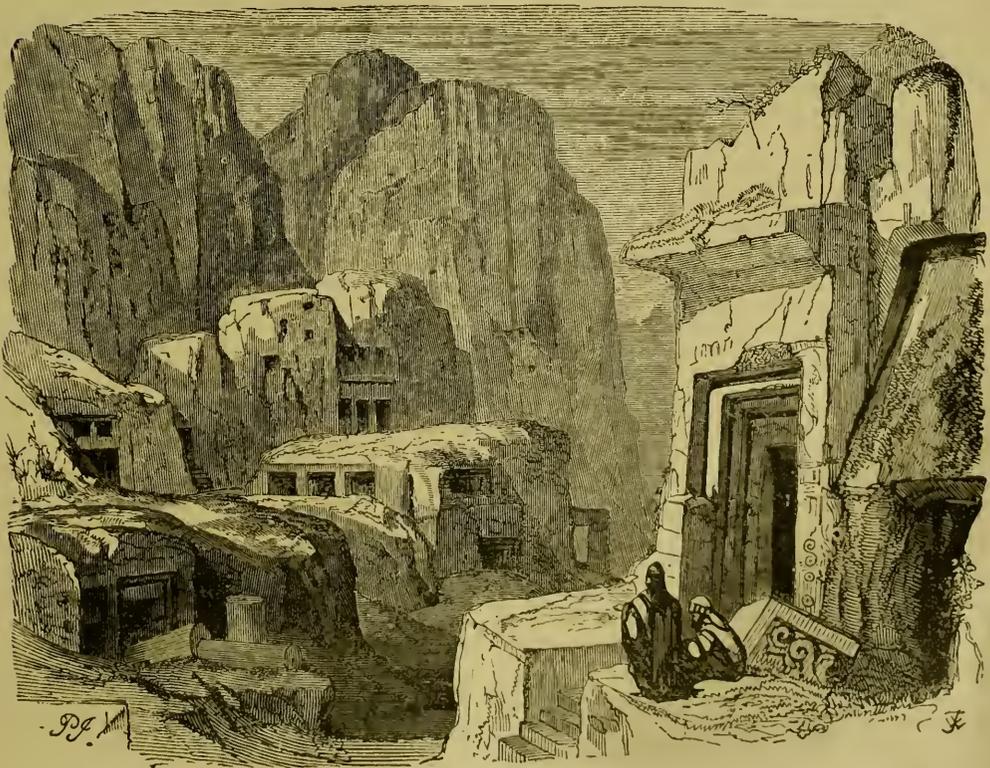

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-14. EZRA'S COMPANIONS FROM BABYLON. 1. this is the genealogy of them that went up with me from Babylon—The number given here amounts to 1754. But this is the register of adult males only, and as there were women and children also (v. 21) the whole caravan may be considered as comprising between 6000 and 7000.

15-20. HE SENDS TO IDDO FOR MINISTERS FOR THE TEMPLE SERVICE. 15. I gathered them together to the river that runneth to Ahava—This river has not been ascertained. The probability is, that the Ahava was one of the streams or numerous canals of Mesopotamia communicating with the Euphrates. [CYCLOPEDIA OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE.] But it was certainly in Babylonia on the banks of that stream; and perhaps in the neighbourhood of a town of the same name was the place appointed for general rendezvous. The emigrants encamped there for three days, according to Oriental custom, while the preparations for the departure were being completed, and Ezra was arranging the order of the caravan. I . . . found there none of the sons of Levi—i. e., the ordinary Levites. Notwithstanding the privilege of exemption from all taxes granted to persons engaged in the temple service, none of the Levitical tribes were induced to join the settlement in Jerusalem; and it was even not without difficulty Ezra persuaded some of the priestly families to accompany him. 16, 17, then sent I for Eliezer . . . with commandment unto Iddo the chief—Ezra sent this deputation, either by virtue of authority which by his priestly character he had over the Levites, or of the royal commission with which he was invested. The deputation were despatched to Iddo, who was a prince or chief of the Nethinims—for the Persian government allowed the Hebrews during their exile to retain their ecclesiastical government by their own chiefs, as well as to enjoy the privilege of free worship. Iddo's influence procured and brought to the camp at Ahava thirty-eight Levites, and 220 Nethinims, the descendants of the Gibeonites, who performed the servile duties of the temple.

21-36. A FAST PROCLAIMED. 21. Then I proclaimed a fast there—The dangers to travelling caravans from the Bedouin Arabs that prowl through the desert were in ancient times as great as they still are; and it seems that travellers usually sought the protection of a military escort. But Ezra had spoken so much to the king of the sufficiency of the Divine care of his people that he would have blushed to apply for a guard of soldiers; and therefore he resolved that his followers should, by a solemn act of fasting and prayer, commit themselves to the Keeper of Israel. Their faith, considering the many and constant perils of a journey across the Bedouin regions, must have been great, and it was rewarded by the enjoyment of perfect safety during the whole way. 24-32. Then I separated twelve of the chief of the priests . . . and weighed unto them the silver, &c.—The custody of the contributions and of the sacred vessels was, during the journey, committed to twelve of the chief priests, who, with the assistance of ten of their brethren, were to watch closely over them by the way, and deliver them into the house of the Lord in Jerusalem. The treasures in silver and gold, according to the value of the Babylonian talent, amounted to about £515,000 sterling. 27. two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold—Almost all commentators agree in maintaining that the vessels referred to were not made of copper, but of an alloy capable of taking on a bright polish, which we think highly probable, as copper was then in common use amongst the Babylonians, and would not be as precious as gold. This alloy, much esteemed amongst the Jews, was composed of gold and other metals, which took on a high polish and was not subject to tarnish. [NOYES.] 31. we departed from the river of Ahava on the twelfth day of the first month—Computing from the time of their setting out to the period of their arrival, they occupied about four months on the way. Their health and security were marvellous during so long a journey. The pilgrim-caravans of the present day perform long journeys through the wildest deserts of the East under the protection of a firman from the Porte, and an escort of soldiers. But for a large body, composed as that of Ezra—of some thousands of men, women, and children, unaccustomed to travel, undisciplined to order, and without military strength, and with so large an amount of treasure tempting the cupidty of the marauding, plundering tribes of the desert—to accomplish a journey so long and so arduous in perfect safety, is one of the most astonishing events recorded in history. Nothing but the vigilant care of a superintending Providence could have brought them securely to their destination. 33. Now, on the fourth day was the silver . . . weighed in the house of our God—Devoted the first three days after their arrival in Jerusalem to repose; on the next, the treasures were weighed and handed over to the custody of the officiating priests of the temple. The returned exiles offered burnt offerings, and Ezra delivered the royal commission to the satraps and inferior magistrates; while the Levitical portion of them lent all the assistance they could in performing the additional work which the arrival of so many new worshippers occasioned,

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-4. EZRA MOURNS FOR THE AFFINITY OF THE PEOPLE WITH STRANGERS. 1. Now when these things were done—The first days after Ezra's arrival in Jerusalem were occupied in executing the different trusts committed to him. The nature and design of the office with which the royal authority had invested him was publicly made known to his own people by the formal delivery of the contribution and the sacred vessels brought from Babylon to the priests to be deposited in the temple. Then his credentials were privately presented to the provincial governors; and by this prudent, orderly proceeding he put himself in the best position to avail himself of all the advantages guaranteed him by the king. On a superficial view everything contributed to gratify his patriotic feelings in the apparently flourishing state of the church and country. But a further acquaintance discovered the existence of great corruptions, which demanded immediate correction; and one was particularly brought under his notice as being the source and origin of all others, viz., a serious abuse that was practised respecting the law of marriage. the princes came to me, saying—The information they lodged with him was to the effect that numbers of the people, in violation of the Divine law (Deuteronomy 7, 2, 3), had contracted marriages with Gentile women, and that the guilt of the disorderly practice, far from being confined to the lower classes, was shared in by several of the priests and Levites, as well as of the leading men in the country. This great irregularity would inevitably bring many evils in its train; it would encourage and increase idolatry, as well as break down the barriers of distinction which, for important purposes, God had raised between the Israelites and all other people. Ezra foresaw these dangerous consequences, but was overwhelmed with a sense of the difficulty of correcting the evil, when matrimonial alliances had been formed, families had been reared, affections engaged, and important interests established. 3. when I heard this . . . I rent my garment and my mantle, &c.—the outer and inner garment, which was a token not only of great grief, but of dread at the same time of the Divine wrath; "plucked off the hair of my head and my beard," which was a still more significant sign of overpowering grief. 4. Then were assembled unto me every one that trembled at the words of . . . God, &c.—All the pious people who revered God's word and dreaded its threatenings and judgments joined with Ezra in bewailing the public sin, and devising the means of redressing it. I sat astonished until the evening sacrifice—The intelligence of so gross a violation of God's law by those who had been carried into captivity on account of their sins, and who, though restored, were yet unreformed, produced such a stunning effect on the mind of Ezra that he remained for awhile incapable either of speech or of action. The hour of the evening sacrifice was the usual time of the people assembling, and at that season, having again rent his hair and garments, he made public prayer and confession of sin.

5-15. PRAYS TO GOD. 5. I fell upon my knees, and spread out my hands unto the Lord my God—The burden of his prayer, which was dictated by a deep sense of the emergency, was that he was overwhelmed at the flagrant enormity of this sin, and the bold impety of continuing in it after having, as a people, so recently experienced the heavy marks of the Divine displeasure. God had begun to show returning favour to Israel by the restoration of some. But this only aggravated their sin, that, so soon after their re-establishment in their native land, they openly violated the express and repeated precepts which commanded them to extirpate the Canaanites. Such conduct, he exclaimed, could issue only in drawing down some great punishment from offended Heaven and ensuring the destruction of the small remnant of us that is left, unless, by the help of Divine grace, we repent and bring forth the fruits of repentance in an immediate and thorough reformation.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-17. EZRA REFORMS THE STRANGE MARRIAGES.
1. Now when Ezra had prayed—As this prayer was uttered in public, while there was a general concourse of the people at the time of the evening sacrifice, and as it was accompanied with all the demonstrations of poignant sorrow and anguish, it is not surprising that the spectacle of a man so respected, a priest so holy, a governor so dignified as Ezra, appearing distressed and filled with fear at the sad state of things, should produce a deep sensation; and the report of his passionate grief and expressions in the court of the temple having rapidly spread through the city, a great multitude flocked to the spot. 2-4. Shechaniah . . . answered and said unto Ezra, We have trespassed—This was one of the leading men, who was not himself a delinquent in the matter, for his name does not occur in the following list. He spoke in the general name of the people, and his conduct evinced a tender conscience, as well as no small fortitude in making such a proposal; for as his father and five paternal uncles (v. 26) were involved in the guilt of unlawful marriages, he showed, by the measure he recommended, that he deemed it better to obey God than to please his nearest relatives. yet now there is hope in Israel concerning this thing—This hope, however, depended on timely measures of reformation, and therefore, instead of surrendering themselves to despair or despondency, he counselled them to amend their error without delay, relying on God's mercy for the past. Though the proposal may seem harsh and cruel, yet in the peculiar circumstances of the Jews it was just as well as necessary; and he urged the duty of seeing it executed on Ezra, as the only person competent to carry it into effect, being possessed of skill and address for so delicate and difficult a work, and invested by God, and under him by the Persian king (ch. 7. 23-28), with the requisite authority to enforce it. 5-8. Then Ezra . . . went into the chamber of Johanan—At a private council of the princes and elders held there, under the presidency of Ezra, it was resolved to enter into a general covenant to put away their foreign wives and children; that a proclamation should be made for all who had returned from Babylon to repair within three days to Jerusalem, under pain of excommunication and confiscation of their property. 9-11. Then all the men of Judah and Benjamin—The returned captives belonged chiefly to these tribes; but other Israelites are also included under these names, as they all were then occupying the territory formerly assigned to those two tribes. it was the ninth month—i. e., between the end of December and the beginning of January, which is the coldest and most rainy season of the year in Palestine. all the people sat in the street—i. e., the court. 10. Ezra the priest stood up, and said—Having fully represented the enormity of their sin, and urged them to dissolve their unlawful connections, he was gratified by receiving a prompt acknowledgment of the justice of his reproof and a promise of compliance with his recommendation. But as the weather was ungenial, and the defaulters were too numerous to be passed in review at one time, it was resolved that a commission should be appointed to examine into the whole matter. These commissioners, assisted by the judges and elders of the respective cities, made a minute investigation into every case, and after three months' labour completely removed all traces of the abuse. Doubtless, an adequate provision was made for the repudiated wives and children, according to the means and circumstances of the husbands.

18-44. THOSE THAT HAD TAKEN STRANGE WIVES. 18. among the sons of the priests—from the names of so many men of rank appearing in the following list, some idea may be formed of the great and complicated difficulties attending the reformatory work. they gave their hands—i. e., came under a solemn engagement, which was usually ratified by pledging the right hand (Proverbs 6. 1; Ezekiel 17. 18). The delinquents of the priestly order bound themselves to do like the common Israelites (v. 25), and sought to expiate their sin by sacrificing a ram as a trespass offering.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-3. NEHEMIAH, UNDERSTANDING BY HANANI THE AFFLICTED STATE OF JERUSALEM, MOURNS, FASTS AND PRAYS. 1. Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah—This eminently pious and patriotic Jew is to be carefully distinguished from two other persons of the same name—one of whom is mentioned as helping to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (ch. 3. 16), and the other is noticed in the list of those who accompanied Zerubbabel in the first detachment of returning exiles (Ezra 2. 2; ch. 7. 7). Though little is known of his genealogy, it is highly probable that he was a descendant of the tribe of Judah and the royal family of David. in the month Chisleu—answering to the close of November and the larger part of December. Shushan the palace—The capital of ancient Susiana, east of the Tigris, a province of Persia. From the time of Cyrus it was the favourite winter residence of the Persian kings. 2. Hanani, one of my brethren, came, he and certain men of Judah—Hanani is called (ch. 7. 2) his brother. But as that term was used loosely by Jews as well as other Orientals, it is probable that no more is meant than that he was of the same family. According to Josephus, Nehemiah, while walking around the palace walls, overheard some persons conversing in the Hebrew language, and having ascertained that they had lately returned from Judea, was informed by them, in answer to his eager inquiries, of the unfinished and desolate condition of Jerusalem, as well as the defenceless state of the returned exiles. The commissions previously given to Zerubbabel and Ezra extending only to the repair of the temple and private dwellings, the walls and gates of the city had been allowed to remain a mass of shattered ruins, as they had been laid by the Chaldean siege.

4-11. HIS PRAYER. 4. when I heard these words . . . I sat down . . . and mourned, . . . and fasted and prayed—The recital deeply affected the patriotic feelings of this good man, and no comfort could he find but in earnest and protracted prayer, that God would favour the purpose, which he seems to have secretly formed, of asking the royal permission to go to Jerusalem. 11. I was the king's cup-bearer—This officer, in the ancient Oriental courts, was always a person of rank and importance; and, from the confidential nature of his duties and his frequent access to the royal presence, possessed of great influence.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-20. ARTAXERXES, UNDERSTANDING THE CAUSE OF NEHEMIAH'S SADNESS, SENDS HIM WITH LETTERS AND A COMMISSION TO BUILD AGAIN THE WALLS OF JERUSALEM. 1. it came to pass in the month Nisan—This was nearly four months after he had learned the desolate and ruinous state of Jerusalem (ch. 1. 1). The reasons of so long a delay cannot be ascertained. I took up the wine, and gave it unto the king—Xenophon has particularly remarked the polished and graceful manner in which the cup-bearers of the Median, and consequently the Persian, monarchs performed their duty of presenting the wine to their royal master. Having washed the cup in the king's presence, and poured into their left hand a little of the wine, which they drank off in his presence, they then handed the cup to him, not grasped, but lightly held with the tips of their thumb and fingers. This description has received some curious illustrations from the monuments of Assyria and Persia, on which the cup-bearers are frequently represented in the act of handing wine to the king. 2. the king said unto me, Why is thy countenance sad?—It was deemed highly unbecoming to appear in the royal presence with any weeds or signs of sorrow (Esther 4. 2); and hence it was no wonder that the king was struck with the dejected air of his cup-bearer, while that attendant, on his part, felt his agitation increased by his deep anxiety about the issue of the conversation so abruptly begun. But the piety and intense earnestness of the man immediately restored him to calm self-possession, and enabled him to communicate, first, the cause of his sadness, and next, the patriotic wish of his heart to be the honoured instrument of reviving the ancient glory of the city of his fathers. 6-9. the queen also sitting by him—As the Persian monarchs did not admit their wives to be present at their state festivals, this must have been a private occasion. The queen referred to was probably Esther, whose presence would tend greatly to embolden Nehemiah in stating his request; and through her influence, powerfully exerted it may be supposed, also by her sympathy with the patriotic design, his petition was granted, to go as deputy-governor of Judea, accompanied by a military guard, and invested with full powers to obtain materials for the building in Jerusalem, as well as to get all requisite aid in promoting his enterprise. 6. I set him a time—Considering the great despatch made in raising the walls, it is probable that this leave of absence was limited at first to a year or six months, after which he returned to his duties in Shushan. The circumstance of fixing a set time for his return, as well as entrusting so important a work as the refortification of Jerusalem to his care, proves the high favour and confidence Nehemiah enjoyed at the Persian court, and the great estimation in which his services were held. At a later period he received a new commission for the better settlement of the affairs of Judea, and remained governor of that province for twelve years (ch. 5.14). 7. letters be given me to the governors beyond the river—The Persian empire at this time was of vast extent, reaching from the Indus to the Mediterranean, and the Euphrates was considered as naturally dividing it into two parts, eastern and western (see Ezra 5. 3, 4). 8. according to the good hand of my God upon me—The piety of Nehemiah appears in every circumstance. The conception of his patriotic design—the favourable disposition of the king, and the success of the undertaking are all ascribed to God. 9, 10. Sanballat the Horonite—Horonalm being a town in Moab, this person, it is probable, was a Moabite. Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite—The term used indicates him to have been a freed slave, elevated to some official dignity. These were district magistrates under the government of the satrap of Syria; and they seem to have been leaders of the Samaritan faction. 11, 12. So I came to Jerusalem, and was there three days—Deeply affected with the desolations of Jerusalem, and uncertain what course to follow, he remained three days before informing any one of the object of his mission, and at the end of the third day, accompanied with a few attendants, he made, under covert of night, a secret survey of the walls and gates. 13-15. I went out by night by the gate of the valley—i. e., the Jaffa gate, near the tower of Hippicus. even before the dragon well—i. e., fountain on the opposite side of the valley. and to the dung-port—The gate on the east of the city, through which there ran a common sewer to the brook Kedron and the valley of Hinnom. 14. Then—i. e., after having passed through the gate of the Essenes. I went on to the gate of the fountain—i. e., Siloah, from which turning round the fount of Ophel. to the king's pool; but there was no place for the beast that was under me to pass—i. e., by the sides of this pool—Solomon's—there being water in the pool, and too much rubbish about it to permit the passage of the beast. 15. Then I went up . . . by the brook—i. e., Kedron. and entered by the gate of the valley, and so returned—The gate leading to the valley of Jehoshaphat, east of the city. He went out by this gate, and having made the circuit of the city, went in by it again. [BARCLAY'S CITY OF THE GREAT KING.] 16-18. the rulers knew not—The following day, having assembled the elders, Nehemiah produced his commission and exhorted them to assist in the work. The sight of his credentials, and the animating strain of his address and example, so revived their drooping spirits, that they resolved immediately to commence the building, which they did, despite of the bitter taunts and scoffing ridicule of some influential men.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-32. THE NAMES AND ORDER OF THEM THAT BUILDED THE WALL OF JERUSALEM. 1. Then Eliashib the high priest—The grandson of Jeshua, and the first high priest after the return from Babylon. rose up, with his brethren the priests—i. e., set an example by commencing the work—their labors being confined to the sacred localities. they builded the sheep-gate—close to the temple. Its name arose either from the sheep-market, or from the pool of Bethesda, where the sheep were washed, which was there (John 5. 2), and thence they were taken to the temple for sacrifice. they sanctified it, and set up the doors—Being the common entrance into the temple, and the first part of the building repaired, it is probable that some religious ceremonies were observed in gratitude for its completion. "It was the first-fruits, and therefore, in the sanctification of it, the whole lump and building was sanctified." [POOLE.] the tower of Meah—This word is improperly considered, in our version, as the name of a tower; it is the Hebrew word for "a hundred," so that the meaning is, they not only rebuilt the sheep-gate, but also a hundred cubits of the wall, which extended as far as the tower of Hananeel. 2. next unto him builded the men of Jericho, &c.—The wall was divided into portions, one of which was assigned respectively to each of the great families which had returned from the captivity, and this distribution, by which the building was carried on in all parts simultaneously with great energy, was eminently favourable to despatch. "The villages where the restorers resided being mostly mentioned, it will be seen that this circumstance affords a general indication of the part of the wall upon which they laboured, such places being on that side of the city nearest their place of abode; the only apparent exception being, perhaps, where they repaired more than their piece. Having completed their first undertaking (If they worked any more), there being no more work to be done on the side next their residence, or having arrived after the repairs on that part of the city nearest them under operation were completed, they would go wherever their services would be required." [BARCLAY'S CITY OF THE GREAT KING.] 8. they fortified Jerusalem unto the broad wall—or double wall, extending from the gate of Ephraim to the corner gate, 400 cubits in length, formerly broken down by Joash, king of Israel, but afterwards rebuilt by Uzziah, who made it so strong that the Chaldeans, finding it difficult to demolish it, had left it standing. 12. Shallum . . . he and his daughters—who were either hellesses or rich widows, who undertook to defray the expenses of a part of the wall next them. 13. the inhabitants of Zanoah—There were two towns so called in the territory of Judah (Joshua 15. 31, 56). 14. Beth-haccerem—a city of Judah, supposed to be now occupied by Bethulia, on a hill of the same name, which is sometimes called also the mountain of the Franks, between Jerusalem and Tekoa. 16. the sepulchres of David, and to the pool that was made, and unto the house of the mighty—i. e., along the precipitous cliffs of Zion. [BARCLAY.] 11.

at the turning of the wall—i. e., the wall across the Tyropœon, being a continuation of the first wall, connecting Mount Zion with the temple wall. [BARCLAY.] 25. the tower which lieth out from the king's high house—i. e., watch-tower by the royal palace. [BARCLAY.] 26. the Nethinims—Not only the priests and the Levites, but the meanest persons that belonged to the house of God, contributed to the work. The names of those who repaired the walls of Jerusalem are commemorated, because it was a work of piety and patriotism to repair the holy city. It was an instance of religion and courage to defend the true worshippers of God, that they might serve Him in quietness and safety, and, in the midst of so many enemies, go on with this work, piously confiding in the power of God to support them. [BISHOP PATRICK.]

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-6. WHILE THE ENEMIES SCOFF, NEHEMIAH PRAYS TO GOD, AND CONTINUES THE WORK. 1. when Sanballat heard that we builded the wall, he was wroth—The Samaritan faction showed their bitter animosity to the Jews on discovering the systematic design of refortifying Jerusalem. Their opposition was confined at first to scoffs and insults, in heaping which the governors made themselves conspicuous, and circulated all sorts of disparaging reflections that might increase the feelings of hatred and contempt for them in their own party. The weakness of the Jews in respect of wealth and numbers—the absurdity of their purpose apparently to reconstruct the walls, and celebrate the feast of dedication in one day—the idea of raising the walls on their old foundations, as well as using the charred and mouldering debris of the ruins as the materials of the restored buildings—and the hope of such a parapet as they could raise being capable of serving as a fortress of defence—these all afforded fertile subjects of hostile ridicule. 3. if a fox go up—The foxes were mentioned from their having been known, in great numbers, to infest the ruined and desolate places in the mount and city of Zion (Lamentations 5. 18). 4, 5. Hear, O our God; for we are despised—The imprecations invoked here may seem harsh, cruel, and vindictive; but it must be remembered that Nehemiah and his friends regarded those Samaritan leaders as enemies to the cause of God and His people, and therefore as deserving to be visited with heavy judgments. The prayer, therefore, is to be considered as emanating from hearts in which neither hatred, revenge, nor any inferior passion, but a pious and patriotic zeal for the glory of God and the success of His cause, held the ascendant sway. 6. all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof—The whole circuit of the wall had been distributed in sections to various companies of the people, and was completed to the half of the intended height.

7-23. HE SETS A WATCH. 7. But . . . when Sanballat . . . heard that the walls . . . were made up, and . . . the breaches . . . stopped—The rapid progress of the fortifications, despite of all their predictions to the contrary, goaded the Samaritans to frenzy, and they, dreading danger from the growing greatness of the Jews, formed a conspiracy to surprise them, demolish their works, and disperse or intimidate the builders. The plot being discovered, Nehemiah adopted the most energetic measures for ensuring the common safety, as well as the uninterrupted building of the walls. Hitherto the governor, for the sake of despatch, had set all his attendants and guards on the work—now half of them were withdrawn to be constantly in arms. The workmen laboured with a trowel in one hand and a sword in the other; and as, in so large a circuit, they were far removed from each other, Nehemiah, who was night and day on the spot, and, by his pious exhortations and example, animated the minds of his people, kept a trumpeter by his side, so that, on any intelligence of a surprise being brought to him, an alarm might be immediately sounded, and assistance rendered to the most distant detachment of their brethren. By these vigilant precautions, the counsels of the enemy were defeated, and the work was carried on apace. God, when he has important public work to do, never fails to raise up instruments for accomplishing it, and in the person of Nehemiah, who, to great natural acuteness and energy added fervent piety and heroic devotion, He provided a leader, whose high qualities fitted him for the demands of the crisis. Nehemiah's vigilance anticipated every difficulty, his prudent measures defeated every obstruction, and with astonishing rapidity this Jerusalem was made again "a city fortified.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-5. THE PEOPLE COMPLAIN OF THEIR DEBT, MORTGAGE, AND BONDAGE. 1. There was a great cry of the people . . . against their brethren—Such a crisis in the condition of the Jews in Jerusalem—fatigued with hard labour, and harassed by the machinations of restless enemies, the majority of them poor, and the bright visions which hope had painted of pure happiness on their return to the land of their fathers being unrealized—must have been very trying to their faith and patience. But, in addition to these vexatious oppressions, many began to sink under a new and more grievous evil. The poor made loud complaints against the rich for taking advantage of their necessities, and grinding them by usurious exactions. Numbers of them had, in consequence of these oppressions, been driven to such extremities, that they had to mortgage their lands and houses, to enable them to pay the taxes to the Persian government, and ultimately even sell their children for slaves to procure the means of subsistence. The condition of the poorer inhabitants was indeed deplorable; for, besides the deficient harvests caused by the great rains (Ezra 10. 9; also Haggai 1. 6-11), a dearth was now threatened by the enemy keeping such a multitude pent up in the city, and preventing the country people bringing in provisions.

6-19. THE USURERS REBUKED. 6. I was very angry when I heard their cry and these words—When such disorders came to the knowledge of the governor, his honest indignation was roused against the perpetrators of the evil, and having summoned a public assembly, he denounced their conduct in terms of just severity—contrasted it with his own in redeeming with his money some of the Jewish exiles who, through debt or otherwise, had lost their personal liberty in Babylon—urged the rich creditors not only to abandon their illegal and oppressive system of usury, but to restore the fields and vineyards of the poor, so that a remedy might be put to an evil, the introduction of which had led to much actual disorder, and the continuance of which would inevitably prove ruinous to the newly restored colony, by violating the fundamental principles of the Hebrew constitution. The remonstrance was effectual. The conscience of the usurious oppressors could not resist the touching and powerful appeal, and with mingled emotions of shame, contrition, and fear, they with one voice expressed their readiness to comply with the governor's recommendation. The proceedings were closed by the parties binding themselves by a solemn oath, administered by the priests, that they would redeem their pledge, as well as by the governor invoking, by the solemn and significant gesture of shaking a corner of his garment, a malediction on those who should violate it. The historian has taken care to record that the people did according to this promise. 14. Moreover from the time that I was appointed . . . I and my brethren have not eaten the bread of the governor—We have a remarkable proof both of the opulence and the disinterestedness of Nehemiah. As he declined, on conscientious grounds, to accept the lawful emoluments attached to his government, and yet maintained a style of princely hospitality for twelve years out of his own resources, it is evident that his office of cup-bearer at the court of Shushan must have been very lucrative. 15. the former governors . . . had taken . . . bread and wine, besides forty shekels of silver—The income of Eastern governors is paid partly in produce, partly in money. "Bread" means all sorts of provisions. The forty shekels of silver per day would amount to a yearly salary of £1800 sterling. 17. Moreover there were at my table an hundred and fifty of the Jews—In the East it has been always customary to calculate the expense of a king's or grandee's establishment, not by the amount of money disbursed, but by the quantity of provisions consumed (see 1 Kings 4, 22; 18, 19; Ecclesiastes 5, 11).

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-19. SANBALLAT PRACTISES AGAINST NEHEMIAH BY INSIDIOUS ATTEMPTS. 2. Sanballat and Geshem sent unto me—The Samaritan leaders, satisfied that they could not overcome Nehemiah by open arms, resolved to gain advantage over him by deceit and stratagem. With this view, under pretext of terminating their differences in an amicable manner, they invited him to a conference. The place of rendezvous was fixed "in some one of the villages in the plain of Ono." "In the villages" is, Heb., "in Cephirim," or Cephira, the name of a town in the territory of Benjamin (Joshua 9, 17; 18, 26). Nehemiah, however, apprehensive of some intended mischief, prudently declined the invitation, and, though it was repeated four times, his uniform answer was, that his presence could not be dispensed with from the important work in which he was engaged. This was one, though not the only, reason. The principal ground of his refusal, was, that his seizure or death at their hands would certainly put a stop to the further progress of the fortifications. 5-9. Then sent Sanballat his servant . . . the fifth time with an open letter in his hand—In Western Asia, letters, after being rolled up like a map, are flattened to the breadth of an inch, and instead of being sealed, are pasted at the ends. In Eastern Asia, the Persians make up their letters in the form of a roll about six inches long, and a bit of paper is fastened round it with gum, and sealed with an impression of ink, which resembles our printers' ink, but it is not so thick. Letters were, and are still, sent to persons of distinction in a bag or purse, and even to equals they are enclosed—the tie being made with a coloured ribbon; but to inferiors, or persons who are to be treated contemptuously, the letters were sent open—i. e., not enclosed in a bag. Nehemiah, accustomed to the punctilious ceremonial of the Persian court, would at once notice the want of the usual formality, and know that it was from designed disrespect. The strain of the letter was equally insolent. It was to this effect—that the fortifications with which he was so busy were intended to strengthen his position in the view of a meditated revolt—that he had engaged prophets to incite the people to enter into his design, and support his claim to be their native king—and that, to stop the circulation of such reports, which would soon reach the court, he was earnestly besought to come to the wished-for conference. Nehemiah, strong in the consciousness of his own integrity, and penetrating the purpose of this shallow artifice, replied, that there were no rumours of the kind described—that the idea of a revolt and the stimulating addresses of hired demagogues were stories of the writer's own invention, and that he declined now, as formerly, to leave his work. 10-14. Afterward I came into the house of Shemajah, &c.—This man was the son of a priest, who was an intimate and confidential friend of Nehemiah. The young man claimed to be endowed with the gift of prophecy. Having been secretly bribed by Sanballat, he, in his pretended capacity of prophet, told Nehemiah that his enemies were that night to make an attempt upon his life, and advised him, at the same time, to consult his safety by concealing himself in the sanctuary, a crypt which, from its sanctity, was strong and secure. But the noble-minded governor determined at all hazards to remain at his post, and not bring discredit on the cause of God and religion by his unworthy cowardice in leaving the temple and city unprotected. This plot, together with a secret collusion between the enemy and the nobles of Judah who were favourably disposed towards the bad Samaritan in consequence of his Jewish connections (v. 18), the undaunted courage and vigilance of Nehemiah were enabled, with the blessing of God, to defeat, and the erection of the walls thus built in troublous times (Daniel 9, 25) was happily completed (v. 15) in the brief space of fifty-two days. So rapid execution, even supposing some parts of the old wall standing, cannot be sufficiently accounted for, except by the consideration that the builders laboured with the ardour of religious zeal, as men employed in the work of God.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-4. NEHEMIAH COMMITS THE CHARGE OF JERUSALEM TO HANANI AND HANANIAH. 2. I gave my brother Hanani . . . charge over Jerusalem—If, as is commonly supposed, Nehemiah was now contemplating a return to Shushan according to his promise, it was natural that he should wish to entrust the custody of Jerusalem and the management of its civic affairs to men on whose ability, experience, and fidelity, he could confide. Hanani, a near relative (ch. 1, 2), was one, and with him was associated, as colleague, Hananiah, "the ruler of the palace"—i. e., the marshal or chamberlain of the vice-regal court, which Nehemiah had maintained in Jerusalem. The high religious principle, as well as the patriotic spirit of those two men, recommended them as pre-eminently qualified for being invested with an official trust of such peculiar importance. he feared God above many—The piety of Hananiah is especially mentioned as the ground of his eminent fidelity in the discharge of all his duties and, consequently, the reason of the confidence which Nehemiah reposed in him, for he was fully persuaded that Hananiah's fear of God would preserve him from those temptations to treachery and unfaithfulness which he was likely to encounter on the governor's departure from Jerusalem. 3. Let not the gates of Jerusalem be opened until the sun be hot, &c.—In the East it is customary to open the gates of a city at sunrise, and to bar them at sunset—a rule which is very rarely, and not except to persons of authority, infringed. Nehemiah recommended that the gates of Jerusalem should not be so early opened; a precaution necessary at a time when the enemy were practising all sorts of dangerous stratagems, to ensure that the inhabitants were all astir, and enjoyed the benefit of clear broad daylight for observing the suspicious movements of any enemy. The propriety of regularly barring the gates at sunset was, in this instance, accompanied with the appointment of a number of the people to act as sentinels, each mounting guard in front of his own house. 4. Now the city was large and great—The walls being evidently built on the old foundations, the city covered a large extent of surface, as all Oriental towns do, the houses standing apart with gardens and orchards intervening. This extent, in the then state of Jerusalem, was the more observable as the population was comparatively small, and the habitations of the most rude and simple construction—mere wooden sheds or coverings of loose, un-mortared stones.

5-38. GENEALOGY OF THOSE WHO CAME AT THE FIRST OUT OF BABYLON. 5. my God put into mine heart to gather together the nobles, &c.—The arrangement about to be described, though dictated by mere common prudence, is, in accordance with the pious feelings of Nehemiah, ascribed not to his own prudence or reflection, but to the grace of God prompting and directing him. He resolved to prepare a register of the returned exiles, containing an exact record of the family and ancestral abode of every individual, and while thus directing his attention, discovered a register of the first detachment who had come under the care of Zerubbabel. It is transcribed in the following verses, and differs in some few particulars from that given in Ezra 2; but the discrepancy is sufficiently accounted for from the different circumstances in which the two registers were taken; that of Ezra having been made up at Babylon, while that of Nehemiah was drawn out in Judea, after the walls of Jerusalem had been rebuilt. The lapse of so many years might well be expected to make a difference appear in the catalogue, through death or other causes; in particular, one person being, according to Jewish custom, called by different names. Thus Hariph (v. 24) is the same as Jorah (Ezra 2, 18), Sia (v. 47) the same as Siaha (Ezra 2, 44), &c. Besides other purposes to which this genealogy of the nobles, rulers, and people was subservient, one leading object contemplated by it was to ascertain with accuracy the parties to whom the duty legally belonged of ministering at the altar and conducting the various services of the temple; and for guiding to exact information in this important point of inquiry, the possession of the old register of Zerubbabel was invaluable.

39-73. OF THE PRIESTS. 39. The priests—It appears that only four of the courses of the priests returned from the captivity, and that the course of Abia (Luke 1, 5) is not in the list. But it must be noticed that these four courses were afterwards divided into twenty-four, which retained the names of the original courses which David appointed. 70. some of the chief of the fathers, &c.—With verse 69 the register ends, and the thread of Nehemiah's history is resumed. He was the tirshatha or governor, and the liberality displayed by him and some of the leading men for the suitable equipment of the ministers of religion, forms the subject of the remaining portion of the chapter. Their donations consisted principally in garments. This would appear a singular description of gifts to be made by any one amongst us; but, in the East, a present of garments, or of any article of use, is conformable to the prevailing sentiments and customs of society. drams of gold—i. e., darics. A daric was a gold coin of ancient Persia, worth £1 5s. 71. pound of silver—i. e., mina (sixty shekels, or £9). 73. So . . . all Israel, dwelt in their cities—The utility of these genealogical registers was thus found in guiding to a knowledge of the cities and localities in each tribe to which every family anciently belonged.

CHAPTER VIII.

VER. 1-8. RELIGIOUS MANNER OF READING AND HEARING THE LAW. 1. all the people gathered themselves together as one man—The occasion was the celebration of the feast of the seventh month (ch. 7, 73). The beginning of every month was ushered in as a sacred festival; but this, the commencement of the seventh month, was kept with distinguished honour as "the feast of trumpets," which extended over two days. It was the first day of the seventh ecclesiastical year, and the new year's day of the civil year, on which account it was held as "a great day." The place where the general concourse of people was held was "at the water-gate," on the south rampart. Through that gate the Nethinims or Gibeonites brought water into the temple, and there was a spacious area in front of it. they spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book of the law of Moses—He had come to Jerusalem twelve or thirteen years previous to Nehemiah; and either remained there, or had returned to Babylon in obedience to the royal order, and for the discharge of important duties. He had returned along with Nehemiah, but in a subordinate capacity. From the time of Nehemiah's appointment to the dignity of tirshatha, Ezra had retired into private life; and, although cordially and zealously co-operating with the former patriot in his important measures of reform, the pious priest had devoted his time and attention principally toward producing a complete edition of the canonical Scriptures. The public reading of the Scriptures was required by the law to be made every seventh year, but during the long period of the captivity this excellent practice, with many others, had fallen into neglect, till revived on this occasion; and it indicates a greatly improved tone of religious feeling, that there was a strong and general desire among the returned exiles in Jerusalem to hear the word of God read to them. 4. Ezra . . . stood upon a pulpit of wood—Not made in the form known to us, but only a raised scaffold or platform, broad enough to allow fourteen persons to stand with ease upon it. Ezra's duty was very laborious, as he continued reading aloud from morning until midday, but his labour was lightened by the aid of the other priests present. Their presence was of use partly to show their cordial agreement with Ezra's declaration of Divine truth; and partly to take their share with him in the important duty of publicly reading and expounding the Scripture. 5. when he opened it, all the people stood up—This attitude they assumed either from respect to God's word, or, rather, because the reading was prefaced by a solemn prayer, which was concluded by a general expression of amen, amen. 7, 8. caused the people to understand the law . . . gave the sense—Commentators are divided in opinion as to the import of this statement, some thinking that Ezra read the law in pure Hebrew, while the Levites, who assisted him, translated it sentence by sentence into Chaldee, the vernacular dialect which the exiles spoke in Babylon; while others maintain that the duty of these Levites consisted in explaining to the people, many of whom had become very ignorant, what Ezra had read.

9-15. THE PEOPLE COMFORTED. 9. This day is holy unto the Lord . . . mourn not, nor weep—A deep sense of their national sins, impressively brought to their remembrance by the reading of the law and its denunciations, affected the hearts of the people with penitential sorrow; but notwithstanding the painful remembrances of their national sins which the reading of the law awakened, the people were exhorted to cherish the feelings of joy and thankfulness associated with a sacred festival (see on Leviticus 23, 23-25), and by sending portions of it to their poorer brethren (Deuteronomy 16, 11, 14; Esther 9, 19), enable them to participate in the public rejoicings.

16-18. THEY KEEP THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES. 16. the people went forth, and brought . . . and made themselves booths, &c.—(see on Leviticus 23, 34-44; Deuteronomy 16, 13-17). 17. since the days of Joshua . . . had not the children of Israel done so—This national feast had not been neglected for so protracted a period; for, besides that it is impossible that such a flagrant disregard of the law could have been tolerated by Samuel, David, and other pious rulers, its observance is sufficiently indicated (1 Kings 8, 2, 65; 2 Chronicles 7, 9) and expressly recorded (Ezra 3, 4). But the meaning is, that the popular feelings had never been raised to such a height of enthusiastic joy since the time of their entrance into Canaan, as now on their return after a long and painful captivity. 18. Also day by day . . . he read in the book of the law of God—This was more than was enjoined (Deuteronomy 31, 10-12), and arose from the exuberant zeal of the time. on the eighth day was a solemn assembly—This was the last and great day of the feast (Numbers 30, 35). In later times, other ceremonies which increased the rejoicing were added (John 7, 37).

CHAPTER IX.

VER. 1-3. A SOLEMN FAST, AND REPENTANCE OF THE PEOPLE. 1. Now in the twenty and fourth day of this month—i. e., on the second day after the close of the feast of tabernacles, which commenced on the fourteenth and terminated on the twenty-second (Leviticus 23). The day immediately after that feast, the twenty-third, had been occupied in separating the delinquents from their unlawful wives, as well, perhaps, as in taking steps for keeping aloof in future from unnecessary intercourse with the heathen around them. For although this necessary measure of reformation had been begun formerly by Ezra (Ezra 10.), and satisfactorily accomplished at that time, so far as he had information of the existing abuses, or possessed the power of correcting them, yet it appears that this reformatory work of Ezra had been only partial and imperfect; many cases of delinquency had escaped, or new defaulters had appeared who had contracted those forbidden alliances; and there was an urgent necessity for Nehemiah again to take vigorous measures for the removal of a social evil which threatened the most disastrous consequences to the character and prosperity of the chosen people. A solemn fast was now observed for the expression of those penitential and sorrowful feelings which the reading of the law had produced, but which had been suppressed during the celebration of the feast; and the sincerity of their repentance was evinced by the decisive steps taken for the correction of existing abuses in the matter of marriage. 2. confessed their sins, and the iniquities of their fathers—Not only did they read in their recent sufferings a punishment of the national apostasy and guilt, but they had made themselves partakers of their fathers' sins by following the same evil ways. 3. they . . . read in the book of the law—Their extraordinary zeal led them to continue this as before. one fourth part of the day—i. e., for three hours, twelve hours being the acknowledged length of the Jewish day (John 11. 9), so that this solemn diet of worship, which probably commenced at the morning sacrifice, was continued for six hours, i. e., till the time of the evening sacrifice. The worship which they gave to the Lord their God, at this season of solemn national humiliation, consisted in acknowledging and adoring His great mercy in the forgiveness of their great and multiplied offences, in delivering them from the merited judgments which they had already experienced or which they had reason to apprehend, in continuing amongst them the light and blessings of His word and worship, and in supplicating the extension of his grace and protection.

4-38. THE LEVITES CONFESS GOD'S MANIFOLD GOODNESS, AND THEIR OWN WICKEDNESS. 4. Then stood up upon the stairs—The scaffolds or pulpits, whence the Levites usually addressed the people. There were probably several placed at convenient distances, to prevent confusion, and the voice of one drowning those of the others. cried with a loud voice unto the Lord—Such an exertion, of course, was indispensably necessary, in order that the speakers might be heard by a vast multitude congregated in the open air. But these speakers were then engaged in expressing their deep sense of sin, as well as fervently imploring the forgiving mercy of God, and "crying with a loud voice" was a natural accompaniment of this extraordinary prayer-meeting, as violent gestures and vehement tones are always the way in which the Jews, and other people in the East, have been accustomed to give utterance to deep and earnest feelings. 5. then the Levites . . . said, Stand up and bless the Lord your God—If this prayer was uttered by all these Levites in common, it must have been prepared and adopted beforehand, perhaps, by Ezra; but it may only embody the substance of the confession and thanksgiving. 6. Thou, even thou, art Lord alone, &c.—In this solemn and impressive prayer, in which they made public confession of their sins, and deprecated the judgments due to the transgressions of their fathers, they begin with a profound adoration of God, whose supreme majesty and omnipotence is acknowledged in the creation, preservation, and government of all, and then they proceed to enumerate his mercies and distinguished favours to them as a nation, from the period of the call of their great ancestor, and the gracious promise intimated to him in the divinely-bestowed name of Abraham, a promise which implied that he was to be the Father of the faithful, the ancestor of the Messiah, and the honoured individual in whose seed all the families of the earth should be blessed. Tracing in full and minute detail the signal instances of Divine interposition for their deliverance and their interest—in their deliverance from Egyptian bondage—their miraculous passage through the Red Sea—the promulgation of His law—the forbearance and long-suffering shown them amid their frequent rebellions—the signal triumphs given them over their enemies—their happy settlement in the promised land—and all the extraordinary blessings, both in the form of temporal prosperity and of religious privilege, with which his paternal goodness had favoured them above all other people; they charge themselves with making a miserable requital—confess their numerous and determined acts of disobedience—read, in the loss of their national independence and their long captivity, the severe punishment of their sins—acknowledge that, in all heavy and continued judgments upon their nation, God had done right, but they had done wickedly, and in throwing themselves on His mercy, express their purpose of entering into a national covenant, by which they pledge themselves to dutiful obedience in future. 22. Moreover, thou gavest them kingdoms and nations—i. e., put them in possession of a rich country, of an extensive territory, which had been once occupied by a variety of princes and people, and didst divide them into corners—i. e., into tribes. The propriety of the expression arose from the various districts touching at points or angles on each other. the land of Sihon, and the land of the king of Heshbon—Heshbon being the capital city, the passage should run thus: the land of Sihon or the land of the king of Heshbon. 33. Now therefore, our God . . . who keepest covenant and mercy—God's fidelity to His covenant is prominently acknowledged, and well it might, for their whole national history bore testimony to it. But as this could afford them little ground of comfort or of hope while they were so painfully conscious of having violated it, they were driven to seek refuge in the riches of Divine grace; and hence the peculiar style of invocation here adopted: "Now therefore, our God, the great, the mighty, and the terrible God, who keepest covenant and mercy." 36. Behold, we are servants this day—Notwithstanding their happy restoration to their native land, they were still tributaries of a foreign prince whose officers ruled them, and were not, like their fathers, free tenants of the land which God gave them. 37. It yieldeth much increase unto the kings whom thou hast set over us because of our sins—Our agricultural labours have been resumed in the land—we plough, and sow, and till, and thou blessest the work of our hands with a plentiful return; but this increase is not for ourselves, as once it was, but for our foreign masters, to whom we have to pay large and oppressive tribute. they have dominion over our bodies—Their persons were liable to be pressed, at the mandate of their Assyrian conqueror, into the service of his empire, either in war or in public works. And our beasts are taken to do their pleasure. 38. we make a sure covenant, and write—i. e., subscribe or sign it. This written document would exercise a wholesome influence in restraining their backslidings or in animating them to duty, by being a witness against them if in future they were unfaithful to their engagements.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-27. THE NAMES OF THOSE WHO SEALED THE COVENANT. 1. Nehemiah, the tirshatha—His name was placed first in the account on account of his high official rank, as deputy of the Persian monarch. All classes were included in the subscription list; but the people were represented by their elders (v. 14), as it would have been impossible for every one in the country to have been admitted to the sealing.

28. THE REST OF THE PEOPLE BOUND THEMSELVES TO OBSERVE IT. Those who were not present at the sealing ratified the covenant by giving their assent, either in words or by lifting up their hands, and bound themselves, by a solemn oath, to walk in God's law, imprecating a curse upon themselves in the event of their violating it.

29-30. POINTS OF THE COVENANT. 29. to observe and do all the commandments, &c.—This national covenant, besides containing a solemn pledge of obedience to the Divine law generally, specified their engagement to some particular duties, which the character and exigency of the times stamped with great urgency and importance, and which may be summed up under the following heads: that they abstain from contracting matrimonial alliances with the heathen; that they would rigidly observe the sabbath; that they would let the land enjoy rest and remit debts every seventh year; that they would contribute to the maintenance of the temple service, the necessary expenses of which had formerly been defrayed out of the treasury of the temple (1 Chronicles 26. 20), and when it was drained, given out from the king's privy purse (2 Chronicles 31. 3); and that they would make an orderly payment of the priests' dues. A minute and particular enumeration of the first-fruits was made, that all might be made fully aware of their obligations, and that none might excuse themselves on pretext of ignorance from withholding taxes which the poverty of many, and the irreligion of others, had made them exceedingly prone to evade. 32. the third part of a shekel for the service of the house of our God—The law required every individual above twenty years of age to pay half a shekel to the sanctuary. But in consequence of the general poverty of the people, occasioned by war and captivity, this tribute was reduced to a third part of a shekel. 34. we cast the lots . . . for the wood offering—The carrying of the wood had formerly been the work of the Nethinims. But few of them having returned, the duty was assigned as stated in the text. The practice afterwards rose into great importance, and Josephus speaks [WARS, 2. 17, sect. 6] of the Xylophoria, or certain stated and solemn times at which the people brought up wood to the temple. 35. The priest the son of Aaron shall be with the Levites, when the Levites take tithes—This was a prudential arrangement. The presence of a dignified priest would ensure the peaceful delivery of the tithes; at least his superintendence and influence would tend to prevent the commission of any wrong in the transaction, by the people deceiving the Levites, or the Levites defrauding the priests. the title of the tithes—i. e., the Levites, having received a tenth of all land produce, were required to give a tenth of this to the priests. The Levites were charged with the additional obligation to carry the tithes when received, and deposit them in the temple stores, for the use of the priests. 39. we will not forsake the house of our God—This solemn pledge was repeated at the close of the covenant as an expression of the intense zeal by which the people at this time were animated for the glory and the worship of God. Under the pungent feelings of sorrow and repentance for their national sins, of which apostasy from the service of the true God was the chief, and under the yet fresh and painful remembrance of their protracted captivity, they vowed, and, feeling the impulse of ardent devotion as well as of gratitude for their restoration, flattered themselves they would never forget their vow, to be the Lord's.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1, 2. THE RULERS, VOLUNTARY MEN, AND EVERY TENTH MAN CHOSEN BY LOT, DWELL AT JERUSALEM. 1. the rulers . . . dwell at Jerusalem—That city being the metropolis of the country, it was right and proper that the seat of government should be there. But the exigency of the times required that special measures should be taken to insure the residence of an adequate population for the custody of the buildings and the defence of the city. From the annoyances of restless and malignant enemies, who tried every means to demolish the rising fortifications, there was some danger attending a settlement in Jerusalem, and hence the greater part of the returned exiles, in order to earn as well as secure the rewards of their duty, preferred to remain in the country or the provincial towns. To remedy this state of things, it was resolved to select every tenth man of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin by lot, to become a permanent inhabitant of the capital. The necessity of such an expedient commended it to the general approval. It was the more readily submitted to, that the lot was resorted to on all the most critical conjunctures of the Jewish history, and regarded by the people as a Divine decision (Proverbs 18. 18). This awakened strongly the national spirit; and patriotic volunteers came readily forward to meet the wishes of the authorities, a service which, implying great self-denial as well as courage, was reckoned in the circumstances of so much importance as entitled them to the public gratitude. No wonder that the conduct of these volunteers drew forth the tribute of public admiration; for they sacrificed their personal safety and comfort for the interests of the community; Jerusalem being at that time a place against which the enemies of the Jews were directing a thousand plots; and, therefore, residence in it at such a juncture was attended with expense and various annoyances from which a country life was entirely free.

3-36. THEIR NAMES. 3. the chief of the province—i. e., Judea. Nehemiah speaks of it, as it then was, a small appendix of the Persian empire. in the cities of Judah dwelt every one in his possession in their cities—The returned exiles, who had come from Babylon, repaired generally, and by a natural impulse, to the lands and cities throughout the country which had been anciently assigned them. Israel—This general name, which designated the descendants of Jacob before the unhappy division of the two kingdoms under Rehoboam, was restored after the captivity, the Israelites being then united with the Jews, and all traces of their former separation being obliterated. Although the majority of the returned exiles belonged to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, they are here called Israel; because a large number out of all the tribes were now intermingled, and these were principally the occupiers of the rural villages, while none but those of Judah and Benjamin resided in Jerusalem. the Levites—these took possession of the cities allotted to them, according as they had opportunity. the Nethinims—a certain order of men, either Gibeonites or persons joined with them, who were devoted to the service of God. 4. at Jerusalem dwelt certain of the children of Judah—The discrepancy that is apparent between this and the list formerly given in 1 Chronicles 9. 1-9, arose not only from the Jewish and Oriental practice of changing or modifying the names of persons from a change of circumstances, but from the alterations that must have been produced in the course of time; the catalogue in Chronicles containing those who came with the first detachment of returned exiles, while the list in this passage probably included also those who returned with Ezra and Nehemiah; or it was most probably made out afterwards, when several had died, or some, who had been inserted as going on the journey, remained, and others came in their stead. 9. overseer—i. e., captain or chief. 11. the ruler of the house of God—Assistant of the high priest (Numbers 3. 32; 1 Chronicles 9. 11; 2 Chronicles 19. 11). 16. the oversight of the outward business of the house of God—i. e., those things which were done outside, or in the country, such as the collecting of the provisions (1 Chronicles 26. 29). 17. the principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer—i. e., the leader of the choir which chanted the public praise at the time of the morning and evening sacrifice. That service was always accompanied by some appropriate psalm, the sacred music being selected and guided by the person named. 22. the sons of Asaph, the singers were over the business of the house of God—They were selected to take charge of providing those things which were required for the interior of the temple and its service, whilst to others was committed the care of the "outward business of the house of God" (v. 16). This duty was very properly assigned to the sons of Asaph; for, though they were Levites, they did not repair in rotation to Jerusalem, as the other ministers of religion. Being permanent residents, and employed in duties which were comparatively light and easy, they were very competent to undertake this charge. 23. it was the king's commandment—It was the will of the Persian monarch in issuing his edict that the temple service should be revived in all its religious fulness and solemnity; and as this special provision for the singers is said to have been by the king's commandment, the order was probably given at the request or suggestion of Ezra or Nehemiah. 24. Pethahiah . . . was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people—This person was entrusted with judicial power, either for the interest, or by the appointment, of the Persian monarch, and his duty consisted either in adjusting cases of civil dispute, or in regulating fiscal concerns. 25. some of the children of Judah dwelt at Kirjath-arba—The whole region in which the villages here mentioned were situated had been completely devastated by the Chaldean invasion; and, therefore, it must be assumed, that these villages had been rebuilt before "the children dwelt in them." 36. And of the Levites were divisions in Judah, and in Benjamin—rather, there were divisions for the Levites, i. e., those who were not resident in Jerusalem were distributed in settlements throughout the provinces of Judah and Benjamin.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-9. PRIESTS AND LEVITES WHO CAME UP WITH ZERUBBABEL. 1. these are the priests—According to v. 7 “the chief of the priests,” the heads of the twenty-four courses into which the priesthood were divided (1 Chronicles 24, 1-20). Only four of the courses returned from the captivity (ch. 7, 39-42; Ezra 2, 36-39). But these were divided by Zerubbabel, or Jeshua, into the original number of twenty-four. Twenty-two only are enumerated here, and no more than twenty in v. 12-21. The discrepancy is owing to the extremely probable circumstance that two of the twenty-four courses had become extinct in Babylon; for none belonging to them are reported as having returned (v. 2-5), viz., Hattush and Maadiah may be omitted in the account of those persons’ families (v. 12), for these had no sons. Shealtiel—or Salathiel. Ezra—This was a different person from the pious and patriotic leader. If he were the same person, he must now have reached a very patriarchal age—and this longevity was doubtless owing to his eminent piety and temperance, which are greatly conducive to the prolongation of life, but, above all, to the special blessing of God, who had preserved and strengthened him for the accomplishment of the important work he was called to undertake in that critical period of the Church’s history. 4. Abijah—One of the ancestors of John the Baptist (Luke 1, 5). 9. their brethren were over against them in the watches—i. e., according to some, their stations—the places where they stood when officiating—“ward over against ward” (v. 24); or, according to others, in alternate watches, in course of rotation.

10-47. SUCCESSION OF THE HIGH PRIESTS. 10. Jeshua begat Joiakim, &c.—This enumeration was of great importance, not only as establishing their individual purity of descent, but because the chronology of the Jews was henceforth to be reckoned not as formerly by the reigns of their kings, but by the successions of their high priests. 11. Jaddua—It is an opinion entertained by many commentators that this person was the high priest whose dignified appearance, solemn manner, and splendid costume overawed and interested so strongly the proud mind of Alexander the Great; and if he were not this person, as some object that this Jaddua was not in office till a considerable period after the death of Nehemiah, it might probably be his father, called by the same name. 12. in the days of Joiakim were priests, the chief of the fathers—i. e., as there had been priests in the days of Jeshua, so in the time of Joiakim, the son and successor of Jeshua, the sons of those persons filled the priestly office in room of their fathers, some of whom were still alive, though many were dead. 23. The sons of Levi . . . were written in the book of the Chronicles—i. e., the public registers in which the genealogies were kept with great regularity and exactness. 27-43. at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem—This ceremony of consecrating the wall and gates of the city was an act of piety on the part of Nehemiah, not merely to thank God in a general way for having been enabled to bring the building to a happy completion, but on the special ground of that city being the place which He had chosen, and its containing the temple which was hallowed by the manifestation of His presence, and anew set apart to His service. It was on these accounts that Jerusalem was called “the holy city,” and by this public and solemn act of religious observance, after a long period of neglect and desecration, it was, as it were, restored to its rightful proprietor. The dedication consisted in a solemn ceremonial, in which the leading authorities, accompanied by the Levitical singers, summoned from all parts of the country, and by a vast concourse of people, marched in imposing procession round the city walls, and, pausing at intervals to engage in united praises, prayer, and sacrifices, supplicated the continued presence, favour, and blessing on “the holy city.” “The assembly convened near Jaffa Gate, where the procession commences. Then (v. 31) I brought up the princes of Judah upon the wall (near the Valley Gate), and appointed two great companies of them that gave thanks, whereof one went on the right hand upon the wall towards the dung-gate (through Bethzo). And after them went Hoshaiah, and half of the princes of Judah. And (v. 37) at the fountain-gate, which was over against them, they (descending by the Tower of Siloam on the interior, and then reascending) went up by the stairs of the city of David, at the going up of the wall, above the house of David, even unto the water-gate eastward (by the staircase of the rampart, having descended to dedicate the fountain structures). And the other company of them that gave thanks went over against them (both parties having started from the junction of the first and second walls), and I after them, and the half of the people upon the wall, from beyond the tower of the furnaces even unto the broad wall (beyond the corner-gate). And from above the gate of Ephraim, and above the old gate (and the gate of Benjamin), and above the fish-gate, and the tower of Hananeel, and the tower of Meah, even unto the sheep-gate; and they stood still in the prison-gate (or high gate, at the east end of the bridge). So stood the two companies of them that gave thanks in the house of God, and I, and half of the rulers with me (having thus performed the circuit of the investing walls), and arrived in the courts of the temple.” [BARCLAY’S CITY OF THE GREAT KING.] 43. the joy of Jerusalem was heard even afar off—The events of the day, viewed in connection with the now repaired and beautified state of the city, raised the popular feeling to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, and the fame of their rejoicings was spread far and near. 44. portions of the law—i. e., prescribed by the law. for Judah rejoiced for the priests and . . . Levites that waited—The cause of this general satisfaction was either the full restoration of the temple service, and the reorganized provision for the permanent support of the ministry, or it was the pious character and eminent gifts of the guardians of religion. 45. the singers and the porters kept . . . the ward of the purification—i. e., took care that no unclean person was allowed to enter within the precincts of the sacred building. This was the official duty of the porters (2 Chronicles 23, 19), with whom, owing to the pressure of circumstances, it was deemed expedient that the singers should be associated as assistants. 47. all Israel . . . sanctified holy things unto the Levites, &c.—The people, selecting the tithes and first-fruits, devoted them to the use of the Levites, to whom they belonged by appointment of the law. The Levites acted in the same way with the tithes due from them to the priests. Thus all classes of the people displayed a conscientious fidelity in paying the dues to the temple and the servants of God who were appointed to minister in it.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-9. UPON THE READING OF THE LAW SEPARATION IS MADE FROM THE MIXED MULTITUDE. 1. On that day—This was not immediately consequent on the dedication of the city wall and gates, but after Nehemiah’s return from the Persian court to Jerusalem, his absence having extended over a considerable period. The transaction here described probably took place on one of the periodical occasions for the public readings of the law, when the people’s attention was particularly directed to some violations of it which called for immediate correction. There is another instance afforded, in addition to those which have already fallen under our notice, of the great advantages resulting from the public and periodical reading of the Divine law. It was an established provision for the religious instruction of the people, for diffusing a knowledge and a reverence for the sacred volume, as well as for removing those errors and corruptions which might, in the course of time, have crept in. the Ammonite and the Moabite should not come into the congregation of God for ever—i. e., not be incorporated into the Israelitish kingdom, nor united in marriage relations with that people (Deuteronomy 23, 3, 4). This appeal to the authority of the Divine law led to a dissolution of all heathen alliances (ch. 9. 2; Ezra 10. 3). 4. before this—The practice of these mixed marriages, in open neglect or violation of the law, had become so common, that even the pontifical house, which ought to have set a better example, was polluted by such an impure mixture. Eliashib the priest . . . was allied unto Tobiah—This person was the high priest (v. 23; also ch. 3. 1), who, by virtue of his dignified office, had the superintendence and control of the apartments attached to the temple. The laxity of his principles, as well as of his practice, is sufficiently apparent from his contracting a family connection with so notorious an enemy of Israel as Tobiah. But his obsequious attentions had carried him much farther, for to accommodate so important a person as Tobiah on his occasional visits to Jerusalem, Eliashib had provided him a splendid apartment in the temple. The introduction of so gross an impropriety can be accounted for in no other way than by supposing that in the absence of the priests, and the cessation of the services, the temple was regarded as a common public building, which might, in the circumstances, be appropriated as a palatial residence. 6. But in all this time was not I at Jerusalem—Eliashib—concluding that, as Nehemiah had departed from Jerusalem, and, on the expiry of his allotted term of absence, had resigned his government, he had gone not to return—began to use great liberties, and, there being none left whose authority or frown he dreaded, allowed himself to do things most unworthy of his sacred office, and which, though in unison with his own irreligious character, he would not have dared to attempt during the residence of the pious governor. Nehemiah resided twelve years as governor of Jerusalem, and having succeeded in repairing and refortifying the city, he at the end of that period returned to his duties in Shushan. How long he remained there is not expressly said, but "after certain days," which is a Scripture phraseology for a year or a number of years, he obtained leave to resume the government of Jerusalem, and, to his deep mortification and regret, found matters in the neglected and disorderly state here described. Such gross irregularities as were practised, such extraordinary corruptions as had crept in, evidently imply the lapse of a considerable time. Besides, they exhibit the character of Eliashib, the high priest, in a most unfavourable light; for while he ought, by his office, to have preserved the inviolable sanctity of the temple and its furniture, his influence had been directly exercised for evil; especially he had given permission and countenance to a most indecent outrage—the appropriation of the best apartments in the sacred building to a heathen governor, one of the worst and most determined enemies of the people and the worship of God. The very first reform Nehemiah on his second visit resolved upon, was the stopping of this gross profanation, and the chamber which had been polluted by the residence of the idolatrous Ammonite was, after undergoing the process of ritual purification (Numbers 15. 9), restored to its proper use—a store-house for the sacred vessels.

10-14. NEHEMIAH REFORMS THE OFFICERS IN THE HOUSE OF GOD. 10. And I perceived that the portions of the Levites had not been given them—The people, disgusted with the malversations of Eliashib, or the lax and irregular performance of the sacred rites, withheld the tithes, so that the ministers of religion were compelled for their livelihood to withdraw to their patrimonial possessions in the country; the temple services had ceased; all religious duties fallen into neglect; and the money put into the sacred treasury squandered in the entertainment of an Ammonite heathen, an open and contemptuous enemy of God and his people. The return of the governor put an end to these disgraceful and profane proceedings. He administered a sharp rebuke to those priests to whom the management of the temple and its services was committed, for the total neglect of their duties, and the violation of the solemn promises which they had made to him at his departure. He upbraided them with the serious charge of having not only withheld from men their dues, but of having robbed God, by neglecting the care of his house and service. And thus having roused them to a sense of duty, and incited them to testify their godly sorrow for their criminal negligence by renewed devotedness to their sacred work, Nehemiah restored the temple services, by recalling the dispersed Levites to the regular discharge of their duties, while the people at large, perceiving that their contributions would be no longer perverted to improper uses, willingly brought in their tithes as formerly. Men of integrity and good report were appointed to act as trustees of the sacred treasures, and thus order, regularity and active service were re-established in the temple.

15-31. THE VIOLATION OF THE SABBATH. 15. In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine-presses on the Sabbath—The cessation of the temple services was necessarily followed by a public profanation of the Sabbath, and this had gone so far that labour was carried on in the fields, and fish brought to the markets on the sacred day. Nehemiah took the decisive step of ordering the city gates to be shut, and not to be opened, till the Sabbath was past; and in order to ensure the faithful execution of this order, he stationed some of his own servants as guards, to prevent the introduction of any commodities on that day. On the merchants and various dealers finding admission denied them, they set up booths outside the walls, in hopes of still driving a traffic with the peasantry, but the governor threatened, if they continued, to adopt violent measures for their removal. For this purpose a body of Levites were stationed as sentinels at the gate, with discretionary powers to protect the sanctification of the Sabbath. 24. could not speak in the Jews' language, but according to the language of each people—A mongrel dialect imbibed from their mothers, together with foreign principles and habits. 25. cursed them—i. e., pronounced on them an anathema which entailed excommunication. smote . . . and plucked off their hair—To cut off the hair of offenders seems to be a punishment rather disgraceful than severe; yet it is supposed that pain was added to disgrace, and that they tore off the hair with violence, as if they were plucking a bird alive.

THE BOOK OF ESTHER.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-22. AHASUERUS MAKES ROYAL FEASTS. 1. Ahasuerus—It is now generally agreed amongst learned men that the Ahasuerus mentioned in this episode is the Xerxes who figures in Grecian history. 3. made a feast unto all his princes and his servants—Banquets on so grand a scale, and extending over so great a period, have not been unfrequently provided by the luxurious monarchs of Eastern countries, both in ancient and modern times. The early portion of this festive season, however, seems to have been dedicated to amusement, particularly an exhibition of the magnificence and treasures of the court, and it was closed by a special feast of seven days' continuance, given within the gardens of the royal palace. The ancient palace of Susa has been recently disinterred from an incumbent mass of earth and ruins, and in that palace, which is, beyond all doubt, the actual edifice referred to in this passage, there is a great hall of marble pillars. "The position of the great colonnade corresponds with the account here given. It stands on an elevation in the centre of the mound, the remainder of which we may well imagine to have been occupied, after the Persian fashion, with a garden and fountains. Thus the colonnade would represent the 'court of the garden of the king's palace' with its 'pillars of marble.' I am even inclined to believe the expression, 'Shushan the palace,' applies especially to this portion of the existing ruins, in contradistinction to the citadel and the city of Shushan." [LOFTUS' CHALDEEA AND SUSIANA.] 6. Where were white, green, and blue hangings, &c.—The fashion, in the houses of the great, on festive occasions, was to decorate the chambers from the middle of the wall downward with damask or velvet hangings of variegated colours suspended on hooks, or taken down at pleasure. the beds were of gold and silver—i. e., the couches on which, according to Oriental fashion, the guests reclined, and which were either formed entirely of gold and silver, or inlaid with ornaments of those costly metals, stood on an elevated floor of parti-coloured marble. 7. they gave them drink in vessels of gold—There is reason to believe from this account, as well as from ch. 5. 6; 7. 2, 7, 8, where the drinking of wine occupies by far the most prominent place in the description, that this was a banquet rather than a feast. 9. Also Vashti the queen made a feast for the women—The celebration was double; for, as according to the Oriental fashion, the sexes do not intermingle in society, the court ladies were entertained in a separate apartment by the queen. 10-12. On the seventh day, when the heart of the king was merry with wine—As the feast-days advanced, the drinking was more freely indulged in, so that the close was usually marked by great excesses of revelry. he commanded . . . the seven chamberlains—these were the eunuchs who had charge of the royal harem. The refusal of Vashti to obey an order which required her to make an indecent exposure of herself before a company of drunken revellers, was becoming both the modesty of her sex and her rank as queen; for, according to Persian customs, the queen, even more than the wives of other men, was secluded from the public gaze; and had not the king's blood been heated with wine, or his reason overpowered by force of offended pride, he would have perceived that his own honour, as well as hers, was consulted by her dignified conduct. 13. Then the king said to the wise men—These were probably the magi, without whose advice as to the proper time of doing a thing the Persian kings never did take any step whatever; and the persons named in the following verse were the "seven counsellors" (cf. Ezra 7. 14) who formed the state ministry. The combined wisdom of all, it seems, was enlisted to consult with the king what course should be taken after so unprecedented an occurrence as Vashti's disobedience of the royal summons. It is scarcely possible for us to imagine the astonishment produced by such a refusal in a country and a court where the will of the sovereign was absolute. The assembled grandees were petrified with horror at the daring affront; alarm for the consequences that might ensue to each of them in his own household next seized on their minds, and the sounds of bacchanalian revelry were hushed into deep and anxious consultation what punishment to inflict on the refractory queen. But a purpose was to be served by the flattery of the king and the enslavement of all women. The counsellors were too intoxicated or obsequious to oppose the courtly advice of Memucan. It was unanimously resolved, with a wise regard to the public interests of the nation, that the punishment of Vashti could be nothing short of degradation from her royal dignity. The doom was accordingly pronounced and made known in all parts of the empire.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-20. ESTHER CHOSEN TO BE QUEEN. 1. After these things, when the wrath of King Ahasuerus was ap- peased—On recovering from the violent excitement of his revelry and rage, the king was pierced with poignant regret for the unmerited treatment he had given to his beautiful and dignified queen. But, according to the law, which made the word of a Persian king irrevocable, she could not be restored. His counsellors, for their own sake, were solicitous to remove his disquietude, and hastened to recommend the adoption of all suitable means for gratifying their royal master with another consort of equal or superior attractions to those of his divorced queen. In the despotic countries of the East the custom obtains that when an order is sent to a family for a young damsel to repair to the royal palace, the parents, however unwilling, dare not refuse the honour for their daughter; and although they know that when she is once in the royal harem, they will never see her again, they are obliged to yield a silent and passive compliance. On the occasion referred to, a general search was commanded to be made for the greatest beauties throughout the empire, in the hope that, from their ranks, the disconsolate monarch might select one for the honour of succeeding to the royal honours of Vashti. The damsels, on arrival at the palace, were placed under the custody of "Hege, the king's chamberlain, keeper of the women," i. e., the chief eunuch, usually a repulsive old man, on whom the court ladies are very dependent, and whose favour they are always desirous to secure. 5. Now in Shushan the palace there was a certain Jew—Mordecai held some office about the court. But his "sitting at the king's gate" (v. 21) does not necessarily imply that he was in the humble condition of a porter; for, according to an institute of Cyrus, all state officers were required to wait in the outer courts till they were summoned into the presence-chamber. He might, therefore, have been a person of some official dignity. This man had an orphan niece, born during the exile, under his care, who being distinguished by great personal beauty, was one of the young damsels taken into the royal harem on this occasion, and had had the good fortune at once to gain the good-will of the chief eunuch. Her sweet and amiable appearance made her a favourite with all who looked upon her (v. 15, last clause). Her Hebrew name (v. 7) was Hadassah, i. e., myrtle, which, on her introduction into the royal harem, was changed for Esther, i. e., the star Venus, indicating beauty and good fortune. [GESENIUS.] 11. Mordecai walked every day before the court of the women's house—The harem is an inviolable sanctuary, and what is transacted within its walls is as much a secret to those without as if they were thousands of miles away. But hints were given him through the eunuchs. 12. Now when every maid's turn was come to go in to King Ahasuerus—A whole year was spent in preparation for the intended honour. Considering that this took place in a palace, the long period prescribed, together with the profusion of costly and fragrant cosmetics employed, was probably required by state etiquette. 17. the king loved Esther above all the women—The choice fell on Esther, who found favour in the eyes of Ahasuerus, and elevated her to the dignity of chief wife, or queen. The other competitors had apartments assigned them in the royal harem, and were retained in the rank of secondary wives, of whom Oriental princes have a great number. he set the royal crown upon her head—This consisted only of a purple ribbon, streaked with white, bound round the forehead. The nuptials were celebrated by a magnificent entertainment, and, in honour of the auspicious occasion, "he made a release to the provinces, and gave gifts, according to the state of the king." The dotation of Persian queens consisted in consigning to them the revenue of certain cities, in various parts of the kingdom, for defraying their personal and domestic expenditure. Some of these imposts the king remitted or lessened at this time.

21-23. MORDECAI, DISCOVERING A TREASON, IS RECORDED IN THE CHRONICLES. 21. In those days . . . two of the king's chamberlains . . . were wroth and sought to lay hand on the king, &c.—This secret conspiracy against the king's life probably arose out of revenge for the divorce of Vashti, in whose interest, and at whose instigation, these eunuchs may have acted. Through the vigilance of Mordecai, whose fidelity, however, passed unnoticed, the design was frustrated, while the conspirators were condemned to be executed; and as the matter was recorded in the court annals, it became the occasion afterwards of Mordecai's preferment to the place of power and influence for which, in furtherance of the national interests of the Jews, Divine providence intended him:

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-15. HAMAN, ADVANCED BY THE KING, AND DEPISED BY MORDECAI, SEEKS REVENGE ON ALL THE JEWS. 1. After these things did Ahasuerus promote Haman . . . and set his seat above all the princes—i. e., raised him to the rank of vizier, or prime confidential minister, whose pre-eminence in office and power appeared in the elevated state chair appropriated to that supreme functionary. Such a distinction in seats was counted of vast importance in the formal court of Persia. 2. all the king's servants, that were in the king's gate, bowed, and revered Haman—Large mansions in the East are entered by a spacious vestibule, or gateway, along the sides of which visitors sit, and are received by the master of the house; for none, except the nearest relatives or special friends, are admitted farther. There the officers of the ancient king of Persia waited till they were called, and did obeisance to the all-powerful minister of the day. but Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence—The obsequious homage of prostration, not entirely foreign to the manners of the East, had not been claimed by former viziers; but this minion required that all subordinate officers of the court should bow before him with their faces to the earth. But to Mordecai it seemed that such an attitude of profound reverence was due only to God. Haman being an Amalekite, one of a doomed and accursed race, was, doubtless, another element in the refusal; and on learning that the recusant was a Jew, whose nonconformity was grounded on religious scruples, the magnitude of the affront appeared so much the greater, as the example of Mordecai would be imitated by all his compatriots. Had the homage been a simple token of civil respect, Mordecai would not have refused it; but the Persian kings demanded a sort of adoration, which, it is well known, even the Greeks reckoned it degradation to express, and as Xerxes, in the height of his favouritism, had commanded the same honours to be given to the minister as to himself, this was the ground of Mordecai's refusal. 7. In the first month . . . they cast Pur, that is, the lot—In resorting to this method of ascertaining the most auspicious day for putting his atrocious scheme into execution, Haman acted as the kings and nobles of Persia have always done, never engaging in any enterprise without consulting the astrologers, and being satisfied as to the lucky hour. Vowing revenge, but scorning to lay hands on a single victim, he meditated the extirpation of the whole Jewish race, who, he knew, were sworn enemies of his countrymen, and by artfully representing them as a people who were aliens in manners and habits, and enemies to the rest of his subjects, procured the king's sanction of the intended massacre. One motive which he used in urging his point was addressed to the king's cupidity. Fearing lest his master might object that the extermination of a numerous body of his subjects would seriously depress the public revenue, Haman promised to make up the loss. 9. I will pay ten thousand talents of silver . . . into the king's treasures—This sum, reckoning by the Babylonish talent, will be about £2,119,000; but estimated according to the Jewish talent, it will considerably exceed £3,000,000, an immense contribution to be made out of a private fortune. But classic history makes mention of several persons whose resources seem almost incredible. 10. the king took his ring from his hand, and gave it unto Haman—There was a seal or signet in the ring. The bestowment of the ring, with the king's name and that of his kingdom engraven on it, was given with much ceremony, and it was equivalent to putting the sign manual to a royal edict. 12-15. Then were the king's scribes called . . . and there was written—The government secretaries were employed in making out the proclamation authorizing a universal massacre of the Jews on one day. It was translated into the dialects of all the people throughout the vast empire, and swift messengers sent to carry it into all the provinces, and, on the day appointed, all Jews were to be put to death, and their property confiscated; doubtless, the means by which Haman hoped to pay his stipulated tribute into the exchequer. To us it appears unaccountable how any sane monarch could have given his consent to the extirpation of a numerous class of his subjects. But such acts of frenzied barbarity have, alas! been not rarely authorized by careless and voluptuous despots, who have allowed their ears to be engrossed and their policy directed by haughty and selfish minions, who had their own passions to gratify, their own ends to serve. the king and Haman sat down to drink; but the city Shushan was perplexed—The completeness of the word-painting in this verse is exquisite. The historian, by a simple stroke, has drawn a graphic picture of an Oriental despot, wallowing with his favourite in sensual enjoyments, while his tyrannical cruelties were rending the hearts and homes of thousands of his subjects.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-14. MORDECAI AND THE JEWS MOURN. 1. When Mordecai perceived all that was done—Relying on the irrevocable nature of a Persian monarch's decree (Daniel 6. 15), Haman made it known as soon as the royal sanction had been obtained, and Mordecai was, doubtless, amongst the first to hear of it. On his own account, as well as on that of his countrymen, this astounding decree must have been indescribably distressing. The acts described in this passage are, according to the Oriental fashion, expressive of the most poignant sorrow; and his approach to the gate of the palace, under the impulse of irrepresible emotions, was to make an earnest though vain appeal to the royal mercy. Access, however, to the king's presence was, to a person in his disfigured state, impossible; "for none might enter into the king's gate clothed with sackcloth." But he found means of conveying intelligence of the horrid plot to Queen Esther. 4. Then was the queen . . . grieved; and . . . sent raiment to . . . Mordecai—Her object in doing so was either to qualify him for resuming his former office, or else, perhaps, of fitting him to come near enough the palace to inform her of the cause of such sudden and extreme distress. 5. Then called Esther for Hatach, one of the king's chamberlains, whom he had appointed to attend upon her—Communication with the women in the harem is hardly ever to be obtained, and only through the medium of the keepers. The chief eunuch receives the message from the lips of the queen, conveys it to some inferior officer of the seraglio, and, when the commission is executed, the subaltern communicates it to the superintendent, by whom it is delivered to the queen. This chief eunuch, usually an old man who has recommended himself by a long course of faithful service, is always appointed by the king; but it is his interest, as well as his duty, to ingratiate himself with the queen also; and, accordingly, we find Hatach rendering himself very serviceable in carrying on those private communications with Mordecai, who was thereby enabled to enlist her powerful influence. 8. charge her that she should go in unto the king—This language is exceedingly strong, and, as it can scarcely be supposed that Mordecai was still using authority over Esther as his adopted daughter, he must be considered as imploring rather than commanding her, in the name of her brethren, and in the name of her God, to make a direct appeal to the feelings of her royal husband. 11. whosoever, whether man or woman, shall come unto the king into the inner court, who is not called—The Persian kings surrounded themselves with an almost impassable circle of forms. The law alluded to was first enacted by Deloces, king of Media, and afterwards, when the empires were united, adopted by the Persians, that all business should be transacted and petitions transmitted to the king through his ministers; and although the restriction was not intended, of course, to apply to the queen, yet from the strict and inflexible character of the Persian laws, and the extreme desire to exalt the majesty of the sovereign, even his favourite wife had not the privilege of entree, except by special favour and indulgence. Esther was suffering from the severity of this law; and as, from not being admitted for a whole month to the king's presence, she had reason to fear that the royal affections had become alienated from her, she had little hope of serving her country's cause in this awful emergency. 13, 14. Then Mordecai commanded to answer Esther—His answer was to this effect, that Esther need not indulge the vain hope she would, from her royal connection, escape the general doom of her race—that he (Mordecai) confidently believed God would interpose, and, if not through her, by some other deliverer, save his people; but that the duty evidently devolved on her, as there was great reason to believe that this was the design of Providence in her elevation to the dignity of queen, and therefore that she should go with a courageous heart, not doubting of success. 16. so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law—The appeal of Mordecai was irresistible; and having appointed a solemn fast of three days, she expressed her firm resolution to make an appeal to the king, though she should perish in the attempt. I . . . and my maidens—It is probable that she had surrounded herself with Jewish maidens, or women who were proselytes to that religion.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-14. ESTHER INVITES THE KING AND HAMAN TO A BANQUET. 1. Esther put on her royal apparel—It was not only natural, but, on such occasions, highly proper and expedient, that the queen should decorate herself in a style becoming her exalted station. On ordinary occasions she might reasonably set off her charms to as much advantage as possible; but, on the present occasion, as she was desirous to secure the favour of one who sustained the twofold character of her husband and her sovereign, public as well as private considerations—a regard to her personal safety, no less than the preservation of her doomed countrymen—urged upon her the propriety of using every legitimate means of recommending herself to the favourable notice of Ahasuerus. the king sat upon his royal throne in the royal house, over against the gate of the house—The palace of this Persian king seems to have been built, like many more of the same quality and description, with an advanced cloister, over against the gate, made in the fashion of a large penthouse, supported only by one or two contiguous pillars in the front, or else in the centre. In such open structures as these, in the midst of their guards and counsellors, are the bashaws, kadis, and other great officers, accustomed to distribute justice, and transact the public affairs of the provinces. [SHAW'S TRAVELS.] In such a situation the Persian king was seated. The seat he occupied was not a throne, according to our ideas of one, but simply a chair, and so high that it required a footstool. It was made of gold, or, at least, inlaid with that metal, and covered with splendid tapestry, and no one save the king might sit down on it under pain of death. It is often found pictured on the Persepolitan monuments, and always of the same fashion. 2. the king held out to Esther the golden sceptre that was in his hand—This golden sceptre receives an interesting illustration from the sculptured monuments of Persia and Assyria. In the bas-reliefs of Persepolis, copied by Sir Robert Ker Porter, we see King Darius enthroned in the midst of his court, and walking abroad in equal state; in either case he carries in his right hand a slender rod or wand, about equal in length to his own height, ornamented with a small knob at the summit. In the Assyrian alabasters, as well those found at Nimroud as those from Khorsabad, "the great king" is furnished with the same appendage of royalty, a slender rod, but destitute of any knob or ornament. On the Khorsabad reliefs the rod is painted red, doubtless to represent gold; proving that "the golden sceptre" was a simple wand of that precious metal, commonly held in the right hand, with one end resting on the ground, and that whether the king was sitting or walking. "The gold sceptre" has received little alteration or modification since ancient times. [Goss.] It was extended to Esther as a token not only that her intrusion was pardoned, but that her visit was welcome, and a favourable reception given to the suit she had come to prefer. touched the top of the sceptre—This was the usual way of acknowledging the royal condescension, and at the same time expressing reverence and submission to the august majesty of the king. 3. it shall be even given thee to the half of the kingdom—This mode of speaking originated in the Persian custom of appropriating for the maintenance of great men, or royal favourites, one city for his bread, another for his wine, a third for his clothes, &c., so that the phrase denoted great liberality. 4. let the king and Haman come this day unto the banquet that I have prepared for him—There was great address in this procedure of Esther's; for, by showing such high respect to the king's favourite, she would the better insinuate herself into the royal affections; and gain a more suitable opportunity of making known her request. 8. let the king and Haman come to the banquet that I shall prepare—The king ate alone, and his guests in an adjoining hall; but they were admitted to sit with him at wine. Haman being the only invited guest with the king and queen, it was natural that he should have been elated with the honour.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-14. AHASUERUS REWARDS MORDECAI FOR FORMER SERVICE. 1. the king . . . commanded to bring the book of records of the chronicles—In Eastern courts, there are scribes or officers whose duty it is to keep a journal of every occurrence worthy of notice. A book of this kind, abounding with anecdotes, is full of interest, and it has been a custom with Eastern kings, in all ages, frequently to cause the annals of the kingdom to be read to them. It is resorted to, not merely as a pastime to while away the tedium of an hour, but a source of instruction to the monarch, by reviewing the important incidents of his own life, as well as those of his ancestors. There was, therefore, nothing uncommon in this Persian monarch calling for the court journal. But, in his being unable to sleep at that particular juncture, in his ordering the book then to be read to him, and in his attention having been specially directed to the important and as yet unrewarded services of Mordecai, the immediate interposition of Providence is distinctly visible. 4. Now Haman was come into the outward court—This was early in the morning. It is the invariable custom for kings in Eastern countries to transact business before the sun is hot, often in the open air, and so Haman was in all probability come officially to attend on his master. 6. What shall be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour!—In bestowing tokens of their favour, the kings of Persia do not at once, and as it were by their own will, determine the kind of honour that shall be awarded; but they turn to the courtier standing next in rank to themselves, and ask him what shall be done to the individual who has rendered the service specified; and according to the answer received, the royal mandate is issued. 8. the royal apparel . . . which the king useth to wear—A coat which has been on the back of a king or prince is reckoned a most honourable gift, and is given with great ceremony. the horse that the king rideth upon—Persia was a country of horses, and the high-bred charger that the king rode upon acquired, in the eyes of his venal subjects, a sort of sacredness from that circumstance. and the crown royal which is set upon his head—Either the royal turban, or it may be a tiara, with which, on state processions, the horse's head was adorned. 9. delivered to the hand of one of the king's most noble princes . . . array the man—On grand and public occasions, the royal steed is led by the highest subject through the principal streets of the city, a ceremony which may occupy several hours. 11. Then Haman took, &c.—This sudden reverse, however painful to Haman as an individual, is particularly characteristic of the Persian manners. 14. came the king's chamberlains, and hastened to bring Haman unto the banquet—Besides the invitation given to an entertainment, a message is always sent to the guests, immediately at the day and hour appointed, to announce that all things are ready.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-6. ESTHER SUES FOR HER OWN LIFE AND THE LIFE OF HER PEOPLE. 4. we are sold, I and my people to be destroyed—i. e., by the cruel and perfidious scheme of that man, who offered an immense sum of money to purchase our extermination. Esther dwelt on his contemplated atrocity, in a variety of expressions, which both evinced the depth of her own emotions, and were intended to awaken similar feelings in the king's breast. But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my tongue—Though a great calamity to the Jews, the enslavement of that people might have enriched the national exchequer, and, at all events, the policy, if found from experience to be bad, could be altered. But the destruction of such a body of people would be an irreparable evil, and all the talents Haman might pour into the treasury could not compensate for the loss of their services.

7-10. THE KING CAUSES HAMAN TO BE HANGED ON HIS OWN GALLOWES. 7. he saw that there was evil determined against him by the king—When the king of Persia orders an offender to be executed, and then rises and goes into the women's apartment, it is a sign that no mercy is to be hoped for. Even the sudden rising of the king in anger was the same as if he had pronounced sentence. 8. Haman was fallen upon the bed whereon Esther was—We do not know the precise form of the couches on which the Persians reclined at table. But it is probable that they were not very different from those used by the Greeks and Romans. Haman, perhaps, at first stood up to beg pardon of Esther; but driven in his extremity to resort to an attitude of the most earnest supplication, he fell prostrate on the couch where the queen was recumbent. The king returning that instant was fired at what seemed an outrage on female modesty. they covered Haman's face—The import of this striking action is, that a criminal is unworthy any longer to look on the face of the king, and hence, when malefactors are consigned to their doom in Persia, the first thing is to cover the face with a veil or napkin. 9. Harbonah, one of the chamberlains, said before the king, Behold also the gallows—This eunuch had probably been the messenger sent with the invitation to Haman, and on that occasion had seen the gallows. The information he now volunteered, as well it may be from abhorrence of Haman's cold-blooded conspiracy as from sympathy with his amiable mistress, involved with her people in imminent peril. 10. So they hanged Haman on the gallows that he had prepared—He has not been the only plotter of mischief whose feet have been taken in the net which they hid (Psalm 9. 15). But never was condemnation more just, and retribution more merited, than the execution of that gigantic criminal.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-6. MORDECAI ADVANCED. 1. On that day did . . . Ahasuerus give the house of Haman . . . unto Esther—His property was confiscated, and every thing belonging to him, as some compensation for the peril to which she had been exposed. Mordecai came before the king—i. e., was introduced at court and appointed one of the seven counsellors. Esther displayed great prudence and address in acknowledging Mordecai's relation to her at the moment most fitted to be of eminent service to him. 2. the king took off his ring . . . and gave it to Mordecai—By that act transferring to him all the power and authority which the ring symbolized, and promoting him to the high dignity which Haman had formerly filled. Esther set Mordecai over the house of Haman—As her steward or factor, to manage that large and opulent estate which had been assigned to her. 3. Esther spake yet again before the king, and fell down at his feet—The king was then not reclining at table, but sitting on a divan, most probably in the Persian attitude, leaning back against the cushions, and one foot under him, besought him with tears to put away the mischief of Haman—i. e., to repeal the sanguinary edict which, at the secret instigation of Haman, had been recently passed (ch. 3. 12). 4. Then the king held out the golden sceptre toward Esther—In token that her request was accepted, and that she needed no longer to maintain the humble attitude of a suppliant. 5, 6. reverse the letters devised by Haman . . . to destroy the Jews—The whole conduct of Esther in this matter is characterized by great tact, and the variety of expressions by which she describes her willing submission to her royal husband, the address with which she rolls the whole infamy of the meditated massacre on Haman, and the argument she draws from the king's sanction being surreptitiously obtained, that the decree should be immediately reversed—all indicate the queen's wisdom and skill, and she succeeded in this point also.

7-14. AHASUERUS GRANTS TO THE JEWS TO DEFEND THEMSELVES. 8. Write . . . in the king's name, and seal it with the king's ring—Hence it is evident that the royal ring had a seal in it, which, being affixed to any document, authenticated it with the stamp of royal authority. which . . . may no man reverse—This is added as the reason why he could not comply with the queen's request for a direct reversal or recall of Haman's letters, viz., that the laws of the Medes and Persians, once passed, were irrevocable. 10. sent . . . by posts . . . and riders on . . . camels, and young dromedaries—The business being very urgent, the swiftest kind of camel would be employed, and so the word in the original denotes—the wind-camel—young dromedaries also are used to carry expresses, being remarkable for the nimbleness and ease of their movements. Animals of this description could convey the new rescript of Ahasuerus over the length and breadth of the Persian empire in time to relieve the unhappy Jews from the ban under which they lay. 11-13. the king granted to the Jews . . . to stand for their life . . . to slay . . . all . . . that would assault them—The fixed and unalterable character claimed for Persian edicts often placed the king in a very awkward dilemma; for, however bitterly he might regret things done in a moment of haste and thoughtlessness, it was beyond even his power to prevent the consequences. This was the reason on account of which the king was laid under a necessity not to reverse, but to issue a contradictory edict; according to which it was enacted that if, pursuant to the first decree, the Jews were assaulted, they might, by virtue of the second, defend themselves and even slay their enemies. However strange and even ridiculous this mode of procedure may appear, it was the only one which, from the peculiarities of court etiquette in Persia, could be adopted. Instances occur in sacred (Daniel 6. 14), no less than profane, history. Many passages of the Bible attest the truth of this, particularly the well-known incident of Daniel's being cast into the den of lions, in conformity with the rash decree of Darius, though, as it afterwards appeared, contrary to the personal desire of that monarch. That the law of Persia has undergone no change in this respect, and the power of the monarch not less immutable, appear from many anecdotes related in the books of modern travellers through that country.

15-17. MORDECAI'S HONOURS, AND THE JEWS' JOY. 15. Mordecai went out . . . in royal apparel—He was invested with the khelaa of official honour. A dress of blue and white was held in great estimation among the Persians; so that Mordecai, whom the king delighted to honour, was in fact arrayed in the royal dress and insign-ma. The variety and the kind of insignia worn by a favourite at once makes known to the people the particular dignity to which he has been raised.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-19. THE JEWS SLAY THEIR ENEMIES WITH THE TEN SONS OF HAMAN. 1. In the twelfth month, . . . on the thirteenth day of the same—This was the day which Haman's superstitious advisers had led him to select as the most fortunate for the execution of his exterminating scheme against the Jews. 2. The Jews gathered themselves . . . no man could withstand them—The tables were now turned in their favour; and though their enemies made their long meditated attack, they were not only at liberty to act on the defensive, but through the powerful influence enlisted on their side at court, together with the blessing of God, they were everywhere victorious, the fear of them fell upon all people—This impression arose not alone from the consciousness of the all-powerful vizier being their countryman, but from the hand of God appearing so visibly interposed to effect their strange and unexpected deliverance. 5-16. Thus the Jews smote all their enemies—The effect of the two antagonistic decrees was, in the mean time, to raise a fierce and bloody war between the Jews and their enemies throughout the Persian empire; but through the dread of Esther and Mordecai, the provincial governors universally favoured their cause, so that their enemies fell in great numbers. 13. let it be granted to the Jews which are in Shushan to do to-morrow also according unto this day's decree—Their enemies adroitly concealing themselves for the first day might have returned on the next, when they imagined that the privilege of the Jews was expired; so that that people would have been surprised and slain. The extension of the decree to another day at the queen's special desire has exposed her to the charge of being actuated by a cruel and vindictive disposition. But her conduct in making this request is capable of full vindication, on the ground (1.) that Haman's sons having taken a prominent part in avenging their father's fall, and having been previously slain in the melee, the order for the exposure of their dead bodies on the gallows was only intended to brand them with public infamy for their malice and hatred to the Jews; and (2.) the anti-Jewish party having, in all probability, been instigated through the arts or influence of Haman to acts of spiteful and wanton oppression, the existing state of feeling amongst the natives required some vigorous and decisive measure to prevent the outbreak of future aggressions. The very circumstance of their slaying 800 Jews in the immediate vicinity of the court (v. 6, 15) is a proof of the daring energy and deep-rooted malice by which multitudes were actuated against the Jews. To order an extension, therefore, of the permissive edict to the Jews to defend themselves, was perhaps no more than affording an opportunity for their enemies to be publicly known; and though it led to so awful a slaughter of 75,000 of their enemies, there is reason to believe that these were chiefly Amalekites, in the fall of whom on this occasion, the prophecies (Exodus 17. 14, 16; Deuteronomy 25. 19) against that doomed race were accomplished. 19. a day of . . . feasting . . . and of sending portions one to another—The princes and people of the East not only invite their friends to feasts, but it is their custom to send a portion of the banquet to those who cannot well come to it, especially their relations, and those who are detained at home in a state of sorrow or distress.

20-32. THE TWO DAYS OF PURIM MADE FESTIVAL. 20. Mordecai wrote these things—Commentators are not agreed what is particularly meant by "these things;" whether the letters following, or an account of these marvellous events to be preserved in the families of the Jewish people, and transmitted from one generation to another. 26. they called these days Purim, after the name of Pur—Pur, in the Persian language, signifies lot; and the feast of Purim, or lots, has a reference to the time having been pitched upon by Haman through the delition of the lot. In consequence of the signal national deliverance which Divine providence gave them from the infamous machinations of Haman, Mordecai ordered the Jews to commemorate that event by an anniversary festival, which was to last for two days, in accordance with the two days' war of defence they had to maintain. There was a slight difference in the time of this festival; for the Jews in the provinces, having defended themselves against their enemies on the thirteenth, devoted the fourteenth to festivity; whereas their brethren in Shushan, having extended that work over two days, did not observe their thanksgiving feast till the fifteenth. But this was remedied by authority, which fixed the fourteenth and fifteenth of Adar. It became a season of sunny memories to the universal body of the Jews; and, by the letters of Mordecai, dispersed through all parts of the Persian empire, it was established as an annual feast, the celebration of which is kept up still. On both days of the feast, the modern Jews read over the Megillah or book of Esther in their synagogues. The copy read must not be printed, but written on vellum in the form of a roll; and the names of the ten sons of Haman are written on it in a peculiar manner, being ranged, they say, like so many bodies on a gibbet. The reader must pronounce all these names in one breath. Whenever Haman's name is pronounced, they make a terrible noise in the synagogue. Some drum with their feet on the floor, and the boys have mallets with which they knock and make a noise. They prepare themselves for their carnival by a previous fast, which should continue three days, in imitation of Esther's; but they have mostly reduced it to one day. [JENNINGS' JEWISH ANTIQUITIES.]

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-3. AHASUERUS' GREATNESS. MORDECAI'S ADVANCEMENT. 1. Ahasuerus laid a tribute—This passage being an appendix to the history, and improperly separated from the preceding chapter, it might be that the occasion of levying this new impost arose out of the commotions raised by Haman's conspiracy. Neither the nature nor the amount of the tax has been recorded; only it was not a local tribute, but one exacted from all parts of his vast empire. 2. the declaration of the greatness of Mordecai—The experience of this pious and excellent Jew verified the statement, "he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." From sitting contentedly at the king's gate, he was raised to the dignity of highest subject, the powerful ruler of the kingdom. Acting uniformly on the great principles of truth and righteousness, his greatness rested on a firm foundation. His faith was openly avowed, and his influence as a professor of the true religion was of the greatest usefulness for promoting the welfare of the Jewish people, as well as for advancing the glory of God. 3. Mordecai . . . was next unto King Ahasuerus . . . great among the Jews, &c.—The elevation of this pious and patriotic Jew to the possession of the highest official power was of very great importance to the suffering church at that period; for it enabled him, who all along possessed the disposition, now to direct the royal influence and authority in promoting the interests and extending the privileges of his exiled countrymen. Viewed in this light, the providence of God is plainly traceable in all the steps that led to his unexpected advancement, and this providential interposition is all the more remarkable, that, as in the analogous case of Joseph, it was displayed in making the ordinary and natural course of things lead to the most marvellous results. To use the pious words of an eminent prelate, "though in the whole of this episode there was no extraordinary manifestation of God's power, no particular cause or agent that was in its working advanced above the ordinary pluck of nature, yet the contrivance, and suiting these ordinary agents appointed by God, is in itself more admirable than if the same end had been effected by means that were truly miraculous." The sudden advancement of individuals from obscurity and neglect to the highest stations of power and influence is, in Eastern courts, no extraordinary nor unrequent occurrence. The caprice, the weak partiality of the reigning sovereign, or, it may be, his penetrating discernment in discovering latent energy and talent, has often "raised the beggar from the dunghill, and set him among princes." Some of the all-powerful viziers in modern Persia, and not a few of the beys in Egypt, have been elevated to their respective dignities in this manner. And, therefore, the advancement of "Mordecai, who was next unto Ahasuerus, and great among the Jews," was in perfect accordance with the rapid revolution of "the wheel of fortune" in that part of the world. But, considering all the circumstances of Mordecai's advancement, not only his gaining the favour of the king, but his being "accepted of the multitude of his brethren, it was beyond all controversy the doing of the Lord, and was truly marvellous in his people's eyes." accepted of the multitude of his brethren—Far from being envious of his grandeur, they blessed God for the elevation to official power of so good a man. speaking peace to all his seed—While his administration was conducted with a mild and impartial hand, he showed a peculiarly warm and friendly feeling to all his countrymen when asked his counsel or his aid.

THE BOOK OF JOB. INTRODUCTION.

JOB A REAL PERSON.—It has been supposed by some that the book of Job is an allegory, not a real narrative, on account of the artificial character of many of its statements. Thus the sacred numbers, three and seven, often occur. He had seven thousand sheep, seven sons, both before and after his trials; his three friends sit down with him seven days and seven nights; both before and after his trials he had three daughters. So also the number and form of the speeches of the several speakers seem to be artificial. The name of Job, too, is derived from an Arabic word signifying repentance.

But Ezekiel 14. 14 (cf. v. 16, 20) speaks of "Job" in conjunction with "Noah and Daniel," real persons. St. James (5. 11) also refers to Job as an example of "patience," which he would not have been likely to do had Job been only a fictitious person. Also the names of persons and places are specified with a particularity not to be looked for in an allegory. As to the exact doubling of his possessions after his restoration, no doubt the round number is given for the exact number, as the latter approached near the former; this is often done in undoubtedly historical books. As to the studied number and form of the speeches, it seems likely that the arguments were substantially those which appear in the book, but that the studied and poetic form were given by Job himself, guided by the Holy Spirit. He lived one hundred and forty years after his trials, and nothing would be more natural than that he should, at his leisure, mould into a perfect form the arguments used in the momentous debate, for the instruction of the Church in all ages. Probably, too, the debate itself occupied several sittings; and the number of speeches assigned to each was arranged by preconcerted agreement, and each was allowed the interval of a day or more to prepare carefully his speech and replies; this will account for the speakers bringing forward their arguments in regular series, no one speaking out of his turn. As to the name Job—repentance (supposing the derivation correct)—it was common in old times to give a name from circumstances which occurred at an advanced period of life, and this is no argument against the reality of the person.

WHERE JOB LIVED.—Uz, according to GESENIUS, means a light, sandy soil, and was in the north of Arabia Deserta between Palestine and the Euphrates, called by PTOLEMY (Geography 19) Ausitai or Aisitai. In Genesis 10. 23; 22. 21; 36. 28; and 1 Chronicles 1. 17, 42, it is the name of a man; in Jeremiah 25. 20; Lamentations 4. 21; and Job 1. 1, it is a country. Uz, in Genesis 22. 21, is said to be the son of Nahor, brother of Abraham—a different person from the one mentioned (Genesis 10. 23), a grandson of Shem. The probability is, that the country took its name from the latter of the two; for this one was the son of Aram, from whom the Arameans take their name, and these dwelt in Mesopotamia, between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris. Cf. as to the dwelling of the sons of Shem in Genesis 10. 30, "a mount of the East," answering to "men of the East" (Job 1. 3). RAWLINSON, in his deciphering of the Assyrian inscriptions, states that "Uz is the prevailing name of the country at the mouth of the Euphrates." It is probable that Eliphaz the Temanite and the Sabaeans dwelt in that quarter; and we know that the Chaldeans resided there, and not near Idumea, which some identify with Uz. The tornado from "the wilderness" (ch. 1. 19) agrees with the view of it being Arabia Deserta. Job (ch. 1. 3) is called "the greatest of the men of the East;" but Idumea was not east, but south of Palestine: therefore in Scripture language, the phrase cannot apply to that country, but probably refers to the north of Arabia Deserta, between Palestine, Idumea, and the Euphrates. So the Arabs still show in the Houran a place called Uz as the residence of Job.

THE AGE WHEN JOB LIVED.—EUSEBIUS fixes it two ages before Moses, i. e., about the time of Isaac: eighteen hundred years before Christ, and six hundred after the Deluge. Agreeing with this are the following considerations: 1. Job's length of life is patriarchal, two hundred years. 2. He alludes only to the earliest form of idolatry, viz., the worship of the sun, moon, and heavenly hosts (called Saba, whence arises the title Lord of Sabaoth, as opposed to Sabeanism) (ch. 31. 26–28). 3. The number of oxen and rams sacrificed, seven, as in the case of Balaam. God would not have sanctioned this after the giving of the Mosaic law, though He might graciously accommodate Himself to existing customs before the law. 4. The language of Job is Hebrew, interspersed occasionally with Syriac and Arabic expressions, implying a time when all the Shemitic tribes spoke one common tongue and had not branched into different dialects, Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic. 5. He speaks of the most ancient kind of writing, viz., sculpture. Riches also are reckoned by cattle. The Hebrew word, translated a piece of money, ought rather be rendered a lamb. 6. There is no allusion to the exodus from Egypt and to the miracles that accompanied it; nor to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (PATRICK, however, thinks there is); though there is to the Flood (ch. 22. 17); and these events, happening in Job's vicinity, would have been striking illustrations of the argument for God's interposition in destroying the wicked and vindicating the righteous, had Job and his friends known of them. Nor is there any undoubted reference to the Jewish law, ritual, and priesthood. 7. The religion of Job is that which prevailed among the patriarchs previous to the law; sacrifices performed by the head of the family; no officiating priesthood, temple, or consecrated altar.

THE WRITER.—All the foregoing facts accord with Job himself having been the author. The style of thought, imagery, and manners, are such as we should look for in the work of an Arabian emir. There is precisely that degree of knowledge of primitive tradition (see ch. 31. 33, as to Adam) which was universally spread abroad in the days of Noah and Abraham, and which was subsequently embodied in the early chapters of Genesis. Job, in his speeches, shows that he was much more competent to compose the work than Elihu, to whom LIGHTFOOT attributes it. The style forbids its being attributed to Moses, to whom its composition is by some attributed, "whilst he was among the Midianites, about B. C. 1520." But the fact, that it, though not a Jewish book, appears among the Hebrew sacred writings, makes it likely that it came to the knowledge of Moses during the forty years which he passed in parts of Arabia, chiefly near Horeb; and that he, by Divine guidance, introduced it as a sacred writing to the Israelites, to whom, in their affliction, the patience and restoration of Job were calculated to be a lesson of especial utility. That it is inspired appears from the fact that Paul (1 Corinthians 3. 19) quotes it (Job 5. 13) with the formula, "It is written." Our Saviour, too (Matthew 24. 28), plainly refers to Job 29. 30. Cf. also James 4. 10 and 1 Peter 5. 6 with Job 22. 29; Romans 11. 34, 35 with Job 15. 8. It is probably the oldest book in the world. It stands among the Hagiographa in the threefold division of Scripture into the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa ("Psalms," Luke 24. 44).

DESIGN OF THE BOOK.—It is a public debate in poetic form on an important question concerning the Divine government; moreover the prologue and epilogue, which are in prose, shed the interest of a living history over the debate, which would otherwise be but a contest of abstract reasonings. To each speaker of the three friends three speeches are assigned. Job having no one to stand by him is allowed to reply to each speech of each of the three. Eliphaz, as the eldest, leads the way. Zophar, at his third turn, failed to speak, thus virtually owning himself overcome (ch. 27.); and therefore Job continued his reply, which forms three speeches (chs. 26., 27., 28.; 29–31). Elihu (ch. 32–37.) is allowed four speeches. Jehovah makes three addresses (ch. 38.–41). Thus, throughout there is a tripartite division. The whole is divided into three parts—the prologue, poem proper, and epilogue. The poem, into three—1. The dispute of Job and his three friends; 2. The address of Elihu; 3. The address of God. There are three series in the controversy, and in the same order. The epilogue (ch. 42.) also is threefold; Job's justification, reconciliation with his friends; restoration. The speakers also in their successive speeches regularly advance from less to greater vehemence. With all this artificial composition, everything seems easy and natural.

The question to be solved, as exemplified in the case of Job, is, Why are the righteous afflicted consistently with God's justice? The doctrine of retribution after death, no doubt, is the great solution of the difficulty. And to it Job plainly refers in ch. 14. 14, and ch. 19. 25. The objection to this, that the explicitness of the language on the resurrection in Job is inconsistent with the obscurity on the subject in the early books of the Old Testament, is answered by the fact, that Job enjoyed the Divine vision (ch. 38. 1; 42. 5), and therefore, by inspiration, foretold these truths. Next, the revelations made outside of Israel being few needed to be the more explicit; thus Balaam's prophecy (Numbers 24. 17) was clear enough to lead the wise men of the East by the star (Matthew 2.); and in the age before the written law, it was the more needful for God not to leave himself without witness of the truth. Still Job evidently did not fully realize the significance designed by the Spirit in his own words (cf. 1 Peter 1. 11, 12). The doctrine, though existing, was not plainly revealed or at least understood. Hence he does not mainly refer to this solution. Yes, and even now, we need something in addition to this solution. David, who firmly believed in a future retribution (Psalm 16. 10; 17. 15), still felt the difficulty not entirely solved thereby (Psalm 83). The solution is not in Job's or in his three friends' speeches. It must, therefore, be in Elihu's. God will hold a final judgment, no doubt, to clear up all that seems dark in his present dealings; but He also now providentially and morally governs the world and all the events of human life. Even the comparatively righteous are not without sin which needs to be corrected. The justice and love of God administer the altogether deserved and merciful correction. Affliction to the godly is thus mercy and justice in disguise. The afflicted believer on repentance sees this, "Via crucis, via salutis." Though afflicted, the godly are happier even now than the ungodly, and when affliction has attained its end, it is removed by the Lord. In the Old Testament the consolations are more temporal and outward; in the New Testament, more spiritual; but in neither to the entire exclusion of the other. "Prosperity," says Bacon, "is the blessing of the Old Testament; adversity that of the New Testament, which is the mark of God's more especial favour. Yet even in the Old Testament, if you listen to David's harp, you shall hear as many hearse-like airs as carols; and the pencil of the Holy Ghost has laboured more in describing the afflictions of Job than the felicities of Solomon. Prosperity is not without many fears and distastes; and adversity is not without comforts and hopes." This solution of Elihu is seconded by the addresses of God, in which it is shown God must be just (because He is God), as Elihu had shown how God can be just, and yet the righteous be afflicted. It is also acquiesced in by Job, who makes no reply. God reprimands the three friends, but not Elihu. Job's general course is approved; he is directed to intercede for his friends, and is restored to double his former prosperity.

POETRY.—In all countries poetry is the earliest form of composition as being best retained in the memory, and in the East especially it was customary to preserve their sentiments in a terse, proverbial, and poetic form (called maschal). Hebrew poetry is not constituted by the rhythm or metre, but in a form peculiar to itself:—1. In an alphabetical arrangement somewhat like our acrostic. For instance, Lamentations 1. 2. The same verse repeated at intervals; as Psalms 42., 107. 3. Rhythm of gradation. Psalms of degrees, 120.–134, in which the expression of the previous verse is resumed and carried forward in the next (Psalm 121). 4. The chief characteristic of Hebrew poetry is parallelism, or the correspondence of the same ideas in the parallel clauses. The earliest instance is Enoch's prophecy (Jude 14), and Lamech's parody of it (Genesis 4. 23). Three kinds occur—(1.) The synonymous parallelism, in which the second is a repetition of the first, with or without increase of force (Psalm 22. 27; Isaiah 15. 1); sometimes with double parallelism (Isaiah 1. 15). (2.) The antithetic, in which the idea of the second clause is the converse of that in the first (Proverbs 10. 1). (3.) The synthetic, where there is a correspondence between different propositions, noun answering to noun, verb to verb, member to member, the sentiment, moreover, being not merely echoed, or put in contrast, but enforced by accessory ideas (Job 3. 3–9). Also alternate (Isaiah 51. 19). "Desolation and destruction, famine and sword," i. e., desolation by famine, and destruction by the sword. Introverted; where the fourth answers to the first, and the third to the second (Matthew 7. 6). Parallelism thus often affords a key to the interpretation. For fuller information, see Lowth (Introduction to Isaiah, and Lecture on Hebrew Poetry) and Spirit of Hebrew Poetry by Herder, translated by Marsh. The simpler and less artificial forms of parallelism prevail in Job—a mark of its early age.

CHAPTER I.

PART I.—PROLOGUE OR HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION IN PROSE—CHAPTERS I., II.

Ver. 1-5. THE HOLINESS OF JOB, HIS WEALTH, &c. 1. Uz—North of Arabia Deserta, lying towards the Euphrates; it was in this neighbourhood, and not in that of Idumæa, that the Chaldeans and Sabæans who plundered him dwelt. The Arabs divide their country into the north, called Sham, or "the left;" and the south, called Yemen, or "the right;" for they faced east, and so the west was on their left, and the south on their right. Arabia Deserta was on the east, Arabia Petræa on the west, and Arabia Felix on the south. Job—The name comes from an Arabic word meaning to return, viz., to God, to repent, referring to his end [EICHORN], or rather from a Hebrew word signifying one to whom enmity was shown, greatly tried. [GESENIUS.] Significant names were often given among the Hebrews, from some event of the after life (cf. Isaiah 8, 18; Genesis 4, 2, Abel—a feeder of sheep). So the emir of Uz was by general consent called Job, on account of his trials. The only other person so called was a son of Issachar (Genesis 46, 13). perfect—Not absolute or faultless perfection (cf. 9, 20; Ecclesiastes 7, 20), but integrity, sincerity, and consistency on the whole, in all relations of life (Genesis 6, 9; 17, 1; Proverbs 10, 9; Matthew 5, 48). It was the fear of God that kept Job from evil (Proverbs 8, 13). 3. she-asses—Prized on account of their milk, and for riding (Judges 5, 10). Houses and lands are not mentioned among the emir's wealth, as nomadic tribes dwell in movable tents, and live chiefly by pasture, the right to the soil not being appropriated by individuals. The "five hundred yoke of oxen" imply, however, that Job tilled the soil. He seems also to have had a dwelling in a town, in which respect he differed from the patriarchs. Camels are well called ships of the desert, especially valuable for caravans, as being able to lay in a store of water that suffices them for days, and sustaining life on a very few thistles or thorns. household—(Genesis 26, 14.) The other rendering which the Hebrew admits, husbandry, is not so probable. men of the east—Denoting in Scripture those living east of Palestine; as the people of North Arabia Deserta (Judges 6, 3; Ezekiel 25, 4). 4. every one his day—viz., the birth-day (ch. 3, 1). Implying the love and harmony of the members of the family, as contrasted with the ruin which soon broke up such a scene of happiness. The sisters are specified, as these feasts were not for revelry, which would be inconsistent with the presence of sisters. These latter were invited by the brothers, though they gave no invitations in return. 5. when the days of feasting were gone about—i.e., at the end of all the birth-days collectively, when the banquets had gone round through all the families. Job sanctified them—By offering up as many expiatory burnt offerings as he had sons (Leviticus 1, 4). This was done in the morning (Genesis 22, 3; Leviticus 6, 12). So Jesus began devotions early (Mark 1, 35). The holocaust, or burnt offering, in patriarchal times, was offered (lit., caused to ascend, referring to the smoke ascending to heaven) by each father of a family officiating as priest in behalf of his household. cursed God—The same Hebrew word means to curse, and to bless; GESENIUS says, the original sense is to kneel, and thus it came to mean bending the knee in order to invoke either a blessing or a curse. Cursing is a perversion of blessing, as all sin is of goodness. Sin is a degeneracy, not a generation. It is not, however, likely that Job should fear the possibility of his sons cursing God. The sense bid farewell to, derived from the blessing customary at parting, seems sufficient (Genesis 47, 10). Thus UMBREIT translates "may have dismissed God from their hearts;" viz., amidst the intoxication of pleasure (Proverbs 20, 1). This act illustrates Job's "fear of God," v. 1.

6-12. SATAN, APPEARING BEFORE GOD, FALSELY ACCUSES JOB. 6. sons of God—Angels (ch. 38, 7; 1 Kings 22, 19). They present themselves to render account of their "ministry" in other parts of the universe (Hebrews 1, 14). the Lord—Heb., JEHOVAH—the self-existing God, faithful to His promises. God says (Exodus 6, 3), that He was not known to the patriarchs by this name. But, as the name occurs previously in Genesis, 2, 7-9, &c., what must be meant is, not until the time of delivering Israel by Moses was He known peculiarly and publicly in the character which the name means, viz., making things to be, fulfilling the promises made to their forefathers. This name, therefore, here, is no objection against the antiquity of the book of Job. Satan—The tradition was widely spread that he had been the agent in Adam's temptation. Hence his name is given without comment. The feeling with which he looks on Job is similar to that with which he looked on Adam in Paradise: emboldened by his success in the case of one not yet fallen, he is confident that the piety of Job, one of a fallen race, will not stand the test. He had fallen himself (ch. 4, 19; 15, 15; Jude 6). In the book of Job, Satan is first designated by name: Satan, in Hebrew, one who lies in wait; an Adversary in a court of justice (1 Chronicles 21, 1; Psalm 109, 6; Zechariah 3, 1); the accuser (Revelation 12, 10). He has got the law of God on his side by man's sin, and against man. But Jesus Christ has fulfilled the law for us; justice is once more on man's side against Satan (Isaiah 42, 21); and so Jesus Christ can plead as our Advocate against the adversary (Romans 8, 33). Devil is the Greek name—the stander over, or accuser. He is subject to God, who uses his ministry for chastising man. In Arabic, Satan is often applied to a serpent (Genesis 3, 1). He is called Prince of this world (John 12, 31); the God of this world (2 Corinthians 4, 4); Prince of the power of the air (Ephesians 2, 2). God here questions him, in order to vindicate His own ways before angels. 7. going to and fro—Rather, hurrying rapidly to and fro. The original idea in Arabic is the heat of haste (1 Peter 5, 8; Matthew 12, 43). Satan seems to have had some peculiar connection with this earth. Perhaps he was formerly its ruler under God. Man succeeded to the vice-royalty (Genesis 1, 26; Psalm 8, 6). Man lost it, and Satan became Prince of this world. The Son of man (Psalm 8, 4)—the representative man, regains the forfeited inheritance (Revelation 11, 15). Satan's replies are characteristically curt and short. When the angels appear before God, Satan is among them, even as there was a Judas among the apostles. 8. considered—Marg., set thine heart on; i. e., considered attentively. No true servant of God escapes the eye of the Adversary of God. 9. fear God for naught—It is a mark of the children of Satan to sneer and not give credit to any for disinterested piety. Not so much God's gifts, as God Himself is "the reward" of His people (Genesis 15, 1). 10. his substance is increased—Lit., spread out like a flood; Job's herds covered the face of the country. 11. curse thee to thy face—In antithesis to God's praise of him (v. 8), "one that feareth God." Satan's words are too true of many. Take away their prosperity and you take away their religion (Malachi 3, 14). 12. in thy power—Satan has no power against man till God gives it. God would not touch Job with His own hand, though Satan asks this (v. 11, thine), but allows the enemy to do so.

13-22. JOB, IN AFFLICTION, BLESSES GOD, &c. 13. wine—Not specified in verse 4. The mirth inspired by the wine here contrasts the more sadly with the alarm which interrupted it. 14. the asses feeding beside them—Heb., she-asses. A graphic picture of rural repose and peace; the more dreadful, therefore, by contrast is the sudden attack of the plundering Arabs. 15. Sabæans—Not those of Arabia Felix, but those of Arabia Deserta, descending from Sheba, grandson of Abraham and Keturah (Genesis 25, 3). The Bedouin Arabs of the present day resemble, in marauding habits, these Sabæans (cf. Genesis 16, 12). I alone am escaped—Cunningly contrived by Satan. One in each case escapes (v. 16, 17, 19), and brings the same kind of message. This was to overwhelm Job, and leave him no time to recover from the rapid succession of calamities—"misfortunes seldom come single." 16. fire of God—Hebraism for a mighty fire; as cedars of God—lofty cedars. Not lightning, which would not consume all the sheep and servants. UMBREIT understands it of the burning wind of Arabia, called by the Turks "wind of poison." "The prince of the power of the air" is permitted to nave control over such destructive agents. 17. Chaldeans—Not merely robbers as the Sabeans; but experienced in war, as is implied by "they set in array three bands" (Habakkuk 1. 6-8). RAWLNSON distinguishes three periods: 1. When their seat of empire was in the south, towards the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates. The Chaldean period, from 2300 B. C. to 1500 B. C. In this period was Chedorlaomer (Genesis 14), the Kurur of Hur or Ur of the Chaldees, in the Assyrian inscriptions, and the conqueror of Syria. 2. From 1500 to 625 B. C., the Assyrian period. 3. From 625 to 538 B. C. (when Cyrus took Babylon), the Babylonian period. Chaldees in Hebrew—Chasdim. They were akin, perhaps, to the Hebrews, as Abraham's sojourn in Ur, and the name Chesed, a nephew of Abraham, imply. The three bands were probably in order to attack the three separate thousands of Job's camels (v. 3). 19. wind from the wilderness—South of Job's house. The tornado came the more violently over the desert as being uninterrupted (Isaiah 21. 1; Hosea 13. 15), the young men—Rather, the young people; including the daughters (so in Ruth 2. 21). 20. Job arose—Not necessarily from sitting. Inward excitement is implied, and the beginning to do anything. He had heard the other messages calmly, but on hearing of the death of his children, then he arose; or, as ERCHORN translates, he started up (2 Samuel 13. 31). The rending of the mantle was the conventional mark of deep grief (Genesis 37. 34). Orientals wear a tunic or shirt, and loose pantaloons; and over these a flowing mantle (especially great persons and women). Shaving the head was also usual in grief (Jeremiah 41. 5; Micah 1. 16). 21. naked—(1 Timothy 6. 7). "Mother's womb" is poetically the earth, the universal mother (Ecclesiastes 5. 15; 12. 7; Psalm 139. 15). Job herein realizes God's assertion (v. 8) against Satan's (v. 11). Instead of cursing, he blesses the name of JEHOVAH (the Hebrew). The name of Jehovah, is Jehovah himself, as manifested to us in His attributes (Isaiah 9. 6). 22. nor charged God foolishly—Rather, allowed himself to commit no folly against God. [UMBREIT.] Chapter 2. 10 proves that this is the meaning. Not as marg. attributed no folly to God. Hasty words against God, though natural in the bitterness of grief, are folly; lit., an insipid, unsavoury thing (ch. 6. 6; Jeremiah 23. 13, margin). Folly in Scripture is continually equivalent to wickedness. For when man sins, it is himself, not God, whom he injures (Proverbs 8. 36). We are to submit to trials, not because we see the reasons for them, nor yet as though they were matters of chance, but because God wills them, and has a right to send them, and has His own good reasons in sending them.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-8. SATAN FURTHER TEMPTS JOB. 1. a day—Appointed for the angels giving an account of their ministry to God. The words to present himself before the Lord occur here, though not in 1. 6, as Satan has now a special report to make as to Job. 3. integrity—lit., completeness; so "perfect," another form of the same Heb. word, ch. 11. movedst . . . against—So 1 Samuel 26. 19; cf. 1 Chronicles 21. 1 with 2 Samuel 24. 1. 4. Skin for skin—A proverb. Supply, He will give. The skin is figurative for any outward good. Nothing outward is so dear that a man will not exchange it for some other outward good; but (not yet) life, the inward good, cannot be replaced; a man will sacrifice everything else for its sake. Satan sneers bitterly at man's egotism, and says, Job bears the loss of property and children, because these are mere outward and exchangeable goods, but he will give up all things, even his religion, in order to save his life, if you touch his bones and flesh. Skin and life are in antithesis. [UMBREIT.] The martyrs prove Satan's sneer false. ROSEN-MULLER explains it not so well. A man willingly gives up another's skin (life) for his own skin (life). So Job might bear the loss of his children, &c., with equalmunity, so long as he remained unharmed himself; but when touched in his own person, he would renounce God. Thus the first "skin" means the other's skin, i. e., body; the second "skin," one's own, as in Exodus 21. 23. 6. but save—

Rather, only spare. Satan shows his ingenuity in inflicting pain, and also his knowledge of what man's body can bear without vital injury. 7. sore boils—Malignant boils. Rather, as it is singular in the Hebrew, a burning sore. Job was covered with one universal inflammation. The use of the potsherd agrees with this view. It was that form of leprosy called black (to distinguish it from the white), or elephantiasis, because the feet swell like those of the elephant. The Arabic judham (Deuteronomy 28. 35), where sore botch is rather the black burning boil (Isaiah 1. 6). 8. a potsherd—Not a piece of a broken earthen vessel, but an instrument made for scratching (the root of the Hebrew word is scratch); the sore was too disgusting to touch. "To sit in the ashes" marks the deepest mourning (Jonah 3. 6); also humility, as if the mourner were nothing but dust and ashes; so Abraham (Genesis 18. 27).

9-13. JOB REPROVES HIS WIFE. 9. curse God—Rather renounce God. Note 1. 5. [UMBREIT.] However, it was usual among the heathens, when disappointed in their prayers accompanied with offerings to their gods, to reproach and curse them. and die—i. e., take thy farewell of God and so die. For no good is to be got out of religion, either here or hereafter; or, at least, not in this life. [GILL.] Nothing makes the ungodly so angry as to see the godly under trial not angry. 10. the foolish women—Sin and folly are allied in Scripture (1 Samuel 25. 25; 2 Samuel 13. 13; Psalm 14. 1). receive evil—Bear willingly (Lamentations 3. 39). 11. Eliphaz—The view of RAWLNSON that "the names of Job's three friends represent the Chaldean times, about 700 B. C.," cannot be accepted. Eliphaz is an Idumean name, Esau's eldest son (Genesis 36. 4); and Teman, son of Eliphaz (15), called "duke." EUSEBIUS places Teman in Arabia Petraea (but see note 6. 19). Teman means at the right hand; and then the south, viz., part of Idumea; capital of Edom (Amos 1. 12). Hebrew geographers faced the east, not the north as we do; hence with them the right hand was the south. Temanites were famed for wisdom (Jeremiah 49. 7). BARUCH mentions them as "authors of fables (viz., proverbs embodying the results of observation), and searchers out of understanding." Bildad the Shuhite—Shuah (a pit), son of Abraham and Keturah (Genesis 25. 2). PROLEMY mentions the region Syceca, in Arabia Deserta, east of Batanea. Zophiar the Naamathite—Not of the Naamans in Judah (Joshua 15. 41), which was too distant; but some region in Arabia Deserta. FRETILIUS says there was a Naamath in Uz. 12. toward heaven—They threw violently ashes upwards, that they might fall on their heads and cover them. The deepest mourning (Joshua 7. 6; Acts 22. 23). 13. seven days . . . nights—They did not remain in the one posture and without food, &c., all this time, but for the most of this period daily and nightly. Sitting on the earth marked mourning (Lamentations 2. 10). Seven days was the usual length of it (Genesis 50. 10; 1 Samuel 31. 13). This silence may have been due to a rising suspicion of evil in Job; but chiefly because it is only ordinary griefs that find vent in language; extraordinary griefs are too great for utterance.

CHAPTER III.

THE POEM OR DEBATE ITSELF, 2.-12. 6; FIRST SERIES IN IT, 3.-11.; JOB FIRST 3.

Ver. 1-19. JOB CURSES THE DAY OF HIS BIRTH, AND WISHES FOR DEATH. 1. opened his mouth—The Orientals speak seldom, and then sententiously. Hence this formula expressing deliberation and gravity (Psalm 78. 2). Formally began. cursed his day—The strict Hebrew word for cursing; not the same as in ch. 1. 5. Job cursed his birth-day, but not his God. 2. spake—Hebrew, answered, i. e., not to any actual question that preceded, but to the question virtually involved in the case. His outburst is singularly wild and bold (Jeremiah 20. 14). To desire to die so as to be free from sin is a mark of grace; to desire to die so as to escape troubles is a mark of corruption. He was ill-fitted to die who was so unwilling to live. But his trials were greater, and his light less, than ours. 3. the night in which—Rather "the night which said."

The words in italics are not in the Hebrew. Night is personified and poetically made to speak. So in v. 7, and Psalm 19. 2. The birth of a male in the East is a matter of joy; often not so of a female. 4. Let not God regard it—Rather, more poetically, Seek it out. "Let not God stoop from his bright throne to raise it up from its dark hiding-place." The curse on the day in v. 3, is amplified in v. 4, 5; that on the night, in v. 6-10. 5. let the shadow of death—(deepest darkness, Isaiah 9. 2)—stain it—This is a later sense of the verb [GESENIUS], better the old and more poetic idea, "Let darkness (the ancient night of chaotic gloom) resume its rights over light (Genesis 1. 2), and claim that day as its own." a cloud—Collectively, a gathered mass of dark clouds. the blackness of the day terrify it—lit., the obscurations; whatever darkens the day. [GESENIUS.] The verb in Hebrew expresses sudden terrifying. May it be suddenly affrighted at its own darkness. UMBREIT explains it of magical incantations that darken the day, forming the climax to the previous clauses; v. 3 speaks of curseurs of the day similarly. But the former view is simpler. Others refer it to the poisonous simoom wind. 6. seize upon it—As its prey, i. e., utterly dissolve it. joined unto the days of the year—Rather, by poetic personification, "Let it not rejoice in the circle of days and nights and months, which form the circle of years." 7. solitary—Rather, unfruitful. "Would that it had not given birth to me," 8. them . . . that curse the day—If mourning be the right rendering in the latter clause of this verse, these words refer to the hired mourners of the dead (Jeremiah 9. 17). But the Hebrew for mourning elsewhere always denotes an animal, whether it be the crocodile or some huge serpent (Isaiah 27. 1), that is meant by leviathan. Therefore, the expression, curseurs of day, refers to magicians, who were believed to be able by charms to make a day one of evil omen. So Balaam, Numbers 22. 5. This accords with UMBREIT'S view (v. 7); or to the Ethiopians and Atlantes, who "used to curse the sun at his rising for burning up them and their country." [HERODOTUS.] Neoromancers claimed power to control or rouse wild beasts at will, as the Indian serpent-charmers at this day (Psalm 58. 5). Job does not say they had the power they claimed; but, supposing they had, may they curse the day. SCHUTTE'S renders it by supplying words (?) Let those that are ready for anything, call it (the day) the raiser up of leviathan, i. e., of a host of evils. 9. dawning of the day—lit., eyelashes of morning. The Arab poets call the sun the eye of day. His early rays, therefore, breaking forth before sunrise, are the opening eyelids or eyelashes of morning. 12. Why did the knees prevent me?—Old English for anticipate my wants. The reference is to the solemn recognition of a new-born child by the father, who used to place it on his knees as his own, whom he was bound to rear (Genesis 30. 3; 50. 23; Isaiah 63. 12). 13. Iain . . . quiet . . . slept—A gradation. I should not only have lain, but been quiet, and not only been quiet, but slept. Death in Scripture is called sleep (Psalm 13. 3); especially in the New Testament, where the resurrection-awakening is more clearly set forth (1 Corinthians 15. 51; 1 Thessalonians 4. 14; 5. 10.) 14. With kings . . . which built desolate places for themselves—Who built up for themselves what proved to be (not palaces, but) ruins! The wounded spirit of Job, once a great emir himself, sick of the vain struggles of mortal great men, after grandeur, contemplates the palaces of kings, now desolate heaps of ruins. His regarding the repose of death the most desirable end of the great ones of earth, wearied with heaping up perishable treasures, marks the irony that breaks out from the black clouds of melancholy. [UMBREIT.] The for themselves marks their selfishness. MICHAELIS explains it weakly of mausoleums, such as are found still, of stupendous proportions, in the ruins of Petra of Idumea. 15. filled their houses with silver—Some take this of the treasures which the ancients used to bury with their dead. But see last verse. 16. untimely birth—(Psalm 58. 8). Preferable to the life of the restless miser (Ecclesiastes 6. 3-5). 17. the wicked—The original meaning, those ever restless, full of desires (Isaiah 57. 20, 21). weary—lit., those whose strength is wearied out (Revelation 14. 13). 18. There the prisoners rest—From their chains. 19. servant—The slave is there manumitted from slavery.

20-26. HE COMPLAINS OF LIFE BECAUSE OF HIS ANGUISH. 20. Wherefore giveth He light—viz., God. Often omitted reverentially (ch. 21. 23; Ecclesiastes 9. 9). Light, i. e., life. The joyful light ill suits the mourners. The grave is most in unison with their feelings. 23. whose way is hid—The picture of Job is drawn from a wanderer who has lost his way, and who is hedged in, so as to have no exit of escape (Hosea 2. 6; Lamentations 3. 7, 9). 24. my sighing cometh before I eat—i. e., prevents my eating. [UMBREIT.] Or, conscious that the effort to eat brought on the disease, Job must sigh before eating. [ROSENMULLER.] Or, sighing takes the place of good (Psalm 42. 3). [GOOD.] But the first explanation accords best with the text. my roaring is poured out like the waters—An image from the rushing sound of water streaming. 25. the thing which I . . . feared is come upon me—In the beginning of his trials, when he heard of the loss of one blessing, he feared the loss of another, and when he heard of the loss of that, he feared the loss of a third. that which I was afraid of is come unto me—viz., the ill-opinion of his friends, as though he were a hypocrite on account of his trials. 26. I was not in safety . . . yet trouble came—Referring, not to his former state, but to the beginning of his troubles. From that time I had no rest, there was no intermission of sorrows. And (not, yet) a fresh trouble is coming, viz., my friends' suspicion of my being a hypocrite. This gives the starting-point to the whole ensuing controversy.

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 1-21. FIRST SPEECH OF ELIPHAZ. Eliphaz—The mildest of Job's three accusers. The greatness of Job's calamities, and his complaints against God, and the opinion that calamities are proofs of guilt, led the three to doubt Job's integrity. 2. If we essay to commune—Rather, two questions, "May we attempt a word with thee? Wilt thou be grieved at it?" Even pious friends often count that only a touch which we feel as a wound. 3. weak hands—Isaiah 35. 3; 2 Samuel 4. 1. 5. thou art troubled—Rather, unhinged, hast lost thy self-command (1 Thessalonians 3. 3). 6. Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, &c.—Does thy fear, thy confidence, &c., come to nothing? Does it come only to this, that thou faintest now? Rather, by transposition, "Is not thy fear (of God) thy hope? and the uprightness of thy ways thy confidence? If so, bethink thee, who ever perished being innocent?" [UMBREIT.] But Luke 13. 2, 3 shows that, though there is a retributive divine government even in this life, yet we cannot judge by the mere outward appearance. "One event is outwardly to the righteous and to the wicked" (Ecclesiastes 9. 2); but yet we must take it on trust, that God deals righteously even now (Psalm 37. 25; Isaiah 33. 16). Judge not by a part, but by the whole of a godly man's life, and by his end, even here (James 5. 11). The one and the same outward event is altogether a different thing in its inward bearings on the godly and on the ungodly even here. Even prosperity, much more calamity, is a punishment to the wicked (Proverbs 1. 32). Trials are chastisements for their good (to the righteous) (Psalm 119.; 67. 71, 75). See Preface on the Design of this book. 8. they that plough iniquity . . . reap the same—(Proverbs 22. 8; Hosea 8. 7; 10. 13; Galatians 6. 7, 8). 9. breath of his nostrils—God's anger. A figure from the fiery winds of the East (ch. 1. 16; Isaiah 5. 25; Psalm 18. 8, 15). 10. lion—i. e., Wicked men, upon whom Eliphaz wished to show that calamities come in spite of their various resources, just as destruction comes on the lion in spite of his strength (Psalm 58. 6; 2 Timothy 4. 17). Five different Hebrew terms here occur for lion. The raging of the lion (the tearer), and the roaring of the bellowing lion, and the teeth of the young lions, not whelps, but grown up enough to hunt for prey. The strong lion (English Version, old), &c., the whelps of the lioness ('not the stout lion, as English Version). [BARNES and UMBREIT.] The various phases of wickedness are expressed by this variety of terms: obliquely, Job, his wife and children, may be hinted at by the lion, lioness and whelps. The one verb, are broken, does not suit both subjects; therefore, supply "the roaring of the bellowing lion is silenced." The strong lion dies of want at last, and the whelps, torn from the mother, are scattered, and the race becomes extinct. 12. a thing—Hebrew, a word. Eliphaz confirms his view by a Divine declaration which was secretly and unexpectedly imparted to him, a little—lit., a whisper. Implying the still silence around, and that more was conveyed than articulate words could utter (ch. 26. 14; 2 Corinthians 12. 4). 13. In thoughts from the visions—[So Winer and English Version.] Whilst revolving night visions previously made to him (Daniel 2. 29). Rather, "In my manifold (Hebrew, divided) thoughts, before the visions of the night commenced;" therefore not a delusive dream (Psalm 4. 4). [UMBREIT.] deep sleep—(Genesis 2. 21; 15. 12). 16. It stood still—At first the apparition glides before Eliphaz, then stands still, but with that shadowy indistinctness of form which creates such an impression of awe; a gentle murmur; not (English Version): there was silence: For in 1 Kings 19. 12, the voice, as opposed to the previous storm, denotes a gentle, still murmur. 17. mortal man . . . a man—Two Hebrew words for man are used; the first implying his feebleness; the second his strength. Whether feeble or strong, man is not righteous before God. 17. more just than God . . . more pure than his Maker—But this would be self-evident without an oracle. 18. folly—Imperfection is to be attributed to the angels, in comparison with Him. The holiness of some of them had given way (2 Peter 2. 4), and at best is but the holiness of a creature. Folly is the want of moral consideration. [UMBREIT.] 19. houses of clay—(2 Corinthians 5. 1). Houses made of sun-dried clay bricks are common in the East; they are easily washed away (Matthew 7. 27). Man's foundation is this dust (Genesis 3. 19). before the moth—Rather, as before the moth, which devours a garment (ch. 13. 28; Psalm 39. 11; Isaiah 50. 9). Man, who cannot, in a physical point of view, stand before the very moth, surely cannot, in a moral, stand before God. 20. from morning to evening—Unceasingly; or, better, between the morning and evening of one short day (so Exodus 18. 14; Isaiah 38. 12). "They are destroyed;" better, "they would be destroyed," if God withdrew His loving protection. Therefore man must not think to be holy before God, but to draw holiness and all things else from God (v. 17.) 21. their excellency—(Psalm 39. 11; 146. 4; 1 Corinthians 13. 8). But UMBREIT, by an Oriental image from a bow, useless, because unstrung, "Their nerve or string would be torn away." MICHAELIS, better in accordance with v. 19, makes the allusion be to the cords of a tabernacle taken down (Isaiah 33. 20). they die, even without wisdom—Rather, "They would perish, yet not according to wisdom," but according to arbitrary choice, if God were not infinitely wise and holy. The design of the spirit is to show that the continued existence of weak man proves the inconceivable wisdom and holiness of God, which alone save man from ruin. [UMBREIT.] BENGEI shows from Scripture, that God's holiness (Hebrew Kadosh) comprehends all his excellencies and attributes. DE WETTE loses the scope, in explaining it, of the shortness of man's life, contrasted with the angels "before they have attained to wisdom."

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-27. ELIPHAZ'S CONCLUSION FROM THE VISION. 1. if there be any, &c.—Rather will He (God) reply to thee? Job, after the revelation just given, cannot be so presumptuous as to think God or any of the holy ones (Daniel 4. 17; angels) round His throne, will vouchsafe a reply (a judicial expression) to his rebellious complaint. 2. wrath . . . envy—Fretful and passionate complaints; such as Eliphaz charged Job with (ch. 4. 5; so Proverbs 14. 30). Not, the wrath of God killeth the foolish, and His envy, &c. 3. the foolish—The wicked, I have seen the sinner spread his roots wide in prosperity, yet circumstances suddenly occurred which gave occasion for his once prosperous dwelling being curst as desolate (Psalm 37. 35, 36; Jeremiah 17. 8). 4. His children . . . crushed in the gate—A judicial formula. The gate was the place of judgment, and of other public proceedings (Psalm 127. 5; Proverbs 22. 22; Genesis 23. 10; Deuteronomy 21. 19). Such propylæa have been found in the Assyrian remains. Eliphaz obliquely alludes to the calamity which cut off Job's children. 5. even out of the thorns—Even when part of the grain remains hanging on the thorn bushes (or, is growing among thorns, Matthew 13. 7), the hungry gleaner does not grudge the trouble of taking even it away, so clean swept away is the harvest of the wicked. the robber—As the Sabæans, who robbed Job. Rather, translate the thirsty, as the antithesis in the parallelism, the hungry, proves. 6. Although—Rather, for truly, [UMBREIT.] affliction cometh not forth of the dust—Like a weed, of its own accord. Eliphaz hints that the cause of it lay with Job himself. 7. Yet—Rather, Truly, or, But Affliction does not come from chance, but is the appointment of God for sin; i. e., the original birth-sin of man. Eliphaz passes from the particular sin and consequent suffering of Job to the universal sin and suffering of mankind. Troubles spring from man's common sin by as necessary a law of natural consequences as sparks (Hebrew, sons of coal) fly upward. Troubles are many and fiery, as sparks (1 Peter 4. 12; Isaiah 43. 2). UMBREIT for sparks has birds of prey; lit., sons of lightning, not so well. 8. Therefore (as affliction is ordered by God, on account of sin), I would have you to seek unto God (Isaiah 8. 19; Amos 5. 8; Jeremiah 5. 21). 11. Connected with v. 9. His unsearchable dealings are with a view to raise the humble (and abase the proud), Luke 1. 52. Therefore Job ought to turn humbly to Him. 12. enterprise—lit., realization. The Hebrew combines in the one word the two ideas, wisdom and happiness, enduring existence being the etymological and philosophical root of the combined notion. [UMBREIT.] 13. Paul (1 Corinthians 3. 19) quoted this clause with the formula establishing its inspiration, it is written. He cites the exact Hebrew words, not as he usually does the LXX. Greek version (Psalm 9. 15). Haman was hanged on the gallows he prepared for Mordecai (Esther 5. 14; 7. 10). The wise—the cunning, is carried headlong—Their scheme is precipitated before it is ripe. 14. Judicial blindness often is sent upon keen men of the world (Deuteronomy 23. 29; Isaiah 59. 10; John 9. 39). 15. From the sword which proceedeth from their mouth (Psalm 59. 7; 57. 4). 16. the poor hath hope—of the interposition of God. iniquity stoppeth her mouth—(Psalm 107. 42; Micah 7. 9, 10; Isaiah 52. 15). Especially at the last day, through shame (Jude 15; Matthew 22. 12). The mouth was the offender (v. 15), and the mouth shall then be stopped (Isaiah 25. 8) at the end. 17. happy—Not that the actual suffering is joyous; but the consideration of the righteousness of Him who sends it, and the end for which it is sent, make it a cause for thankfulness, not for complaints, such as Job had uttered (Hebrews 12. 11). Eliphaz implies that the end in this case is to call back Job from the particular sin of which he takes for granted that Job is guilty. Paul seems to allude to this passage in Hebrews 12. 5; so James 1. 12; Proverbs 3. 12. Eliphaz does not give due prominence to this truth, but rather to Job's sin. It is Elihu alone (32-37.) who fully dwells upon the truth, that affliction is mercy and justice in disguise, for the good of the sufferer. 18. he maketh sore, and bindeth up—(Deuteronomy 32. 39; Hosea 6. 1; 1 Samuel 2. 6). An image from binding up a wound. The healing art consisted much at that time in external applications. 19. in six . . . yea, in seven—(Proverbs 6. 16; Amos 1. 8). The Hebrew idiom fixes on a certain number (here six), in order to call attention as to a thing of importance; then increases the force by adding, with a yea, nay seven, the next higher number; here seven, the sacred and perfect number. In all possible troubles; not merely in the precise number seven. 20. power—(Jeremiah 5. 12). Hebrew, hands, of the sworn—(Ezekiel 35. 5, Margin) Hands are given to the sword personified as a living agent. 21. (Psalm 31. 20; Jeremiah 18. 18.) Smile (Psalm 73. 9). 22. famine thou shalt laugh—Not, in spite of destruction and famine, which is true (Habakkuk 3. 17, 18), though not the truth meant by Eliphaz, but because those calamities shall not come upon thee. A different Hebrew word from that in v. 20; there, famine in general; here, the languid state of those wanting proper nutriment. [BARNES.] 23. in league with the stones of the field—They shall not hurt the fertility of thy soil; nor the wild beasts thy fruits. Spoken in Arabia Deserta, where stones abounded. Arabia, derived from Arabah—a desert plain. The first clause of this verse answers to the first clause of verse 22; and the last of this verse to the last of that verse. The full realization of this is yet future (Isaiah 65. 23, 25; Hosea 2. 18). 24. know—“Thou shalt rest in the assurance, that thine habitation is the abode of peace; and (if) thou numberest thine herd, thine expectations prove not fallacious.” [UMBREIT.] Sin does not agree with the context. The Hebrew word—to miss a mark, said of archers (Judges 20. 16). The Hebrew for “habitation” primarily means the fold for cattle; and for “visit,” often to take an account of, to number. “Peace” is the common Eastern salutation; including inward and outward prosperity. 25. as the grass—(Psalm 72. 16). Properly, herb bearing seed (Genesis 1. 11, 12). 26. in full age—So full of days (42. 17; Genesis 35. 20). Not mere length of years, but ripeness for death, one's inward and outward full development not being prematurely cut short, is denoted (Isaiah 65. 22). Thou shalt come, not lit., but expressing willingness to die. Eliphaz speaks from the Old Testament point of view, which made full years a reward of the righteous (Psalm 91. 16; Exodus 20. 12), and premature death the lot of the wicked (Psalm 55. 23). The righteous are immortal till their work is done. To keep them longer would be to render them less fit to die. God takes them at their best (Isaiah 57. 1). The good are compared to wheat (Matthew 13. 30). cometh in—lit., ascends. The corn is lifted up off the earth and carried home; so the good man “is raised into the heap of sheaves.” [UMBREIT.] 27. Searched it . . . for thy good—lit., for thyself (Psalm 111. 2; Proverbs 2. 4; 9. 12).

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-30. REPLY OF JOB TO ELIPHAZ. 2. thoroughly weighed—Oh that, instead of censuring my complaints when thou oughtest rather to have sympathized with me, thou wouldst accurately compare together my sorrow, and my misfortunes; these latter outweigh in the balance the former. 3. the sand—(Proverbs 27. 3). are swallowed up—See Margin. So Psalm 77. 4. But Job plainly is apologizing, not for not having had words enough, but for having spoken too much and too boldly; and the Hebrew is, to speak rashly. [UMBREIT, GESENIUS, ROSENMULLER.] “Therefore were my words so rash.” 4. arrows . . . within me—have pierced me. A poetic image representing the avenging Almighty armed with bow and arrows (Psalm 38. 2, 3). Here the arrows are poisoned. Peculiarly appropriate, in reference to the burning pains which penetrated, like poison, into the inmost parts—“spirit;” as contrasted with mere surface flesh wounds of Job's body. set themselves in array—A military image (Judges 20. 33). All the terrors which the Divine wrath can muster are set in array against me (Isaiah 42. 13). 5. Neither wild animals, as the wild ass, nor tame, as the ox, are dissatisfied when well supplied with food. The braying of the one, and the lowing of the other, prove distress and want of palatable food. So, Job argues, if he complains, it is not without cause; viz., his pains, which are, as it were, disgusting food, which God feeds him with—end of verse 7. But he should have remembered a rational being should evince a better spirit than the brute. 6. unsavoury—Tasteless, insipid. Salt is a chief necessary of life to an Eastern, whose food is mostly vegetable. the white—lit., spittle (1 Samuel 12. 13), which the white of an egg resembles. 7. To touch is contrasted with meat. “My taste refused even to touch it, and yet am I fed with such meat of sickness.” The second clause lit., is, “Such is like the sickness of my food.” The natural taste abhors even to touch insipid food, and such forms my nourishment. For my sickness is like such nauseous food. [UMBREIT.]

(Psalm 42. 3; 80. 5; 102. 9). No wonder, then, I complain. 8. To desire death is no necessary proof of fitness for death. The ungodly sometimes desire it, so as to escape troubles, without thought of the hereafter. The godly desire it, in order to be with the Lord; but they patiently wait God's will. 9. destroy—lit., grind or crush (Isaiah 3. 15). let loose his hand—God had put forth His hand only so far as to wound the surface of Job's flesh (ch. 1. 12; 2. 6); he wishes that hand to be let loose, so as to wound deeply and vitally. cut me off—Metaphor from a weaver cutting off the web, when finished, from the thrum fastening it to the loom (Isaiah 38. 12). 10. I would harden myself—Rather, “I would exult in the pain,” if I knew that that pain would hasten my death. [GESENIUS.] UMBREIT translates the Hebrew of “Let Him not spare,” unsparing; and joins it with pain. The English Version is more vivid. concealed—I have not disowned, in word or deed, the commands of the Holy One (Psalm 119. 46; Acts 20. 20). He says this in answer to Eliphaz' insinuation that he is a hypocrite. God is here called the Holy One, to imply man's reciprocal obligation to be holy, as He is holy (Leviticus 19. 2). 11. What strength have I, so as to warrant the hope of restoration to health? a hope which Eliphaz had suggested. And what but a miserable end of life is before me, that I should desire to prolong life? [UMBREIT.] UMBREIT and ROSENMULLER not so well translate the last words to be patient. 12. Disease had so attacked him, that his strength would need to be hard as a stone, and his flesh like brass, not to sink under it. But he has only flesh, like other men. It must, therefore, give way; so that the hope of restoration suggested by Eliphaz is vain (see Note 5, 11). 13. Is not my help in me?—The interrogation is better omitted. “There is no help in me!” For “wisdom,” deliverance is a better rendering. “And deliverance is driven quite from me.” 14. pity—A proverb. Charity is the love which judges indulgently of our fellow-men: it is put on a par with truth in Proverbs 3. 3, for they together form the essence of moral perfection. [UMBREIT.] It is the spirit of Christianity (1 Peter 4. 8; 1 Corinthians 13. 7; Proverbs 10. 12; 17. 17). If it ought to be used towards all men, much more towards friends. But he who does not use it forsaketh (renounceth) the fear of the Almighty (James 2. 13). 15. Those whom I regarded as my brethren, from whom I looked for faithfulness in my adversity, have disappointed me, as the streams failing from drought; wadys of Arabia, filled in the winter, but dry in the summer, which disappoint the caravans expecting to find water there. The fulness and noise of these temporary streams answers to the past large and loud professions of my friends; their dryness in summer, to the failure of the friendship when needed. The Arab proverb says of a treacherous friend, “I trust not in thy torrent” (Isaiah 58. 11, Margin). streams of brooks—Rather, “the brook in the ravines which passes away.” It has no perpetual spring of water to renew it (unlike “the fountain of living waters,” Jeremiah 2. 13; Isaiah 33. 16, at the end); and thus passes away as rapidly as it arose. 16. blackish—lit., Go as a mourner in black clothing (Psalm 34. 14). A vivid and poetic image to picture the stream turbid and black with melted ice and snow, descending from the mountains into the valley. In the next clause, the snow dissolved is, in the poet's view, hid in the flood. [UMBREIT.] 17. wax warm—Rather, at the time when. (But they soon) [UMBREIT], “they become narrower (flow in a narrower bed), they are silent (cease to flow noisily); in the heat (of the sun) they are consumed or vanish out of their place. First the stream flows more narrowly—then becomes silent and still; at length every trace of water disappears by evaporation under the hot sun.” [UMBREIT.] 18. turned aside—Rather, Caravans (Hebrew travellers) turn aside from their way, by circuitous routes, to obtain water. They had seen the brook in spring full of water; and now in the summer heat, on their weary journey, they turn off their road by a devious route to reach the living waters, which they remembered with such pleasure. But, when “they go,” it is “into a desert.” [NOYES and UMBREIT.] Not as English Version, “They go to nothing,” which would be a tame repetition of the drying up of the waters in v. 17; instead of waters, they find an "empty wilderness;" and, not having strength to regain their road, bitterly disappointed, they perish. The terse brevity is most expressive.

19. the troops—i. e., Caravans. Tema, north of Arabia Deserta, near the Syrian desert; called from Tema son of Ishmael (Genesis 25. 15; Isalah 21. 14; Jeremiah 25. 23). Still so called by the Arabs. Verses 19, 20 give another picture of the mortification of disappointed hopes, viz., those of the caravans on the direct road, anxiously awaiting the return of their companions from the distant valley. The mention of the locality whence the caravans came gives living reality to the picture. Sheba refers here not to the marauders in North Arabia Deserta (ch. 1. 15), but to the merchants (Ezekiel 27. 22) in the south, in Arabia Felix or Yemen, "afar off" (Jeremiah 6. 20; Matthew 12. 42; Genesis 10. 28). Caravans are first mentioned (Genesis 37. 25); men needed to travel thus in companies across the desert, for defence against the roving robbers, and for mutual accommodation. "The companies waited for them," cannot refer to the caravans who had gone in quest of the waters; for v. 18 describes their utter destruction. 20. lit., each had hoped, viz., that their companions would find water. The greater had been their hopes the more bitter now their disappointment; they came thither, to the place, and were ashamed; lit., their countenances burn, an Oriental phrase for the shame and consternation of received expectation. So ashamed as to disappointment (Romans 5. 5). 21. As the dried-up brook is to the caravan, so are ye to me, viz., a nothing; ye might as well not be in existence. [UMBREIT.] The Margin, like to them or it (viz., the waters of the brook), is not so good a reading. ye see, and are afraid—Ye are struck aghast at the sight of my misery, and ye lose presence of mind. Job puts this mild construction on their failing to relieve him with affectionate consolation. 22. And yet I did not ask you to bring me a gift; or to pay for me out of your substance a reward (to the Judge, to redeem me from my punishment); all I asked from you was affectionate treatment. 23. the mighty—The oppressor, or creditor, in whose power the debtor was. [UMBREIT.] 24, 25. Irony—If you can teach me the right view, I am willing to be set right, and hold my tongue; and to be made to see my error. But then if your words be really the right words, how is it that they are so feeble? "Yet how feeble are the words of what you call the right view." So the Hebrew is used (in Micah 2. 10; 1. 9). The English Version, "How powerful," &c., does not agree so well with the last clause of the v. "And what will your arguings reprove?" lit., "the reproofs which proceed from you;" the emphasis is on you; you may find fault, who are not in my situation. [UMBREIT.] 26. Do you imagine, or mean, to reprove words, and (to reprove) the speeches of one desperate, (which are) as wind, mere nothings, not to be so narrowly taken to task? UMBREIT not so well takes the Hebrew for as wind, "as sentiments;" making formal sentiments antithetical to mere speeches, and supplying, not the word "reprove," but "would you regard," from the first clause. 27. "Ye overwhelm:" lit., "ye cause (supply, your anger) [UMBREIT], a net, viz., of sophistry [NOYES and SCHUTTENS], to fall upon the desolate (one bereft of help, like the fatherless orphan); and ye dig (a pit) for your friend," i. e., try to ensnare him, to catch him in the use of unguarded language. [NOYES.] (Psalm 57. 6); metaphor from hunters catching wild beasts in a pit covered with brushwood to conceal it. UMBREIT from the Syriac, and answering to his interpretation of the first clause, has "Would you be indignant against your friend?" The Hebrew in ch. 41. 6, means to feast upon. As the first clause asks, "Would you catch him in a net?" so this follows up the image, "And would you next feast upon him, and his miseries?" So LXX. 28. be content—Rather, be pleased to—look. Since you have so falsely judged my words, look upon me, i. e., upon my countenance: for (it is evident before your faces) if I lie; my countenance will betray me, if I be the hypocrite that you suppose. 29. Return—Rather, retract your charges: "Let it not be iniquity;" i. e., (retract) that injustice may not be done me. Yea retract, "my righteousness is in it;" i. e., my right is involved in this matter. 30. Will you say that my guilt lies in the organ of speech, and will you call it to account? or is it that my taste (palate) or discernment is not capable to form a judgment of perverse things? Is it thus you will explain the fact of my having no consciousness of guilt? [UMBREIT.]

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-21. JOB EXCUSES HIS DESIRE FOR DEATH. 1. appointed time—Better, warfare, hard conflict with evil (so in Isalah 40. 2; Daniel 10. 1; and ch. 14. 14); translate it appointed time (ch. 14. 5, 13; Psalm 39. 4). Job reverts to the sad picture of man, however grand, which he had drawn (ch. 3. 14), and details in this chapter the miseries which his friends will see, if, according to his request (ch. 6. 25), they will look on him. Even the Christian soldier, "warring a good warfare," rejoices when it is completed (1 Timothy 1. 18; 2 Timothy 2. 3; 4. 7, 8). 2. earnestly desireth—Hebrew, pants for the (evening) shadow. Easterns measure time by the length of their shadow. If the servant longs for the evening when his wages are paid, why may not Job long for the close of his hard service, when he shall enter on his reward? This proves that Job did not, as many maintain, regard the grave as a mere sleep. 3. Months of comfortless misfortune. "I am made to possess," lit., to be heir to. Irony. To be heir to, is usually a matter of joy; but here it is the entail of an involuntary and dismal inheritance. Months, for days, to express its long duration. Appointed, lit., they have numbered to me; marking well the unavoidable doom assigned to him. 4. Lit., "when shall be the flight of the night?" [GESENIUS.] UMBREIT, not so well, "the night is long extended;" lit., measured out: so Marg. 5. In elephantiasis maggots are bred in the sores (Acts 12. 23; Isalah 14. 11). clouds of dust—Rather, a crust of dried filth and accumulated corruption (ch. 2. 7, 8). my skin is broken and loathsome—Rather, comes together so as to heal up, and again breaks out with running matter. [GESENIUS.] More simply the Hebrew is, "My skin rests (for a time) and (again) melts away" (Psalm 58. 7). 6. (Isalah 38. 12.) Every day like the weaver's shuttle leaves a thread behind; and each shall wear, as he weaves. But Job's thought is, that his days must swiftly be cut off as a web; without hope, viz., of a recovery and renewal of life (ch. 14. 19; 1 Chronicles 29. 15). 7. Address to God. Wind, a picture of evanescence (Psalm 78. 39). shall no more see—Rather, "shall no more return to see good." This change from the different wish in ch. 3. 17, &c., is most true to nature. He is now in a softer mood; and a beam from former days of prosperity falling upon memory, and the thought of the unseen world, where one is seen no more (v. 8), drew from him an expression of regret at leaving this world of light (Ecclesiastes 11. 7). So Hizekiah (Isalah 38. 11). Grace rises above nature (2 Corinthians 5. 8). 8. The eye of him who beholds me [present, not past, as English Version], i. e., in the very act of beholding me, seeth me no more. "Thine eyes (are) upon me, and I am not?" He disappears, even while God is looking upon him. Job cannot survive the gaze of Jehovah (Psalm 104. 32; Revelation 20. 11). Not "Thine eyes seek me and I am not to be found;" for God's eye penetrates even to the unseen world (Psalm 139. 8). UMBREIT unaturally takes Thine to refer to one of the three friends. 9. (2 Samuel 12. 23.) the grave—The Sheol, or place of departed spirits, not disproving Job's belief in the resurrection. It merely means, "He shall come up no more" in the present order of things. 10. (Psalm 103. 16.) The Oriental keenly loves his dwelling. In Arabian elegies the desertion of abodes by their occupants is often a theme of sorrow. Grace overcomes this also (Luke 18. 29; Acts 4. 31). 11. Therefore, as such is my hard lot, I will at least have the melancholy satisfaction of venting my sorrow in words. The Hebrew opening words, therefore I, at all events, express self-elevation. [UMBREIT.] 12-14. Why doest thou deny me the comfort of care-assuaging sleep? Why scarest thou me with frightful dreams? Am I, then, a sea (regarded in Old Testament poetry as a violent rebel against God, the Lord of nature, who therefore enrbs his violence) (Jeremiah 5. 22)? or a whale (or some other sea monster) (Isalah 27. 1), that thou needest thus to watch and curb me? The Egyptians "watched" the crocodile most carefully to prevent its doing mischief. 14. The frightful dreams resulting from elephantiasis he attributes to God; the common belief assigned all night visions to God. 15. UMBRETT translates, "So that I could wish to strangle myself—dead by my own hands." He softens this idea of Job's harbouring the thought of suicide, by representing it as entertained only in agonizing dreams, and immediately repudiated with horror next verse, "Yet that (self-strangling) I loathe." This is forcible and graphic. Perhaps the meaning is simply, "My soul chooses (even) strangling (or any violent death) rather than my life" (lit., my bones) (Psalm 35. 10); i. e., rather than the wasted and diseased skeleton, left to him. In this view, "I loathe it" (v. 16) refers to his life. 16. "Let me alone;" i. e., cease to afflict me for the few and vain days still left to me. 17. (Psalm 8. 4; 144. 3.) Job means, "What is man that thou shouldst make him of so much importance, and that thou shouldst expend such attention (heart-thought) upon him" as to make him the subject of so severe trials? Job ought rather to have reasoned from God's condescending so far to notice man as to try him, that there must be a wise and loving purpose in trial. David uses the same words in their right application, to express wonder that God should do so much as He does for insignificant man. Christians who know God manifest in the man Christ Jesus still more may use them. 18. With each new day (Psalm 73. 14). It is rather God's mercies, not our trials, that are "new every morning" (Lamentations 3. 23). The idea is that of a shepherd taking count of his flock every morning, to see if all are there. [COCCURIUS.] 19. "How long (like a jealous keeper) wilt thou never take thine eyes off (so the Heb. for depart from) me? Nor let me alone for a brief respite" (lit., so long as I take to swallow my spittle). An Arabic proverb, like our, till I draw my breath. 20. "I have sinned (I grant); yet what sin can I do against (to: ch. 35. 6) thee (of such a nature that thou shouldst jealously watch and deprive me of all strength, as if thou didst fear me)? (Yet thou art one who hast men ever in view, ever watchest them)—O thou Watcher (v. 12; Daniel 9. 14), not as English Version, Preserver [GESENIUS] of men." Job had borne with patience his trials, as sent by God (ch. 1. 21; ch. 2. 10); only his reason cannot reconcile the ceaseless continuance of his mental and bodily pains with his ideas of the Divine nature. set me as a mark—Wherefore dost thou make me thy point of attack? i. e., ever assail me with new pains. [UMBRETT.] (Lamentations 3. 12.) 21. for now—very soon. in the morning—Not the resurrection; for then Job will be found. It is a figure, from one seeking a sick man in the morning, and finding he has died in the night. So Job implies that, if God does not help him at once, it will be too late, for he will be gone. The reason why God does not give an immediate sense of pardon to awakened sinners is, they think they have a claim on God for it.

CHAPTER VIII.

FIRST SERIES.—FIRST SPEECH OF BILDAD, MORE SEVERE AND COARSE THAN ELIPHAZ.

Ver. 1-22. THE ADDRESS OF BILDAD. 2. like a . . . wind—Disregarding restraints, and daring against God. 2. The repetition of pervert gives an emphasis galling to Job (ch. 31. 12). "Wouldest thou have God (as thy words imply) pervert judgment," by letting thy sins go unpunished? He assumes Job's guilt from his sufferings. 4. If—Rather, "since thy children have sinned against Him, and (since) He has cast them away for (Hebrew, by the hand of) their transgressions, (Yet) if thou wouldest seek unto God, &c., if thou wert pure, &c., surely (even) now He would awake for thee." UMBRETT makes the apodosis to, "since thy children," &c., begin at "He has cast them away." Also, instead of for "He gave them up to (lit., into the hand of) their own guilt." Bildad expresses the justice of God, which Job had arraigned. Thy children have sinned, God leaves them to the consequence of their sin. Most cutting to the heart of the bereaved father. 5. seek unto God betimes—Early. Make it the first and chief anxiety (Psalm 78. 34; Hosea 5. 15; Isaiah 26. 9; Proverbs 8. 17; 13. 24). 6. "He would awake for thee," i. e., arise to thy help. God seemed to be asleep towards the sufferer (Psalm 85. 23; 7. 6; Isaiah 51. 9). make . . . prosperous—Restore to prosperity thy (their) righteous habitation. Bildad assumes it to have been heretofore the habitation of guilt. 9. thy beginning—The beginning of thy new happiness after restoration. latter end—(ch. 42. 12; Proverbs 23. 18). 8, 9. The sages of the olden time reached an age beyond those of Job's time (Note 42. 16); and therefore could give the testimony of a fuller experience. of yesterday—i. e., a recent race. We know nothing as compared with them, from the brevity of our lives. So even Jacob (Genesis 47. 9). Knowledge consisted then in the results of observation, embodied in poetical proverbs, and handed down by tradition. Longevity gave the opportunity of wider observation. a shadow—(Psalm 144. 4; 1 Chronicles 29. 15). 10. teach thee—(ch. 6. 24), had said, "Teach me." Bildad, therefore, says, Since you want teaching, inquire of the fathers, they will teach thee. utter words—more than mere speaking; "put forth well-considered words." out of their heart—From observation and reflection. Not merely, from their mouth: such as Bildad insinuates, were Job's words. Verses 11, 12, 13 embody in poetic and sententious form (probably the fragment of an old poem) the observation of the elders. The double point of comparison between the ungodly and the paper-reed is, 1. The luxuriant prosperity at first; and, 2. The sudden destruction. 11. rush—Rather paper-reed: the papyrus of Egypt, which was used to make garments, shoes, baskets, boats, and paper (a word derived from it). It and the flag or bulrush grow only in marshy places (such as are along the Nile). So the godless thrive only in external prosperity; there is in the hypocrite no inward stability; his prosperity is like the rapid growth of water plants. 12. not cut down—Ere it has ripened for the scythe, it withers more suddenly than any herb, having no self-sustaining power, once that the moisture is gone, which other herbs do not need in the same degree. So ruin seizes on the godless in the zenith of prosperity, more suddenly than on others who appear less firmly seated in their possessions. [UMBRETT.] (Psalm 112. 10.) 13. paths—So ways (Proverbs 1. 19). all that forget God—The distinguishing trait of the godless (Psalm 9. 17; 50. 22). 14. cut off—So GESENIUS. Or, to accord with the metaphor of the spider's house, "The confidence (on which he builds) shall be laid in ruins" (Isaiah 59. 5, 6). 15. he shall hold it fast—Implying his eager grasp, when the storm of trial comes. As the spider "holds fast" by its web; but with this difference, the light spider is sustained by that on which it rests, the godless is not by the thin web on which he rests. The expression, "Hold fast," properly applies to the spider holding his web, but is transferred to the man. Hypocrisy, like the spider's web, is fine-spun, flimsy, and woven out of its own inventions, as the spider's web out of its own bowels. An Arab proverb says, "Time destroys the well-built house, as well as the spider's web." 16. before the sun—i. e., He (the goddess) is green only before the sun rises; but he cannot bear its heat, and withers. So succulent plants like the gourd (Jonah 4. 7, 8). But the widespreading in the garden does not quite accord with this. Better, "in sunshine," the sun representing the smiling fortune of the hypocrite, during which he wondrously progresses. [UMBRETT.] The image is that of weeds growing in rank luxuriance, and spreading over even heaps of stones and walls, and then being speedily torn away. 17. seeth the place of stones—Hebrew, "the house of stones;" i. e., the wall surrounding the garden. The parasite plant, in creeping towards and over the wall—the utmost bound of the garden—is said figuratively to "see" or regard it. 18. If He (God) tear him away (English Version, destroy; properly, to tear away rapidly and violently) from his place, "then it (the place personified) shall deny him" (Psalm 103. 16). The very soil is ashamed of the weeds lying withered on its surface, as though it never had been connected with them. So, when the goddess falls from prosperity, his nearest friends disown him. 19. Bitter irony. The hypocrite boasts of joy. This then is his "joy" at the last. and out of the earth—Others immediately, who take the place of the man thus punished. Not godly men (Matthew 3, 9). For "the place" of the weeds is among stones, where the gardener wishes no plants. But, ungodly; a fresh crop of weeds always springs up in the room of those torn up; there is no end of hypocrites on earth. [UMBREIT.] 20. Bildad regards Job as a righteous man, who has fallen into sin. "God will not cast off for ever a perfect" (or godly man, such as Job was), if he will only repent. "Those alone who persevere in sin God will not help" (Hebrew, take by the hand; Psalm 73, 23; Isaiah 41, 13; 42, 6) when fallen. 21. THIL—lit., "to the point that;" God's blessing on thee, when repentant, will go on increasing to the point that, or until, &c. 22. The haters of Job are the wicked. They shall be clothed with shame (Jeremiah 3, 25; Psalm 35, 26; 109, 29), at the failure of their hope, that Job would utterly perish, and because they, instead of him, come to naught.

CHAPTER IX.

FIRST SERIES.

Ver. 1-35. REPLY OF JOB TO BILDAD. 2. I know that it is so—That God does not "pervert justice" (8, 3). But (even though I be sure of being in the right) how can a mere man assert his right—(be just) with God. The gospel answers (Romans 3, 26). 3. if He (God) will contend with him—lit., "deign to enter into judgment." he cannot answer, &c.—He (man) would not dare, even if he had a thousand answers in readiness to one question of God's, to utter one of them, from awe of his Majesty. 4. Hebrew, Wise in heart (understanding)! And mighty in power! God confounds the ablest arguer by His wisdom, and the mightiest by His power. hardened—viz., himself, or his neck (Proverbs 29, 1); i. e., defied God. To prosper, one must fall in with God's arrangements of providence and grace. 5. and they know not—Hebrew for "suddenly, unexpectedly, before they are aware of it" (Psalm 35, 8); "at unawares;" Hebrew, which he knoweth not of (Joel 2, 14; Proverbs 5, 6). 6. The earth is regarded, poetically, as resting on pillars, which tremble in an earthquake (Psalm 75, 3; Isaiah 24, 20). The literal truth as to the earth is given (26, 7). 7. The sun, at His command, doth not rise; viz., in an eclipse, or the darkness that accompanies earthquakes (v. 6). scaleth up—i. e., totally covers, as one would seal up a room, that its contents may not be seen. 8. spreadeth out—(Isaiah 40, 22; Psalm 104, 2). But throughout it is not so much God's creating, as His governing, power over nature that is set forth. A storm seems a struggle between Nature and her Lord! Better, therefore, "Who boweth the heavens alone," without help of any other. God descends from the bowed-down heaven to the earth (Psalm 18, 9). The storm, wherein the clouds descend, suggests this image. In the descent of the vault of heaven, God has come down from His high throne, and walks majestic over the mountain waves (Hebrew, heights), as a conqueror taming their violence. So tread upon (Deuteronomy 33, 29; Amos 4, 13; Matthew 14, 26). The Egyptian hieroglyphic for impossibility is a man walking on waves. 9. maketh—Rather, from the Arabic, covereth up. This accords better with the context, which describes His boundless power as controller rather than as creator. [UMBREIT.] Arcturus—The great bear, which always revolves about the pole, and never sets. The Chaldeans and Arabs, early named and grouped in constellations the stars; often travelling and tending flocks by night, they would naturally do so, especially as the rise and setting of some stars mark the distinction of seasons. BRINKLEY, presuming the stars here mentioned to be those of Taurus and Scorpio, and that these were the cardinal constellations of spring and autumn in Job's time, calculates, by the precession of equinoxes, the time of Job to be 815 years after the deluge, and 181 before Abraham. Orion—Hebrew, the fool; in ch. 33, 31 he appears fettered with "bands." The old legend represented this star as a hero, who presumptuously rebelled against God, and was therefore a fool, and was chained in the sky as a punishment; for its rising is at the stormy period of the year. He is Nimrod (the exceedingly impious rebel) among the Assyrians; Orion among the Greeks. Sabaism (worship of the heavenly hosts) and hero-worship were blended in his person. He first subverted the patriarchal order of society by substituting a chieftainship based on conquest (Genesis 10, 9, 10). Pleiades—lit., "the heap of stars;" Arabic, "knot of stars." The various names of this constellation in the East express the close union of the stars in it (Amos 5, 8). chambers of the south—The unseen regions of the southern hemisphere, with its own set of stars, as distinguished from those just mentioned of the northern. The true structure of the earth is here implied. 10. Repeated from Eliphaz, ch. 5, 9. 11. I see Him not: He passeth on—The image is that of a howling wind (Isaiah 21, 1). Like it when it bursts invisibly upon man: so God is felt in the awful effects of His wrath, but is not seen (John 3, 8). Therefore, reasons Job, it is impossible to contend with Him. 12. If "He taketh away," as in my case all that was dear to me, still a mortal cannot call Him to account. He only takes His own. He is an absolute King (Ecclesiastes 8, 4; Daniel 4, 35). 13. If God—Rather, "God will not withdraw His anger," i. e., so long as a mortal obstinately resists. [UMBREIT.] the proud helpers—The arrogant, who would help one contending with the Almighty, are of no avail against Him. 14. How much less shall I?—Who am weak—seeing that the mighty have to stoop before Him. Choose words (use a well-chosen speech, in order to reason) with Him. 15. (Ch. 10, 15.) Though I were conscious of no sin, yet I would not dare to say so, but leave it to His judgment and mercy to justify me (1 Corinthians 4, 4). 16, 17. "I would not believe that He had hearkened unto my voice, who breaketh me (as a tree strip of its leaves) with a tempest." 19. UMBREIT takes these as the words of God, translating, "What availeth the might of the strong?" "Here (saith he) behold! what availeth justice? Who will appoint me a time to plead?" (So Jeremiah 49, 19). The last words certainly apply better to God than to Job. The sense is substantially the same if we make "me," with English Version, apply to Job. The "lo!" expresses God's swift readiness for battle when challenged. 20. It—(ch. 15, 6; Luke 19, 22); or "He," God. 21. Lit., here (and in v. 20). "I perfect! I should not know my soul! I would despise (disown) my life;" i. e., Though conscious of Innocence, I should be compelled, in contending with the infinite God, to ignore my own soul and despise my past life as if it were guilty. [ROSENMULLER.] 22. one thing—"It is all one; whether perfect or wicked—He destroyeth." This was the point Job maintained against his friends, that the righteous and wicked alike are afflicted, and that great sufferings here do not prove great guilt (Luke 13, 1-5; Ecclesiastes 9, 2). 23. If—Rather, "While (His) scourge slays suddenly (the wicked, v. 22), He laughs at (disregards; not derides) the pining away of the innocent." The only difference, says Job, between the innocent and guilty is, the latter are slain by a sudden stroke, the former pine away gradually. The translation, "trial," does not express the antithesis to "slay suddenly," as "pining away" does. [UMBREIT.] 24. Referring to righteous judges, in antithesis to "the wicked" in the parallel first clause, Whereas the wicked oppressor often has the earth given into his hand, the righteous judges are led to execution, culprits had their faces covered preparatory to execution (Esther 7, 8). Thus the contrast of the wicked and righteous here answers to that in v. 23. if not, where and who?—If God be not the cause of these anomalies, where is the cause to be found, and who is he? 25. a post—A courier. In the wide Persian empire such couriers, on dromedaries or on foot, were employed to carry the royal commands to the distant provinces (Esther 3, 13, 15; 8, 14). My days are not like the slow caravan, but the fleet post. The days are themselves poetically said to see no good, instead of Job in them (1 Peter 3, 19). 26. swift ships—Rather, canoes of reeds or papyrus skiffs, used on the Nile, swift from their lightness (Isaiah 18, 2). 28. The apodosis to 27—"If I say, &c." "I still am afraid of all my sorrows (returning), for I know that thou wilt (dost) not (by removing my sufferings) hold or declare me innocent. How then can I leave off my heaviness? 29. The if is better omitted: I (am treated by God as) wicked; why then labour I in vain (to disprove His charge). Job submits, not so much because he is convinced that God is right, as because God is powerful and he weak. [BARNES.] 30. snow water—Thought to be more cleansing than common water, owing to the whiteness of snow (Psalm 51. 7; Isaiah 1. 18). never so clean—Better, to answer to the parallelism of the first clause which expresses the cleansing material, bye: the Arabs used alkali mixed with oil, as soap (Psalm 73. 13; Jeremiah 2. 22). 32. (Ecclesiastes 6. 10; Isaiah 45. 9.) 33. daysman—Mediator or umpire; the imposition of whose hand expresses power to adjudicate between the persons. There might be one on a level with Job, the one party; but Job knew of none on a level with the Almighty, the other party (1 Samuel 2. 25). We Christians know of such a Mediator (not, however, in the sense umpire) on a level with both—the God-man, Christ Jesus (1 Timothy 2. 5). 34. rod—Not here the symbol of punishment, but of power. Job cannot meet God on fair terms so long as God deals with him on the footing of His almighty power. 35. it is not so with me—As it now is, God not taking His rod away, I am not on such a footing of equality as to be able to vindicate myself.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-22. JOB'S REPLY TO BILDAD CONTINUED. 1. leave my complaint to myself—Rather, "I will give loose to my complaint" (ch. 7. 11). 2. show me, &c.—Do not, by virtue of thy mere sovereignty, treat me as guilty without showing me the reasons. 3. Job is unwilling to think God can have "pleasure" in using his power to "oppress" the weak, and to "treat" man, "the work of His own hands, as of no value" (v. 8; Psalm 138. 8). shine upon—Favour with prosperity (Psalm 50. 2). 4-6. Dost thou see as feebly as man? i. e., with the same uncharitable eye, as, for instance, Job's friends. Is thy time as short? Impossible! Yet one might think, from the rapid succession of thy strokes, that thou hadst no time to spare in overwhelming me. 7. "Although thou (the Omniscient) knowest," &c. (connected with v. 6), "thou searchest after my sin." and . . . (that) none can deliver out of thine hand—Therefore thou hast no need to deal with me with the rapid violence which "man" would use (Note v. 6). 8. "Made" with pains; implying a work of difficulty and art; applying to God language applicable only to man. together round about—Implying that the human body is a complete unity, the parts of which on all sides will bear the closest scrutiny. 9. clay—Next verse proves that the reference here is, not so much to the perishable nature of the materials, as to their wonderful fashioning by the Divine potter. 10. In the organization of the body from its rude commencements the liquid original gradually assumes a more solid consistency, like milk curdling into cheese (Psalm 139. 15, 16). Science reveals that the chyle circulated by the lacteal vessels is the supply to every organ. 11. fenced—Or "inlaid" (Psalm 139. 15); curiously wrought." [UMBREIT.] In the fetus the skin appears first, then the flesh, then the harder parts. 12. visitation—Thy watchful Providence. spirit—Breath. 13. is with thee—Was thy purpose. All God's dealings with Job in his creation, preservation, and present afflictions were part of His secret counsel (Psalm 139. 16; Acts 15. 18; Ecclesiastes 3. 11). 14, 15. Job is perplexed, because God "marks" every sin of his with such ceaseless rigour. Whether "wicked" (godless and a hypocrite) or "righteous" (comparatively: sincere), God condemns and punishes alike. lift up my head—In conscious innocence (Ps. 3. 3). see thou—Rather, "and seeing I see—(I too well see) mine affliction," (which seems to prove me guilty). [UMBREIT.] 16. increaseth—Rather, (if) I lift up (my head) thou wouldst hunt me, &c. [UMBREIT.] and again—As if a lion should not kill his prey at once, but come back and torture it again. 17. witnesses—His accumulated trials were like a succession of witnesses brought up in proof of his guilt, to wear out the accused. changes and war—Rather ("thou settest in array) against me host after host" (lit., changes and a host, i. e., a succession of hosts), viz., his afflictions, and then reproach upon reproach from his friends. 20. But, since I was destined from my birth to these ills, at least give me a little breathing time during the few days left me (ch. 9. 34; 13. 21; Psalm 39. 13). 22. The ideas of order and light, disorder and darkness, harmonize (Genesis 1. 2). Three Hebrew words are used for darkness; in v. 21 (1), the common word "darkness;" here (2), "a land of gloom" (from a Hebrew root, to cover up); (3), "as thick darkness" or blackness (from a root, expressing sunset). "Where the light thereof is like blackness." Its only sunshine is thick darkness. A bold figure of poetry. Job in a better frame has brighter thoughts of the unseen world. But his views at best wanted the definite clearness of the Christian's. Compare with his words here (Revelation 21. 23; 22. 5; 2 Timothy 1. 10).

CHAPTER XI.

FIRST SERIES.

Ver. 1-20. FIRST SPEECH OF ZOPHAR. 2. Zophar assails Job for his empty words, and indirectly, the two friends, for their weak reply. Taciturnity is highly prized among Orientals (Proverbs 10. 8, 19). 3. lies—Rather, vain boasting (Isaiah 16. 6; Jeremiah 48. 30). The "men" is emphatic; men of sense; in antithesis to "vain boasting," mockest—Upbraided God by complaints. 4. doctrine—Purposely used of Job's speeches, which sounded like lessons of doctrine (Deuteronomy 32. 2; Proverbs 4. 2). thine—Addressed to God. Job had maintained his sincerity against his friends' suspicions, not faultlessness. 5. to that which is!—Rather, "they are double to (man's) wisdom." [MICHAELIS.] So the Hebrew is rendered (Proverbs 2. 7). God's ways, which you arraign, if you were shown their secret wisdom, would be seen vastly to exceed that of men, including yours (1 Corinthians 1. 25). exacteth—Rather, "God consigns to oblivion in thy favour much of thy guilt." 7. Rather, "Penetrate to the perfections of the Almighty" (ch. 9. 10; Psalm 139. 6). 8. It—The "wisdom" of God (v. 6). The abruptness of the Hebrew is forcible: "The heights of heaven! What canst thou do" (as to attaining to them with thy gaze, Psalm 139. 8)? know—viz., of His perfections. 10. cut off—Rather, as in ch. 9. 11, pass over as a storm; viz., rush upon in anger. shut up—In prison, with a view to trial. gather together—The parties for judgment: hold a judicial assembly, to pass sentence on the prisoners. 11. (Psalm 94. 11.) consider—So as to punish it. Rather, from the connection, v. 6, "He seeth wickedness also, which man does not perceive;" lit., "But no (other, save He) perceiveth it." [UMBREIT.] God's "wisdom" (v. 6), detects sin where Job's human eye cannot reach (v. 8), so as to see any. 12. vain—Hollow. would be—Wants to consider himself "wise;" opposed to God's "wisdom" (note, v. 11); refuses to see sin, where God sees it (Romans 1. 22). wild ass's colt—A proverb for untamed wildness (ch. 39. 5, 8; Jeremiah 2. 24; Genesis 16. 12; Hebrew, "a wild-ass man"). Man wishes to appear wisely obedient to his Lord, whereas he is, from his birth, unsubdued in spirit. 13. The apodosis to the "If" is at v. 15. The "preparation of the heart" is to be obtained (Proverbs 16. 1) by "stretching out the hands" in prayer for it (Psalm 10. 17; 1 Chronicles 29. 18). 14. Rather, "if thou wilt put far away the iniquity in thine hand" (as Zacheus did, Luke 19. 8). The apodosis or conclusion is at v. 15, "then shalt thou," &c. 15. Zophar refers to Job's own words (ch. 10. 15), "yet will I not lift up my head," even though righteous. Zophar declares, if Job will follow his advice, he may "lift up his face." spot—(Deuteronomy 32. 5). steadfast—lit., run fast together, like metals which become firm and hard by fusion. The sinner on the contrary is wavering. 16. Just as when the stream runs dry (ch. 6. 17), the danger threatened by its wild waves is forgotten (Isaiah 65. 16). [UMBREIT.] 17. age—Days or life the noontide—viz., of thy former prosperity; which, in the poet's image, had gone on increasing, until it reached its height, as the sun rises higher and higher until it reaches the meridian (Proverbs 4. 18). shine forth—Rather, "though now in darkness, thou shalt be as the morning." Or, "thy darkness (if any dark shade should arise on thee, it) shall be as the morning" (only the dullness of morning twilight, not nocturnal darkness). [UMBREIT.] 18. The experience of thy life will teach thee there is hope for man in every trial. dig—viz., wells; the chief necessity in the East. Better, "though now ashamed (Romans 5. 5, opposed to the previous "hope"), thou shalt then rest safely." [GESENIUS.] 19. (Psalm 4. 8; Proverbs 3. 24; Isaiah 14. 30.) Oriental images of prosperity. 19. make suit—lit., "stroke thy face, caress thee" (Proverbs 19. 6). 20. A warning to Job, if he would not turn to God. "The wicked," i. e., obdurate sinners. eyes . . . fall—i. e., in vain look for relief (Deuteronomy 28. 65). Zophar implies Job's only hope of relief is in a change of heart. they shall not escape—lit., "every refuge shall vanish from them," giving up the ghost—Their hope shall leave them as the breath does the body (Proverbs 11. 7).

CHAPTER XII.

FIRST SERIES.

Ver. 1-25. JOB'S REPLY TO ZOPHAR, XII, XIII, XIV. 2. wisdom shall die with you!—Ironical. As if all the wisdom in the world was concentrated in them, and would expire when they expired. Wisdom makes "a people;" a foolish nation are "not a people" (Romans 10. 19). 3. not inferior—Not vanquished in argument and "wisdom" (ch. 13. 2). such things as these—Such commonplace maxims, as you so pompously adduce. 4. The unfounded accusations of Job's friends were a "mockery" of him. He alludes to Zophar's word, "mockest" (ch. 11. 3). his neighbour, who calleth, &c.—Rather, "I who call upon God that he may answer me favourably. [UMBREIT.] 5. Rather, "a torch" (lamp) is an object of contempt in the thoughts of him who rests securely (is at ease), though it (which) was prepared for the falterings of the feet. [UMBREIT.] (Proverbs 25. 19.) "Thoughts" and "feet" are in contrast; also rests "securely," and "falterings." The wanderer, arrived at his night-quarters, contemptuously throws aside the torch which had guided his uncertain steps through the darkness. As the torch is to the wanderer, so Job to his friends. Once they gladly used his aid in their need, now they in prosperity mock him in his need. 6. Job shows that the matter of fact opposes Zophar's theory (ch. 11. 14, 19, 20), that wickedness causes "insecurity" in men's "tabernacles." On the contrary, they who rob the "tabernacles" (dwellings) of others "prosper securely" in their own. into whose hand, &c.—Rather, "who make a god of their own hand," i. e., who regard their might as their only ruling principle. [UMBREIT.] 7, 8. Beasts, birds, fishes, and plants, reasons Job, teach that the violent live the most securely (v. 6). The vulture lives more securely than the dove, the lion than the ox, the shark than the dolphin, the rose than the thorn which tears it. speak to the earth—Rather, "the shrubs of the earth." [UMBREIT.] 9. In all these cases, says Job, the agency must be referred to Jehovah ("the Lord," English Version), though they may seem to man to imply imperfection (v. 6; ch. 9. 24). This is the only undisputed passage of the poetical part in which the name "Jehovah" occurs; in the historical parts it occurs frequently. 10. The soul, i. e., the animal life. Man, reasons Job, is subjected to the same laws as the lower animals. 11. As the mouth by tasting meats selects what pleases it, so the ear tries the words of others and retains what is convincing. Each chooses according to his taste. The connection with v. 12 is in reference to Bildad's appeal to the "ancients" (ch. 8. 8). You are right in appealing to them, since "with them was wisdom," &c. But you select such proverbs of theirs as suit your views, so I may borrow from the same such as suit mine. 12. ancient—Aged (ch. 15. 10). 13. In contrast to, "with the ancient is wisdom" (v. 12), Job quotes a saying of the ancients which suits his argument, "with Him (God) is (the true) wisdom" (Proverbs 8. 14); and by that "wisdom and strength"

"He breaketh down," &c., as an absolute Sovereign, not allowing man to penetrate His mysteries; man's part is to bow to His unchangeable decrees (ch. 1. 21). The Mohammedan saying is, "If God will, and how God will." 14. shutteth up—(Isaiah 22. 22). Job refers to Zophar's "shut up" (ch. 11. 10). 15. Probably alluding to the flood. 16. (Ezekiel 14. 9). 18. He looseth the authority of kings—the "bond" with which they bind their subjects (Isaiah 45. 1; Genesis 14. 4; Daniel 2. 21). a girdle—The cord, with which they are bound as captives, instead of the royal "girdle" they once wore (Isaiah 22. 21), and the bond they once bound others with. So "gird"—put on one the bonds of a prisoner instead of the ordinary girdle (John 21. 18). 19. princes—Rather, priests, as the Hebrew is rendered (Psalm 99. 6). Even the sacred ministers of religion are not exempt from reverses and captivity. the mighty—Rather, "the firm-rooted in power;" the Arabic root expresses ever-flowing water. [UMBREIT.] 20. the trusty—Rather, "those secure in their eloquence;" ex. gr., the speakers in the gate (Isaiah 3. 3). [BEZA.] understanding—lit., taste, i. e., insight or spiritual discernment, which experience gives the aged. The same Hebrew word is applied to Daniel's wisdom in interpretation (Daniel 2. 14). 21. Psalm 107. 40 quotes, in its first clause, this v., and, in its second, the 21th v. of the chapter. weakeneth the strength—lit., looseth the girdle; Orientals wear flowing garments; when active strength is to be put forth, they gird up their garments with a girdle. Hence here—"He destroyeth their power" in the eyes of the people. 22. (Daniel 2. 22.) 23. Isaiah 9. 3; Psalm 107. 33, 39, which Psalm quotes this chapter elsewhere. (See note v. 21.) straiteneth—lit., leadeth in, i. e., reduces. 24. heart—Intelligence. wander in a wilderness—Figurative; not referring to any actual fact. This cannot be quoted to prove Job lived after Israel's wanderings in the desert. Psalm 107. 4, 40 quotes this passage. 25. Deuteronomy 28. 29; Psalm 107. 27 again quotes Job, but in a different connection.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-28. JOB'S REPLY TO ZOPHAR CONTINUED. 1. all this—as to the dealings of Providence (ch. 12. 3). 3. Job wishes to plead his cause before God (ch. 9. 34, 35), as he is more and more convinced of the valueless character of his would-be "physicians" (ch. 16. 2). 4. forgers of lies—lit., artful twisters of vain speeches. [UMBREIT.] 5. (Proverbs 17. 28.) The Arabs say, "the wise are dumb; silence is wisdom." 7. deceitfully—Use fallacies to vindicate God in His dealings; as if in the end justified the means. Their "deceitfulness" for God, against Job, was, they asserted he was a sinner, because he was a sufferer. 8. accept his person—God's; i. e., be partial for Him, as when a judge favours one party in a trial, because of personal considerations. contend for God—viz., with fallacies and prepossessions against Job before judgment (Judges 6. 31). Partiality can never please the impartial God, nor the goodness of the cause excuse the unfairness of the arguments. 9. Will the issue to you be good, when He searches out you and your arguments? Will you be regarded by Him as pure and disinterested? mock—(Galatians 6. 7.) Rather, "can you deceive Him as one man?" &c. 10. If ye do, though secretly, act partially. (Note v. 8; Psalm 82. 1, 2.) God can successfully vindicate His acts, and needs no fallacious argument of man. 11. make you afraid!—viz., of employing sophisms in His name (Jeremiah 10. 7, 10). 12. remembrances—"Proverbial maxims," so called because well remembered. like unto ashes—Or, "parables of ashes;" the image of lightness and nothingness (Isaiah 41. 20). bodies—Rather, "entrenchments;" those of clay, as opposed to those of stone, are easy to be destroyed; so the proverbs, behind which they entrench themselves, will not shelter them when God shall appear to reprove them for their injustice to Job. 13. Job would wish to be spared their speeches, so as to speak out all his mind as to his wretchedness (v. 14), happen what will. 14. A proverb for, "Why should I anxiously desire to save my life?" [EICHORN.] The image in the first clause is that of a wild beast, which in order to preserve his prey carries it in his teeth. That in the second refers to men who hold in the hand what they want to keep secure. 15. in him—So the margin or keri reads. But the textual reading or ceib is "not," which agrees best with the context, and other passages wherein he says he has no hope (ch. 6. 11; 7. 21; 10. 20; 19. 10). "Though He slay me, and I dare no more hope, yet I will maintain," &c., i. e., "I desire to vindicate myself before Him," as not a hypocrite. [UMBREIT and NOYES.] 16. He—Rather, "This also already speaks in my behalf (lit., "for my saving acquittal"), for a hypocrite would not wish to come before Him" (as I do). [UMBREIT.] (See last clause of v. 15.) 17. my declaration—viz., that I wish to be permitted to justify myself immediately before God. with your ears—i. e., attentively. 18. ordered—Implying a constant preparation for defence in his confidence of innocence. 19. if, &c.—Rather, Then would I hold my tongue and give up the ghost, i. e., if any one can contend with me and prove me false, I have no more to say. "I will be silent and die." Like our "I would stake my life on it." [UMBREIT.] 20. Address to God. not hide—Stand forth boldly to maintain my cause. 21. (Note 9. 34; Psalm 39. 10.) 22. call—A challenge to the defendant to answer to the charges. answer—The defence begun. speak—As plaintiff. answer—To the plea of the plaintiff. Expressions from a trial. 23. The catalogue of my sins ought to be great, to judge from the severity with which God ever anew crushes one already bowed down. Would that He would reckon them up! He then would see how much my calamities outnumber them. sin ?—Singular, "I am unconscious of a single particular sin, much less many." [UMBREIT.] 24. hidest . . . face—A figure from the gloomy impression caused by the sudden clouding over of the sun. enemy—God treated Job as an enemy who must be robbed of power by ceaseless sufferings (ch. 7. 17, 21). 25. (Leviticus 26. 36; Psalm 1. 4.) Job compares himself to a leaf already fallen, which the storm still chases hither and thither. break—lit., shake with (thy) terrors. Jesus Christ does not "break the bruised reed" (Isaiah 42. 3; 27. 8). 26. writest—A judicial phrase, to note down the determined punishment. The sentence of the condemned used to be written down (Isaiah 10. 1; Jeremiah 22. 30; Psalm 149. 9). [UMBREIT.] bitter things—Blister punishments. make me to possess—Or inherit. In old age he receives possession of the inheritance of sin thoughtlessly acquired in youth. "To inherit sins" is to inherit the punishments inseparably connected with them in Hebrew ideas (Psalm 25. 7). 27. stocks—In which the prisoner's feet were made fast until the time of execution (Jeremiah 20. 2). lookest narrowly—As an overseer would watch a prisoner. print—Either the stocks, or his disease, marked his soles (Hebrew, roots) as the bastinado would. Better, thou drawest (or diggest) [GESENIUS] a line (or trench) [GESENIUS] round my soles, beyond which I must not move. [UMBREIT.] 28. Job speaks of himself in the third person, thus forming the transition to the general lot of man (ch. 14. 1; Psalm 39. 11; Hosea 5. 12).

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-22. JOB PASSES FROM HIS OWN TO THE COMMON MISERY OF MANKIND. 1. woman—Feeble, and in the East looked down upon (Genesis 2. 21). Man being born of one so frail must be frail himself (Matthew 11. 11). few days—(Genesis 47. 9; Psalm 90. 10). Lit., short of days. Man is the reverse of full of days and short of trouble. 2. (Psalm 90. 6; Note ch. 8. 9.) 3. open . . . eyes upon—Not in graciousness; but, "Dost thou sharply fix thine eyes upon?" (Note 7. 20; also 1. 7). Is one so frail as man worthy of such constant watching on the part of God? (Zechariah 12. 4). me—So frail. thee—So almighty. 4. A plea in mitigation. The doctrine of original sin was held from the first. "Man is unclean from his birth, how then can God expect perfect cleanness from such a one and deal so severely with me?" 5. determined—(ch. 7. 1; Isaiah 10. 23; Daniel 9. 27; 11. 36). 6. Turn—viz., thine eyes from watching him so jealously (v. 3). hiring—(ch. 7. 1). accomplish—Rather, "enjoy." That he may at least enjoy the measure of rest of the hiring, who though hard worked reconciles himself to his lot by the hope of his rest and reward. [UMBREIT.] 7. Man may the more claim a peaceful life, since, when separated from it by death, he never returns to it. This does not deny a future life, but a return to the present condition of life. Job plainly hopes for a future state (v. 13; ch. 7. 2). Still, it is but vague and trembling hope, not assurance; excepting the one bright glimpse in ch. 19. 25. The Gospel revelation was needed to change fears, hopes, and glimpses into clear and definite certainties. 9. scent—Exhalation, which, rather than the humidity of water, causes the tree to germinate. In the antithesis to man the tree is personified, and volition is poetically ascribed to it. like a plant—"as if newly planted." [UMBREIT.] Not as if trees and plants were a different species. 10. man . . . man—Two distinct Hebrew words are here used; Geber, a mighty man; though mighty, he dies: Adam, a man of earth: because earthly, he gives up the ghost. wasteth—is reduced to nothing: he cannot revive in the present state, as the tree does. The ypress and pine, which when cut down do not revive, were the symbols of death among the Romans. 11. sea—i. e., a lake, or pool formed from the outspreading of a river. Job lived near the Euphrates: and "sea" is applied to it (Jeremiah 51. 36; Isaiah 27. 1). So of the Nile (Isaiah 19. 5). fail—Utterly disappeared by drying up. The rugged channel of the once flowing water answers to the outstretched corpse ("lieth down," v. 12) of the once living man. 12. heavens, be no more—This only implies that Job had no hope of living again in the present order of the world, not that he had no hope of life again in a new order of things. Psalm 102. 26 proves that early under the Old Testament the dissolution of the present earth and heavens was expected (cf. Genesis 8. 22). Enoch before Job had implied that the "sanctis shall live again" (Jude 14; Hebrews 11. 13-16). Even if, by this phrase, Job meant "never" (Psalm 89. 29) in his gloomier state of feelings, yet the Holy Ghost has made him unconsciously (1 Peter 1. 11, 12) use language expressing the truth, that the resurrection is to be preceded by the dissolution of the heavens. In v. 13-15 he plainly passes to brighter hopes of a world to come. 13. Job wishes to be kept hidden in the grave, until God's wrath against him shall have passed away. So whilst God's wrath is visiting the earth for the abounding apostasy which is to precede the second coming, God's people shall be hidden against the resurrection-glory (Isaiah 26. 19-21). set time—A decreed time (Acts 1. 7). 14. shall he live ?—The answer implied is, There is a hope that he shall, though not in the present order of life, as is shown by the words following. Job had denied (v. 10-12) that man shall live again in this present world. But hoping for a "set time," when God shall remember and raise him out of the "hiding"-place of the grave (v. 13), he declares himself willing to "wait all the days of his appointed time" of continuance in the grave, however long and hard that may be. "Appointed time," lit., warfare, hard service: implying the hardship of being shut out from the realms of life, light and God for the time he shall be in the grave (ch. 7. 1). change—My release, as a soldier at his post released from duty by the relieving guard (note 10. 17) [UMBREIT and GESENIUS], but elsewhere GESENIUS explains it, renovation, as of plants in spring (v. 7), but this does not accord so well with the metaphor in "appointed time" or "warfare." 15—viz., at the resurrection (John 5. 28; Psalm 17. 15). have a desire to—lit., become pale with anxious desire: the same word is translated "sore longed after" (Genesis 31. 30; Psalm 84. 2); implying the utter unlikelihood that God would leave in oblivion the "creature of His own hands so fearfully and wonderfully made." It is objected that if Job knew of a future retribution, he would make it the leading topic in solving the problem of the permitted afflictions of the righteous. But 1. "He did not intend to exceed the limits of what was clearly revealed; the doctrine was then in a vague form only. 2. The doctrine of God's moral government in this life, even independently of the future, needed vindication. 16. Rather, Yea, thou wilt number, &c., and wilt not (as now) jealously watch over my sin." Thenceforward, instead of severe watching for every sin of Job, God will guard him against every sin. "Number . . . steps," i. e., minutely attend to them, that they may not wander. [UMBREIT.] (1 Samuel 2. 9; Psalm 37. 23.) 17. sealed up—(Ch. 9. 7.) Is shut up in eternal oblivion, i. e., God thenceforth will think no more of my former sins. To cover sins is to completely forgive them (Psalm 32. 1; 85. 2). Purses of money in the East are usually sealed. sewest up—Rather, "coverest;" akin to an Arabic word "to colour over," to forget wholly. 18. cometh to naught—lit., fadeth: a poetical image from a leaf (Isaiah 34. 4). Here Job falls back into his gloomy bodings as to the grave. Instead of "and surely," translate "yet;" marking the transition from his brighter hopes. Even the solid mountain falls and crumbles away, man therefore cannot "hope" to escape decay or to live again in the present world (v. 19). out of his place—So man (Psalm 103. 16). 19. The Hebrew order is more forcible: "Stones themselves are worn away by water," things which grow out of—Rather, "floods wash away the dust of the earth." There is a gradation from "mountains" to "rocks" (v. 18), then "stones," then last "dust of the earth;" thus the solid mountain at last disappears utterly. 20. prevaillest—Dost overpower by superior strength. passeth—Dieth. changest countenance—The change in the visage at death. Differently (Daniel 5. 9). 21. One striking trait is selected from the sad picture of the severance of the dead from all that passes in the world (Ecclesiastes 9. 5), viz., the utter separation of parents and children. 22. "Flesh" and "soul" describe the whole man. Scripture rests the hope of a future life, not on the inherent immortality of the soul, but on the restoration of the body with the soul. In the unseen world, Job in a gloomy frame anticipates, man shall be limited to the thought of his own misery. "Pain is by personification, from our feelings whilst alive, attributed to the flesh and soul, as if the man could feel in his body when dead. It is the dead in general, not the wicked, who are meant here."

CHAPTER XV.

SECOND SERIES.

Ver. 1-35. SECOND SPEECH OF ELIPHAZ. 2. a wise man—which Job claims to be. vain knowledge—Hebrew, windy knowledge, lit., "of wind" (ch. 8. 2). In Ecclesiastes 1. 14, Hebrew, to catch wind, expresses to strive for what is vain. east wind—Stronger than the previous "wind." For in that region the east wind is the most destructive of winds (Isaiah 27. 8). Thus here,—empty violence. belly—The inward parts, the breast (Proverbs 18. 8). 4. fear—Reverence for God (ch. 4. 6; Psalm 2. 11). prayer—Meditation, in Psalm 104. 34; so devotion. If thy views were right, reasons Eliphaz, that God disregards the afflictions of the righteous and makes the wicked to prosper, all devotion would be an end. 5. The sophistry of thine own speeches proves thy guilt. 6. No pious man would utter such sentiments. 7—i. e., Art thou wisdom personified? Wisdom existed before the hills, i. e., the eternal Son of God (Proverbs 8. 25; Psalm 90. 2). Wast thou in existence before Adam? The farther back one existed, the nearer he was to the Eternal Wisdom. 8. sacred—Rather, "Wast thou a listener in the secret council of God?" The Hebrew means properly the cushions on which a divan of counselors in the East usually sit. God's servants are admitted to God's secrets (Psalm 25. 14; Genesis 18. 17; John 15. 15). restratu—Rather, didst thou take away, or borrow, thence (viz., from the Divine secret council) thy wisdom? Eliphaz in this (v. 8, 9) retorts Job's words upon himself (ch. 12. 2, 3; 13. 2). 9. in us—Or, "with us," Hebraisms for we are aware of. 10. On our side, thinking with us are the aged, Job had admitted that wisdom is with them (ch. 12. 12). Eliphaz seems to have been himself older than Job; perhaps the other two also were so (ch. 32. 6). Job, in ch. 30. 1, does not refer to his three friends; it therefore forms no objection. The Arabs are proud of fulness of years. 11. consolations—viz., the revelation which Eliphaz had stated as a consolatory reproof to Job, and which he repeats in v. 14. secret—Hast thou some secret wisdom and source of consolation, which makes thee disregard those suggested by me? (v. 8). Rather, from a different Hebrew root, is the word of kindness or gentleness addressed by me treated by thee as valueless? [UMBREIT.] 12. wink—i. e., why do thy eyes evince pride? (Proverbs 6. 13; Psalm 35. 19). 13—i. e., Frettest against God, and lettest fall rash words. 14. Eliphaz repeats the revelation (ch. 4. 17) in substance, but using Job's own words (ch. 14. 1, Note on "born of a woman") to strike him with his own weapons. 15. Repeated from ch. 4. 13; "servants" there are "saints" here, viz., holy angels. heavens—lit., or else answering to "angels" (ch. 4. 13; see Note there, and ch. 25. 5). 16. filthy—In Arabic sour (Psalm 14. 3; 53. 3), corrupted from his original purity. drinketh—(Proverbs 19. 28). 17. In direct contradiction of Job's position (ch. 12. 6, &c.), that the lot of the wicked was the most prosperous here, Eliphaz appeals (1) to his own experience, (2) to the wisdom of the ancients. 18. Rather, "and which as handed down from their fathers, they have not concealed." 19. Eliphaz speaks like a genuine Arab when he boasts that his ancestors had ever possessed the land unmixed with foreigners. [UMBREIT.] His words are intended to oppose Job's (ch. 9. 24); "the earth" in their case was not "given into the hand of the wicked." He refers to the division of the earth by Divine appointment (Genesis 10. 5; 25. 32). Also he may insinuate that Job's sentiments had been corrupted from original purity by his vicinity to the Sabaeans and Chaldeans. [ROSENMULLER.] 20. travaileth—Rather, "trembleth of himself," though there is no real danger. [UMBREIT.] and the number of (his) years, &c.—This gives the reason why the wicked man trembles continually, viz., because he knows not the moment when his life must end. 21. An evil conscience conceives alarm at every sudden sound, though it be in a time of peace ("prosperity"), when there is no real danger (Leviticus 26. 36; Proverbs 28. 1; 2 Kings 7. 6). 22. darkness—viz., danger or calamity. Glancing at Job, who despaired of restoration: in contrast to good men when in darkness (Micah 7. 8, 9). waited for of—i. e., He is destined for the sword. [GESENIUS.] Rather (in the night of danger), "he looks anxiously towards the sword," as if every sword was drawn against him. [UMBREIT.] 23. Wandereth in anxious search for bread. Famine in Old Testament depicts sore need (Isaiah 5. 13). Contrast the pious man's lot (ch. 5. 20-22). knoweth—Has the firm conviction. Contrast the same word applied to the pious (ch. 5. 24, 25). ready at his hand—An Arabic phrase to denote a thing's complete readiness and full presence, as if in the hand. 24. prevail—Break upon him suddenly and terribly, as a king, &c. (Proverbs 6. 11). 25. stretcheth . . . hand—Wielding the spear, as a bold rebel against God (ch. 9. 4; Isaiah 27. 4). 26. on his neck—Rather, "with outstretched neck," viz., that of the rebel. [UMBREIT.] (Psalm 75. 5) upon . . . bucklers—Rather, "with—his (the rebel's, not God's) bucklers." The rebel and his fellows are depicted as joining shields together, to form a compact covering over their heads against the weapons hurled on them from a fortress. [UMBREIT and GESENIUS.] 27. The well-nourished body of the rebel is the sign of his prosperity. collops—Masses of fat. He pampers and fattens himself with sensual indulgences. Hence his rebellion against God (Deuteronomy 32. 15; 1 Samuel 2. 29). 28. The class of wicked here described is that of robbers who plunder "cities," and seize on the houses of the banished citizens (Isaiah 13. 20). Eliphaz chooses this class, because Job had chosen the same (ch. 12. 6). heaps—of ruins. 29. Rather, he shall not increase his riches; he has reached his highest point; his prosperity shall not continue. perfection—Rather, "His acquired wealth—what he possesses—shall not be extended," &c. 30. depart—i. e., escape (v. 22, 23). branches—viz., his offspring (ch. 1. 13, 19; Psalm 37. 35). dry up—The "flame" is the sultry wind in the East by which plants most full of sap are suddenly shrivelled. His mouth—i. e., God's wrath (Isaiah 11. 4). 31. Rather, let him not trust in vanity or he will be deceived, &c. vanity—That which is unsubstantial. Sin is its own punishment (Proverbs 1. 31; Jeremiah 2. 19). 32. lit., "it (the tree to which he is compared v. 30, or else his life) shall not be filled up in its time;" i. e., "he shall be ended before his time." shall not be green—Image from a withered tree; the childless extinction of the wicked. 33. Images of incompleteness. The loss of the unripe grapes is poetically made the vine tree's own act, in order to express more pointedly that the sinner's ruin is the fruit of his own conduct (Isaiah 3. 11; Jeremiah 6. 19). 34. Rather, The binding together of the hypocrites (wicked) shall be fruitless. [UMBREIT.] Tabernacles of bribery, viz., dwellings of unjust judges, often reprobed in the Old Testament (Isaiah 1. 23). The "fire of God" that consumed Job's possessions (ch. 1. 16) Eliphaz insinuates may have been on account of Job's bribery as an Arab sheik or emir. 35. Bitter irony, illustrating the "unfruitfulness" (v. 34) of the wicked. Their conceptions and birth-givings consist solely in mischief, &c. (Isaiah 33. 11). prepareth—Hatcheth.

CHAPTER XVI.

SECOND SERIES.

Ver. 1-22. JOB'S REPLY. 2. (Ch. 13. 4.) 3. "Words of wind," Hebrew, He retorts upon Eliphaz his reproach (ch. 15. 2). emboldeneth—lit., What waries you so that ye contradict? i. e., What have I said to provoke you? &c. [SCHUTTENS.] Or, as better accords with the first clause, "wherefore do ye weary yourselves contradicting?" [UMBREIT.] 4. heap up—Rather, marshal together (an army of) words. shake head—in mockery; it means nodding, rather than shaking; nodding is not with us, as in the East, a gesture of scorn (Isaiah 37. 22; Jeremiah 18. 16; Matthew 27. 39). 5. strengthen with mouth—Bitter irony. In allusion to Eliphaz's boasted "consolations" (ch. 15. 11). Opposed to strengthening with the heart, i. e., with real consolation. Translate, "I also (like you) could strengthen with the mouth," i. e., with heartless talk: "And the moving of my lips (mere lip comfort) could console" (in the same fashion as you do). [UMBREIT.] "Heartly counsel" (Proverbs 27. 9) is the opposite. 6. eased—lit., What (portion of my sufferings) goes from me? 7. But now—Rather, "ah!" he—God. company—Rather, "band of witnesses," viz., those who could attest his innocence, his children, servants, &c. So the same Hebrew is translated next verse. UMBREIT makes his "band of witnesses" himself, for, alas! he had no other witness for him. But this is too recondite. 8. filled with wrinkles—Rather (as also the same Hebrew word in ch. 22. 16; English Version, "cut down"), "thou hast fettered me, thy witness" (besides cutting off my "band of witnesses," v. 7), i. e., hast disabled me by pains from properly attesting my innocence. But another "witness" arises against him, viz., his "leanness" or wretched state of body, construed by his friends into a proof of his guilt. The radical meaning of the Hebrew is to draw together, whence flow the double meanings to bind or fetter, and in Syriac, to wrinkle. leanness—meaning also lie; implying it was a false "witness." 9. Image from a wild beast. So God is represented (ch. 10. 16). who hateth me—Rather, "and pursues me hard." Job would not ascribe "hatred" to God (Psalm 50. 22). mine enemy—Rather, "he sharpens, &c., as an enemy" (Psalm 7. 12). Darts wrathful glances at me, like a foe (ch. 13. 24). 10. gaped—not in order to devour, but to mock him. To fill his cup of misery, the mockery of his friends (v. 10) is added to the hostile treatment from God (v. 9). smitten . . . cheek—fig. for contemptuous abuse (Lamentations 3. 30; Matthew 5. 39). gathered themselves—"Conspired unanimously." [SCHUTTENS.] 11. turned me over—lit., cast me headlong into, &c. the ungodly—viz., his professed friends, who persecuted him with unkind speeches. 12. I was at ease—In past times (ch. 1). by my neck—as an animal does its prey (so ch. 10. 16). shaken—violently; in contrast to his former "ease" (Psalm 102. 10). Set me up (again). mark—(ch. 7. 20; Lamentations 3. 12). God lets me always recover strength, so as to torment me ceaselessly. 13. his archers—The image of last verse is continued. God, in making me His "mark," is accompanied by the three friends, whose words wound like sharp arrows. gall—put for a vital part. So the liver (Lamentations 2. 11). 14. The image is from storming a fortress by making breaches in the walls (2 Kings 14. 13). a giant—a mighty warrior. 15. sewed—denoting the tight fit of the mourning garment; it was a sack with arm-holes closely sewed to the body. horn—image from horned cattle, which when excited tear the earth with their horns. The horn was the emblem of power (1 Kings 22. 11). Here, it is "in the dust," which as applied to Job denotes his humiliation from former greatness. To throw one's self in the dust was a sign of mourning; this idea is here joined with that of excited despair, depicted by the fury of a horned beast. The Druses of Lebanon still wear horns as an ornament. 16. foul—Rather, "is red," i. e., flushed and heated. [UMBREIT and NOYES.] shadow of death—i. e., darkening through many tears (Lamentations 5. 17). Job here refers to Zophar's implied charge (ch. 11. 14). Nearly the same words occur as to Jesus Christ (Isaiah 53. 9). So v. 10 above answers to the description of Jesus Christ (Psalm 12. 13; Isaiah 50. 6, and v. 4 to Psalm 22. 7). He alone realized what Job aspired after, viz., outward righteousness of acts and inward purity of devotion. Jesus Christ as the representative man is typified in some degree in every servant of God in the Old Testament. 18. my blood—i. e., my undeserved suffering. He compares himself to one murdered, whose blood the earth refuses to drink up until he is avenged (Genesis 4. 10, 11; Ezekiel 24. 1, 8; Isaiah 26. 21). The Arabs say that the dew of heaven will not descend on a spot watered with innocent blood (cf. 2 Samuel 1. 21). no place—no resting-place. "May my cry never stop!" May it go abroad! "Earth" in this verse in antithesis to "heaven" (v. 19). May my innocence be as well known to man as it is even now to God! 19. Also now—even now, when I am so greatly misunderstood on earth, God in heaven is sensible of my innocence. record—Hebrew, my witness. Amidst all his impatience, Job still trusts in God. 20. Hebrew, more forcibly, "my mockers—my friends!" A heart-cutting paradox. [UMBREIT.] God alone remains to whom he can look for attestation of his innocence; plaintively with tearful eye, he supplicates for this. 21. one—Rather, He (God). "Oh that He would plead for a man (viz., me) against God." Job quaintly says, God must support me against God; for He makes me to suffer, and He alone knows me to be innocent. [UMBREIT.] So God helped Jacob in wrestling against Himself (cf. 23. 6; Genesis 32. 25). God in Jesus Christ does plead with God for man (Romans 8. 26, 27). as a man—lit., the Son of man. A prefiguring of the advocacy of Jesus Christ—a boon longed for by Job (ch. 9. 33), though the spiritual pregnancy of his own words, designed for all ages, was but little understood by him (Psalm 80. 17). for his neighbour—Hebrew, friend. Job himself (ch. 42. 8) pleaded as intercessor for his "friends," though "his scorners" (v. 20); so Jesus Christ the Son of man (Luke 23. 34); "for friends" (John 15. 13-15). 22. few—lit., "years of number," i. e., few, opposed to numberless (Genesis 34. 30).

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1-16. JOB'S ANSWER CONTINUED. 1. breath corrupt—result of elephantiasis. But UMBREIT, "my strength (spirit) is spent." extinct—Life is compared to an expiring light. "The light of my day is extinguished." graves—plural, to heighten the force. 2. [UMBREIT.] More emphatically, "had I only not to endure mockery, in the midst of their contentions I (mine eye) would remain quiet." "Eye continue," or tarry all night (Hebrew), is a figure taken from sleep at night, to express undisturbed rest; opposed to (ch. 16. 20), when the eye of Job is represented as pouring out tears to God without rest. 3. Lay down—viz., a pledge or security, i. e., be my surety; do thou attest my innocence, since my friends only mock me (v. 2). Both litigating parties had to lay down a sum as security before the trial. put me in surety—Provide a surety for me (in the trial) with thee. A pre-emptory of the "surety" (Hebrews 7. 22), or "one Mediator between God and man" (see note 16, 21). strike hands—"who else (save God himself) could strike hands with me?" i. e., be my security (Psalm 119. 122). The Hebrew strikes the hand of him for whom he goes security (Proverbs 6.1). 4. their heart—The intellect of his friends. shalt . . . exalt—Rather imperative, exalt them not. Allow them not to conquer. [UMBREIT.] (Isaiah 6.9, 10). 5. The Hebrew for flattery is smoothness; then it came to mean a prey divided by lot, because a smooth stone was used in casting the lots (Deuteronomy 18.8), "a portion" (Genesis 14.24). Therefore translate "He that delivers up his friend as a prey (which the conduct of my friends implies that they would do), even the eyes," &c. [NOYES.] (Ch. 11.20.) Job says this as to the sinner's children, retorting upon their reproach as to the cutting off of his (ch. 5.4; 15.30). This accords with the Old Testament dispensation of legal retribution (Exodus 20.5). 6. He—God. The poet reverentially suppresses the name of God when speaking of calamities inflicted. by-word—(Deuteronomy 28.37; Psalm 69.11.) My awful punishment makes my name execrated everywhere, as if I must have been superlatively bad to have earned it. aforetime . . . tabret—As David was honoured (1 Samuel 18.6). Rather from a different Hebrew root, "I am treated to my face as an object of disgust," lit., an object to be spit upon in the face (Numbers 12.14). So Raca means (Matthew 5.22). [UMBREIT.] 7. (Psalm 6.7; 31.9; Deuteronomy 34.7.) members—lit., figures; all the individual members being peculiar forms of the body; opposed to "shadow," which looks like a figure without solidity. 8. astounded—at my unmerited sufferings. against the hypocrite—The upright shall feel their sense of justice wounded ("will be indignant") because of the prosperity of the wicked. By "hypocrite" or "ungodly," he perhaps glances at his false friends. 9. The strength of religious principle is heightened by misfortune. The pious shall take fresh courage to persevere from the example of suffering Job. The image is from a warrior acquiring new courage in action (Isaiah 40.30, 31; Philippians 1.14). 10. "Return." If you have any thing to advance really wise, though I doubt it, recommence your speech. For as yet I cannot find one wise man among you all. 11. Only do not vainly speak of the restoration of health to me; for "my days are past." broken off—As the threads of the web cut off from the loom (Isaiah 38.12). thoughts—lit., possessions, i. e., all the feelings and fair hopes which my heart once nourished. These belong to the heart, as "purposes" to the understanding; the two together here describe the entire inner man. 12. They—viz., my friends would change the night into day, i. e., would try to persuade me of the change of my misery into joy, which is impossible [UMBREIT.] (ch. 11.17); (but) the light of prosperity (could it be enjoyed) would be short because of the darkness of adversity. Or better for "short," the Hebrew "near;" "and the light of new prosperity should be near in the face of (before) the darkness of death;" i. e., they would persuade me that light is near, even though darkness approaches. 13. Rather, "if I wait for this grave (seehol, or the unseen world) as my house, and make my bed in the darkness (v. 14), and say to corruption," rather, to the pit or grave, &c. (v. 15.) Where then is my hope? [UMBREIT.] The apodosis is at v. 15. 14. Thou art my father, &c.—Expressing most intimate connection (Proverbs 7.4). His diseased state made him closely akin to the grave and worm. 15. Who shall see it fulfilled? viz., the "hope" (ch. 11.18) which they held out to him of restoration. 16. They—viz., my hopes shall be buried with me. bars—(Isaiah 38.10) Rather, the wastes or solitudes of the pit (seehol, the unseen world). rest together—The rest of me and my hope is in, &c. Both expire together. The word "rest" implies that man's ceaseless hopes only rob him of rest.

CHAPTER XVIII.

SECOND SERIES.

Ver. 1-21. REPLY OF BILDAD. 2. ye—The other two friends of Job, whom Bildad charges with having spoken mere "words," i. e., empty speeches; opposed to "mark," i. e., come to reason, consider the question intelligently; and then let us speak. 3. beasts—Alluding to what Job said (ch. 12.7; so Isaiah 1.3). vite—Rather from a Hebrew root, to stop up. "Stubborn," answering to the stupidity implied in the parallel first clause. [UMBREIT.] Why should we give occasion by your empty speeches for our being mutually reputed, in the sight of Job and one another, unintelligent? (ch. 17.4, 10). 4. Rather, turning to Job, thou that tearest thyself in anger (ch. 5.2). be forsaken—Become desolate. He alludes here to Job's words as to the "rock," &c., crumbling away (ch. 14.18, 19); but in a different application. He says bitterly "for thee." Wert thou not punished as thou art, and as thou art unwilling to bear, the eternal order of the universe would be disturbed and the earth become desolate through unavenged wickedness. [UMBREIT.] Bildad takes it for granted Job is a great sinner (ch. 8.3-6; Isaiah 24.5, 6), "Shall that which stands fast as a rock be removed for your special accommodation?" 5. That (v. 4) cannot be. The decree of God is unalterable, the light (prosperity) of the wicked shall at length be put out. his fire—Alluding to Arabian hospitality, which prided itself on welcoming the stranger to the fire in the tent, and even lit fires to direct him to it. The ungodly shall be deprived of the means to show hospitality. His dwelling shall be dark and desolate! 6. candle—The lamp which in the East is usually fastened to the ceiling. Oil abounds in those regions, and the lamp was kept burning all night, as now in Egypt, where the poorest would rather dispense with food than the night-lamp (Psalm 18.28). To put out the lamp was an image of utter desolation. 7. "Steps of strength," Hebrew, for His strong steps. A firm step marks health. To be straitened in steps is to be no longer able to move about at will (Proverbs 4.12). his own counsel—Or plans shall be the means of his fall (ch. 5.13). 8. he walketh upon—Rather, "he lets himself go into the net." [UMBREIT.] If the English Version be retained, then understand "snare" to be the pit-fall, covered over with branches and earth, which when walked upon give way (Psalm 9.15; 35.8). 9. robber—Rather answering to "gin" in the parallel clause, "the noose shall hold him fast." [UMBREIT.] 11. terrors—Often mentioned in this book (v. 14; ch. 21.17; &c.). The terrors excited through an evil conscience are here personified. "Magor-missabib" (Jeremiah 20.3). drive . . . to his feet—Rather, shall pursue (lit., scatter, Habakkuk 3.14) him close at his heels (lit., immediately after his feet, Habakkuk 3.5; 1 Samuel 25.42; Hebrew). The image is that of a pursuing conqueror who scatters the enemy. [UMBREIT.] 13. The Hebrew is brief and bold, "his strength is hungry." destruction—i. e., a great calamity (Proverbs 1.27). ready at his side—Close at hand to destroy him (Proverbs 19.29). 13. UMBREIT has "he" for "it," i. e., "in the rage of hunger he shall devour his own body;" or, his own children (Lamentations 4.10). Rather, "destruction" from the last verse is nom. to "devour." strength—Rather, "members" (lit., the branches of a tree). the first-born of death—A personification full of poetical horror. The first-born son held the chief place (Genesis 49.3); so here the chiefest (most deadly) disease that death has ever engendered (Isaiah 14.30; "first-born of the poor"—the poorest). The Arabs call fever, "daughter of death." 14. confidence—All that the father trusted in for domestic happiness, children, fortune, &c., referring to Job's losses. rooted out—Suddenly torn away, it shall bring—i. e., he shall be brought; or, as UMBREIT better has, "Thou (God) shalt bring him slowly." The Hebrew expresses, "to stride slowly and solemnly." The godless has a fearful death for long before his eyes, and is at last taken by it. Alluding to Job's case. The King of terrors, not like the heathen Pluto, the fabled ruler of the dead, but Death, with all its terrors to the ungodly, personified. 15. It—Terror shall haunt, &c., and not as UMBREIT another, which the last clause of the verse disproves. none of his—It is his no longer. brimstone—Probably comparing the calamity of Job by the "fire of God" (ch. 1.16) to the destruction of guilty Sodom by fire and brimstone (Genesis 19.2). 16. "Roots," himself. "Branch," his children (ch. 8.12; 15.30; Malachi 4.1). 17. street—Men shall not speak of him in meeting in the highways. Rather, in the field or meadow; the shepherds shall no more mention his name. A picture from nomadic life. [UMBREIT.] 18. light . . . darkness—Existence—non-existence. 19. nephew—(So Isaiah 14.22.) But it is translated "grandson" (Genesis 21.23), translate "kinsman." 20. after . . . before—Rather, "those in the West—those in the East;" i. e., all people; lit., those behind—those before; for Orientals in geography turn with their face to the east (not to the north as we), and back to the west; so that before—east; behind—north (so Zechariah 14.8). day—Of ruin. (Obadiah 12.) affrighted—Seized with terror (ch. 21.6; Isaiah 13.8). 21. (Ch. 8.22, Margin.)

CHAPTER XIX.

SECOND SERIES.

Ver. 1-29. JOB'S REPLY TO BILDAD. 2. How long, &c.—Retorting Bildad's words (ch. 18.2). Admitting the punishment to be deserved, is it kind thus ever to be harping on this to the sufferer? And yet even this they have not yet proved. 3. These—Prefixed to numbers emphatically (Genesis 27.36). ten—i. e., often (Genesis 31.7). make yourselves strange—Rather, stun me. [GESENIUS.] (See Margin for a different meaning.) 4. erred—The Hebrew expresses unconscious error. Job was unconscious of wilful sin. remaineth—lit., passeth the night. An image from harbouring an unpleasant guest for the night. I bear the consequences. 5. magnify, &c.—Speak proudly (Obadiah 12; Ezekiel 35.13). against me—Emphatically repeated (Psalm 38.16). plead . . . reproach—English Version makes this part of the protasis, "if" being understood, and the apodosis beginning at v.6. Better with UMBREIT, If ye would become great heroes against me in truth, ye must prove (evince) against me my guilt, or shame, which you assert. In the English Version "reproach" will mean Job's calamities, which they "pleaded" against him as a "reproach," or proof of guilt. 6. compassed . . . net—Alluding to Bildad's words (ch. 18.8). Know, that it is not that I as a wicked man have been caught in my "own net;" it is God who has compassed me in His—why, I know not. 7. wrong—Violence: brought on him by God. no judgment—God will not remove my calamities, and so vindicate my just cause; and my friends will not do justice to my past character. 8. Image from a benighted traveller. 9. stripped . . . crown—Image from a deposed king, deprived of his robes and eroun: appropriate to Job, once an emhr with all but royal dignity (Lamentations 5.16; Psalm 89.39). 10. destroyed . . . on every side—"Shaken all round, so that I fall in the dust:" image from a tree uprooted by violent shaking from every side, [UMBREIT.] The last clause accords with this (Jeremiah 1.10). mine hope—As to this life (in opposition to Zophar, ch. 11.18); not as to the world to come (v.25; ch.14.15). removed—Uprooted. 11. enemies—(Ch. 13.24; Lamentations 2.5.) 12. troops—Calamities advance together like hostile troops (ch.10.17). raise up . . . way—An army must cast up a way of access before it, in marching against a city (Isaiah 40.3). 13. brethren—Nearest kinsmen, as distinguished from "acquaintance." So "kinsfolk" and "familiar friends" (v.14) correspond in parallelism. The Arabic proverb is, "The brother, i. e., the true friend is only known in time of need," estranged—lit., turn away with disgust. Job again unconsciously uses language prefiguring the desertion of Jesus Christ (ch. 16.10; Luke 23.49; Psalm 38.11). 15. They that dwell, &c.—Rather, sojourn: male servants, sojourning in his house. Mark the contrast. The stranger admitted to sojourn as a dependant treats the master as a stranger in his own house. 16. servant—Born in my house (as distinguished from those sojourning in it), and so altogether belonging to the family. Yet even he disobeys my call. mouth—i. e., calling aloud; formerly a nod was enough. Now I no longer look for obedience, I try entreaty. 17. strange—His breath by elephantiasis had become so strongly altered and offensive, that his wife turned away as estranged from him (v.13; ch.17.1). children . . . of mine own body—lit., belly. But "loins" is what we should expect, not "belly" (womb), which applies to the woman. The "mine" forbids it being taken of his wife. Their children

besides were dead. In ch. 3.10 the same words "my womb" mean, my mother's womb: therefore translate, "and I must entreat (as a suppliant) the children of my mother's womb;" i. e., my own brothers. A heightening of force, as compared with last clause of v.16. [UMBREIT.] Not only must I entreat suppliantly my servant, but my own brothers (Psalm 69.8). Here too, he unconsciously foreshadows Jesus Christ (John 7.5). 18. young children—So the Hebrew means (ch.21.11). Reverence for age is a chief duty in the East. The word means "wicked" (ch. 16.11). So UMBREIT has it here, not so well. I arose—Rather, supply "if," as Job was no more in a state to stand up. "If I stood up (arose) they would speak against (abuse) me." [UMBREIT.] 19. inward—Confidential: lit., "men of my secret"—to whom I entrusted my most intimate confidence. 20. Extreme meagreness. The bone seemed to stick in the skin, being seen through it, owing to the flesh drying up and falling away from the bone. The Margin, "as to my flesh," makes this sense clearer. The English Version, however, expresses the same; "And to my flesh," viz., which has fallen away from the bone, instead of firmly covering it. skin of my teeth—Proverbial. I have escaped with bare life; I am whole only with the skin of my teeth, i. e., my gums alone are whole, the rest of the skin of my body is broken with sores (ch.7.5; Psalm 102.5). Satan left Job speech, in hope that he might therewith curse God. 21. When God had made him such a piteous spectacle, his friends should spare him the additional persecution of their cruel speeches. 22. As God—has persecuted me. Prefiguring Jesus Christ (Psalm 69.26). That God afflicts is no reason that man is to add to a sufferer's affliction (Zechariah 1.15). satisfied with my flesh—It is not enough that God afflicts my flesh literally (v.20), but you must "eat my flesh" metaphorically (Psalm 27.2); i. e., utter the worst calumnies, as the phrase often means in Arabic. 23. Despairing of justice from his friends in his lifetime, he wishes his words could be preserved imperishably to posterity, attesting his hope of vindication at the resurrection. printed—Not our modern printing, but engraved. pen—Graver. lead—poured into the engraven characters, to make them better seen. [UMBREIT.] Not on leaden plates; for it was "in the rock" that they were engraved. Perhaps it was the hammer that was of "lead," as sculptors find more delicate incisions are made by it, than by a harder hammer. FOSTER (One Primev. Lang.) has shown that the inscriptions on the rocks in Wady-Mokatta, along Israel's route through the desert, record the journeys of that people, as Cosmas Indicopleustes asserted, 535 A. D. 24. for ever—As long as the rock lasts. 25. Redeemer—UMBREIT, &c., understand this and v.26, of God appearing as Job's avenger before his death, when his body would be wasted to a skeleton. But Job uniformly despairs of restoration and vindication of his cause in this life (ch.17.15,16). One hope alone was left, which the Spirit revealed—a vindication in a future life: it would be no full vindication if his soul alone were to be happy without the body; as some explain (v.26) "out of the flesh." It was his body that had chiefly suffered: the resurrection of his body, therefore, alone could vindicate his cause: to see God with his own eyes, and in a renovated body (v.27), would disprove the imputation of guilt cast on him because of the sufferings of his present body. That this truth is not further dwelt on by Job, or noticed by his friends, only shows that it was with him a bright passing glimpse of Old Testament hope, rather than the steady light of Gospel assurance; with us this passage has a definite clearness, which it had not in his mind (see Note 21.30). The idea in "Redeemer" with Job is Vindicator (ch.16.19; Numbers 35.27), redressing his wrongs; also including at least with us, and probably with him, the idea of the predicted Bruiser of the serpent's head. Tradition would inform him of the prediction. FOSTER shows that the fall by the serpent is represented perfectly on the temple of Osiris at Philæ; and the resurrection on the tomb of the Egyptian Mycerinus, dating 4000 years back. Job's sacrifices imply sense of sin and need of atonement. Satan was the injurer of Job's body; Jesus Christ his Vindicator, the Living one who giveth life (John 5.21,26). at the latter day—Rather, “the Last,” the peculiar title of Jesus Christ, though Job may not have known the pregnancy of his own inspired words, and may have understood merely one that comes after (1 Corinthians 15. 45; Revelation 1. 17). Jesus Christ is the last. The day of Jesus Christ the last day (John 6. 39). stand—Rather, arise. As God is said to “raise up” the Messiah (Jeremiah 23. 5; Deuteronomy 18. 15). earth—Rather, dust: often associated with the body crumbling away in it (ch. 7. 21; 17. 16); therefore appropriately here. Above that very dust wherewith was mingled man’s decaying body shall man’s Vindicator arise. “Arise above the dust,” strikingly expresses that fact that Jesus Christ arose first Himself above the dust, and then is to raise His people above it (1 Corinthians 15. 20, 23). The Spirit intended in Job’s words more than Job fully understood (1 Peter 1. 12). Though he seems, in forsaking me, to be as one dead, He now truly “liveth” in heaven; hereafter He shall appear also above the dust of earth. The Goel or vindicator of blood was the nearest kinsman of the slain. So Jesus Christ took our flesh, to be our kinsman. Man lost life by Satan the “murderer” (John 8. 44), here Job’s persecutor (Hebrews 2. 14). Compare also as to redemption of the inheritance by the kinsman of the dead (Ruth 4. 3-5; Ephesians 1. 14). 26. Rather, “though after my skin (is no more this) (body) is destroyed (“body” being omitted, because it was so wasted as not to deserve the name), yet from my flesh (from my renewed body, as the starting-point of vision, Song of Solomon 2. 9; “looking out from the windows”) “shall I see God.” Next clause proves bodily vision is meant, for it specifies “mine eyes.” [ROSENMULLER, 2d ed.] The Hebrew opposes “in my flesh.” The “skin” was the first destroyed by elephantiasis, then the “body.” 27. for myself—For my advantage, as my friend. not another—Mine eyes shall behold Him, but no longer as one estranged from me, as now. [BENGE.] though—Better omitted: my reins (inward recesses of the heart) are consumed within me, i. e., pine with longing desire for that day (Psalm 84. 2; 119. 81). The Gentiles had but few revealed promises: how gracious that the few should have been so explicit (cf. Numbers 24. 17; Matthew 2. 2). 28. Rather, ye will then (when the Vindicator cometh) say, Why, &c. root . . . in me—The root of pious integrity, which was the matter at issue, whether it could be in one so afflicted, is found in me. UMBREIT, with many MSS. and versions, reads “in him.” “Or how found we in him ground of contention.” 29. “Wrath (the passionate violence with which the friends persecuted Job) bringeth,” &c. lit., is sin of the sword, that ye may know—Supply, “I say this.” judgment—Inseparably connected with the coming of the Vindicator. The “wrath” of God at His appearing for the temporal vindication of Job against the friends (ch. 42. 7), is a pledge of the eternal wrath at the final coming to glorify the saints and judge their enemies (2 Thessalonians 1. 6-10; Isaiah 25. 8).

CHAPTER XX.

SECOND SERIES.

Ver. 1-29. REPLY OF ZOPHAR. 2. Therefore—Rather, the more excited I feel by Job’s speech, the more for that very reason shall my reply be supplied by my calm consideration. lit., “Notwithstanding; my calm thoughts (as in ch. 4. 13) shall furnish my answer, because of the excitement (haste) within me.” [UMBREIT.] 3. check of my reproach—i. e., the castigation intended as a reproach (lit., shame) to me. spirit of . . . understanding—My rational spirit; answering to “calm thoughts” (v. 2). In spite of thy reproach urging me to “hastiness,” I will answer in calm reason. 5. hypocrite—lit., the ungodly (Psalm 37. 35, 36). 6. (Isalah 14. 13; Obadiah 3. 4) 7. dung—In contrast to the haughtiness of the sinner (v. 6); this strong term expresses disgust and the lowest degradation (Psalm 83. 10; 1 Kings 14. 10). 8. (Psalm 73. 20.) 9. Rather “the eye followeth him, but can discern him no more.” A sharp-looking is meant (ch. 28. 7; ch. 7. 10). 10. seek to please—“Atone to the poor” (by restoring the property of which they had been robbed by the father). [DE WETTE.] Better than English Version, “The children” are reduced to the humiliating condition of “seeking the favour of those very poor,” whom the father had oppressed. But UMBREIT translates as Margin, his hands—Rather, their (the children’s) hands. their goods—The goods of the poor. Righteous retribution! (Exodus 20. 5.) 11. (Psalm 25. 7), so Vulgate. GESENIUS has “full of youth;” viz., in the fulness of his youthful strength he shall be laid in the dust. But “bones” plainly alludes to Job’s disease, probably to Job’s own words (ch. 19. 20). UMBREIT translates “full of his secret sins,” as in Psalm 90. 8; his secret guilt in his time of seeming righteousness, like secret poison, at last lays him in the dust. The English Version is best. Zophar alludes to Job’s own words (ch. 17. 16). with him—His sin had so pervaded his nature that it accompanies him to the grave: for eternity the sinner cannot get rid of it (Revelation 22. 11). 12. be—“Taste sweet.” Sin’s fascination is like poison sweet to the taste, but at last deadly to the vital organs (Proverbs 20. 17; ch. 9. 17, 18). hide . . . tongue—Seek to prolong the enjoyment by keeping the sweet morsel long in the mouth (so v. 13). 14. turned—The Hebrew denotes a total change into a disagreeable contrary (Jeremiah 2. 21; cf. Revelation 10. 9, 10). 14. gall—In which the poison of the asp was thought to lie. It rather is contained in a sack in the mouth. Scripture uses popular language, where no moral truth is thereby endangered. 15. He is forced to disgorge his ill-gotten wealth. 16. shall suck—It shall turn out that he has sucked the poison, &c. 17. floods—lit., stream of floods, plentiful streams flowing with milk, &c. (ch. 29. 6; Exodus 3. 17). Honey and butter are more fluid in the East than with us, and are poured out from jars. These “rivers” or water brooks are in the sultry East emblems of prosperity. 18. Image from food which is taken away from one before he can swallow it. restitution—(So Proverbs 6. 31). The parallelism favours the English Version rather than the translation of GESENIUS, “As a possession to be restored in which he rejoices not.” he shall not rejoice—His enjoyment of his ill-gotten gains shall then be at an end (v. 5). 19. oppressed—Whereas he ought to have espoused their cause (2 Chronicles 16. 10). forsaken—Left helpless. house—Thus leaving the poor without shelter (Isaiah 5. 8; Micah 2. 2). 20. UMBREIT translates, “His inward parts know no rest” from desires. his belly—i. e., peace inwardly. not save—lit., “not escape with that which,” &c. Alluding to Job’s having been stripped of his all. 21. look for—Rather, Because his goods, i. e., prosperity shall have no endurance. 22. shall be—Rather, “he is (feeleth) straitened.” The next clause explains in what respect. wicked—Rather, “the whole hand of the miserable (whom he had oppressed) cometh upon him;” viz., the sense of his having oppressed the poor, now in turn comes with all its power (hand) on him. This caused his “straitened” feeling even in prosperity. 23. Rather, “God shall cast (may God send) [UMBREIT] upon him the fury of His wrath to fill his belly!” while eating—Rather, “Shall rain it upon him for his food! Fiery rain, i. e., lightning (Psalm 11. 6; alluding to Job’s misfortune, ch. 1. 16). The force of the image is felt by picturing to one’s self the opposite nature of a refreshing rain in the desert (Exodus 16. 4; Psalm 68. 9). 24. steel—Rather, “brass.” Whilst the wicked flees from one danger, he falls into a greater one from an opposite quarter. [UMBREIT.] 25. it is drawn—Rather, “He (God) draweth (the sword, Joshua 5. 13) and (no sooner has He done so, than) it cometh out of (i. e., passes right through) the (sinner’s) body” (Deuteronomy 32. 41, 42; Ezekiel 21. 9, 10). The glittering sword is a happy image for lightning. gall—i. e., his life (ch. 16. 13). “Inflicts a deadly wound.” terrors—Zophar repeats Bildad’s words (ch. 17. 11; Psalms 88. 16; 55. 4). 26. “All darkness,” i. e., every calamity that befalls the wicked shall be hid (in store for him) in His (God’s) secret places, or treasures (Jude 13; Deuteronomy 32. 34.) not blown—Not kindled by man’s hands, but by God’s (Isalah 30. 33; LXX. in ALEXANDRIAN MS. read “unquenchable fire,” Matthew 3. 12). Tact is shown by the friends in not expressly mentioning, but alluding under colour of general cases, to Job’s calamities; here (ch. 1. 16) UMBREIT explains it, wickedness is a “self-igniting fire;” in it lie the principles of destruction, Ill . . . tabernacle—Every trace of the sinner must be obliterated (ch. 18. 15). 27. All creation is at enmity with him, and proclaims his guilt, which he would fain conceal. 28. increase—Prosperity. Ill got—ill gone. flow away—Like waters that run dry in summer; using Job's own metaphor against himself (ch. 6. 15-17; 2 Samuel 14. 14; Micah 1. 4). his wrath—God's. 29. appointed—Not as a matter of chance, but by the Divine "decree" (Margin) and settled principle.

CHAPTER XXI.

SECOND SERIES.

Ver. 1-34. JOB'S ANSWER. 2. consolations—If you will listen calmly to me, this will be regarded as "consolations;" alluding to Eliphaz's boasted "consolations" (ch. 15. 11), which Job felt more as aggravations ("mockings," v. 3) than consolations (ch. 16. 2). 3. lit., "Begin your mockings" (ch. 17. 2). 4. Job's difficulty was not as to man, but as to God, why He so afflicted him, as if he were the guilty hypocrite which the friends alleged him to be. VULGATE translates it, "my disputation." if it were—Rather, since this is the case. 5. lay . . . hand upon . . . mouth—(Proverbs 30. 32; Judges 18. 19). So the heathen god of silence was pictured with his hand on his mouth. There was enough in Job's case to awe them into silence (ch. 17. 8). 6. remember—Think on it. Can you wonder that I broke out into complaints, when the struggle was not with men, but with the Almighty? Reconcile, if you can, the ceaseless woes of the innocent with the Divine justice! Is it not enough to make one tremble? [UMBREIT.] 7. The answer is (Romans 2. 4; 1 Timothy 1. 16; Psalm 73. 18; Ecclesiastes 8. 11-13; Luke 2. 35 end; Proverbs 16. 4; Romans 9. 22). old—in opposition to the friends who asserted that sinners are "cut off" early (ch. 8. 12, 14). 8. In opposition to (ch. 18. 19; 5. 4). 9. Lit., Peace from fear; with poetic force. Their house is peace itself, far removed from fear. Opposed to the friends' assertion, as to the bad (ch. 15. 21-24; 20. 28-28), and conversely, the good (ch. 5. 23, 24). 10. Rather, their cattle conceive. The first clause of the verse describes an easy conception, the second, a happy birth. [UMBREIT.] 11. "Send forth," viz., out of doors, to their happy sports under the skies, like a joyful flock sent to the pastures. little ones—Like lambskins. children—Somewhat older than the former. dance—Not formal dances; but skip, like lambs, in joyous and healthful play. 12. take—Rather, lift up the voice (sing) to the note of, [UMBREIT.] tambrel—Rather, tambourine organ—Not the modern "organ," but the "pipe" (Genesis 4. 21). The first clause refers to stringed, the latter, to wind instruments; thus, with "the voice" all kinds of music are enumerated. 13. wealth—Old English Version for prosperity. in a moment—Not by a lingering disease. Great blessings! Lengthened life with prosperity, and a sudden painless death (Psalm 73. 4). 14. Therefore—Rather, And yet they are such as say, &c., i. e., say, not in so many words, but virtually, by their conduct (so the Gergesenes, Matthew 8. 34). How differently the godly (Isaiah 2. 3). ways—The course of action, which God points out; as in Psalm 50. 23; Margin. 15. (cf. Jeremiah 2. 20; Margin; Proverbs 30. 9; Exodus 5. 2). what profit—(ch. 35. 3; Malachi 3. 14; Psalm 73. 13). Sinners ask, not what is right, but what is for the profit of self. They forget, "if religion cost self something, the want of it will cost self infinitely more." 16. not in their hand—But in the hand of God. This is Job's difficulty, that God who has sinners' prosperity (good) in His hand should allow them to have it. is—Rather, "may the counsel of the wicked be far from me!" [UMBREIT.] This naturally follows the sentiment of the first clause: Let me not hereby be thought to regard with aught but horror the ways of the wicked, however prosperous. 17. Job in this whole passage down to 21 quotes the assertion of the friends, as to the short continuance of the sinner's prosperity, not his own sentiments. In 22 he proceeds to refute them. "How oft is the candle" (lamp) &c., quoting Bildad's sentiment (ch. 18. 5, 6), in order to question its truth (cf. Matthew 25. 8). how oft—"God distributeth," &c. (alluding to ch. 20. 23, 29). sorrows—

UMBREIT translates "snares," lit., cords, which lightning in its twining motion resembles (Psalm 11. 6). 18. Job alludes to a like sentiment of Bildad (ch. 18. 18), using his own previous words (ch. 13. 25). 19. Equally questionable is the friends' assertion, that if the godless himself is not punished, the children are (ch. 18. 19; 20. 10); and that God rewardeth him here for his iniquity, and that he shall know it to his cost. So "know" (Hosea 9. 7). 20. Another questionable assertion of the friends, that the sinner sees his own and his children's destruction in his lifetime. drink—(Psalm 11. 6; Isaiah 51. 17; Lamentations 4. 21.) 21. The argument of the friends, in proof of v. 20, What pleasure can he have from his house (children) when he is dead—"after him;" Ecclesiastes 3. 22). when the number, &c.—(ch. 14. 21.) Or, rather, What hath he to do with his children, &c.? (so the Hebrew in Ecclesiastes 3. 1; 8. 6). It is therefore necessary "his eyes should see his and their destruction." cut off—Rather, when the number of his allotted months is fulfilled (ch. 14. 5). From an Arabic word, arrow, which was used to draw lots with. Hence arrow—inevitable destiny. [UMBREIT.] 22. Reply of Job, "In all these assertions you try to teach God how He ought to deal with men, rather than prove that He does in fact so deal with them. Experience is against you. God gives prosperity and adversity as it pleases Him, not as man's wisdom would have it, on principles inscrutable as us" (Isaiah 40. 13; Romans 11. 34). those . . . high—The high ones, not only angels, but men (Isaiah 2. 12-17). 23. Lit., in the bone of his perfection, i. e., the full strength of unimpaired prosperity. [UMBREIT.] 24. breasts—Rather, skins, or vessels for fluids. [LEE.] But [UMBREIT] "stations or resting-places of his herds near water;" in opposition to Zophar (ch. 20. 17); the first clause refers to his abundant substance, the second to his vigorous health. moistened—Comparing man's body to a well-watered field (Proverbs 3. 8; Isaiah 58. 11). 26. (Ecclesiastes 9. 2.) 27. Their wrongful thoughts against Job are stated by him in v. 23. They do not honestly name Job, but insinuate his guilt. 28. ye say—referring to Zophar (ch. 20. 7). the house—referring to the fall of the house of Job's eldest son (ch. 1. 19) and the destruction of his family. prince—The parallel "wicked" in the second clause requires this to be taken in a bad sense, tyrant, oppressor (Isaiah 14. 2), the same Hebrew, "nobles"—oppressors. dwelling-places—Rather, pavilions, lit., a tent containing many dwellings, such as a great emir, like Job, with many dependants, would have. 29. Job seeing that the friends will not admit him as an impartial judge, as they consider his calamities prove his guilt, begs them to ask the opinion of travellers (Lamentations 1. 12), who have the experience drawn from observation, and who are no way connected with him. Job opposes this to Bildad (ch. 8. 8) and Zophar (ch. 20. 4). tokens—Rather, intimations (ex. gr., inscriptions, proverbs, signifying the results of their observation), testimony. Lit., signs or proofs in confirmation of the word spoken (Isaiah 7. 11). 30. Their testimony (referring perhaps to those who had visited the region where Abraham who enjoyed a revelation then lived) is, that "the wicked is (now) spared (reserved) against the day of destruction" (hereafter). The Hebrew does not so well agree with [UMBREIT] "in the day of destruction." Job does not deny sinners' future punishment, but their punishment in this life. They have their "good things" now. Hereafter, their lot, and that of the godly, shall be reversed (Luke 16. 25). Job, by the Spirit, often utters truths which solve the difficulty under which he laboured. His afflictions mostly clouded his faith, else he would have seen the solution furnished by his own words. This answers the objection, that if he knew of the resurrection in ch. 19. 25, and future retribution (ch. 21. 30), why did he not draw his reasonings elsewhere from them, which he does not? God's righteous government, however, needs to be vindicated as to this life also, and therefore the Holy Ghost has caused the argument mainly to turn on it, at the same time giving glimpses of a future fuller vindication of God's ways. brought forth—not "carried away safe" or "escape" (referring to this life), as UMBREIT has it. wrath—Lit., "wraths," i. e., multiplied and fierce wrath. 31—i. e., who dares to charge him openly with his bad ways? viz., in this present life. He shall, I grant (v. 30), be "repaid" hereafter. 33. Yet—Rather, and, brought—with solemn pomp (Psalm 45. 15). grave—lit., graves; i. e., the place where the graves are. remain in—Rather, watch on the tomb, or sepulchral mound. Even after death he seems still to live and watch (i. e., have his "remembrance" preserved) by means of the monument over the grave. In opposition to Bildad (ch. 18. 17). 33. As the classic saying has it, "The earth is light upon him." His repose shall be "sweet." draw—follow. He shall share the common lot of mortals; no worse off than they (Hebrews 9. 27). UMBREIT not so well (for it is not true of "every man"), "Most men follow in his bad steps, as countless such preceded him." 34. falsehood—lit., wickedness. Your boasted "consolations" (ch. 15. 11) are contradicted by facts ("valn"), they therefore only betray your evil intent ("wickedness") against me.

CHAPTER XXII.

THIRD SERIES.

Ver. 1-30. AS BEFORE, ELIPHAZ BEGINS. 1. Eliphaz shows, that man's goodness does not add to, or man's badness take from, the happiness of God; therefore it cannot be that God sends prosperity to some and calamities on others for his own advantage; the cause of the goods and ills sent must lie in the men themselves (Psalm 16. 2; Luke 17. 10; Acts 17. 25; 1 Chronicles 29. 14). So Job's calamities must arise from guilt. Eliphaz, instead of meeting the facts, tries to show that it could not be so. 2. as he that is wise—Rather, yea the pious man profiteth himself. So "understanding" or "wise"—pious (Daniel 12. 3, 10; Psalm 14. 2). [MICHAELIS.] 3. pleasure—Accession of happiness; God has pleasure in man's righteousness (Psalm 45. 7), but He is not dependent on man's character for His happiness. 4. Is the punishment inflicted on thee from fear of thee, in order to disarm thee? as Job had implied (Notes 7. 12, 20; 10. 17). will He enter . . . into judgment?—Job had desired this (ch. 13. 3, 21). He ought rather have spoken as Psalm 143. 2. 5. Heretofore Eliphaz had only insinuated, now he plainly asserts Job's guilt; merely on the ground of his sufferings. 6. The crimes alleged, on a harsh inference, by Eliphaz against Job are such as he would think likely to be committed by a rich man. The Mosaic law (Exodus 22. 26; Deuteronomy 24. 10) subsequently embodied the feeling that existed among the godly in Job's time against oppression of debtors as to their pledges. Here the case is not quite the same; Job is charged with taking a pledge where he had no just claim to it; and in the second clause, that pledge (the outer garment which served the poor as a covering by day and a bed by night) is represented as taken from one who had not "changes of raiment" (a common constituent of wealth in the East), but was poorly clad—"naked" (Matthew 25. 36; James 2. 15); a sin the more heinous in a rich man like Job. 7. Hospitality to the weary traveller is regarded in the East as a primary duty (Isalah 21. 14). 8. mighty—Hebrew, "man of arm" (Psalm 10. 15; viz., Job). honourable—Hebrew, accepted of countenance (Isalah 3. 3; 2 Kings 5. 1), i. e., possessing authority. Eliphaz repeats his charge (ch. 15. 25; so Zophar, ch. 20. 19), that it was by violence Job wrung houses and lands from the poor, to whom now he refused relief (v. 7, 9). [MICHAELIS.] 9. empty—without their wants being relieved (Genesis 31. 42). The Mosaic law especially protected the widow and fatherless (Exodus 22. 22); the violation of it in their case by the great is a complaint of the prophets (Isalah 1. 17). arms—supports, helps, on which one leans (Hosea 7. 15). Thou hast robbed them of their only stay. Job replies in ch. 20. 11-16. 10. snares—alluding to Job's admission (ch. 19. 6; cf. ch. 18. 10; Proverbs 22. 6). 11. that—So that thou. abundance—floods. Danger by floods is a less frequent image in this book than in the rest of the Old Testament (ch. 11. 16; 27. 20). 12. Eliphaz says this to prove that God can from His height behold all things; gratuitously inferring that Job denied it, because he denied that the wicked are punished here. height—Hebrew, head, i. e., elevation (ch. 11. 8). 13. Rather, And yet thou sayest, God does not concern himself with

("know") human affairs (Psalm 73. 11). 14. "In the circuit of heaven" only, not taking any part in earthly affairs. Job is alleged as holding this Epicurean sentiment (Lamentations 3. 44; Isalah 29. 15; 40. 27; Jeremiah 23. 24; Ezekiel 8. 12; Psalm 139. 12). 15. marked—Rather, Dost thou keep to? i. e., wish to follow (so Hebrew, 2 Samuel 22. 22). If so, beware of sharing their end. the old way—The degenerate ways of the world before the flood (Genesis 6. 5). 16. cut down—Rather, "fettered," as in ch. 16. 8; i. e., arrested by death. out of time—Prematurely, suddenly (ch. 15. 32; Ecclesiastes 7. 17), lit., whose foundation was poured out (so as to become) a stream or flood. The solid earth passed from beneath their feet into a flood (Genesis 7. 11). 17. Eliphaz designedly uses Job's own words (ch. 21. 14, 15). do for them—They think they can do everything for themselves. 18. "Yet" you say (ch. 21. 16, see Note) that it is "He who filled their houses with good"—"their" "good is not in their hand," but comes from God. but the counsel . . . is, &c.—Rather, may the counsel be, &c. Eliphaz sarcastically quotes in continuation Job's words (ch. 21. 16). Yet, after uttering this godless sentiment, thou dost hypocritically add, "May the counsel," &c. 19. Triumph of the pious at the fall of the recent followers of the antediluvian sinners. Whilst in the act of denying that God can do them any good or harm, they are cut off by Him. Eliphaz hereby justifies himself and the friends for their conduct to Job: not derision of the wretched, but joy at the vindication of God's ways (Psalm 107. 42; Revelation 15. 3; 16. 7; 19. 1, 2). 20. The triumphant speech of the pious. If "substance" be retained, translate, rather as LXX., "has not their substance been taken away, and" &c.? But the Hebrew is rather, "Truly our adversary is cut down." [GESENIUS.] The same opposition exists between the godly and ungodly seed as between the un-fallen and restored Adam and Satan (adversary); this forms the groundwork of the book (chs. 1. and 2; Genesis 3. 15). remnant—all that "is left" of the sinner: repeated from (ch. 20. 26), which makes UMBREIT'S rendering "glory" (marg.), "excellency," less probable. fire—alluding to Job (ch. 1. 16; 15. 34; 18. 15). 1. First is mentioned destruction by water (v. 16); here, by fire (2 Peter 3. 5-7). 21. Eliphaz takes it for granted, Job is not yet "acquainted" with God; lit., become a companion of God. Turn with familiar confidence to God. and be—So thou shalt be: the 2d imperatively expresses the consequence of obeying the 1st (Psalm 37. 27). peace—prosperity and restoration to Job; true spiritually also to us (Romans 5. 1; Colossians 1. 20). Good—(1 Timothy 4. 8). 22. lay up—(Psalm 119. 11). 23. "Built up" anew, as a restored house. thou shalt put away—Rather, If thou put away. [MICHAELIS.] 24. Rather, containing the protasis from the last clause of v. 23, If thou regard the glittering metal as dust; lit., lay it on the dust; to regard it of as little value as the dust on which it lies. The apodosis is at v. 25, Then shall the Almighty be, &c. God will take the place of the wealth, in which thou didst formerly trust. gold—Rather, "precious" or "glittering metal," parallel to "(gold) of Ophir," in the second clause. [UMBREIT and MAURER.] Ophir—Derived from a Hebrew word—dust, viz., gold dust. HEEREN thinks it a general name for the rich countries of the South, on the African, Indian, and especially the Arabian coast (where was the port Apher. El Ophir, too, a city of Oman, was formerly the centre of Arabian commerce). It is curious, the natives of Malacca still call their mines Ophirs. stones of the brooks—If thou dost let the gold of Ophir remain in its native valley among the stones of the brooks; i. e., regard it as of little worth as the stones, &c. The gold was washed down by mountain torrents and lodged among the stones and sand of the valley. 25. Apodosis. Yea—Rather, Then shall the Almighty be, &c. defence—Rather, as the same Hebrew means in v. 24 (see note)—Thy precious metals; God will be to thee in the place of riches. plenty of silver—Rather, "And shall be to thee in the place of laboriously-obtained treasures of silver." [GESENIUS.] Elegantly implying, it is less labour to find God than the hidden metals; at least to the humble seeker (ch. 23. 12-23). But [MAURER] "the shining silver." 26 lift up . . . face, &c.—Repeated from Zophar (ch. 11. 15.)

27. (Isaiah 58. 9, 14.) pay thy vows—Which thou hast promised to God in the event of thy prayers being heard: God will give thee occasion to pay the former, by hearing the latter. 28. light—Success. 29. Rather, When (thy ways; from v. 28) are cast down (for a time), thou shalt (soon again have joyful cause to) say, There is lifting up (prosperity returns back to me). [MAURER.] he—God. humble—Hebrew, him that is of low eyes. Eliphaz implies, that Job is not so now in his affliction; therefore it continues: with this he contrasts the blessed effect of being humble under it (James 4. 6, and 1 Peter 5. 5, probably quote this passage). Therefore it is better, I think, to take the first clause as referred to by "God resisteth the proud." When (men) are cast down, thou shalt say (behold the effects of) pride. Eliphaz hereby justifies himself for attributing Job's calamities to his pride. "Giveth grace to the humble," answers to the second clause. 30. island—i. e., dwelling. But the Hebrew expresses the negative (1 Samuel 4. 21), translate "Thus He (God) shall deliver him who was not guiltless," viz., one, who like Job himself on conversion shall be saved, but not because he was, as Job so constantly affirms of himself, guiltless, but because he humbles himself (v. 29); an oblique attack on Job, even to the last. and it—Rather, "he (the one not heretofore guiltless) shall be delivered through the purity (acquired since conversion) of thy hands;" by thy intercession (as Genesis 18. 26, &c.). [MAURER.] The irony is strikingly exhibited in Eliphaz unconsciously uttering words which exactly answer to what happened at last: he and the other two were "delivered" by God accepting the intercession of Job for them (ch. 42. 7, 8).

CHAPTER XXIII.

THIRD SERIES.

Ver. 1-17. JOB'S ANSWER. 2. to-day—Implying, perhaps, that the debate was carried on through more days than one (see Introduction). bitter—(ch. 7. 11; 10. 1). my stroke—The hand of God on me (marg.; ch. 19. 21; Psalm 32. 4). heavier than—Is so heavy that I cannot relieve myself adequately by groaning. 3. The same wish as in ch. 13. 3 (cf. Hebrews 10. 19-22). seat—The idea in the Hebrew is a well-prepared throne (Psalm 9. 7). 4. order—State methodically (ch. 13. 18; Isaiah 43. 26.) fill, &c.—I would have abundance of arguments to adduce. 5. he—Emphatic: it little matters what man may say of me, if only I know what God judges of me. 6. An objection suggests itself, whilst he utters the wish (v. 5). Do I hereby wish, that he should plead against me with His omnipotence? Far from it! (ch. 9. 19, 31; 13. 21; 30. 18). strength—So as to prevail with Him: as in Jacob's case (Hosea 12. 3, 4). UMBREIT and MAURER better translate as in ch. 4. 20 (I only wish that He) "would attend to me," i. e., give me a patient hearing as an ordinary judge, not using His omnipotence, but only His Divine knowledge of my innocence. 7. there—Rather, Then: if God would "attend" to me (v. 6). righteous—i. e., the result of my dispute would be, He would acknowledge me as righteous. delivered—From suspicion of guilt on the part of my Judge. 8. But I wish in vain. For "behold," &c. forward . . . backward—Rather, "to the east—to the west." The Hebrew geographers faced the east, i. e., sunrise: not the north, as we do. So "before" means east: "behind," west (so the Hindoos). "Para," before—east: "Apara," behind—west: "Daschina," the right hand—south: "Bama," left—north. A similar reference to sunrise appears in the name Asia, sunrise: Europe, sunset: pure Babylonian names, as RAWLINSON shows. 9. Rather, "To the N." work—God's glorious works are especially seen towards the north region of the sky by one in the northern hemisphere. The antithesis is between God working and yet not being beheld: as in ch. 9. 11, between "He goeth by," and "I see Him not." If the Hebrew bears it, the parallelism to the second clause is better suited by translating, as UMBREIT, doth hide himself; but then the antithesis to behold would be lost. right hand—"In the south." hideth—Appropriately, of the unexplored south, then regarded as uninhabitable through heat (see ch. 31. 29). 10. But—Correcting himself for the wish that his cause should be known before God. The omniscient One already knoweth the way in me (my inward principles; His outward way or course of acts is mentioned in v. 11. So in me, ch. 4. 21); though for some inscrutable cause He as yet hides himself (v. 8, 9). when—Let Him only but try my cause, I shall, &c. 11. held—Fast by His steps. The law is in Old Testament poetry regarded as a way, God going before us as our guide, in whose footsteps we must tread (Psalm 17. 5). declined—(Psalm 125. 5.) 12. esteemed—Rather, laid up, viz., as a treasure found (Matthew 13. 44; Psalm 119. 11); alluding to the words of Eliphaz (ch. 22. 22). There was no need to tell me so; I have done so already (Jeremiah 15. 16. necessary—"Appointed portion" (of food; as in Proverbs 30. 8). UMBREIT and MAURER translate "More than my law," my own will, in antithesis to "the words of His mouth" (John 6. 88). Probably under the general term, "what is appointed to me" (the same Hebrew is in v. 14), all that ministers to the appetites of the body and carnal will is included. 13. in one mind—Notwithstanding my innocence, He is unaltered in His purpose of proving me guilty (ch. 9. 12). soul—His will (Psalm 115. 3). God's sovereignty. He has one great purpose; nothing is hap-hazard; everything has its proper place with a view to His purpose. 14. many such—He has yet many more such ills in store for me, though hidden in His breast (ch. 10. 13). 15. God's decrees, impossible to be resisted, and leaving us in the dark as to what may come next, are calculated to fill the mind with holy awe. [BARNES.] 16. soft—Faint. Hath melted my courage. Here again Job's language is that of Jesus Christ (Psalm 22. 14). 17. Because I was not taken away by death from the evil to come (lit., from before the face of the darkness, Isaiah 57. 1). Alluding to the words of Eliphaz (ch. 22. 11), "darkness," i. e., calamity. "Cut off;" rather, in the Arabic sense, Brought to the land of silence; my sad complaint hushed in death. [UMBREIT.] "Darkness" in the second clause, not the same Hebrew word as in the first, cloud, obscurity. Instead of "covering the cloud (of evil) from my face," He "covers" me with it (ch. 22. 11).

CHAPTER XXIV.

Ver. 1-25. 1. Why is it that, seeing that the times of punishment (Ezekiel 30. 3; "time" in the same sense) are not hidden from the Almighty, they who know Him (His true worshippers, ch. 18. 21) do not see His days (of vengeance; Joel 1. 15; 2 Peter 3. 10)? Or, with UMBREIT less simply, making the parallel clauses more nicely balanced, Why are not times of punishment hoarded up ("laid up;" ch. 21. 19; appointed) by the Almighty? i. e., why are they not so appointed as that man may now see them? as the second clause shows. Job does not doubt that they are appointed: nay, he asserts it (ch. 21. 30); what he wishes is that God would let all now see that it is so. 2-24. Instances of the wicked doing the worst deeds with seeming impunity. Some—The wicked. landmarks—Boundaries between different pastures (Deuteronomy 19. 14; Proverbs 22. 28). 3. pledge—Alluding to ch. 22. 6. Others really do, and with impunity, that which Eliphaz falsely charges the afflicted Job with. 4. Literally, they push the poor out of their road in meeting them. Figuratively, they take advantage of them by force and injustice (alluding to the charge of Eliphaz (ch. 22. 8; 1 Samuel 8. 3). poor—In spirit and in circumstances (Matthew 5. 3). hide—From the injustice of their oppressors, who have robbed them of their all and driven them into unfrequented places (ch. 20. 19; 30. 3-6; Proverbs 28. 28). 5. wild asses—(Ch. 11. 12.) So Ishmael is called a wild ass-man; Hebrew (Genesis 16. 12). These Bedouin robbers, with the unbridled wildness of the ass of the desert, go forth thither. Robbery is their lawless "work." The desert, which yields no food to other men, yields food for the robber and his children by the plunder of caravans. rising betimes—In the East travelling is begun very early, before the heat comes on. 6. Like the wild asses (v. 5), they (these Bedouin robbers) reap (metaphorically) their various grain (so the Hebrew for "corn" means). The wild ass does not let man pile up in a stable his mixed provender (Isalah 30, 24); so these robbers find their food in the open air, at one time in the desert (v. 5), at another in the fields. the vintage of the wicked—The vintage of robbery, not of honest industry. If we translate "belonging to the wicked," then it imply, that the wicked alone have vineyards, the "pious poor" (v. 4) have none. "Gather" in Hebrew, is gather late: as the first clause refers to the early harvest of corn, so the second to the vintage late in autumn. 7. UMBRETT understands it of the Bedouin robbers, who are quite regardless of the comforts of life, "They pass the night naked, &c., and uncovered," &c. But the allusion to ch. 22, 6, makes the English Version preferable (see note below, v. 10). Frost is not uncommon at night in those regions (Genesis 31, 40). 8. They—The plundered travellers, embrace the rock—Take refuge under it (Lamentations 4, 5). 9. from the breast—Of the widowed mother. Kidnapping children for slaves. Here Job passes from wrongs in the desert, to those done among the habitations of men. pledge—viz., the garment of the poor debtor, as next verse shows. 10. (Note ch. 22, 6.) In v. 7 a like sin is alluded to: but there he implies open robbery of garments in the desert; here, the more refined robbery in civilized life, under the name of a "pledge." Having stripped the poor, they make them besides labour in their harvest-fields, and do not allow them to satisfy their hunger with any of the very corn which they carry to the heap. Worse treatment than that of the ox, according to Deuteronomy 25, 4. Translate, "they (the poor labourers) hungering carry the sheaves." [UMBRETT.] 11. Which—"They," the poor, "press the oil within their walls;" viz., not only in the open fields (v. 10), but also in the wall-enclosed vineyards and olive gardens of the oppressor (Isalah 5, 5). Yet they are not allowed to quench their "thirst" with the grapes and olives. Here, thirsty; v. 10, hungry. 12. Men—Rather, "mortals" (not the common Hebrew for "men"); so the Masoretic vowel points read as English Version. But the vowel points are modern. The true reading is, The dying: answering to "the wounded" in the next clause, so Syriac. Not merely in the country (v. 11), but also in the city there are oppressed sufferers, who cry for help in vain: "From out of the city;" i. e., they long to get forth and be free outside of it (Exodus 1, 11; 2, 23). wounded—By the oppressor (Ezekiel 30, 24). layeth not folly—Takes no account of (by punishing) their sin ("folly" in Scripture; ch. 1, 22). This is the gist of the whole previous list of sins (Acts 17, 30). UMBRETT with Syriac reads by changing a vowel point, "Regards not their supplication." 13. So far as to openly-committed sins; now, those done in the dark. Translate, "There are those among them (the wicked) who rebel," &c. light—Both lit. and fig. (John 3, 19, 20; Proverbs 2, 13). paths thereof—Places where the light shines. 14. with the light—At early dawn, whilst still dark, when the traveller in the East usually sets out, and the poor labourer to his work; the murderous robber lies in wait then (Psalm 10, 8). is as a thief—Thieves in the East steal whilst men sleep at night, robbers murder at early dawn. The same man who steals at night, when light dawns not only robs, but murders to escape detection. 15. (Proverbs 7, 9; Psalm 10, 11). disguiseth—Puts a veil on. 16. dig through—Houses in the East are generally built of sun-dried mud bricks (so Matthew 6, 19). "Thieves break through," lit., dig through (Ezekiel 12, 7). had marked—Rather, as in ch. 9, 7, "They shut themselves up (in their houses); lit., they seal up. for themselves—For their own ends, viz., to escape detection. know not—Shun. 17. They shrink from the "morning" light, as much as other men do from the blackest darkness ("the shadow of death"). if one know—i. e., recognize them. Rather, "They know well (are familiar with) the terrors of," &c. [UMBRETT.] Or, as MAURER, "They know the terrors of (this) darkness," viz., of morning, the light, which is as terrible to them is darkness ("the shadow of death") is to other men. 18-21. In these verses Job quotes the opinions of his adversaries ironically; he quoted them so before (ch. 1, 21, 7-21). In v. 22-24 he states his own observation as the opposite. You say, "The sinner is swift, i. e., swiftly passes away (as a thing floating) on the surface of the waters" (Ecclesiastes 11, 1; Hosea 10, 7). is cursed—By those who witness their "swift" destruction. beholdeth not—"Turneth not to;" fig., for He cannot enjoy his pleasant possessions (ch. 20, 17; 15, 33). the way of the vineyards—Including his fields, fertile as vineyards; opposite to "the way of the desert." 19. Arabian image; melted snow, as contrasted with the living fountain, quickly dries up in the sun-burnt sand, not leaving a trace behind (ch. 6, 16-18). The Hebrew is terse and elliptical to express the swift and utter destruction of the godless; (so) "the grave—they have sinned!" 20. The womb—The very mother that bare him, and who is the last to "forget" the child that sucked her (Isalah 49, 15), shall dismiss him from her memory (ch. 18, 17; Proverbs 10, 7). The worm shall suck, i. e., "feed sweetly" on him as a delicate morsel (ch. 21, 33). wickedness—i. e., the wicked; abstract for concrete (as ch. 5, 16). as a tree—Utterly (ch. 19, 10); UMBRETT better, "As a staff." A broken staff is the emblem of irreparable ruin (Isalah 14, 5; Hosea 4, 12). 21. The reason given by the friends why the sinner deserves such a fate. barren—Without sons, who might have protected her. widow—Without a husband to support her. 22-25. Reply of Job to the opinion of the friends. Experience proves the contrary. Translate, "But He (God) prolongeth the life of (lit., draweth out at length; Margin, Psalm 38, 10) the mighty with His (God's) power. He (the wicked) riseth up (from his sick bed) although he had given up hope of (lit., when he no longer believed in) life" (Deuteronomy 28, 66). 23. Lit., He (God omitted as often; ch. 3, 20; Ecclesiastes 9, 9; reverentially) giveth to him (the wicked, to be) in safety, or security. yet—Job means, How strange that God should so favour them, and yet have his eyes all the time open to their wicked ways (Proverbs 15, 3; Psalm 73, 4)! 24. Job repeats what he said (ch. 21, 13), that sinners die in exalted positions, not the painful and lingering death we might expect, but a quick and easy death. Join "for a while" with "are gone," not as English Version. Translate, "A moment—and they are no more! They are brought low, as all (others) gather up their feet to die" (so the Hebrew of "are taken out of the way"). A natural death (Genesis 49, 33). ears of corn—In a ripe and full age, not prematurely (ch. 5, 26). 25. (So ch. 9, 24.)

CHAPTER XXV.

THIRD SERIES.

Ver. 1-6. BILDAD'S REPLY. He tries to show Job's rashness (ch. 23, 3), by arguments borrowed from Eliphaz (ch. 15, 15), with which cf. ch. 11, 17. 2. Power and terror, i. e., terror-inspiring power. peace in His high places—Implying that His power is such on high as to quell all opposition, not merely there, but on earth also. The Holy Ghost here shadowed forth Gospel truths (Colossians 1, 20; Ephesians 1, 10). 3. armies—Angels and stars (Isalah 40, 26; Jeremiah 33, 22; Genesis 15, 5; countless, Daniel 7, 10). His light—(James 1, 17). 4. (ch. 4, 17, 18; 14, 4; 15, 14.) 5. "Look up even unto the moon" (ch. 15, 15). "Stars" here answer to "saints" (angels) there; "the moon" here to "the heavens" there. Even the "stars," the most dazzling object to man's eye, and the angels, of which the stars are emblems (ch. 4, 18; Revelation 9, 1), are imperfect in His sight. Theirs is the light and purity but of creatures; his of the Creator. 6. (ch. 4, 19-21; 15, 16). worm . . . worm—Two distinct Hebrew words. The first, a worm bred in putridity; alluding to man's corruption. The second, a crawling worm; implying that man is weak and grovelling.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THIRD SERIES.

Ver. 1-14. JOB'S REPLY. 2, 3. without power . . . no strength . . . no wisdom—The negatives are used instead of the positives, powerlessness, &c., designedly (so Isalah 31, 8; Deuteronomy 32, 21). Granting I am, as you say (ch. 18, 17; 15, 2), powerlessness itself, &c. How hast thou helped such a one? savest—supportest, plentifully . . . the thing as it is—Rather, “abundantly—wisdom.” Bildad had made great pretensions to abundant wisdom. How nas he shown it? 4. For whose instruction were thy words meant? If for me, I know the subject (God's omnipotence) better than my instructor; (v. 5-14) is a sample of Job's knowledge of it. whose spirit—not that of God (ch. 32, 8); nay, rather, the borrowed sentiment of Eliphaz (ch. 4, 17-19; 15, 14-16). 5-14. As before in ch. 9, and 12., Job had shown himself not inferior to the friends' inability to describe God's greatness, so now he describes it as manifested in hell (the world of the dead), 5, 6; on earth, 7; in the sky, 8-11; the sea, 12; the heavens, 13. Dead things are formed—Rather, “The souls of the dead (Rephaim) tremble.” Not only does God's power exist, as Bildad says (ch. 25, 2), “in high places” (heaven), but reaches to the region of the dead. Rephaim here, and Proverbs 21, 16; Isaiah 14, 9, is from a Hebrew root, meaning to be weak, hence deceased; in Genesis 14, 5 it is applied to the Canaanite giants; perhaps in derision, to express their weakness, in spite of their gigantic size, as compared with Jehovah [UMBREIT]; or as the imagination of the living magnifies apparitions, the term originally was applied to ghosts, and then to giants in general. [MAGEE.] from under—UMBREIT joins this with the previous word tremble from beneath (so Isaiah 14, 9). But the Masoretic text joins it “under the waters.” Thus the place of the dead will be represented as under the waters (Psalm 18, 4, 5); and the waters as under the earth (Psalm 24, 2). MAGEE well translates thus, “The souls of the dead tremble; (the places) under the waters, and their inhabitants.” Thus the Masoretic connection is retained; and at the same time the parallel clauses are evenly balanced. “The inhabitants of the places under the waters” are those in Gehenna, the lower of the two parts into which Sheol, according to the Jews, is divided; they answer to “destruction,” i. e., the place of the wicked in v. 6, as “Rephaim” (v. 5) to “Hell” (Sheol) (v. 6). Sheol comes from a Hebrew root—ask, because it is insatiable (Proverbs 27, 20); or ask as a loan to be returned, implying Sheol is but a temporary abode, previous to the resurrection; so for English Version “formed,” LXX. and Chaldee translate, shall be born, or born again, implying the dead are to be given back from Sheol and born again into a new state. [MAGEE.] 6—(ch. 38, 17; Psalm 139, 8; Proverbs 5, 11). destruction—The abode of destruction, i. e., of lost souls. Hebrew, Abaddon (Revelation 9, 11), no covering—from God's eyes. 7. Hint of the true theory of the earth. Its suspension in empty space is stated in the second clause. The north in particular is specified in the first, being believed to be the highest part of the earth (Isaiah 14, 13). The northern hemisphere or vault of heaven is included; often compared to a stretched-out canopy (Psalm 104, 2). The chambers of the south are mentioned (ch. 9, 9), i. e., the southern hemisphere, consistently with the earth's globular form. 8. in . . . clouds—as if in airy vessels, which though light do not burst with the weight of water in them (Proverbs 30, 4). 9. Rather, He encompasseth or closeth. God makes the clouds a veil to screen the glory not only of His person, but even of the exterior of His throne from profane eyes. His agency is everywhere, yet Himself invisible (Psalm 18, 11; 104, 3). 10. Rather, “He hath drawn a circular bound round the waters” (Proverbs 8, 27; Psalm 104, 9). The horizon seems a circle. Indication is given of the globular form of the earth. until the day, &c.—To the confines of light and darkness. When the light falls on our horizon, the other hemisphere is dark. UMBREIT and MAUREE translate, “He has most perfectly (lit., to perfection) drawn the bound (taken from the 1st clause) between light and darkness” (cf. Genesis 1, 4, 6, 9); where the bounding of the light from darkness is similarly brought into proximity with the bounding of the waters. 11. pillars—poetically for the mountains which seem to bear up the sky (Psalm 104, 32). astonished—viz., from terror. Personification. His reproof—(Psalm 104, 7.) The thunder, reverberating from cliff to cliff (Habakkuk 3, 10; Nahum 1, 5). 12. divideth—(Psalm 74, 13.) Perhaps at creation (Genesis 1, 9, 10). The parallel clause favours UMBREIT, “He stilleth.” But the Hebrew means He moves. Probably such a “moving” is meant as that at the assuaging of the flood by the wind which “God made to pass over” it (Genesis 8, 1; Psalm 104, 7). the proud—Rather, its pride, viz., of the sea (ch. 9, 13.). 13. UMBREIT less simply, “By His breath He maketh the heavens to revive;” viz., His wind dissipates the clouds, which obscured the shining stars. And so the next clause in contrast, “His hand doth strangle,” i. e., obscures the north constellation, the dragon. Pagan astronomy typified the flood trying to destroy the ark by the dragon constellation, about to devour the moon in its eclipsed crescent-shape like a boat (ch. 3, 8, Margin). But better as English Version (Psalm 33, 6). crooked—Implying the oblique course, of the stars, or the ecliptic. “Fleeing” or “swift” [UMBREIT] (Isaiah 27, 1). This particular constellation is made to represent the splendour of all the stars. 14. parts—Rather, “only the extreme boundaries of, &c., and how faint is the whisper that we hear of Him!” thunder—The entire fullness. In antithesis to “whisper” (1 Corinthians 13, 9, 10, 12).

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 1-23. It was now Zophar's turn to speak. But as he and the other two were silent, virtually admitting defeat, after a pause Job proceeds. 1. parable—Applied in the East to a figurative sententious embodiment of wisdom in poetic form, a gnome (Psalm 49, 4). continued—proceeded to put forth: implying elevation of discourse. 2. (1 Samuel 20, 3). taken away . . . judgment—words unconsciously foreshadowing Jesus Christ (Isaiah 53, 8; Acts 8, 33). God will not give Job his right, by declaring his innocence. vexed—Hebrew, made bitter (Ruth 1, 20). 3. Implying Job's knowledge of the fact that the living soul was breathed into man by God (Genesis 2, 7). “All the while.” But MAURER, “as yet all my breath is in me!” (notwithstanding my trials): the reason why I can speak so boldly. 4. (Ch. 6, 28, 30). The “deceit” would be if he were to admit guilt against the witness of his conscience. 5. justify you—approve of your views. nine integrity—which you deny, on account of my misfortunes. 6. Rather, my “heart” (conscience) reproaches “not one of my days,” i. e., I do not repent of any of my days since I came into existence. [MAURER.] 7. Let . . . be—Let mine enemy be accounted as wicked, i. e., He who opposes my asseveration of innocence must be regarded as actuated by criminal hostility. Not a curse on his enemies. 8. “What hope hath the hypocrite, notwithstanding all his gains, when?” &c. “Gained” is antithetic to “taketh away.” UMBREIT's translation is an unmeaning tautology. “When God cuts off, when He taketh away his life,” taketh away—Lit., draws out the soul from the body, which is, as it were, its scabbard (ch. 4, 21; Psalm 104, 29; Daniel 7, 15). Job says, he admits what Bildad said (ch. 8, 13) and Zophar (ch. 20, 5). But he says, the very fact of his still calling upon God (v. 10) amidst all his trials, which a hypocrite would not dare to do, shows he is no “hypocrite.” 9. (Psalm 66, 18.) 10. Alluding to ch. 22, 26. always call—he may do so in times of prosperity, in order to be thought religions. But he will not, as I do, call on God in calamities verging on death. Therefore I cannot be a “hypocrite” (ch. 19, 25; 20, 5; Psalm 62, 8). 11-23. These words are contrary to Job's previous sentiments (notes, ch. 21, 22-33; 24, 22-25). They therefore seem to be Job's statement, not so much of his own sentiments, as of what Zophar would have said had he spoken when his turn came (end of ch. 26). So Job stated the friends' opinion (ch. 21, 17-21; 24, 18-21). The objection is, why, if so, does not Job answer Zophar's opinion, as stated by himself? The fact is, it is probable that Job tacitly, by giving, in ch. 28., only a general answer, implies, that in spite of the wicked often dying, as he said, in prosperity, he does not mean to deny that the wicked are in the main dealt with according to right, and that God herein vindicates His moral government even here. Job therefore states Zophar's argument more strongly than Zophar would have done. But by comparing v. 13 with ch. 20, 29 ("portion," "heritage"), it will be seen, it is Zophar's argument, rather than his own, that Job states. Granting it to be true, implies Job, you ought not to use it as an argument to criminate me. For (ch. 28) the ways of Divine wisdom in afflicting the godly are inscrutable; all that is sure to man is, the fear of the Lord is wisdom (v. 28). by the hand—Rather, concerning the hand of God, viz., what God does in governing men. with the Almighty—The counsel or principle which regulates God's dealings. 12. "Ye yourselves see" that the wicked often are afflicted (though often the reverse ch. 21. 33). But do you "vainly" make this an argument to prove from my afflictions that I am wicked? 13. (Note v. 11.) 14. His family only increases to perish by sword or famine (Jeremiah 18. 21; ch. 5. 20), the converse. 15. Those that escape war and famine (v. 14) shall be buried by the deadly plague—"death" (ch. 18. 13; Jeremiah 15. 2; Revelation 6. 8). The plague of the Middle Ages was called "the black death." Buried by it implies, that they would have none else but the death plague itself (poetically personified) to perform their funeral rites, i. e., that they would have none. his—Rather, their widows. Transitions from singular to plural are frequent. Polygamy is not implied. 16. dust . . . clay—Images of multitudes (Zechariah 9. 3). Many changes of raiment are a chief constituent of wealth in the East. 17. Inverted parallelism. My introduction. Of the four clauses in the two verses, I answers to 4, 2 to 3 (so Matthew 7. 6). 18. (Ch. 8. 14; 4. 19.) The transition is natural from "raiment" (v. 16) to the "house" of the "moth" in it, and of it, when in its larva state. The moth worm's house is broken whenever the "raiment" is shaken out, so frail is it. booth—A bough-formed but which the guard of a vineyard raises for temporary shelter (Isaiah 1. 8). 19. gathered—Buried honourably (Genesis 25. 8; 2 Kings 22. 20). But UMBREIT, agreeably to v. 18, which describes the short continuance of the sinner's prosperity, "He layeth himself rich in his bed, and nothing is robbed from him, he openeth his eyes, and nothing more is there." If English Version be retained, the first clause probably means, rich though he be in dying, he shall not be honoured with a funeral; the second, When he opens his eyes in the unseen world, it is only to see his destruction. LXX. read for "not gathered," He does not proceed, i. e., goes to his bed no more. So MAURER. 20. (Ch. 18. 11; 22. 11, 21.) Like a sudden violent flood (Isaiah 8. 7, 8; Jeremiah 47. 2); conversely (Psalm 32. 6). 21. (Ch. 21. 13; 15. 2; Psalm 58. 9.) 22. cast—viz., thunderbolts (ch. 6. 4; 7. 20; 16. 13; Psalm 7. 12, 13). 23. clap hands—for joy at his downfall (Lamentations 2. 15; Nahum 3. 19). hiss—deride (Jeremiah 25. 9). Job alludes to Bildad's words (ch. 18. 18).

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 1-23. JOB'S SPEECH CONTINUED. In ch. 27. Job had tacitly admitted, that the statement of the friends was often true, that God vindicated His justice by punishing the wicked here; but still the affliction of the godly remained unexplained. Man has, by skill, brought the precious metals from their concealment. But the Divine Wisdom, which governs human affairs, he cannot similarly discover, 12, &c. However, the image from the same metals (ch. 28. 10), implies Job has made some way towards solving the riddle of his life, viz., that affliction is to him as the refining fire to gold. vein—A mine, from which it goes forth, Hebrew, i. e., is dug. place for gold—A place where gold may be found, which men refine. Not as English Version, "A place—where," &c. (Malachi 3. 3). Contrasted with gold found in the bed and sand of rivers, which does not need refining; as the gold dug from a mine does. Golden ornaments have been found in Egypt, of the times of Joseph. 2. Brass—i. e., copper; for brass is a mixed metal of copper and zinc, of modern invention. Iron is less easily discovered, and wrought, than copper; therefore copper was in common use long before iron. Copper-stone is called "cadmlum" by PLINY (NATURAL HISTORY 34. 1; 36. 21). Iron is fitly said to be taken out of the "earth" (dust), for one looks like mere earth. 3. "Man makes an end of darkness," by exploring the darkest depths (with torches). all perfection—Rather, carries out his search to the utmost perfection; most thoroughly searches the stones of darkness and of the shadow of death (thickest gloom), & e., the stones, whatever they be, embedded in the darkest bowels of the earth [UMBREIT] (ch. 28. 10). 4. Three hardships in mining: 1. "A stream (flood) breaks out at the side of the stranger;" viz., the miner, a strange new-comer into places heretofore unexplored; his surprise at the sudden stream breaking out beside him is expressed (English Version, from the inhabitant); 2. "Forgotten (unsupported) by the foot they hang," viz., by ropes, in descending. In the Hebrew, "Lo there" precedes this clause, graphically placing it as if before the eyes. The waters are inserted by English Version. Age dried up, ought to be, "hang," "are suspended." English Version perhaps understood, waters of whose existence man was previously unconscious, and near which he never trod; and yet man's energy is such, that by pumps, &c., he soon causes them to "dry up and go away." [So HERDER.] 3. "Far away from men, they move with uncertain step;" they stagger; not "they are gone." [UMBREIT.] 5. Its fertile surface yields food; and yet "beneath it is turned up as it were with fire." So PLINY (NATURAL HISTORY 33) observes on the ingratitude of man who repays the debt he owes the earth for food, by digging out its bowels. "Fire" was used in mining. [UMBREIT.] English Version is simpler, which means precious stones which glow like fire; and so v. 6 follows naturally (Ezekiel 28. 14). 6. Sapphires are found in alluvial soil near rocks and embedded in gneiss. The ancients distinguished two kinds; 1. The real, of transparent blue; 2. That improperly so called, opaque, with gold spots, i. e., lapislazuli. To the latter, looking like gold dust, UMBREIT refers "dust of gold." English Version better, "The stones of the earth are, &c., and the clods of it (Vulgate) are gold;" the parallel clauses are thus neater. 7. fowl—Rather, ravenous bird, or eagle, which is the most sharp-sighted of birds (Isaiah 46. 11). A vulture will spy a carcass at an amazing distance. The miner penetrates the earth by a way unseen by birds of keenest sight. 8. lion's whelps—Lit., the sons of pride, i. e., the fiercest beasts. passed—The Hebrew implies the proud gait of the lion. The miner ventures, where not even the fierce lion dares to go in pursuit of his prey. 9. rock—Flint. He puts forth his hand to cleave the hardest rock. by the roots—From their foundations, by undermining them. 10. He cuts channels to drain off the waters, which hinder his mining; and when the waters are gone, he is able to see the precious things in the earth. 11. floods—"He restrains the streams from weeping;" a poetical expression for the trickling subterranean rills, which impede him; answering to the first clause of v. 10; so also the two latter clauses in each verse correspond. 13. Can man discover the Divine Wisdom by which the world is governed, as he can the treasures hidden in the earth? Certainly not. Divine Wisdom is conceived as a person (v. 12-27) distinct from God (v. 23; also in Proverbs 8. 23, 27). The Almighty Word, Jesus Christ, we know now, is that Wisdom. The order of the world was originated and is maintained by the breathing forth (Spirit) of Wisdom, unfathomable and unpurchaseable by man. In verse 28, the only aspect of it, which relates to, and may be understood by, man, is stated. understanding—Insight into the plan of the Divine government. 13. Man can fix no price upon it, as it is nowhere to be found in man's abode (Isaiah 38. 11). Job implies both its valuable worth, and the impossibility of buying it at any price. 15. Not the usual word for "gold;" from a Hebrew root, to shut up with care; i. e., purest gold (1 Kings 6. 20, Margin). weighed—The precious metals were weighed out before coining was known (Genesis 23. 16). 16. gold of Ophir—The most precious (Note 22. 21; Psalm 45. 9). onyx—(Genesis 2. 12.) More valued formerly than now. The term is Greek, meaning thumb nail, from some resemblance in colour. The Arabic denotes, of two colours, white preponderating. 17. crystal—Or else glass, if then known, very costly. From a root, to be transparent. jewels—Rather, vessels. 18. Red coral (Ezekiel 27. 16). 19. pearls—Lit., what is frozen. Probably crystal; and v. 17 will then be glass. rubies—UMBREIT translates pearls (see Lamentations 4. 1; Proverbs 3. 15). The Urin and Thummim, the means of consulting God by the twelve stones on the high priest's breastplate, "the stones of the sanctuary" (Lamentations 4. 1), have their counterpart in this chapter; the precious stones symbolizing the "light" and "perfection" of the Divine wisdom. 19. Ethiopia—Cush in the Hebrew. Either Ethiopia, or the south of Arabia, near the Tigris. 20. Verse 12 repeated with great force. 21. None can tell whence or where, seeing it, &c. fowls—The gift of divination was assigned by the heathen especially to birds. Their rapid flight heavenwards and keen sight originated the superstition. Job may allude to it, Not even the boasted divination of birds has an insight into it (Ecclesiastes 10. 20). But it may merely mean, as v. 7, It escapes the eye of the most keen-sighted bird. 22—i. e., the abodes of destruction and of the dead. "Death" put for Sheol (ch. 30. 23; 20. 6, Note; Psalm 9. 13). We have (only) heard—The report of her. We have not seen her. In the land of the living (v. 13) the workings of Wisdom are seen, though not herself. In the regions of the dead she is only heard of, her actions on nature not being seen (Ecclesiastes 9. 10). 23. God hath, and is Himself wisdom. 24. "Seeth (all that is) under," &c. 25. God has adjusted the weight of the winds, so seemingly imponderable, lest, if too weighty, or too light, injury should be caused. He measureth out the waters, fixing their bounds, with wisdom as His counsellor (Proverbs 8. 27-31; Isaiah 40. 12). 26. The decree regulating at what time and place, and in what quantity, the rain should fall. away—Through the parted clouds (ch. 38. 25; Zechariah 10. 1). 27. declare—Manifest her, viz., in His works (Psalm 19. 1. 2). So the approval bestowed by the Creator on His works (Genesis 1. 10, 31; cf. the "rejoicing" of wisdom at the same (Proverbs 8. 30; which UMBREIT translates, "I was the skilful artificer by his side," 31). prepared—Not created, for wisdom is from everlasting (Proverbs 8.); but "established" her as Governor of the world. searched out—Examined her works to see, whether she was adequate to the task of governing the world. [MAURER.] 28. Rather, But unto man, &c., My wisdom is that whereby all things are governed; Thy wisdom is in fearing God and shunning evil, and in feeling assured that my wisdom always acts aright, though thou dost not understand the principle which regulates it; ex. gr., in afflicting the godly (John 7. 17). The friends, therefore, as not comprehending the Divine Wisdom, should not infer Job's guilt from his sufferings. Here alone in Job the name of God, "Adonai," occurs, Lord or master, often applied to Messiah in Old Testament. Appropriately here, in speaking of the Word or Wisdom, by whom the world was made (Proverbs 8.; John 1.; Ecclesiasticus 24).

CHAPTER XXIX.

Ver. 1-25. 1. Job pauses for a reply. None being made, he proceeds to illustrate the mysteriousness of God's dealings, as set forth (ch. 23.) by his own case. 2. preserved me—From calamity. 3. candle—When His favour shone on me (note 18. 6; Psalm 18. 28). darkness—By His safeguard I passed secure through dangers. Perhaps alluding to the lights carried before caravans in nightly travels through deserts. [NOYES.] 4. youth—Lit., autumn; the time of the ripe fruits of my prosperity. Applied to youth, as the Orientalists began their year with autumn, the most temperate season in the East. secret—When the intimate friendship of God rested on my tent (Proverbs 3. 32; Psalm 31. 20; Genesis 18. 17; John 15. 15). The Hebrew often means a divan for deliberation. 6. butter—Rather, cream, lit., thick milk. Wherever I turned my steps the richest milk and oil flowed in to me abundantly. Image from pastoral life. Literal washing of the feet in milk is not meant, as the second clause shows; Margin, with me, i. e., near my path, wherever I walked (Deuteronomy 32. 13). Olives amidst rocks yield the best oil. Oil in the East is used for food, light, anointing, and medicine. 7-10. The great influence Job had over young and old, and noblemen. through . . . street—Rather, When

I went out of my house, in the country (see ch. 1., prologue) to the gate (ascending), up to the city (which was on elevated ground), and when I prepared my (judicial) seat in the market-place. The market-place was the place of judgment, at the gate or propylea of the city, such as is found in the remains of Nineveh and Persepolis (Isaiah 59. 14; Psalm 55. 11; 127. 5). 8. hid—Not lit. Rather, Stepped backwards, reverentially. The aged, who were already seated, arose and remained standing (Hebrew) until Job seated himself. Oriental manners. 9. (Ch. 4. 2; note 21. 5.) "Refrained," stopped in the middle of their speech. 10. Margin, voice—hid, i. e., hushed (Ezekiel 3. 26). "Tongue cleaved," &c., i. e., awed by my presence, the emirs or sheiks were silent. 11. blessed—Extolled my virtues (Proverbs 31. 28). Omit me after "heard;" whoever heard of me (in general, not in the market-place, 7-10) praised me. gave witness—to my honourable character. Image from a court of justice (Luke 4. 22). "The eye"—i. e., face to face; antithesis to "ear"—i. e., report of me. 12-17. The grounds on which Job was praised (v. 11), his helping the afflicted (Psalm 72. 12) who cried to him for help, as a judge, or as one possessed of means of charity. Translate, The fatherless who had none to help him. 13. So far was I from sending "widows" away empty (ch. 22. 9). ready to perish—(Proverbs 31. 6.) 14. (Isaiah 61. 10; 1 Chronicles 12. 18.) Margin, judgment—Justice. diadem—Tiara. Rather, turban, head-dress. It and the full flowing outer mantle or "robe," are the prominent characteristics of an Oriental's grandee or high priest dress (Zechariah 3. 5). So Job's righteousness especially characterized him. 15. Lit., the blind (Deuteronomy 27. 18); lame (2 Samuel 9. 13); fig., also the spiritual support which the more enlightened gives to those less so (ch. 4. 3; Hebrews 12. 13; Numbers 10. 31). 16. So far was I from "breaking the arms of the fatherless," as Eliphaz asserts (ch. 22. 9), I was a "father" to such. the cause which I knew not—Rather—of him whom I knew not, the stranger (Proverbs 29. 7 [UMBREIT]; contrast Luke 18. 1, &c.). Applicable to atonement (Job 4. 1); but here primarily, Judicial conscientiousness (ch. 31. 13). 17. Image from combating with wild beasts (ch. 4. 11; Psalm 3. 7). So compassionate was Job to the oppressed, so terrible to the oppressor! jaws—Job broke his power, so that he could do no more hurt, and tore from him the spoil, which he had torn from others. 18. I said—In my heart (Psalm 30. 6). in—Rather, "With my nest;" as the second clause refers to long life. Instead of my family dying before me, as now, I shall live so long as to die with them: proverbial for long life. Job did realize his hope (ch. 42. 16). However, In the bosom of my family, gives a good sense (Numbers 24. 21; Obadiah 4). Use "nest" for a secure dwelling. sand—(Genesis 22. 17; Habakkuk 1. 9). But LXX., and Vulgate, and Jewish interpreters, favour the translation, "the phoenix bird." "Nest" in the parallel clause supports the reference to a bird. "Sand" for multitude, applies to men, rather than to years. The myth was, that the phoenix sprang from a nest of myrrh, made by his father before death, and that he then came from Arabia (Job's country) to Heliopolis (the city of the Sun) in Egypt, once in every 500 years, and there burnt his father. [HERODOTUS, 2. 73.] Modern research has shown that this was the Egyptian mode of representing hieroglyphically a particular chronological era or cycle. The death and revival every 500 years, and the reference to the sun, implies such a grand cycle commencing afresh from the same point in relation to the sun from which the previous one started. Job probably refers to this. 19. Lit., opened to the waters. Opposed to ch. 18. 16. Vigorous health. 20. My renown, like my bodily health, was continually fresh. bow—Metaphor from war, for, My strength, which gains me "renown," was ever renewed (Jeremiah 49. 35). 21. Job reverts with peculiar pleasure to his former dignity in assemblies (v. 7-10). 22. not again—Did not contradict me. dropped—Affected their minds, as the general rain does the soil on which it gently drops (Amos 7. 16; Deuteronomy 32. 2; Song 4. 11). 23. Image of v. 22 continued. They waited for my salutary counsel, as the dry soil does for the refreshing rain. opened . . . mouth—Panted for; Oriental image (Psalm 119. 131). The "early rain" is in autumn and onwards, while the seed is being sown. The "latter rain" is in March, and brings forward the harvest, which ripens in May or June. Between the early and latter rains, some rain falls, but not in such quantities as those rains. Between March and October no rain falls (Deuteronomy 11. 14; James 5. 7). 21. When I relaxed from my wonted gravity (a virtue much esteemed in the East) and smiled, they could hardly credit it, and yet, notwithstanding my condescension, they did not cast aside reverence for my gravity. But the parallelism is better in UMBREIT'S translation, "I smiled kindly on those who trusted not," i. e., in times of danger I cheered those in despondency. And they could not cast down (by their despondency) my serenity of countenance" (flowing from trust in God) (Proverbs 16. 15; Psalm 104. 15). The opposite phrase (Genesis 4. 5, 9). "Gravity" cannot well be meant by "light of countenance." 25. I chose . . . their way—i. e., I willingly went up to their assembly (from my country residence, v. 7). in . . . army—As a king supreme in the midst of his army. comforteth . . . mourners—Here again Job unconsciously foreshadows Jesus Christ (Isaiah 61. 2, 3). Job's afflictions, as those of Jesus Christ, were fitting him for the office hereafter (Isaiah 50. 4; Hebrews 2. 18).

CHAPTER XXX.

Ver. 1-31. 1. younger—Not the three friends (ch. 15. 10; 32. 4, 6, 7). A general description; 1-8, the lowliness of the persons who derided him; 9-15, the derision itself. Formerly old men rose to me (ch. 29. 8). Now not only my juniors, who are bound to reverence me (Leviticus 19. 32), but even the mean and base-born actually deride me; opposed to, "smiled upon" (ch. 29. 24). This goes farther than even the "mockery" of Job by relations and friends (ch. 12. 4; 16. 10, 20; 17. 2, 6; 19. 22). Orientals feel keenly any indignity shown by the young. Job speaks as a rich Arabian emir, proud of his descent. dogs—Regarded with disgust in the East as unclean (1 Samuel 17. 43; Proverbs 26. 11). They are not allowed to enter a house, but run about wild in the open air, living on offal and chance morsels (Psalm 59. 14, 15). Here again we are reminded of Jesus Christ (Psalm 22. 16). "Their fathers, my coevals, were so mean and famished that I would not have associated them with (not to say, set them over) my dogs in guarding my flock." 2. If their fathers could be of no profit to me, much less the sons, who are feebler than their sires; and in whose case the hope of attaining old age is utterly gone, so puny are they (ch. 5. 26). [MAURER.] Even if they had "strength of hands," that could be now of no use to me, as all I want in my present affliction is sympathy. 3. solitary—Lit., hard as a rock; so translate, rather, dried up, emaciated with hunger. Job describes the rudest race of Bedouins of the desert. [UMBREIT.] fleeing—So LXX. Better, as Syriae, Arabiae, and Vulgate, "gnawers of the wilderness." What they gnaw follows in v. 4. in former time—Lit., the "yesternight of desolation and waste" (the most utter desolation; Ezekiel 6. 14); i. e., those deserts frightful as night to man, and even there from time immemorial. I think both ideas are in the words darkness [GESENIUS] and antiquity [UMBREIT]. (Isaiah 30. 33, Margin.) 4. mallows—Rather, salt-wort, which grows in deserts and is eaten as a salad by the poor, [MAURER.] by the bushes—Among the bushes. juniper—Rather, a kind of broom, Spartium junceum [LINNÆUS], still called in Arabia, as in the Hebrew of Job, retem, of which the bitter roots are eaten by the poor. 5. they cried—i. e., a cry is raised, &c. Expressing the contempt felt for this race by civilized and well-born Arabs. When these wild vagabonds make an incursion on villages, they are driven away, as thieves would be. 6. They are forced "to dwell," cliffs of valleys—Rather, "in the gloomy (lit., gloom) of valleys," or wadys. To dwell in valleys is, in the East, a mark of wretchedness. The troglodytes, in parts of Arabia, lived in such dwellings as caves, &c. 7. brayed—Like the wild ass (ch. 6. 5 for food). The inarticulate tones of this uncivilized rabble are but little above those of the beast of the field. gathered together—Rather, sprinkled here and there. Lit., poured out, graphically picturing their disorderly mode of encampment, lying up and down behind the thorn-bushes. nettles—Or brambles. [UMBREIT.] 8. fools—i. e., the impious and abandoned (1 Samuel 25. 25). base—Nameless, low-born rabble. viler than, &c.—Rather, they were driven or beaten out of the land. The Horites in Mount Seir (Genesis 14. 6, with which cf. Genesis 36. 20, 21; Deuteronomy 2. 12, 22) were probably the aborigines, driven out by the tribe to which Job's ancestors belonged; their name means troglodyte, or dwellers in caves. To these Job alludes here (v. 1-8, and Genesis 24. 4-8, which cf. together). 9. (Ch. 17. 6.) Strikingly similar to the derision Jesus Christ underwent (Lamentations 3. 14; Psalm 69. 12). Here Job returning to the sentiment in v. 1. It is to such I am become a song of "derision." 10. in my face—Rather, refrain not to spit in deliberate contempt before my face. To spit at all in presence of another is thought in the East insulting, much more when done to mark "abhorrence." Cf. the further insult to Jesus Christ (Isaiah 50. 6; Matthew 26. 67). 11. He, i. e., God; antithetical to they, English Version, here follows the marginal reading (KERI). "My cord," image from a bow unstrung; opposed to ch. 29. 20. The text (CHETIB), "His cord" or "reins" is better; "yea, each lets loose his reins." [UMBREIT.] 12. youth—Rather, a (low) brood. To rise on the right hand is to accuse, as that was the position of the accuser in court (Zechariah 3. 1; Psalm 109. 6). push . . . feet—Jostle me out of the way (ch. 24. 4). ways of—i. e., their ways of (i. e., with a view to my) destruction. Image, as in ch. 19. 12, from a besieging army throwing up a way of approach for itself to a city. 13. Image of an assailed fortress continued. They tear up the path by which succour might reach me. set forward—(Zechariah 1. 15.) they have no helper—Arabic proverb for contemptible persons. Yet even such afflict Job. 14. waters—(So 2 Samuel 5. 20.) But it is better to retain the image of v. 12, 13. "They came (upon me) as through a wide breach," viz., made by the besiegers in the wall of a fortress (Isaiah 30. 13). [MAURER.] in the desolation—"Amidst the crash" of falling masonry, or "with a shout like the crash" of, &c. 15. they—Terrors. soul—Rather, my dignity. [UMBREIT.] welfare—Prosperity. cloud—(Ch. 7. 9; Isaiah 44. 22). 16-23. Job's outward calamities affect his mind. poured out—In irremissible complaints (Psalm 42. 4; Joshua 7. 5). 17. In the Hebrew, night is poetically personified, as ch. 3. 3: "night pierceth my bones (so that they fall) from me" (not as English Version, "in me;" see v. 30). snuews—So the Arabic, veins, akin to the Hebrew; rather, gnawers, as in v. 3 (note), viz., my gnawing pains never cease. Effects of elephantiasis. 18. of my disease—Rather, "of God" (ch. 23. 6). garment changed—From a robe of honour to one of mourning, literally (ch. 2. 8; John 3. 6) and metaphorically. [UMBREIT.] Or rather, as SCHUTTENS, following up v. 17, My outer garment is changed into affliction; i. e., affliction has become my outer garment, it also bindeth me fast round (my throat) as the collar of the inner coat; i. e., it is both my inner and outer garment. Observe the distinction between the inner and outer garments. The latter refers to his afflictions from without (v. 1-13); the former his personal afflictions (v. 14-23). UMBREIT makes "God" subject to "bindeth," as in v. 19. 19. God is poetically said to do that which the mourner had done to himself (ch. 2. 8). With lying in the ashes he had become, like them, in dirty colour. 20. stand up—The reverential attitude of a suppliant before a king (1 Kings 8. 14; Luke 18. 11-13). not—Supplied from the first clause. But the intervening affirmative "stand" makes this ellipsis unlikely. Rather, as ch. 16. 9 (not only dost thou refuse aid to me "standing" as a suppliant, but), thou dost regard me with a frown; eye me sternly. 23. liftest . . . to wind—As a "leaf" or "stubble" (ch. 13. 25). The moving pillars of sand, raised by the wind to the clouds, as described by travellers, would happily delect Job's agitated spirit, if it be to them that he alludes. dissolveth . . . substance—The marginal Hebrew reading (KERI), "my wealth," or else "wisdom," i. e., sense and spirit, or "my hope of deliverance." But the text (CHETIB) is better: Thou dissolvest me (with fear, Exodus 15.15) in the crash (of the whirlwind; as v. 14, note). [MAURER.] UMBREIT translates as a verb, "Thou terrificest me." 23. This shows ch. 19. 25 cannot be restricted to Job's hope of a temporal deliverance. death—as in ch. 28. 22, the realm of the dead (Hebrews 9. 27; Genesis 3. 19). 24. Expressing Job's faith as to the state after death. Though one must go to the grave, yet He will no more afflict in the ruin of the body (so Hebrew for grave) there, if one has cried to Him when being destroyed. The "stretching of His hand" to punish after death answers antithetically to the raising "the cry" of prayer in the second clause. MAURER gives another translation which accords with the scope of v. 24-31; if it be natural for one in affliction to ask aid, why should it be considered (by the friends) wrong in my case? "Nevertheless does not a man in ruin stretch out his hand" (imploring help, v. 20; Lamentations 1. 17)? If one be in his calamity (destruction) is there not therefore a "cry" (for aid)? Thus in the parallelism "cry" answers to "stretch—hand;" "in his calamity," to "in ruin." The negative of the first clause, is to be supplied in the second, as in v. 25 (ch. 28. 17). 25. May I not be allowed to complain of my calamity, and beg relief, seeing that I myself sympathized with those "in trouble" (lit., hard of day; those who had a hard time of it). 26. I may be allowed to crave help, seeing that, "when I looked for good (on account of my piety and charity), yet evil," &c. light—(ch. 22. 28). 27. bowels—Regarded as the seat of deep feeling (Isaiah 16. 11). boiled—Violently heated and agitated. prevented—Old English for unexpectedly came upon me, surprised me. 28. mourning—Rather, I move about blackened, though not by the sun; i. e., whereas many are blackened by the sun, I am, by the heat of God's wrath (so "boiled," v. 27); the elephantiasis covering me with blackness of skin (v. 30), as with the garb of mourning (Jeremiah 14. 2). This striking enigmatic form of Hebrew expression occurs, Isaiah 29. 9. stood up—As an innocent man crying for justice in an assembled court (v. 20). 29. dragons . . . owls—Rather, jackals, ostriches, both of which utter dismal screams (Micah 1. 8); in which respect, as also in their living amidst solitudes, the emblem of desolation, Job is their brother and companion, i. e., resembles them. "Dragon," Hebrew, Tannim, usually means the crocodile; so perhaps here, its open jaws lifted towards heaven, and its noise making it seem as if it mourned over its fate [BOCHART.] 30. upon me—Rather, as in 17 (Note), my skin is black (and falls away) from me. my bones—(ch. 19. 20; Psalm 102. 5). 31. organ—Rather, pipe (ch. 21. 12); "My joy is turned into the voice of weeping" (Lamentations 5. 15). These instruments are properly appropriated to joy (Isaiah 30. 29, 32), which makes their use now in sorrow the sadder by contrast.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Ver. 1-40. 1. Job proceeds to prove, that he deserved a better lot. As in ch. 29, he showed his uprightness as an emir, or magistrate in public life, so in this chapter he vindicates his character in private life. 1-4. He asserts his guarding against being allured to sin by his senses. 1. think—Rather, cast a (lustful) look. He not merely did not so, but put it out of the question by covenanting with his eyes against leading him into temptation (Proverbs 6. 25; Matthew 5. 28). 2. Had I let my senses tempt me to sin, "what portion (would there have been to me, i. e., must I have expected) from (lit. of) God above, and what inheritance from (lit. of) the Almighty," &c. [MAURER] (ch. 20. 29; 27. 13). 3. Answer to the question in v. 2. strange—extraordinary. 4. Doth not He see, &c.? Knowing this, I could only have expected "destruction" (v. 3), had I committed this sin (Proverbs 5. 21). 5. Job's abstinence from evil deeds. vanity—i. e., falsehood (Psalm 12. 2). 6. Parenthetical. Translate, "Oh that God would weigh me, &c., then would He know," &c. 7. Connected with v. 6. the way—of God (ch. 23. 11; Jeremiah 5. 5). A godly life. heart . . . after . . . eyes—If my heart coveted, what my eyes beheld (Ecclesiastes 11. 9; Joshua 7. 21). hands—(Psalm

24. 4). 8. Apodosis to v. 5 and 7; and the curses which he imprecates on himself, if he had done these things (Leviticus 26. 16; Amos 9. 14; Psalm 128. 2). offspring—Rather, what I plant, my harvests. 9-12. Job asserts his innocence of adultery. deceived—hath let itself be seduced (Proverbs 7. 8, &c.; Genesis 39. 7-12). laid wait—until the husband went out. 10. grind—turn the handmill. Be the most abject slave and concubine (Isaiah 47. 2; 2 Samuel 12. 11). 11. In the earliest times punished with death (Genesis 38. 24). So in later times (Deuteronomy 22. 22). Heretofore he had spoken only of sins against conscience; now, one against the community, needing the cognizance of the judge. 12. (Proverbs 6. 27-35; 8. 6-23, 26, 27.) No crime more provokes God to send destruction as a consuming fire, none so desolates the soul. 13-23. Job affirms his freedom from unfairness towards his servants, from harshness and oppression towards the needy. despise the cause—refused to do them justice. 14, 15. Parenthetical; the reason why Job did not despise the cause of his servants. Translate, What then (had I done so) could I have done, when God arose (to call me to account); and when He visited (came to inquire), what could I have answered Him? 15. Slaveholders try to defend themselves by maintaining the original inferiority of the slave. But Malachi 2. 10; Acts 17. 26; Ephesians 6. 9, make the common origin of masters and servants the argument for brotherly love being shown by the former to the latter. 16. fall—in the vain expectation of relief (ch. 11. 20). 17. Arabian rules of hospitality require the stranger to be helped first, and to the best. 18. Parenthetical: asserting that he did the contrary to the things in v. 16, 17. he—the orphan. guided her—viz., the widow, by advice and protection. On this and "a father" see ch. 29. 16. 19. perish—i. e., ready to perish (ch. 29. 13). 20. loins—the parts of the body benefited by Job are poetically described as thanking him; the loins before naked, when clad by me, wished me every blessing. 21. "When (i. e., because) I saw" that I might calculate on the "help" of a powerful party in the court of justice—"gate"), if I should be summoned by the injured fatherless. 22. Apodosis to vs. 13, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21. If I had done those crimes, I should have made a bad use of my influence (my arm, figuratively, v. 21); therefore, if I have done them let my arm (literally) suffer. Job alludes to Eliphaz's charge (ch. 22. 9). The first "arm" is rather the shoulder. The second "arm" is the fore arm, from the bone—Lit., a reed; hence the upper arm, above the elbow. 23. For—i. e., the reason why Job guarded against such sins. Fear of God, though he could escape man's judgment (Genesis 39. 9). UMBREIT more spiritedly translates, Yea, destruction and terror from God might have befallen me (had I done so); mere fear not being the motive. highness—majestic might. endure—I could have availed nothing against it. 24, 25. Job asserts his freedom from trust in money (1 Timothy 6. 17). Here he turns to his duty towards God, as before he had spoken of his duty towards himself and his neighbour. Covetousness is covert idolatry, as it transfers the heart from the Creator to the creature (Colossians 3. 5). In v. 26, 27 he passes to overt idolatry. 26. If I looked unto the sun (as an object of worship) because he shined; or to the moon because she walked, &c. Sabaism (from Isaba, the heavenly hosts) was the earliest form of false worship. God is hence called in contradistinction "Lord of Sabaoth." The sun, moon, and stars, the brightest objects in nature, and seen everywhere, were supposed to be visible representatives of the invisible God. They had no temples, but were worshipped on high places and roofs of houses (Ezekiel 8. 16; Deuteronomy 4. 19; 2 Kings 23. 5, 11). The Hebrew here for "sun" is light. Probably light was worshipped as the emanation from God, before its embodiments, the sun, &c. This worship prevailed in Chaldea; wherefore Job's exemption from the idolatry of his neighbours was the more exemplary. Our "Sun-day, Mon-day," or Moon-day, bear traces of Sabaism. 27. enticed—away from God to idolatry. kissed . . . hand—Adoration, lit., means this. In worshipping they used to kiss the hand, and then throw the kiss, as it were, towards the object of worship (1 Kings 19. 18; Hosea 13. 2). 28. The Mo-sale law embodied subsequently the feeling of the godly from the earliest times against idolatry, as deserving judicial penalties: being treason against the Supreme King (Deuteronomy 13. 9; 17. 2-7; Ezekiel 8. 14-18). This passage therefore does not prove Job to have been subsequent to Moses. 29. lifted up himself—in malicious triumph (Proverbs 17. 5; 24. 17; Psalm 7. 4). 30. mouth—lit., palate; ch. 6. 30, note). wishing—lit., “so as to demand his (my enemy’s) soul, i. e., life by a curse.” This verse parenthetically confirms v. 30. Job in the patriarchal age of the promise, anterior to the law, realizes the Gospel spirit, which was the end of the law (cf. Leviticus 19. 18; Deuteronomy 23. 6, with Matthew 5. 43, 44). 31. i. e., Job’s household said, Oh that we had Job’s enemy to devour, we cannot rest satisfied till we have! But Job refrained from even wishing revenge (1 Samuel 26. 8; 2 Samuel 16. 9, 10). So Jesus Christ (Luke 9. 54, 55). But, better (see v. 32), translated, “Who can show (lit., give) the man who was not satisfied with the flesh (meat) provided by Job?” He never let a poor man leave his gate without giving him enough to eat. 32. traveller—lit., way, i. e., wayfarers; so expressed to include all of every kind (2 Samuel 12. 4). 33. Adam—Translated by UMBREIT, “as men do” (Hosea 6, 7, where see Margin). But English Version is more natural. The very same word for “hiding” is used in Genesis 3. 8, 10, of Adam hiding himself from God. Job elsewhere alludes to the flood. So he might easily know of the fall, through the two links which connect Adam and Abraham (about Job’s time) viz., Methuselah and Shem. Adam is representative of fallen man’s propensity to concealment (Proverbs 28. 13). It was from God that Job did not “hide his iniquity in his bosom,” as on the contrary it was from God that “Adam” hid in his lurking-place. This disproves the translation, “as men:” for it is from their fellow-men that “men” are chiefly anxious to hide their real character as guilty. MAGEE, to make the comparison with Adam more exact, for my “bosom” translates, “lurking-place.” 34. Rather, the apodosis to v. 33, “Then let me be fear-stricken before a great multitude, let the contempt, &c., let me keep silence (the greatest disgrace to a patriot, heretofore so prominent in assemblies, and not go out,” &c. A just retribution, that he who hides his sin from God, should have it exposed before man (2 Samuel 12. 12). But Job had not been so exposed, but on the contrary was esteemed in the assemblies of the tribes—(“families”); a proof, he implies, that God does not hold him guilty of hiding sin (ch. 21. 16, contrast with ch. 29. 21-25). 35. Job returns to his wish (ch. 13. 22; 19. 23). Omit is; “Behold my sign,” i. e., my mark of subscription to the statements just given in my defence: the mark of signature was originally a cross; and hence the letter Tau or T. Translate also “O that the Almighty,” &c. He marks “God” as the “One” meant in the first clause. Adversary, i. e., he who contends with me, refers also to God. The vagueness is designed to express “whoever it be that judicially opposes me”—the Almighty if it be He. had written a book—Rather, “would write down his charge.” 36. So far from hiding the adversary’s “answer” or “charge” through fear, “I would take it on my shoulders” as a public honour (Isaiah 9. 6). a crown—not a mark of shame, but of distinction (Isaiah 62. 3). 37. A good conscience imparts a princely dignity before man and free assurance in approaching God. This can be realized, not in Job’s way (42. 5, 6); but only through Jesus Christ (Hebrews 10. 22). 38. Personification. The complaints of the unjustly-ousted proprietors are transferred to the lands themselves (v. 20; Genesis 4. 10; Habakkuk 2. 11). If I have unjustly acquired lands (ch. 24. 2; Isaiah 5. 8). furrows—The specification of these makes it likely, he implies in this, “If I paid not the labourer for tillage,” as next verse, “If I paid him not for gathering in the fruits.” Thus of the four clauses in v. 38, 39, the 1st refers to the same subject as the 4th, the 2d is connected with the 3d by inverted parallelism. James 5. 4, who plainly alludes to this passage? cf. “Lord of Sabaoth” with v. 28 here. 39. lose . . . life—not lit., but “harassed to death;” until he gave me up his land gratis [MAURER]; as in Judges 16. 16; “suffered him to languish” by taking away his means of living [UMBREIT] (1 Kings 21. 19). 40. thistles—or brambles, thorns, cockle—lit., noxious weeds. The words . . . ended—i. e., in the controversy with the friends. He spoke in the book afterwards, but not to them. At 37 would be the regular conclusion in strict art. But 38-40 is natural to be added by one whose mind in agitation recurs to its sense of innocence, even after it has come to the point usual to stop at; this takes away the appearance of rhetorical artifice. Hence the transposition by EICHORN of 38-40 to follow 25 is quite unwarranted.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Ver. 1-22. SPEECH OF ELIHU (ch. 32-37). 1-6. Prose (poetry begins with “I am young”). 1. because, &c.—and because they could not prove to him that he was unrighteous. 2. Elihu—meaning “God is Jehovah.” In his name, and character as messenger between God and Job, he shadows forth Jesus Christ (ch. 33. 23-26). Barachel—meaning “God blesses.” Both names indicate the piety of the family, and their separation from idolaters. Buzite—Buz was son of Nahor, brother of Abraham. Hence was named a region in Arabia Deserta (Jeremiah 25. 23). Ram—Aram, nephew of Buz. Job was probably of an elder generation than Elihu. However, the identity of names does not necessarily prove the identity of persons. The particularity with which Elihu’s descent is given, as contrasted with the others, led LEHRHOFF to infer Elihu was the author of the book. But the reason for particularity was, probably, that Elihu was less known than the three called “friends” of Job: and that it was right for the poet to mark especially him who was mainly to solve the problem of the book. rather than God—i. e., was more eager to vindicate himself than God. In ch. 4. 17, Job denies that man can be more just than God. UMBREIT translates, “Before (in the presence of) God.” 3. Though silenced in argument, they held their opinion still. 4. had spoken—Hebrew, in words, referring rather to his own “words” of reply, which he had long ago ready, but kept back in deference to the seniority of the friends who spoke. 6. was afraid—the root meaning in Hebrew is to crawl (Deuteronomy 32. 24). 7. days—i. e., the aged (ch. 15. 10). 8. Elihu claims inspiration, as a divinely-commissioned messenger to Job (ch. 33. 6, 23); and that claim is not contradicted in ch. 42. Translate, “But the spirit (which God puts) in man, and the inspiration, &c., is that which giveth,” &c., it is not mere “years” which give understanding (Proverbs 2. 6; John 20. 22). 9. Great—Rather, old (v. 6). So Hebrew, in Genesis 25. 23. “Greater, less” for the elder, the younger. judgment—what is right. 10. Rather, I say. opinion—Rather, knowledge. 11. Therefore Elihu was present from the first. reasons—lit., understandings, i. e., the meaning intended by words. whilst—I waited until you should discover a suitable reply to Job. 13. This has been so ordered, “lest you should” pride yourselves on having overcome him by your “wisdom” (Jeremiah 9. 23, the great aim of the book of Job); and that you may see, “God alone can thrust him down,” i. e., confute him, “not man.” So Elihu grounds his confutation not on the maxims of sages, as the friends did, but on his special commission from God (v. 8; ch. 33. 4, 6). 14. I am altogether unprejudiced. For it is not I, whom he addressed. “Your speeches” have been influenced by irritation. 15. Here Elihu turns from the friends to Job: and so passes from the second person to the third; a transition frequent in a rebuke (ch. 18. 3, 4). they left off—words were taken from them. 17. my part—for my part. opinion—knowledge. 18. I am full of words,” whereas the friends have not a word more to say. the spirit—(v. 8; ch. 33. 4; Jeremiah 20. 9; Acts 13. 5). 19. belly—Bosom: from which the words of Orientalists in speaking seem to come more than with us; they speak gutturally. “Like (new) wine (in fermentation) without a vent,” to work itself off. New wine is kept in new goatskin bottles. This fittingly applies to the young Elihu, as contrasted with the old friends (Matthew 9. 7). 20. refreshed—lit., that there may be air to me (1 Samuel 16. 23). 21. “May I never accept," &c. Elihu alludes to Job's words (ch. 13. 8, 10), wherein he complains that the friends plead for God partially, "accepting His person." Elihu says, he will not do so, but act impartially between God and Job. "And I will not give flattery," &c. (Proverbs 24. 23). 22. take me away—as a punishment (Psalm 102. 24).

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Ver. 1-33. ADDRESS TO JOB, AS (ch. 32.) TO THE FRIENDS. 2. mouth—Rather, palate, whereby the taste discerns. Every man speaks with his mouth, but few, as Elihu, try their words with discrimination first, and only say what is really good (ch. 6. 30; 12. 11). hath spoken—Rather, Proceeds to speak. 3. I will speak according to my inward conviction. clearly—Rather, purely: sincerely, not distorting the truth through passion, as the friends. 4. "The Spirit of God hath made me," as He did thee; latter clause of v. 6 (Genesis 2. 7). Therefore thou needest not fear me, as thou wouldst God (v. 7; ch. 9. 34). On the other hand, "the breath of the Almighty hath inspired me" (as ch. 32. 8); not as English Version, "given me life;" therefore "I am according to thy wish (ch. 9. 32, 33) in God's stead" to thee; a "daysman," umpire, or mediator, between God and thee. So Elihu was designed by the Holy Ghost to be a type of Jesus Christ (v. 23-26). 5. Images from a court of justice. stand up—alluding to Job's words (ch. 30. 20). 6. Note (v. 4; ch. 31. 35; 13. 3, 20, 21). formed—though acting as God's representative, I am but a creature, like thyself. Arable, pressed together, as a mass of clay by the potter, in forming a vessel. [UMBREIT.] Hebrew, cut off, as the portion taken from the clay to form it. [MAUREL.] 7. hand—alluding to Job's words (ch. 13. 21). 8. thy words—(Ch. 10. 7; 16. 17; 23. 11, 12; 27. 5, 6; 29. 14.) In ch. 9. 30; 13. 23, Job had acknowledged sin; but the general spirit of his words was to maintain himself to be "clean;" and to charge God with injustice. He went too far on the opposite side in opposing the friends' false charge of hypocrisy. Even the godly, though willing to confess themselves sinners in general, often dislike sin in particular to be brought as a charge against them. Affliction is therefore needed to bring them to feel that sin in them deserves even worse than they suffer, and that God does them no injustice. Then at last humbled under God they find, affliction is for their real good, and so at last it is taken way either here, or at least at death. To teach this is Elihu's mission. 9. clean—spotless. 10. occasions—for hostility: lit., enmities (ch. 13. 24; 16. 9; 19. 11; 30. 21). 11. (Ch. 13. 27.) marketh—narrowly watches (ch. 14. 16; 7. 12; 31. 4). 12. in this—view of God and His government. It cannot be that God should jealously "watch" man, though "spotless," as an "enemy," or as one afraid of him as an equal. For "God is greater than man!" There must be sin in man, even though he be no hypocrite, which needs correction by suffering for the sufferer's good. 13. (Isaiah 45. 9.) his matters—ways. Our part is, not to "strive" with God, but to submit. To believe it is right because He does it, not because we see all the reasons for His doing it. 14. Translate, "Yet man regardeth it not;" or rather, as UMBREIT, "Yea, twice (He repeats the warning)—if man gives no heed" to the first warning. Elihu implies that God's reason for sending affliction is, because, when God has communicated His will in various ways, man in prosperity has not heeded it; God therefore must try what affliction will effect (John 15. 2; Psalm 62. 11; Isaiah 23. 10, 13). 15. slumberings—light, is opposed to "deep sleep." Elihu has in view Eliphaz (ch. 4. 13), and also Job himself (ch. 7. 14). "Dreams" in sleep, and "visions" of actual apparitions, were among the ways whereby God then spake to man (Genesis 20. 3). 16. Lit., sealeth (their ears) to himself by warnings, i. e., with the sureness and secrecy of a seal He reveals His warnings. [UMBREIT.] To seal up securely (ch. 37. 7). On the "openeth" (see ch. 36. 10). 17. purpose—Margin, work. So ch. 36. 9. So "business" in a bad sense (1 Samuel 20. 19). Elihu alludes to Job's words (ch. 17. 11). "Pride" is an open "pit" (v. 18) which God hides or covers up, lest man should fall into it. Even the godly need to learn the lesson which trials teach, to "hum- ble themselves under the mighty hand of God." 18. his soul—his life. the pit—the grave; a symbol of hell. perishing by the sword—i. e., a violent death; in the Old Testament a symbol of the future punishment of the ungodly. 19. When man does not heed warnings of the night, he is chastened, &c. The new thought suggested by Elihu is that affliction is disciplinary (ch. 36. 10); for the good of the godly. multitude—so the Margin, Hebrew (KERI). Better with the text (CHETIB), "And with the perpetual (strong) contest of his bones;" the never-resting fever in his bones (Psalm 38. 3) [UMBREIT]. 20. life—i. e., the appetite, which ordinarily sustains "life" (ch. 33. 39; Psalm 107. 18; Ecclesiastes 12. 5). The taking away of desire for food by sickness symbolizes the removal by affliction of lust, for things which foster the spiritual fever of pride. soul—desire. 21. His flesh once prominent "can no more be seen." His bones once not seen now appear prominent. stick out—lit., are bare. The Margin, Hebrew (KERI) reading. The text (CHETIB) reads it a noun (are become), "bareness." The Keri was no doubt an explanatory reading of transcribers. 22. destroyers—angels of death commissioned by God to end man's life (2 Samuel 24. 16; Psalm 78. 49). The death pains personified may, however, be meant; so "gnawers" (note ch. 30. 17). 23. Elihu refers to himself as the Divinely-sent (ch. 32. 8; 33. 6) "messenger," the "Interpreter" to explain to Job and vindicate God's righteousness; such a one Eliphaz had denied that Job could look for (ch. 5. 1), and Job (ch. 9. 33) had wished for such a "daysman" or umpire between him and God. The "messenger" of good is antithetical to the "destroyers" (v. 23). with him—If there be vouchsafed to the sufferer. The office of the interpreter is stated "to show unto man God's uprightness" in His dealings; or, as UMBREIT, "man's upright course towards God" (Proverbs 14. 2). The former is better; Job maintained his own "uprightness" (ch. 16. 17; 27. 5, 6); Elihu on the contrary maintains God's, and that man's true uprightness lies in submission to God. "One among a thousand" is a man rarely to be found. So Jesus Christ (Song of Solomon 5. 10). Elihu, the God-sent mediator of a temporal deliverance (v. 54-26), is a type of the God-man Jesus Christ the Mediator of eternal deliverance: "the messenger of the covenant" (Malachi 3. 1). This is the wonderful work of the Holy Ghost, that persons and events move in their own sphere in such a way, as unconsciously to shadow forth Him, whose "testimony is the Spirit of prophecy;" as the same point may be centre of a small and of a vastly larger concentric circle. 24. Apodosis to 23. he—God. Deliver—Lit., redeem: in it and "ransom" there is reference to the consideration, on account of which God pardons and relieves the sufferers; here it is primarily the intercession of Elihu. But the language is too strong for its full meaning to be exhausted by this. The Holy Ghost has suggested language which receives its full realization only in the "eternal redemption found" by God in the price paid by Jesus Christ for it, i. e., His blood and meritorious intercession (Hebrews 9. 12). "Obtained," lit., found: implying the earnest zeal, wisdom, and faithfulness of the finder, and the newness and joyousness of the finding. Jesus Christ could not but have found it, but still His seeking it was needed. [BENGEL.] (Luke 15. 8.) God the Father, is the Finder (Psalm 89. 19). Jesus Christ the Redeemer, to whom He saith, Redeem (so Hebrew) him from going, &c. (2 Corinthians 5. 19). ransom—Used in a general sense by Elihu, but meant by the Holy Ghost in its strict sense as applied to Jesus Christ, of a price paid for deliverance (Exodus 21. 30), an atonement (i. e., means of selling at once, i. e., reconciling two who are estranged), a covering, as of the ark with pitch, typical of what covers us sinners from wrath (Genesis 6. 14; Psalm 32. 1). The pit is primarily here the grave (Isaiah 38. 17), but the spiritual pit is mainly shadowed forth (Zechariah 9. 11). 25-28. Effects of restoration to God's favour; lit., to Job a temporal revival; spiritually, an eternal regeneration. The striking words cannot be restricted to their temporal meaning, as used by Elihu (1 Peter 1. 11, 12). his flesh shall be fresher than a child's—So Naaman, 2 Kings 5. 14; spiritually, John 3. 3-7. 26. Job shall no longer pray to God, as he complains, in vain

(ch. 23, 3, 8, 9). True especially to the redeemed in Jesus Christ (John 16, 23-27). He (Job) shall see his face—Or God shall make him to see His face. [MAURER.] God shall no longer "hide His face" (ch. 13, 24). True to the believer now, John 14, 21, 22; eternally, Psalm 17, 15; John 17, 24. his (God's) righteousness—God will again make the restored Job no longer ("I perverted—right," v. 27) doubt God's justice, but to justify Him in His dealings. The penitent justifies God (Psalm 51, 4). So the believer is made to see God's righteousness in Jesus Christ (Isaiah 45, 24; 46, 13). 27. he looketh—God. Rather, with UMBREIT, "Now he (the restored penitent) singeth joyfully (answering to "joy," v. 26; Psalm 51, 12) before men, and saith," &c. (Proverbs 25, 20; Psalm 66, 16; 116, 14). perverted—Made the straight crooked: as Job had misrepresented God's character. profited—Lit., was made even to me; rather, "My punishment was not commensurate with my sin" (so Zophar, ch. 11, 6); the reverse of what Job heretofore said (ch. 16, 17; Psalm 103, 10; Ezra 9, 13). 28. Note v. 24; rather, as Hebrew text (English Version reads as Margin, Hebrew, Keri, "his soul, his life"), "He hath delivered my soul, &c., my life." Continuation of the penitent's testimony to the people. light—(v. 30; ch. 3, 16, 20; Psalm 56, 13; Ecclesiastes 11, 7). 29. Margin, twice and thrice, alluding to v. 14; once, by visions, 15-17; secondly, by afflictions, 19-22; now, by the "messenger," thirdly, 23. 30. Referring to v. 23 (Psalm 50, 13). 32. justify—To do thee justice; and, if I can, consistently with it, to declare thee innocent. At v. 33 Elihu pauses for a reply; then proceeds; ch. 34.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Ver. 1-37. 1. answered—Proceeded. 2. This ch. is addressed also to the "friends," as ch. 33, to Job alone. 3. Palate (note ch. 12, 11; ch. 33, 2). 4. judgment—Let us select among the conflicting sentiments advanced, what will stand the test of examination. 5. judgment—My right. Job's own words (ch. 13, 18; 27, 2). 6—i. e., Were I to renounce my right (i. e., confess myself guilty) I should die. Job virtually had said so (ch. 27, 4, 5; 6, 28). MAURER, not so well, "Notwithstanding my right (innocence) I am treated as a liar," by God, by his afflicting me. my wound—Lit., mine arrow, viz., by which I am pierced. So "my stroke" (Hand, Margin, ch. 23, 2). My sickness (ch. 6, 4; 16, 13). without transgression—Without fault of mine to deserve it (ch. 16, 17). 7. (Ch. 15, 16.) Image from the camel. scorning—Against God (ch. 15, 4). 8. Job virtually goeth in company (makes common cause) with the wicked, by taking up their sentiments (ch. 9, 22, 23, 30; 21, 7-15), or at least by saying, that those who act on such sentiments are unpunished (Malachi 3, 14). To deny God's righteous government, because we do not see the reasons of His acts, is virtually to take part with the ungodly. 9. with God—In intimacy (Psalm 50, 18). 10. The true answer to Job, which God follows up (ch. 33). Man is to believe God's ways are right, because they are His, not because we fully see they are so (Romans 9, 14; Deuteronomy 32, 4; Genesis 18, 25). 11. Partly here; fully, hereafter (Jeremiah 32, 19; Romans 2, 6; 1 Peter 1, 17; Revelation 22, 12). 12. (Ch. 8, 3.) In opposition to Job, v. 5, will not—Cannot. 13. If the world were not God's property, as having been made by Him, but committed to His charge by some superior, it might be possible for Him to act unjustly, as He would not thereby be injuring Himself; but as it is, for God to act unjustly would undermine the whole order of the world, and so would injure God's own property (ch. 36, 23). disposed—Hath founded (Isaiah 41, 7), established the circle of the globe. 14, 15. "If He were to set His heart on man," either to injure him, or to take strict account of his sins. The connection supports rather (UMBREIT), "If He had regard to himself (only), and were to gather unto Himself (Psalm 104, 29) man's spirit, &c. (which he sends forth, Psalm 104, 30; Ecclesiastes 12, 7), all flesh must perish together," &c. (Genesis 3, 19). God's loving preservation of his creatures proves He cannot be selfish, and therefore cannot be unjust. 16. In v. 2, Elihu had spoken to all in general, now he calls Job's special attention. 17. "Can even He who (in thy view)

hatheth right (justice) govern?" The government of the world would be impossible if injustice were sanctioned. God must be just, because He governs (2 Samuel 23, 3). govern—Lit., bind, viz., by authority (so "reign," Margin, 1 Samuel 9, 17). UMBREIT translates for "govern," represserath, viz., against Job for his accusations. most just—Rather, "Him who is at once mighty and just" (in His government of the world). 18. Lit. (Is it fit) to be said to a king? It would be a gross outrage to reproach thus an earthly monarch, much more the King of kings (Exodus 22, 28). But MAURER with LXX. and Vulgate reads (It is not fit to accuse of injustice Him) who says to a king, Thou art wicked, to princes, Ye are ungodly, i. e., who punishes impartially the great, as the small. This accords with v. 19. 19. Acts 10, 34; 2 Chronicles 19, 7; Proverbs 22, 2; ch. 31, 15. 20. they—"The rich" and "princes" who offend God. the people—viz., of the guilty princes; guilty also themselves. at midnight—Image from a night-attack of an enemy on a camp, which becomes an easy prey (Exodus 12, 29, 30). without hand—Without visible agency, by the mere word of God (so ch. 20, 26; Zechariah 4, 6; Daniel 2, 34). 21. God's omniscience and omnipotence enable Him to execute immediate justice. He needs not to be long on the "watch," as Job thought (ch. 7, 12; 2 Chronicles 16, 9; Jeremiah 32, 19). 22. shadow of death—Thick darkness (Amos 9, 2, 3; Psalm 139, 12). 23. (1 Corinthians 10, 13; Lamentations 3, 32; Isaiah 27, 8.) Better, as UMBREIT, "He does not (needs not to) regard (as in v. 14; Isaiah 41, 20) man long (so Hebrew, Genesis 46, 29) in order that he may go (be brought by God) into judgment." Lit., "Lest his (attention) upon men" (ch. 11, 10, 11). So v. 24, "without number" ought to be translated, without (needing any) searching out," such as has to be made in human judgments. 24. break in pieces—(Psalm 2, 9; ch. 12, 13; Daniel 2, 21). 25. therefore—Because He knows all things (v. 21). He knows their works, without a formal investigation (v. 24). in the night—Suddenly, unexpectedly (v. 20). Fitly in the night, as it was in it that the godless hid themselves (v. 22). UMBREIT, less simply, for "overturneth," translates, "walketh;" i. e., God is ever on the alert, discovering all wickedness. 26. striketh—Chasteneth. as—i. e., because they are wicked. sight of others—Sinners hid themselves in darkness; therefore they are punished before all, in open day. Image from the place of public execution (ch. 40, 12; Exodus 14, 30; 2 Samuel 12, 12). 27, 28. The grounds of their punishment in v. 26; v. 28 states in what respect they "considered not God's ways," viz., by oppression, whereby "they caused the cry," &c. 29. (Proverbs 16, 7; Isaiah 26, 3.) make trouble—Rather, condemn (Romans 8, 33, 34). MAURER, from the reference being only to the godless, in the next clause, and v. 20 translates, "When God keeps quiet (leaves men to perish) Psalm 83, 1; [UMBREIT] from the Arabic (strikes to the earth), who shall condemn Him as unjust?" v. 17. hideth . . . face—(ch. 23, 8, 9; Psalm 13, 1). it be done—Whether it be against a guilty nation (2 Kings 13, 9-12) or an individual, that God acts so. 30. "Ensnared" into sin (1 Kings 12, 23, 30). Or rather, entrallied by further oppression, v. 26-28. 31. Job accordingly says so (ch. 40, 3-5; Micah 7, 9; Leviticus 26, 41). It was to lead him to this that Elihu was sent. Though no hypocrite, Job, like all, had sin, therefore through affliction he was to be brought to humble himself under God. All sorrow is a proof of the common heritage of sin, in which the godly shares; and therefore he ought to regard it as a merciful correction. UMBREIT and MAURER lose this by translating, as the Hebrew will bear, "Has any a right to say to God, I have borne chastisement and yet have not sinned?" (so v. 6). borne—viz., the penalty of sin, as in Leviticus 5, 1, 17. offend—Lit., to deal destructively or corruptly (Nehemiah 1, 7). 32. ch. 10, 2; Psalm 32, 8; 19, 12; 139, 23, 24. no more—Proverbs 23, 13; Ephesians 4, 22. 33. Rather, "should God recompense (sinners) according to thy mind? Then it is for thee to reject and to choose, and not me," UMBREIT; or as MAURER, "For thou hast rejected God's way of recompensing; state therefore thy way, for thou must choose, not I," i. e., it is thy part, not mine, to show a better way than God's. 34, 35.

Rather, men, &c., will say to me, and the wise man (v. 2, 10) who hearkens to me (will say), "Job hath spoken," &c. 36. Margin, not so well, My father, Elihu addressing God. This title does not elsewhere occur in Job. tried—by calamities. answers for wicked men—(See note v. 8.) Trials of the godly are not removed until they produce the effect designed. 37. clappeth . . . hands—In scorn (ch. 27. 23; Ezekiel 21. 17). multiplifeth . . . words—(ch. 11. 2; 35. 16). To his original "sin" to correct which trials have been sent, "he adds rebellion," i. e., words arraiguing God's justice.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Ver. 1-16. 2. more than—Rather as ch. 9. 2; 25. 4: "I am righteous (lit., my righteousness is) before God." English Version, however, agrees with ch. 9. 17; 16. 12-17; 27. 2-6. Ch. 4. 17 is susceptible of either rendering. Elihu means Job said so, not in so many words, but virtually. 3. Rather, explanatory of "this" in v. 2, "That thou sayest (to thyself, as if a distinct person) What advantage is it (thy integrity) to thee? What profit have I (by integrity) more than (I should have) by my sin?" i. e., more than if I had sinned (ch. 31. 9). Job had said that the wicked, who use these very words, do not suffer for it (ch. 21. 13-15); whereby he virtually sanctioned their sentiments. The same change of persons from oblique to direct address occurs (ch. 19. 23; 22. 17). 4. companions—Those entertaining like sentiments with thee (ch. 34. 8, 36). 5-8. Elihu like Eliphaz (ch. 22. 2, 3, 12) shows that God is too exalted in nature to be susceptible of benefit or hurt from the righteousness or sin of men respectively; it is themselves that they benefit by righteousness, or hurt by sin, behold the clouds, which are higher than thou—Spoken with irony. Not only are they higher than thou, but thou canst not even reach them clearly with the eye. Yet these are not as high as God's seat. God is therefore too exalted to be dependent on man. Therefore he has no inducement to injustice in his dealings with man. When He afflicts, it must be from a different motive; viz., the good of the sufferer. 6. what dost—How canst thou affect him? unto him—That can hurt Him? (Jeremiah 7. 19; Proverbs 8. 36). 7. (Psalm 16. 2; Proverbs 9. 12; Luke 17. 10.) 9. (Ecclesiastes 4. 1.) Elihu states in Job's words (ch. 24. 12; 30. 20) the difficulty; the "cries" of "the oppressed" not being heard might lead man to think that wrongs are not punished by Him. 10-13. But the reason is, that the innocent sufferers often do not humbly seek God for succour; so to their "pride" is to be laid the blame of their ruin; also because (13-16) they, as Job, instead of waiting God's time in pious trust, are prone to despair of His justice, when it is not immediately visible (ch. 33. 19-26). If the sufferer would apply to God with an humbled, penitent spirit, He would hear. Where, &c.—(Jeremiah 2. 6, 8; Isaiah 51. 13.) songs—Of joy at deliverance (Psalm 42. 8; 149. 5; Acts 16. 25). in the night—Unexpectedly (ch. 34. 20, 25). Rather, in calamity. 11. Man's spirit, which distinguishes him from the brute, is the strongest proof of God's beneficence; by the use of it we may understand that God is the Almighty helper of all sufferers who humbly seek him; and that they err who do not so seek him. fowls—(ch. 28. 21; Note). 12. There—Rather, Then (when none humbly casts himself on God, v. 10). They cry proudly against God, rather than humbly to God. So, as the design of affliction is to humble the sufferer, there can be no answer until "pride" gives place to humble, penitent prayer (Psalm 10. 4; Jeremiah 13. 17). 13. Vanity, i. e., cries uttered in an unhumbed spirit, v. 12, which applies in some degree to Job's cries; still more to those of the wicked (ch. 27. 9; Proverbs 15. 29). 14. Although thou sayest, thou shalt not see Him (as a temporal deliverer; for he did look for a Redeemer after death (ch. 19. 25-27); which passage cannot consistently with Elihu's assertion here be interpreted of "seeing" a temporal "Redeemer,") ch. 7. 7; 9. 11; 23. 3, 8, 9, yet, judgment, &c., therefore trust, &c. But the Hebrew favours MAURER, "How much less (will God—regard, v. 13), since thou sayest, that He does not regard thee." So in ch. 4. 19. Thus Elihu alludes to Job's words (ch. 19. 7; 30. 20). judgment—i. e., thy cause, thy right; as in Psalm 9. 16; Proverbs 31. 5, 8. trust—Rather, wait thou on Him, patiently, until He take up thy cause (Psalm 37. 7). 15. As it is, because Job waited not trustfully and patiently (v. 14; Numbers 20. 12; Zephaniah 3. 2; Micah 7. 9), God hath visited, &c., yet still he has not taken (severe) cognizance of the great multitude (English Version wrongly, "extremity") of sins; therefore Job should not complain of being punished with undue severity (ch. 7. 20; 11. 6). MAURER translates, "Because His anger hath not visited (hath not immediately punished Job for his impious complaints), nor has He taken strict (great) cognizance of his folly (sinful speeches), therefore, &c. For "folly," UMBREIT translates with the Rabbins, multitude. GESENIUS reads with LXX. and Vulgate needlessly, "transgression." 16. Apodosis to 15. in vain—Rashly.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Ver. 1-33. 1, 2. Elihu maintains, that afflictions are to the godly disciplinary, in order to lead them to attain a higher moral worth, and that the reason for their continuance is not, as the friends asserted, on account of the sufferer's extraordinary guilt, but because the discipline has not yet attained its object, viz., to lead him to humble himself penitently before God (Isaiah 9. 13; Jeremiah 5. 3). This is Elihu's fourth speech. He thus exceeds the ternary number of the others. Hence his formula of politeness, v. 2. Lit., Wait yet but a little for me. Bear with me a little farther. I have yet (much, ch. 32. 18-20). There are Chaldeisms in this verse, agreeably to the view that the scene of the book is near the Euphrates and the Chaldees. 3. from afar—Not trite commonplaces, but drawn from God's mighty works. ascribe righteousness—Whereas Job ascribed unrighteousness (ch. 34. 10, 12). A man, in inquiring into God's ways, should at the outset presume they are all just, be willing to find them so, and expect that the result of investigation will prove them to be so; such a one will never be disappointed. [BARNES.] 4. I will not "speak wickedly for God," as the friends (ch. 13. 4, 7, 8)—i. e., vindicate God by unsound arguments. he that is perfect, &c.—Rather, as the parallelism requires, "a man of integrity in sentiments is with thee" (is he with whom thou hast to do). Elihu means himself, as opposed to the dishonest reasonings of the friends (ch. 21. 34). 5. Rather, strength of understanding (heart) the force of the repetition of "mighty;" as "mighty" as God is, none is too low to be "despised" by Him; for His "might" lies especially in "His strength of understanding;" whereby He searches out the most minute things, so as to give to each his right. Elihu confirms his exhortation (ch. 35. 14). 6. right . . . poor—He espouses the cause of the afflicted. 7. (1 Peter 3. 12.) God does not forsake the godly, as Job implied, but "establishes," or makes them sit on the throne as kings (1 Samuel 2. 8; Psalm 113. 7, 8). True of believers in the highest sense, already in part, 1 Peter 2. 9; Revelation 1. 6; hereafter fully, Revelation 5. 10; ch. 22. 5. and they are—That they may be. 8-10. If they be afflicted, it is no proof that they are hypocrites, as the friends maintain, or that God disregards them, and is indifferent whether men are good or bad, as Job asserts; God is thereby "disciplining them," and "showing them their sins," and if they bow in a right spirit under God's visiting hand, the greatest blessings ensue. 9. work—Transgression. that . . . exceeded—In that they behaved themselves mightily, lit., great; i. e., presumptuously, or, at least, self-confidently. 10. (ch. 33. 16-18, 23.) 11. serve—i. e., worship; as in Isaiah 19. 23. God is to be supplied (cf. Isaiah 1. 19, 20). 12. (ch. 33. 18.) without knowledge—In, i. e., on account of their foolishness (ch. 4. 20, 21). 13-15. Same sentiment as v. 11, 12, expanded. 13. hypocrites—Or, the ungodly [MAURER]; but "hypocrites" is perhaps a distinct class from the openly wicked (v. 12). heap up wrath—Of God against themselves (Romans 2. 5). UMBREIT translates, "nourish their wrath against God," instead of "erying" unto Him. This suits well the parallelism and the Hebrew. But English Version gives a good parallelism, "hypocrites" answering to "cry not" (ch. 27. 8, 10); "heap up wrath" against themselves, to "He bindeth them" with fetters of affliction (v. 8). 14. Rather (Deuteronomy 23. 17), Their life is ended as that of (lit., among the unclean, prematurely and dishonourably. So the second clause answers to the first. A warning that Job make not common cause with the wicked (ch. 34. 36). 15. poor—The afflicted pious, openeth . . . ears—(v. 10); so as to be admonished in their straits ("oppression") to seek God penitently, and so be "delivered" (ch. 33. 16, 17, 23-27). 16. Rather, "He will lead forth thee also out of the jaws of a strait" (Psalm 18. 10; 118. 5). The "broad place" expresses the liberty, and the well-supplied "table" the abundance of the prosperous (Psalm 23. 5; Isaiah 25. 6). 17. Rather, "But if thou art fulfilled (i. e., entirely filled) with the judgment of the wicked (i. e., the guilt incurring judgment [MAURER]; or rather, as UMBREIT, referring to ch. 34. 5, 6, 7, 26, the judgment pronounced on God by the guilty in misfortunes) judgment (God's judgment on the wicked; Jeremiah 51. 9, playing on the double meaning of "judgment") and justice shall closely follow each other. [UMBREIT.] 18. (Numbers 16. 45; Psalm 49. 6, 7; Matthew 16. 26.) Even the "ransom" by Jesus Christ (ch. 33. 24) will be of no avail to wilful despisers (Hebrews 10. 26-29). with his stroke—(ch. 34. 26). UMBREIT translates, "Beware lest the wrath of God (thy severe calamity) lead thee to scorn" (ch. 34. 7, 27, 23). This accords better with the verb in the parallel clause, which ought to be translated, "Let not the great ransom (of money, which thou canst give) seduce thee (Margin, Turn thee aside, as if thou couldst deliver thyself from "wrath" by it). As the "scorn" in the first clause answers to the "judgment of the wicked," v. 17, so "ransom, seduce" to "will be esteem riches," v. 19. Thus, v. 18 is the transition between v. 17 and 19. 19. forces of strength—i. e., resources of wealth (Psalm 49. 7; Proverbs 11. 4). 20. desire—Pant for. Job had wished for death (ch. 3. 3-9, &c.). night—(John 9. 4). when—Rather, whereby. cut off—Lit., ascend, as the corn cut and lifted upon the wagon or stack (v. 26); so cut off, disappear. in their place—Lit., under themselves; so, without moving from their place, on the spot, suddenly (ch. 40. 12). [MAURER.] UMBREIT'S translation, "To ascend (which is really, as thou wilt find to thy cost, to descend) to the people below" (lit., under themselves), answers better to the parallelism and the Hebrew. Thou pantest for death as desirable, but it is a "night" or region of darkness, thy fancied ascent (amelioration) will prove a descent (deterioration) (ch. 10. 22); therefore desire it not. 21. regard—Lit., turn thyself to. iniquity—viz., presumptuous speaking against God (ch. 34. 5, and above, v. 17, 18; Note). rather than—To bear "affliction" with pious patience. Men think it an alleviation to complain against God, but this is adding sin to sorrow; it is sin, not sorrow, which can really hurt us (contrast Hebrews 11. 25). 22-25. God is not to be impiously arraigned, but to be praised for His might, shown in His works. exalteth—Rather, doeth lofty things, shows His exalted power [UMBREIT] (Psalm 21. 13). teacheth—(Psalm 94. 12, &c.). The connection is, returning to v. 5, God's "might" is shown in His "wisdom;" He alone can teach; yet, because He, as a sovereign, explains not all His dealings, forsooth Job must presume to teach Him (Isaiah 40. 13, 14; Romans 11. 34; 1 Corinthians 2. 16). So the transition to v. 23 is natural. UMBREIT with LXX. translates "Who is Lord," wrongly, as this meaning belongs to later Hebrew. 23. Job dared to prescribe to God what He should do (ch. 34. 10, 13). 24. Instead of arraigning, let it be thy fixed principle to magnify God in His works (Psalm 111. 2-8; Revelation 15. 3); these, which all may "see," may convince us that what we do not see is altogether wise and good (Romans 1. 20). behold—As "see," v. 25, shows; not, as MAURER, "sing," laud (Note 33. 27). 25. "See," viz., with wondering admiration. [MAURER.] man may behold—Rather, (yet mortals (a different Hebrew word from "man")) behold it (only from afar off)" see but a small "part" (ch. 26. 14). 26. (ch. 37. 13.) God's greatness in heaven and earth; a reason why Job should bow under His afflicting hand. 26. know him not—Only in part (v. 25; 1 Corinthians 13. 12). his years—(Psalm 90. 2; 102. 24, 27); applied to Jesus Christ (Hebrews 1. 12). 27, 28.

The marvellous formation of rain (so ch. 5. 9, 10). maketh small—Rather, "He draweth (up) to Him, He attracts (from the earth below) the drops of water; they (the drops of water) pour down rain, (which is His vapour," "Vapour" is in apposition with "rain," marking the way in which rain is formed, viz., from the vapour drawn up by God into the air and then condensed into drops, which fall (Psalm 147. 8). The suspension of such a mass of water, and its descent not in a deluge, but in drops of vapoury rain, are the marvel. The selection of this particular illustration of God's greatness forms a fit prelude to the storm in which God appears (ch. 40. 1). 28. abundantly—Lit., upon many men. 29. (ch. 37. 5). God's marvels in thunder and lightnings. 29. spreadings, &c.—The canopy of thick clouds, which covers the heavens in a storm (Psalm 105. 39). the noise (crashing) of his tabernacle—viz., thunder; God being poetically said to have His pavilion amidst dark clouds (Psalm 18. 11; Isaiah 40. 22). 30. light—Lightning. it—His tabernacle. The light, in an instant spread over the vast mass of dark clouds, forms a striking picture. "Spread" is repeated from v. 29, to form an antithesis. "He spreads not only clouds, but light." covereth the bottom (roots) of the sea—viz., with the light. In the storm the depths of ocean are laid bare; and the light "covers" them, at the same moment that it "spreads" across the dark sky. So in Psalm 18. 14, 15, the discovering of "the channels of waters" follows the "lightnings." UMBREIT translates, "He spreadeth His light upon Himself, and covereth Himself with the roots of the sea;" (Psalm 104. 2); God's garment is woven of celestial light and of the watery depths, raised to the sky to form His cloudy canopy. The phrase "cover Himself with the roots of the sea" is harsh; but the image is grand. 31. These (rain and lightnings) are marvellous and not to be understood (v. 29), yet necessary; "For by them He judgeth (chastiseth on the one hand, &c. (and on the other, by them) He giveth meat" (food), &c. (ch. 37. 13; 33. 23, 27; Acts 14. 17). 32. Rather, "He covereth (both) His hands with light (lightning, ch. 37. 3, Margin), and giveth it a command against his adversary" (lit., the one assailing Him; Psalm 8. 2; 139. 20; 21. 19.) Thus, as in v. 31, the twofold effects of His waters are set forth, so here, of His light; in the one hand destructive lightning against the wicked; in the other, the genial light for good to His friends, &c., v. 33. [UMBREIT.] 33. noise—Rather, He revealeth it (lit., announceth concerning it) to His friend (antithesis to adversary, v. 32, so the Hebrew is translated, ch. 2. 11); also to cattle and plants (lit., that which shooteth up; Genesis 40. 10; 41. 22). As the genial effect of "water" in the growth of food, is mentioned v. 31, so here that of "light" in cherishing cattle and plants. [UMBREIT.] If English Version, "noise" be retained, translate, "His noise (thunder) announces concerning Him (His coming in the tempest), the cattle (to announce) concerning Him when He is in the act of rising up" (in the storm). Some animals give various intimations, that they are sensible of the approach of a storm. [Virg. Georg. I. 373, &c.]

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Ver. 1-21. 1. At this—When I hear the thundering of the Divine Majesty. Perhaps the storm already had begun, out of which God was to address Job (ch. 38. 1). 2. Hear attentively—The thunder (noise), &c., and then you will feel that there is good reason to tremble. sound—Muttering of the thunder. 3. directeth it—However zig-zag the lightning's course; or, rather, it applies to the pealing roll of the thunder. God's all-embracing power. ends—Lit., wings, skirts, the habitable earth being often compared to an extended garment (ch. 38. 13; Isaiah 11. 12). 4. The thunder-clap follows at an interval after the flash. stay them—He will not hold back the lightnings (v. 3), when the thunder is heard. [MAURER.] Rather, take "them" as the usual concomitants of thunder, viz., rain and hail [UMBREIT] (ch. 40. 9). 5. (ch. 36. 26; Psalm 65. 6; 139. 14). The sublimity of the description lies in this, that God is everywhere in the storm, directing it whither He will. [BARNES.] See Psalm 29., where, as here, the "voice" of God is repeated with grand effect. The thunder in Arabia is sublimely terrible. 6. Be—More forcible than “Fall,” as UMBREIT translates Genesis 1. 3. to the small rain, &c.—He saith, Be on the earth. The shower increasing from “small” to “great,” is expressed by the plural show-ers (Margin), following the singular shower. Winter rain (Song of Solomon 2. 11). 7. In winter God stops man’s out-of-doors activity. sealeth—Closeth up (ch. 9. 7). Man’s “hands” are then tied up. his work—In antithesis to man’s own work (“hand”) which at other times engages men so as to be liable to forget their dependence on God. UMBREIT more lit. translates, That all men whom He has made (lit., of His making) may be brought to acknowledgment. 8. remain—Rest in their lairs. It is beautifully ordered that during the cold, when they could not obtain food, many lie torpid; a state wherein they need no food. The desolation of the fields, at God’s bidding, is poetically graphic. 9. south—Lit., chambers; connected with the south (ch. 9. 9). The whirlwinds are poetically regarded as pent up by God in His southern chambers, whence he sends them forth (so ch. 33. 22; Psalm 135. 7). As to the southern whirlwinds (see Isaiah 21. 1; Zechariah 9. 14), they drive before them burning sands; chiefly from February to May. the north—Lit., scattering; the north wind scatters the clouds. 10. frost—Rather, ice, the breath of God—Poetically, for the ice-producing north wind. straitened—Physically accurate; frost compresses or contracts the expanded liquid into a congealed mass (ch. 38. 29, 30; Psalm 147. 17, 18). 11-13. How the thunder-clouds are dispersed, or else employed by God, either for correction or mercy. by watering—By loading it with water. wearieth—Burdeneth it, so that it falls in rain; thus “wearieth” answers to the parallel “scattereth” (cf. Note v. 9); a clear sky resulting alike from both. bright cloud—Lit., cloud of His light, i. e., of His lightning. UMBREIT for “watering,” &c., translates, “Brightness drives away the clouds, His light scattereth the thick clouds;” the parallelism is thus good, but the Hebrew hardly sanctions it. 13. it—The cloud of lightning. counsels—Guidance (Psalm 148. 8); lit., steering; the clouds obey God’s guidance, as the ship does the helmsman. So the lightning (Note 36. 31, 32); neither is hap-hazard in its movements. they—The clouds, implied in the collective singular “it.” face of the world, &c.—In the face of the earth’s circle. 13. Lit., He maketh it (the rain-cloud) find place, whether for correction, if (it be destined) for His land (i. e., for the part inhabited by man, with whom God deals, as opposed to the parts uninhabited, on which rain is at other times appointed to fall, ch. 38. 26, 27) or for mercy. “If it be destined for His land” is a parenthetical supposition. [MAURER.] In English Version, this clause spoils the even balance of the antithesis between the “rod” (Margin) and “mercy” (Psalm 68. 9; Genesis 7). 14. (Psalm 111. 2.) 15. when—Rather, how, disposed then—Lays His charge on these “wonders” (v. 14) to arise. light—Lightning. shine—Flash. How is it that light arises from the dark thunder-cloud? 16. Hebrew, “Hast thou understanding of the balancings,” &c., how the clouds are poised in the air, so that their watery gravity does not bring them to the earth? The condensed moisture, descending by gravity, meets a warmer temperature, which dissipates it into vapour (the tendency of which is to ascend) and so counteracts the descending force, perfect in knowledge—God; not here in the sense that Elihu uses it of himself (ch. 36. 4). 17. dost thou know—How, &c. thy garments—i. e., how thy body grows warm, so as to affect thy garments with heat? south wind—Lit., region of the south. “When He maketh still (and sultry) the earth (i. e., the atmosphere) by (during) the south wind (Song of Solomon 4. 16). 18. with him—Like as He does (ch. 40. 15). spread out—Given expanse to. strong—Firm; whence the term “firmament” (Genesis 1. 6; Margin, expansion, Isaiah 41. 24). molten looking-glass—Image of the bright smiling sky. Mirrors were then formed of molten polished metal, not “glass.” 19. Men cannot explain God’s wonders; we ought, therefore, to be dumb and not contend with God. If Job thinks we ought, “let him teach us, what we shall say.” order—

Frame. darkness—Of mind; ignorance. “The eyes are bewilderingly blinded, when turned in bold controversy with God towards the sunny heavens” (v. 18). [UMBREIT.] 20. What I a mortal say against God’s dealings is not worthy of being told HIM. In opposition to Job’s wish to “speak” before God (ch. 13. 3, 18-22). If . . . surely he shall be swallowed up—The parallelism more favours UMBREIT, “Durst a man speak (before Him, complaining) that he is (without cause) being destroyed?” 21. “Cleanseth,” i. e., cleareth the air of clouds. When the “bright light” of the sun, previously “not seen” through “clouds,” suddenly shines out from behind them, owing to “the wind clearing them away,” the effect is dazzling to the eye; so if God’s majesty, now hidden, were suddenly revealed in all its brightness, it would spread “darkness” over Job’s eyes, anxious as he is for it (cf. Note, v. 19). [UMBREIT.] It is because “now man sees not the bright sunlight” (God’s dazzling Majesty), owing to the intervening “clouds” (ch. 26. 9), that they dare to wish to “speak” before God (v. 20). Prelude to God’s appearance (ch. 38. 1). The words also hold true in a sense not intended by Elihu, but perhaps included by the Holy Ghost. Job and other sufferers cannot see the light of God’s countenance through the clouds of trial: but the wind will soon clear them off, and God shall appear again: let them but wait patiently, for He still shines, though for a time they see Him not (see Note 23). 22. Rather, golden splendour. MAURER translates gold. It is found in northern regions. But God cannot be “found out,” because of His “Majesty” (v. 23). Thus ch. 28. corresponds; English Version is simpler. the north—Brightness is chiefly associated with it (Note, 23. 9). Here, perhaps, because the north wind clears the air (Proverbs 25. 23). Thus this clause answers to the last of v. 21; as the second of this v. to the first of v. 21. Inverted parallelism. (See Isaiah 14. 13; Psalm 48. 2). with God—Rather, upon God, as a garment (Psalm 104. 1, 2). majesty—Splendour. 23. afflict—Oppressively, so as to “pervert judgment” as Job implied (Note 8. 3); but see end of Note 21, above. The reading “He answereth not,” i. e., gives no account of His dealings, is like a transcriber’s correction, from ch. 33. 13; Margin, 24. do—Rather, ought, wise—in their own conceits.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Ver. 1-41. 1. Jehovah appears unexpectedly in a whirlwind (already gathering ch. 37. 1, 2), the symbol of “judgment” (Psalm 50. 3, 4, &c.), to which Job had challenged him. He asks him now to get himself ready for the contest. Can he explain the phenomena of God’s natural government? How can he, then, hope to understand the principles of His moral government? God thus confirms Elihu’s sentiment, that submission to, not reasonings on, God’s ways is man’s part. This and the disciplinary design of trial to the godly is the great lesson of this book. He does not solve the difficulty by reference to future retribution: for this was not the immediate question; glimpses of that truth were already given in chs. 14. and 19., the full revelation of it being reserved for Gospel times: Yet even now we need to learn the lesson taught by Elihu and God in Job. 2. this—Job. counsel—Impugning my Divine wisdom in the providential arrangements of the universe. Such “words” (including those of the friends) rather obscure, than throw light on my ways. God is about to be Job’s Vindicator, but must first bring him to a right state of mind for receiving relief. 3. a man—Hero, ready for battle (1 Corinthians 16. 13), as he had wished (ch. 9. 35 13. 22; 31. 37). The robe, usually worn flowing, was girt up by a girdle when men ran, laboured, or fought (1 Peter 1. 13). 4. To understand the cause of things, man should have been present at their origin. The finite creature cannot fathom the infinite wisdom of the Creator (ch. 28. 12; 15. 7, 8). hast (knowest) understanding—(Proverbs 4. 1). 5. measures—Of its proportions. Image from an architect’s plans of a building. line—of measurement (Isaiah 28. 17). The earth is formed on an all-wise plan. 6. foundations—Not sockets, as Margin, fastened—Lit., made to sink, as a foundation-stone let down till it settles firmly in the clay (ch. 26. 7). Gravitation makes and keeps the earth a sphere. 7. So at the founding of Zerubbabel's temple (Ezra 3. 10-13). So hereafter at the completion of the Church, the temple of the Holy Ghost (Zechariah 4. 7); as at its foundation (Luke 2. 13, 14). 7. morning stars—Especially beautiful. The creation morn is appropriately associated with these, it being the commencement of this world's day. The stars are fig. said to sing God's praises, as in Psalm 19. 1; 143. 3. They are symbols of the angels, bearing the same relation to our earth, as angels do to us. Therefore they answer to "sons of God," or angels, in the parallel. See note, 25. 5. 8. doors—Flood-gates; these when opened caused the flood (Genesis 8. 2); or else, the shores. womb—of Chaos. The bowels of the earth. Image from childbirth (v. 8, 9; Ezekiel 32. 2; Micah 4. 10). Ocean at its birth was wrapped in clouds as its swaddling bands. 10. brake up for—i. e., appointed it. Shores are generally broken and abrupt cliffs. The Greek for shore means a broken place. I broke off or measured off for it my limit, i. e., the limit which I thought fit (ch. 26. 10). 11. stayed—Hebrew, a limit shall be set to. 12-15. Passing from creation to phenomena in the existing inanimate world. 12. hast thou—As God daily does. commanded the morning—To rise. since thy days—Since thou hast come into being. its place—It varies in its place of rising from day to day, and yet has its place each day according to fixed laws. 13. take hold of the ends, &c.—Spread itself over the earth to its utmost bounds in a moment. wicked—Who hate the light, and do their evil works in the dark (ch. 24. 13). shaken out of it—The corners (Hebrew, wings or skirts) of it, as of a garment, are taken hold of by the day spring, so as to shake off the wicked. 14. Explaining the first clause of v. 13, as v. 15 does the second clause. As the plastic clay presents the various figures impressed on it by a seal, so the earth, which in the dark was void of all form, when illuminated by the day spring, presents a variety of forms, hills, valleys, &c. "Turned" ("turns itself," Hebrew) alludes to the rolling cylinder seal, such as is found in Babylon, which leaves its impressions on the clay, as it is turned about: so the morning light rolling on over the earth. they stand—The forms of beauty, unfolded by the dawn, stand forth as a garment, in which the earth is clad. 15. their light—by which they work, viz., darkness, which is their day (ch. 24. 17), is extinguished by daylight. high—Rather, The arm uplifted for murder or other crime is broken; it falls down suddenly, powerless, through their fear of light. 16. springs—Fountains beneath the sea (Psalm 95. 4, 5). search—Rather, The inmost recesses, lit., that which is only found by searching, the deep caverns of ocean. 17. seen—The second clause heightens the thought in the first. Man during life does not even "see" the gates of the realm of the dead ("death," ch. 10. 21), much less are they "opened" to him. But those are "naked before God" (ch. 26. 6). 18. Hast thou—As God doth (ch. 28. 24). 19-38. The marvels in heaven. 19. "What is the way (to the place wherein) light dwelleth?" The origin of light and darkness. In Genesis 1, "light" is created distinct from, and previous to, light-emitting bodies, the luminaries of heaven. 20. Dost thou know its place so well as to be able to guide ("take" as in Isaiah 36. 17), it to (but UMBRETT, "reach it in") its own boundary, i. e., the limit between light and darkness (ch. 26. 10)? 21. Or without the interrogation, in an ironical sense. [UMBRETT.] then—When I created light and darkness (ch. 15. 7). 22. treasures—Store-houses, from which God draws forth snow and hail. Snow is vapour congealed in the air, before it is collected in drops large enough to form hail. Its shape is that of a crystal in endless variety of beautiful figures. Hail is formed by rain falling through dry cold air. 23. against the time of trouble—The time when I design to chastise men (Exodus 9. 18; Joshua 10. 11; Revelation 16. 21; Isaiah 23. 17; Psalm 18. 12, 13; Haggai 2. 17). 24. is . . . parted—Parts, so as to diffuse itself over the whole earth, though seeming to come from one point. Light travels from the sun to the earth, ninety millions of miles, in eight minutes. which scattereth—Rather, "And by what way the east wind (personified) spreads (scattereth) itself," &c. The light and east wind are associated together, as both come from one quarter, and often arise together (Jonah 4. 8). 25. waters—Rain falls, not in a mass on one spot, but in countless separate canals in the air marked out for them. way for the lightning—(Ch. 28. 26.) 26. Since rain falls also on places uninhabited by man, it cannot be that man guides its course. Such rain, though man cannot explain the reason for it, is not lost. God has some wise design in it. 27. As though the desolate ground thirsted for God's showers. Personification. The beauty imparted to the uninhabited desert pleases God, for whom primarily all things exist, and He has ulterior designs in it. 28. Can any visible origin of rain and dew be assigned by man? Dew is moisture, which was suspended in the air, but becomes condensed on reaching the—in the night—lower temperature of objects on the earth. 29. Ch. 37. 10. 30. The unfrozen waters are hid under the frozen, as with a covering of stone. frozen—Lit., is taken: the particles take hold of one another so as to cohere. 31. sweet influences—The joy diffused by spring, the time when the Pleiades appear. The Eastern poets, Hafiz, Sadi, &c., describe them as "brilliant rosettes." GESENIUS translates, "bands" or "knot," which answers better the parallelism. But English Version agrees better with the Hebrew. The seven stars are closely "bound" together (Note 9. 9). "Canst thou bind or loose the tie?" "Canst thou loose the bonds by which the constellation Orion (represented in the East as an impious giant chained to the sky) is held fast." (Note 9. 9.) 32. Canst thou bring forth from their places or houses (Mazzaloth, Margin, 2 Kings 23. 5; to which Mazzaloth here is equivalent) into the sky the signs of the Zodiac at their respective seasons—the twelve lodgings in which the sun successively stays, or appears, in the sky? Arcturus—Ursa Major. his sons—The three stars in his tail. Canst thou make them appear in the sky? (ch. 9. 9). The great and less Bear are called by the Arabs "Daughters of the Bier," the quadrangle being the bier, the three others the mourners. 33. ordinances—Which regulate the alternations of seasons, &c. (Genesis 8. 22). dominion—Controlling influence of the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, &c., on the earth (on the tides, weather) (Genesis 1. 16; Psalm 136. 7-9). 34. Jeremiah 14. 22; above ch. 22. 11, metaphorically. 35. Here we are—At thy disposal (Isaiah 6. 8). 36. inward parts . . . heart—But [UMBRETT] "dark clouds" ("shining phenomena") [MAURER]—"meteor," referring to the consultation of the stars as signs of weather by the husbandman (Ecclesiastes 11. 4). But Hebrew supports English Version. The connection is, "Who hath given thee the intelligence to comprehend in any degree the phenomena just specified?" heart—Not the usual Hebrew word, but one from a root to view; perception. 37. Who appoints by his wisdom the due measure of the clouds? stay—Rather, empty; lit., lay down or incline so as to pour out. "Bottles of heaven," rain-filled clouds. 38. groweth, &c.—Rather, pour itself into a mass by the rain, like molten metal; then translate 38, "Who is it that empties," &c., "when," &c.? English Version, however, is tenable: "Is caked into a mass" by heat, like molten metal, before the rain falls; "Who is it that can empty the rain vessels, and bring down rain at such a time?" (v. 38). 39. From this v. to ch. 39. 30, the instincts of animals. Is it thou that givest it the instinct to hunt its prey? (Psalm 104. 21.) appetite—Lit., life: which depends on the appetite (ch. 33. 20). 40. lie in wait—for their prey (Psalm 10. 9). 41. Luke 12. 24. Transition from the noble liveness to the croaking raven. Though man dislikes it, as of ill-omen, God cares for it, as for all His creatures.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Ver. 1-30. 1. Even wild beasts, cut off from all care of man, are cared for by God at their seasons of greatest need. Their instinct comes direct from God, and guides them to help themselves in parturition; the very time when the herdsman is most anxious for his herds. wild goats—Ibex (Psalm 104. 18; 1 Samuel 24. 2). hinds—Fawns; most timid and defenceless animals, yet cared for by God. 2.

They bring forth with ease and do not need to reckon the months of pregnancy, as the shepherd does in the case of his flocks. 3. "Bow themselves" in parturition; bend on their knees (1 Samuel 4. 19). bring forth—Lit., cause their young to cleave the womb and break forth. sorrows—Their young ones, the cause of their momentary pains. 4. are in good liking—In good condition, grow up strong. with corn—Rather, in the field, without man's care. return not—Being able to provide for themselves. 5. wild ass—Two different Hebrew words are here used for the same animal, the ass of the woods and the wild ass. (Note 6. 5; ch. 11. 12; 24. 5; Jeremiah 2. 24.) loosed the bands—Given its liberty to. Man can rob animals of freedom, but not, as God, give freedom, combined with subordination to fixed laws. 6. barren—lit., salt, i. e., unfruitful. (So Margin, Psalm 107. 34.) 7. multitude—Rather, din: he sets it at defiance, being far away from it in the freedom of the wilderness. driver—who urges on the tame ass to work. The wild ass is the symbol of uncontrolled freedom in the East; even kings have, therefore, added its name to them. 8. The range—Lit., searching, "that which it finds by searching is," &c. 9. unicorn—Pliny, Natural History 8. 21, mentions such an animal; its figure is found depicted in the ruins of Persepolis. The Hebrew reem conveys the idea of loftiness and power (cf. Ramah, Indian Ram, Latin Roma). The rhinoceros was perhaps the original type of the unicorn. The Arab rim is a two-horned animal. Sometimes "unicorn" or reem is a mere poetical symbol or abstraction; but the buffalo is the animal referred to here, from the contrast to the tame ox, used in ploughing, &c. (v. 10, 12). crib—(Isaiah 1. 3.) abide—Lit., pass the night. 10. his hand—fastened to the horns, as its chief strength lies in the head and shoulders. after thee—Obedient to thee; willing to follow, instead of being galled on before thee. 11. thy labour—Rustic work. 12. believe—Trust. seed—Produce (1 Samuel 8. 15). into thy barn—Rather, gather (the contents of) thy threshing-floor [MAURER]; the corn threshed on it. 13. Rather, "the wing of the ostrich hen—(lit., the crying bird; as the Arab name for it means song; referring to its night cries, ch. 30. 29; Micah 1. 8) vibrates joyously. Is it not like the quill and feathers of the pious bird" (the stork)? [UMBREIT.] The vibrating, quivering wing, serving for sail and oar at once, is characteristic of the ostrich in full course. Its white and black feathers in the wing and tail are like the stork's. But, unlike that bird, the symbol of parental love in the East, it with seeming want of natural (pious) affection deserts its young. Both birds are poetically called by descriptive instead of their usual appellative names. 14. Yet (unlike the stork) she leaveth, &c. Hence called by the Arabs the impious bird. However, the fact is, she lays her eggs with great care and hatches them, as other birds do; but in hot countries the eggs do not need so constant incubation; she therefore often leaves them; and sometimes forgets the place on her return; moreover, the outer eggs, intended for food, she feeds her young with; these eggs, lying separate in the sand, exposed to the sun, gave rise to the idea of her altogether leaving them. God describes her as she seems to man; implying, though she may seem foolishly to neglect her young, yet really she is guided by a sure instinct from God, as much as animals of instincts widely different. 16. On a slight noise often she forsakes her eggs, and returns not, as if she were "hardened towards her young." her labour—in producing eggs, is in vain (yet) she has no disquietude (about her young); unlike other birds, who, if one egg and another are taken away, will go on laying till their full number is made up. 17. wisdom—such as God gives to other animals, and to man (ch. 35. 11). The Arab proverb is, "foolish as an ostrich." Yet her very seeming want of wisdom is not without wise design of God, though man cannot see it; just as in the trials of the godly, which seem so unreasonable to Job, there lies hid a wise design. 18. Notwithstanding her deficiencies, she has distinguishing excellences. lifteth . . . herself—for running; she cannot mount in the air. GESSENIUS translates, lashes herself up to her course by flapping her wings. The old versions favour English Version, and the parallel "scorneth"

answers to her proudly "lifting up herself." 19. The allusion to "the horse," v. 18, suggests the description of him. Arab poets delight in praising the horse; yet it is not mentioned in the possessions of Job (chs. 1. and 42). It seems to have been at the time chiefly used for war, rather than "domestic purposes." thunder—poetically for, "he with arched neck inspires fear as thunder does." Translate, "Majesty." [UMBREIT.] Rather "the trembling, quivering mane," answering to the "vibrating wing" of the ostrich (note 13) [MAURER]. Mane in Greek also is from a root meaning fear. English Version is more sublime. 20. make . . . afraid—Rather, "canst thou (as I do) make him spring as the locust." So in Joel 2. 4 the comparison is between locusts and war-horses. The heads of the two are so like, that the Italians call the locusts cavaletta, "little horse." nostrils—Snorting furiously. 21. valley—Where the battle is joined. goeth on—Goeth forth (Numbers 1. 3; 21. 23). 23. quiver—for the arrows, which they contain, and which are directed "against him." glittering spear—lit., glittering of the spear, like "lightning of the spear" (Habakkuk 3. 11). shield—Rather, lance. 24. swalloweth—Fretting with impatience, he draws the ground towards him with his hoof, as if he would swallow it. The parallelism shows this to be the sense; not as MAURER, "scours over it." neither believeth—For joy. Rather, "he will not stand still, when the note of the trumpet" (soundeth). 25. saith—Poetically applied to his mettlesome neighing, whereby he shows his love of the battle. smelleth—Snuffeth; discerneth (Margin, Isaiah 11. 3). thunder—Thundering voice. 26. The instinct by which some birds migrate to warmer climes before winter. Rapid flying peculiarly characterizes the whole hawk genus. 27. eagle—It flies highest of all birds: thence called the bird of heaven. 28. abideth—Securely (Psalm 91. 1); it occupies the same abode mostly for life. crag—lit., tooth (Margin, 1 Samuel 14. 5). strong place—Citadel, fastness. 29. seeketh—Is on the lookout for. behold—the eagle descries its prey at an astonishing distance, by sight, rather than smell. 30. Quoted partly by Jesus Christ (Matthew 24. 28). The food of young eagles is the blood of victims brought by the parent, when they are still too feeble to devour flesh. slain—as the vulture chiefly feeds on carcasses, it is included probably in the genus eagle.

CHAPTER XL.

Ver. 1-24. GOD'S SECOND ADDRESS. He had paused for a reply, but Job was silent. 1. the Lord—Hebrew, JEHOVAH. 2. he that contendeth—As Job had so often expressed a wish to do. Or, rebuketh. Does Job now still (after seeing and hearing of God's majesty and wisdom) wish to set God right? answer it—viz., the questions I have asked. 3. Lord—JEHOVAH. 4. I am (too) vile (to reply). It is a very different thing to vindicate ourselves before God, from what it is before men. Job could do the latter, not the former. lay . . . hand upon . . . mouth—I have no plea to offer (ch. 21. 5; Judges 18. 19). 5. Once . . . twice—Oftentimes, more than once (ch. 33. 14, cf. with 29; Psalm 62. 11): "I have spoken," viz., against God. not answer—Not plead against thee. 6. the Lord—JEHOVAH. 7. (Note 38. 3.) Since Job has not only spoken against God, but accused Him of injustice, God challenges him to try, could he govern the world, as God by His power doth, and punish the proud and wicked (v. 7-14). 8. Wilt thou not only contend with, but set aside my judgment or justice in the government of the world. condemn—Declare me unrighteous, in order that thou mayest be accounted righteous (innocent; undeservingly afflicted). 9. arm—God's omnipotence (Isaiah 53. 1). thunder—God's voice (ch. 37. 4). 10. See, hast thou power and majesty like God's, to enable thee to judge and govern the world? 11. rage—Rather, pour out the redundant floods of, &c. behold—Try, canst thou, as God, by a mere glance abase the proud (Isaiah 2. 12, &c.)? 12. proud—high (Daniel 4. 37). in this place—On the spot; suddenly, before they can move from their place (note 31. 26; 36. 20). 13. (Isaiah 2. 10.) Abase and remove them out of the sight of men. blind . . . faces—i. e., Shut up their persons. [MAURER.] But it refers rather the custom of binding a cloth over the faces of persons about to be executed (ch. 9. 24; Esther 7. 8). in secret—Consign them to darkness. 14. confess—Rather, extol; "I also," who now censure thee. But since thou canst not do these works, thou must, instead of censuring, extol my government. thine own . . . hand . . . save—(Psalm 44. 3.) So as to eternal salvation by Jesus Christ (Isaiah 59. 16; 63. 5). 15-24. God shows that if Job cannot bring under control the lower animals (of which he selects the two most striking, behemoth on land, leviathan in the water), much less is he capable of governing the world. 15. behemoth—The description in part agrees with the hippopotamus, in part with the elephant, but exactly in all details with neither. It is rather a poetical personification of the great Pachydermata, or Herbivora (so "he eateth grass," &c.), the idea of the hippopotamus being predominant. In v. 17, "the tail like a cedar," hardly applies to the latter (so also v. 20, 23, "Jordan," a river which elephants alone could reach, but see note 2). On the other hand, 21, 22 are characteristic of the amphibious river-horse. So leviathan (the twisting animal), ch. 41. 1, is a generalized term for cetacea, pythons, saurians of the neighbouring seas and rivers, including the crocodile, which is the most prominent, and is often associated with the river-horse by old writers. "Behemoth" seems to be the Egyptian Pehemout, "water-ox," Hebraized, so called as being like an ox, whence the Italian "bombarino." with tree—As I made thyself. Yet how great the difference! The manifold wisdom and power of God! he eateth grass—Marvelous in an animal living so much in the water; also strange, that such a monster should not be carnivorous. 16. navel—Rather, muscles of his belly; the weakest point of the elephant, therefore it is not meant. 17. like a cedar—As the tempest bends the cedar, so it can move its smooth thick tail. [UMBREIT.] But the cedar implies straightness and length, such as do not apply to the river-horse's short tail, but perhaps to an extinct species of animal (see note v. 15). stones—Rather, thighs. wrapped—Firmly twisted together, like a thick rope. 18. strong pieces—Rather, tubes of copper. [UMBREIT.] 19. Chief of the works of God; so "ways" (ch. 26. 14; Proverbs 8. 22). can make his sword to approach—Rather, has furnished him with his sword (harpe), viz., the sickle-like teeth with which he cuts down grain. English Version, however, is lit. right. 20. The mountain is not his usual haunt. BOCHART says it is sometimes found there(?). beasts . . . play—A graphic trait: though armed with such teeth, he lets the beasts play near him unhurt, for his food is grass. 21. lieth—He leads an inactive life. shady trees—Rather, lotus bushes; as v. 22 requires. 22. Translate, lotus bushes; 23. Rather, "(Though) a river be violent (overflow), he trembleth not;" (for though living on land, he can live in the water too), he is secure, though a Jordan swell up to his mouth. "Jordan" is used for any great river (consonant with the "behemoth"), being a poetical generalization (note 15). The author cannot have been a Hebrew as UMBREIT asserts, or he would not adduce the Jordan, where there were no river-horses. He alludes to it as a name for any river, but not as one known to him, except by hearsay. 24. Rather, "will any take him by open force (lit., before his eyes), or pierce his nose with cords?" No; he can only be taken by gulle, and in a pitfall (ch. 41. 1, 2).

CHAPTER XLI.

Ver. 1-31. 1. leviathan—Lit., the twisted animal, gathering itself in folds; a synonym to the Thannin (ch. 3. 8, Margin; see Psalm 74. 14; type of the Egyptian tyrant; Psalm 104. 26; Isaiah 27. 1; the Babylonian tyrant). A poetical generalization for all cetacean, serpentine, and saurian monsters (Note 40. 15, hence all the description applies to no one animal); especially the crocodile; which is naturally described after the river-horse, as both are found in the Nile. 1. tongue . . . lettest down—The crocodile has no tongue, or a very small one cleaving to the lower jaw. But as in flashing the tongue of the fish draws the baited hook to it, God asks, Canst thou in like manner take leviathan? 2. hook—Rather, a rope of rushes. thorn—

Rather, a ring or hook. So wild beasts were led about when caught (Isaiah 37. 29; Ezekiel 29. 4); fishes also were secured thus, and thrown into the water to keep them alive. 3. soft words—That thou mayest spare his life. No; he is untamable. 4. Can he be tamed for domestic use (so ch. 39. 10-12)? 5. a bird—That is tamed. 6. Rather, partners (viz., in fishing). make a banquet—The parallelism rather supports UMBREIT, "Do partners (in trade) desire to purchase him? (so the Hebrew, Deuteronomy 2. 6). merchants—Lit., Canaanites, who were great merchants (Hosea 12. 7, Margin). His hide is not penetrable, as that of fishes. 8. If thou lay, &c., thou wilt have reason ever to remember, &c., and thou wilt never try it again. 8. the hope—Of taking him. cast down—With fear "at the (mere) sight of him." 17. fierce—Courageous. If a man dare attack one of my creatures (Genesis 49. 9; Numbers 24. 9), who will dare (as Job had wished) oppose himself (Psalm 2. 2) to me, the Creator? This is the main drift of the description of leviathan. 11. prevented—Done me a favour first: anticipated me with service (Psalm 21. 3). None can call me to account ("stand before me," v. 10) as unjust, because I have withdrawn favours from him (as in Job's case): for none has laid me under a prior obligation by conferring on me something which was not already my own. What can man give to Him who possesses all, including man himself? Man cannot constrain the creature to be his "servant" (v. 4), much less the Creator. 12. I will not conceal—A resumption of the description broken off by the digression, which formed an agreeable change. his power—Lit., the way, i. e., true proportion or expression of his strength (so Hebrew, Deuteronomy 19. 4). comely proportion—Lit., the comeliness of his structure (his apparatus: so "suit of apparel" Judges 17. 10). [MAURER.] UMBREIT translates, "his armour." But that follows after. 13. discover—Rather, uncover the surface of his garment (skin, ch. 10. 11): strip off the hard outer coat with which the inner skin is covered. with-Rather, within his double jaws, lit., bridle: hence that into which the bridle is put, the double row of teeth; but "bridle" is used to imply that none dare put his hand in to insert a bridle where in other animals it is placed (v. 4; ch. 39. 10). 14. doors of . . . face—His mouth. His teeth are sixty in number, larger in proportion than his body, some standing out, some serrated, fitting into each other like a comb. [BOCHART.] 15. Rather, his furrows of shields (as "tubes," "channels," Note 40. 18), are, &c., i. e., the rows of scales, like shields covering him: he has seventeen such rows. shut up—Firmly closed together. A musket ball cannot penetrate him, save in the eye, throat and belly. 18. Translate, "his sneezing causeth a light to shine." Amphibious animals, emerging after having long held their breath under water, respire by violently expelling the breath like one sneezing: in the effort the eyes which are usually directed towards the sun, seem to flash fire; or it is the expelled breath that, in the sun, seems to emit light. eyelids of morning—The Egyptian hieroglyphics paint the eyes of the crocodile as the symbol for morning, because the eyes appear the first thing, before the whole body emerges from the deep. [HOR. HERC., 1. 65. BOCHART.] 19. burning lamps—Torches, viz., in respiring (v. 18), seem to go out. 20. seething—Boiling: lit., blown under, under which a fire is blown. 21. kindleth coals—Poetical imagery (Psalm 18. 8). 22. remaneth—Abideth permanently. His chief strength is in the neck. sorrow—Anxiety or dismay personified. is turned into joy—Rather, danceth, exulteth; wherever he goes, he spreads terror "before him." 23. flakes—Rather, dewlaps. That which falls down (Margin). They are "joined" fast and firm, together, not hanging loose, as in the ox. are firm—UMBREIT and MAURER, "Are spread." In themselves—Rather, upon him. 24. heart—BOCHART, "in large beasts which are less acute in feeling, there is great firmness of the heart, and slower motion." [BOCHART.] The nether millstone, on which the upper turns, is especially hard. 25. he—The crocodile: a type of the awe which the Creator inspires when He rises in wrath. breakings—viz., of the mind, i. e., terror. purify themselves—Rather, they wander from the way, i. e., flee away bewildered.

[MAURER and UMBRETT.] 26. cannot hold—On his hard skin. habergeon—Coat of mail: avail must be taken by zeugma out of "hold," as the verb in the second clause: "hold" cannot apply to the "coat of mail." 27. iron . . . brass—viz., weapons. 28. arrow—Lit., son of the bow; Oriental imagery (Lamentations 3. 13; Margin). stubble—Arrows produce no more effect than it would to throw stubble at him. 29. darts—Rather, clubs; darts have been already mentioned. 30. stones—Rather, potsherds, i. e., the sharp and pointed scales on the belly, like broken pieces of pottery. sharp-pointed things—Rather, a threshing instrument, but not on the fruits of the earth, but "on the mire;" Irony. When he lies on the mire, he leaves the marks of his scales so imprinted on it, that one might fancy a threshing instrument with its sharp teeth had been drawn over it (Isaiah 28. 27). 31. Whenever he moves. sea—The Nile (Isaiah 19. 5; Nahum 3. 8). pot of ointment—The vessel in which it is mixed. Appropriate to the crocodile, which emits a musky smell. 32. path—The foam on his track. hoary—As hair of the aged. 33. who—Being one who, &c. 34. beholdeth—As their superior. children of pride—The proud and fierce beasts. So ch. 23. 8; Hebrew, sons of pride. To humble the pride of man, and to teach implicit submission, is the aim of Jehovah's speech and of the book: therefore with this as to leviathan, the type of God in His lordship over creation, he closes.

CHAPTER XLII.

Ver. 1-6. JOB'S PENITENT REPLY. 2. In the first clause he owns God to be omnipotent over nature, as contrasted with his own feebleness, which God had proved (ch. 40. 15; 41. 34); in the second, that God is supremely just (which, in order to be governor of the world, He must needs be) in all His dealings, as contrasted with his own vileness (v. 6), and incompetence to deal with the wicked as a just judge (ch. 40. 8-14). thought—Purpose, as in ch. 17. 11; but it is usually applied to evil devices (ch. 21. 27; Psalm 10. 2); the ambiguous word is designedly chosen to express, that, whilst to Job's finite view, God's plans seem bad, to the All-wise One they continue unhindered in their development, and will at last be seen to be as good as they are infinitely wise. No evil can emanate from the Parent of good (James 1. 13, 17); but it is His prerogative to overrule evil to good. 3. I am the man! Job in God's own words (ch. 38. 2) expresses his deep and humble penitence. God's word concerning our guilt should be engraven on our hearts and form the groundwork of our confession. Most men in confessing sin palliate rather than confess. Job in omitting "by words" (ch. 38. 2), goes even further than God's accusation. Not merely my words, but my whole thoughts and ways were "without knowledge." too wonderful—I rashly denied that thou hast any fixed plan in governing human affairs, merely because thy plan was "too wonderful" for my comprehension. 4. When I said, "Hear," &c., Job's demand (ch. 13. 22) convicted him of being "without knowledge." God alone could speak thus to Job, not Job to God: therefore he quotes again God's words as the groundwork of retracting his own foolish words. 5. hearing of ear—(Psalm 18. 44, Margin). Hearing and seeing are often in antithesis (ch. 29. 11; Psalm 18. 8). seeth—not God's face (Exodus 33. 20), but his presence in the veil of a dark cloud (ch. 38. 1). Job implies also that, besides this literal seeing, he now saw spiritually what he had indistinctly taken on hearsay before God's infinite wisdom. He "now" proves this; he had seen in a literal sense before, at the beginning of God's speech, but he had not seen spiritually till "now" at its close. 6. myself—Rather, "I abhor," and retract the rash speeches I made against thee, v. 3, 4 [UMBRETT].

7-17. EPILOGUE, in prose. 7. to Eliphaz—Because he was the foremost of the three friends; their speeches were but the echo of his. right—Lit., well-grounded, sure and true. Their spirit towards Job was unkindly, and to justify themselves in their unkindness they used false arguments (ch. 13. 7) (viz., that calamities always prove peculiar guilt); therefore, though it was "for God" they spake thus falsely, God "reproves" them, as Job said He would (ch. 13. 10). like Job—Job had spoken rightly in relation to them and their argument, denying their theory, and the fact which they alleged, that he was peculiarly guilty and a hypocrite; but wrongly in relation to God, when he fell into the opposite extreme of almost denying all guilt. This extreme he has now repented of, and therefore God speaks of him as now altogether "right." 8. seven—(See Introduction.) The number offered by the Gentile prophet (Numbers 23. 1). Job plainly lived before the legal priesthood, &c. The patriarchs acted as priests for their families; and sometimes as praying mediators (Genesis 20. 17), thus foreshadowing the true Mediator (1 Timothy 2. 5), but sacrifice accompanies, and is the groundwork on which the mediation rests. him—Rather, "His person (face) only" (note 22. 30). The "person" must be first accepted, before God can accept his offering and work (Genesis 4. 4); that can be only through Jesus Christ. folly—Impiety (ch. 1. 22; 2. 10). 9. The forgiving spirit of Job foreshadows the love of Jesus Christ and of Christians to enemies (Matthew 5. 44; Luke 23. 34; Acts 7. 60; 16. 24, 28, 30, 31). 10. turned . . . captivity—Proverbial for restored, or amply indemnified him for all he had lost (Ezekiel 16. 53; Psalm 14. 7; Hosea 6. 11). Thus the future vindication of man, body and soul, against Satan (ch. 1. 9-12), at the resurrection (ch. 19. 25-27), has its earnest and adumbration in the temporal vindication of Job at last by Jehovah in person. thrice—So to the afflicted literal and spiritual Jerusalem (Isaiah 40. 2; 60. 7; 61. 7; Zechariah 9. 12). As in Job's case, so in that of Jesus Christ, the glorious recompense follows the "intercession" for enemies (Isaiah 53. 12). 11. It was Job's complaint in his misery that his "brethren," &c., were "estranged" from him (ch. 19. 13); these now return with the return of his prosperity (Proverbs 14. 20; 19. 6, 7); the true friend loveth at all times (Proverbs 17. 17; 18. 24). "Swallow friends leave in the winter and return with the spring." [HENRY.] eat bread—in token of friendship (Psalm 41. 9). piece of money—Presents are usual in visiting a man of rank in the East, especially after a calamity (2 Chronicles 32. 23). Hebrew, Kesjod MAGEE translates, a lamb (the medium of exchange taken before money was used), as it is in Margin of Genesis 33. 19; Joshua 24. 32. But it is from the Arabic Kasat, "weighed out" [UMBRETT], not coined; so Genesis 42. 35; 33. 19; cf. with Genesis 23. 15, makes it likely it was equal to four shekels; Hebrew kashat, "pure," viz., metal. The term, instead of the usual "shekel," &c., is a mark of antiquity. ring—whether for the nose or ear (Genesis 35. 4; Isaiah 3. 21). Much of the gold in the East, in the absence of banks, is in the shape of ornaments. 12. Probably by degrees, not all at once. 13. The same number as before; perhaps by a second wife; in ch. 19. 17 his wife is last mentioned. 14. Names significant of his restored prosperity (Genesis 4. 25; 5. 20). Jemima, day-light, after his "night" of calamity; but MAURER, "a dove." Kezia, cassia, an aromatic herb (Psalm 45. 8), instead of his offensive breath and ulcers. Keren-happuch, "horn of stibium," a paint with which females dyed their eyelids; in contrast to his "horn defiled in the dust" (ch. 16. 15). The names also imply the beauty of his daughters. 15. inheritance among . . . brethren—An unusual favour in the East to daughters, who, in the Jewish law, only inherited, if there were no sons (Numbers 27. 8), a proof of wealth and unanimity. 16. LXX. make Job live 170 years after his calamity, and 240 in all. This would make him seventy at the time of his calamity, which added to 140 in Hebrew text makes up 280; a little more than the age (205) of Terah, father of Abraham, perhaps his contemporary. Man's length of life gradually shortened, till it reached threescore and ten in Moses' time (Psalm 90. 10). 16. sons' sons—A proof of Divine favour (Genesis 50. 23; Psalm 128. 6; Proverbs 17. 6). 17. full of days—Fully sated and contented with all the happiness that life could give him; realizing what Eliphaz had painted as the lot of the godly (ch. 5. 26; Psalm 91. 16; Genesis 25. 8; 35. 29). LXX. adds, "It is written, that he will rise again with those whom the Lord will raise up." Cf. Matthew 27. 52, 53, from which it perhaps was derived spuriously.

BOOK OF PSALMS.
INTRODUCTION.

THE Hebrew title of this book is [Tehillim] praises or hymns, for a leading feature in its contents is praise, though the word occurs in the title of only one Psalm (145). The Greek title (in the Septuagint, a translation made 200 years before Christ) is psalmoi, whence our word Psalms. This corresponds to the Hebrew word mizmot by which sixty-five Psalms are designated in their inscriptions, and which the Syriac, a language like the Hebrew, uses for the whole book. It means, as does also the Greek name, an ode, or song, whose singing is accompanied by an instrument, particularly the harp (cf. 1 Chronicles 16. 4-8; 2 Chronicles 5. 12, 13). To some Psalms, the Hebrew word (shir) a song, is prefixed. Paul seems to allude to all these terms in Ephesians 5. 19, "singing . . . in psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs."

TITLES.—To more than a hundred Psalms are prefixed inscriptions, which give one or more (and in one case, 60th, all) of these particulars: the direction to the musician, the name of the author or the instrument, the style of the music or of the poetry, the subject or occasion. The authority of these inscriptions has been disputed by some writers. They say that the earliest translators, as the Greek and Syriac, evince a disregard for their authority, by variations from a proper translation of some, altering others, and, in several instances, supplying titles to Psalms which, in Hebrew, had none. It is also alleged, that the subject of a Psalm, as given in the title, is often inconsistent with its contents. But those translators have also varied from a right translation of many passages in the Bible, which all agree to be of good authority; and the alleged inconsistency may be shown, on more accurate investigation, not to exist. The admitted antiquity of these inscriptions, on the other hand, and even their obscurity, raise a presumption in their favour, while such prefaces to a composition accord with the usages of that age and part of the world, cf. Isaiah 83. 9.

"The Chief Musician" was the superintendent of the music, cf. 1 Chronicles 15. 21, Marg. To prefixed to this, means, pertaining to in his official character. This inscription is found in 53 Psalms, and is attached to Habakkuk's prayer, Habakkuk 3. The same Hebrew preposition is prefixed to the name of the author, and translated of, as "a Psalm of David," "of Asaph," except that to "the sons of Korah," it is translated for, which is evidently wrong, as the usual direction, "to the chief musician," is given, and no other authorship intimated. On the apparent exception to this last remark, see below, and Psalm 83., title. The explanations of other particulars in the titles will be given as they occur.

AUTHORS.—This book is usually called "The Psalms of David," he being the only author mentioned in the New Testament, Luke 20. 42, and his name appearing in more titles than that of any other writer. Besides about one-half of the Psalms in which it thus appears, the 2d and 95th are ascribed to him, Acts 4. 25, and Hebrews 4. 7. He was probably the author of many others which appear without a name. He used great efforts to beautify the worship of the sanctuary. Among the 238 Levites he appointed for singing and performing instrumental music, we find mentioned the "sons of Korah," 1 Chronicles 9. 19; including Heman, 1 Chronicles 6. 33-38; and also Asaph, 39-44; and Ethan, 15-19. God was doubtless pleased to endow these men with the inspiration of His Spirit, so that they used those poetic talents which their connection with the kindred art of music had led them to cultivate, in the production of compositions like those of their king and patron. To Asaph are ascribed twelve Psalms; to the sons of Korah, eleven, including the 88th, which is also ascribed to Heman, that being the only instance in which the name of the "son" (or descendant) is mentioned; and to Ethan, one. Solomon's name appears before the 72d and 127th; and that of Moses before the 90th. Special questions respecting authorship will be explained as they arise.

CONTENTS.—As the book contains 150 independent compositions, it is not susceptible of any logical analysis. The Jews having divided it into five books, corresponding to the Five Books of Moses (1st, 1-42; 2d, 43-72; 3d, 73-89; 4th, 90-106; 5th, 107-150), many attempts have been made to discover, in this division, some critical or practical value, but in vain. Sundry efforts have been made to classify the Psalms by subject. That of "Angus' Bible Hand-Book" is perhaps the most useful, and is appended.

Still the Psalms have a form and character peculiar to themselves; and with individual diversities of style and subject, they all assimilate to that form, and together constitute a consistent system of moral truth. They are all poetical, and of that peculiar parallelism (Introduction to Poetical Books) which distinguished Hebrew poetry. They are all lyrical, or songs adapted to musical instruments, and all religious lyrics, or such as were designed to be used in the sanctuary worship.

The distinguishing feature of the Psalms is their devotional character. Whether their matter be didactic, historical, prophetic, or practical, it is made the ground or subject of prayer, or praise, or both. The doctrines of theology and precepts of pure morality are here inculcated. God's nature, attributes, perfections, and works of creation, providence, and grace, are unfolded. In the sublimest conceptions of the most exalted verse, His glorious supremacy over the principalities of heaven, earth, and hell, and His holy, wise, and powerful control of all material and immaterial agencies, are celebrated. The great covenant of grace resting on the fundamental promise of a Redeemer, both alike the provisions of God's exhaustless mercy, is set forth in respect of the doctrines of regeneration by the Spirit, forgiveness of sins, repentance toward God, and faith toward Jesus Christ, while its glorious results, involving the salvation of men "from the ends of the earth," are proclaimed in believing, prophetic prayer and thankful praise. The personal history of the authors, and especially David's in its spiritual aspects, is that of God's people generally. Christian biography is edifying only as it is truth illustrated in experience, such as God's Word and Spirit produce. It may be factitious in origin and of doubtful authenticity. But here the experience of the truly pious is detailed, under Divine influence, and "in words which the Holy Ghost" taught. The whole inner life of the pious man is laid open, and Christians of all ages have here the temptations, conflicts, perplexities, doubts, fears, penitent moanings, and overwhelming griefs on the one hand, and the joy and hope of pardoning mercy, the victory over the seductions of false-hearted flatterers, and deliverance from the power of Satan on the other, with which to compare their own spiritual exercises. Here, too, are the fruits of that sovereign mercy, so often sought in earnest prayer, and when found, so often sung in rapturous joy, exhibited by patience in adversity, inodoration in prosperity, zeal for God's glory, love for man, justice to the oppressed, holy contempt for the proud, magnanimity towards enemies, faithfulness towards friends, delight in the prosperity of Zion, and believing prayer for her enlargement and perpetuity.

The historical summaries of the Psalms are richly instructive. God's choice of the patriarchs, the sufferings of the Israelites in Egypt, their exodus, temptations of God, rebellions and calamities in the wilderness, settlement in Canaan, backslidings and reformations, furnish illustrations of God's providential government of His people, individually and collectively, tending to exalt His adorable grace and abase human pride. But the promises and prophecies connected with these summaries, and elsewhere presented in the Psalms, have a far wider reach, exhibiting the relations of the book to the great theme of promise and prophecy:

THE MESSIAH AND HIS KINGDOM.—David was God's chosen servant to rule His people, as the head at once of the State and the Church, the lineal ancestor, "according to the flesh," of His adorable Son, and His type, in His official relations, both in suffering and in triumph. Generally, David's trials by the ungodly depicted the trials of Christ, and his final success the success of Christ's kingdom. Typically, he uses language describing his feelings, which only finds its full meaning in the feelings of Christ. As such it is quoted and applied in the New Testament. And farther, in view of the great promise (2 Samuel 7.) to him and his seed, to which such frequent reference is made in the Psalms, David was inspired to know, that though his earthly kingdom should perish, his spiritual would ever endure, in the power, beneficence, and glory of Christ's. In repeating and amplifying that promise, he speaks not only as a type, but "being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne," he "foretold the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow. His incarnation, humiliating sorrows, persecution, and cruel death are disclosed in the plaintive cries of a despairing sufferer; and His resurrection and ascension, His eternal priesthood, His royal dignity, His prophetic office, the purchase and bestowal of the gifts of the Spirit, the conversion of the nations, the establishment, increase, and perpetuity of the Church, the end of time, and the blessedness of the righteous who acknowledge, and the ruin of the wicked who reject, this King in Zion, are predicted in the language of assured confidence and joy." While these great themes have supplied the people of God with a popular theology and a guide in religious experience and Christian morality, clothed in the language of devotion, they have provided an inspired liturgy in which the pious, of all creeds and sects, have, for nearly three thousand years, poured out their prayers and praises. The pious Jew, before the coming of Christ, mourned over the adversity, or celebrated the future glories, of Zion, in the words of her ancient king. Our Saviour, with his disciples, sung one of these hymns on the night on which he was betrayed: he took from one the words in which he entered the dreadful sorrows of his soul, and died with those of another on his lips. Paul and Silas in the dungeon, primitive Christians in their covert places of worship, or the costly churches of a later day, and the scattered and feeble Christian flocks in the prevalence of darkness and error through the Middle Ages, fed their faith and warmed their love with these consoling songs. Now, throughout the Christian world, in untold forms of version, paraphrase, and imitation, by Papists and Protestants, Prelatists and Presbyterians—Independents, Baptists, Methodists—men of all lands and all creeds, in public and private worship, God is still adored in the sentiments expressed in these venerable Psalms. From the tone of sorrow and suffering which pervade their earlier portions we are gradually borne on amid alternate conflicts and triumphs, mournful complaints and awakening confidence; as we approach the close the tones of sorrow grow feebler, and those of praise wax louder and stronger—till, in the exulting strains of the last Psalm, the chorus of earth mingles with the hallelujahs of the multitude, which no man can number, in the sanctuary above.

Angus' or Bickersteth's arrangement may be profitably used as a guide for finding a Psalm on a special topic. It is a little modified, as follows:

1. Didactic.—Good and bad men, Psalm 1, 5, 7, 9-12, 14, 15, 17, 24, 25, 32, 34, 36, 37, 50, 52, 53, 58, 73, 75, 84, 91, 92, 94, 112, 121, 125, 127, 128, 133; God's Law, Psalm 19, 119; Human life vain, Psalm 30, 49, 90; Duty of Rulers, Psalm 82, 101.—2. Note.—The compiler of the following notes has omitted all references to authors, as needlessly encumbering the commentary. He has had before him the works of Calvin, Scott, Poole, Ainsworth, Cobbin, Geice, Vatablus, Tholuck, J. H. Michaelis, Rosenmuller, and Alexander. To the two last named he has been particularly indebted for the parallel passages. He has made a free use of the views advanced by these authors, and claims no credit for any thing in the work except the conciseness united with fullness of exposition. Whoever attempts it will find it far easier to write a long commentary than a brief one.

PSALM I.

Ver. 1-6. The character and condition, and the present and future destiny, of the pious and the wicked are described and contrasted, teaching that true piety is the source of ultimate happiness, and sin of misery. As this is a summary of the teachings of the whole book, this Psalm, whether designedly so placed or not, forms a suitable preface.

1. Blessed—lit., oh, the happiness—an exclamation of strong emotion, as if resulting from reflecting on the subject. The use of the plural may denote fullness and variety (2 Chronicles 9. 7). counsel . . . way . . . seat—With their corresponding verbs, mark gradations of evil, as acting on the principles, cultivating the society, and permanently conforming to the conduct of the wicked, who are described by three terms, of which the last is indicative of the boldest impiety (cf. Psalm 26. 4. 5; Jeremiah 15. 17). 2. law—all of God's word then written, especially the books of Moses (cf. Psalm 119. 1, 55, 97, &c.). 3. like a tree—(Jeremiah 17. 7, 8.) planted—settled, fast, by—or over, the rivers—canals for irrigation, shall prosper— lit., make prosper, brings to perfection. The basis of this condition and character is given (Psalm 32. 1). 4. not so—either as to conduct or happiness. like the chaff—which by Eastern modes of winnowing against the wind, was utterly blown away. 6. stand in the judgment—be acquitted. They shall be driven from among the good (Matthew 25. 45, 46). 6. knoweth the way—attends to and provides for them (Psalm 101. 6; Proverbs 12. 10; Hosea 13. 5). way of the wicked—all their plans will end in disappointment and ruin (Psalm 37. 13; 146. 8; Proverbs 4. 19).

PSALM II.

Ver. 1-12. The number and authorship of this Psalm are stated (Acts 4. 25; 13. 33). Though the warlike events of David's reign may have suggested its imagery, the scenes depicted, and the subjects presented can only find a fulfillment in the history and character of Jesus Christ, to which, as above cited and Hebrews 1. 5; 5. 5, the New Testament writers most distinctly testify. In a most animated and highly poetical style, the writer, in "four stanzas of three verses each," sets forth the inveterate and furious, though futile, hostility of men to God and His anointed, God's determination to carry out His purpose, that purpose as stated more fully by His Son, the establishment of the Mediatorial kingdom, and the imminent danger of all who resist, and the blessing of all who welcome this mighty and triumphant king.

1. Why do the heathen, &c.—Beholding, in prophetic vision, the peoples and nations, as if in a tumultuous assembly, raging with a fury like the raging of the sea, designing to resist God's government, the writer breaks forth into an exclamation in which are mingled surprise at their folly, and indignation at their rebellion. heathen—nations generally, not as opposed to Jews, people—lit., peoples, or races of men. 2. The kings and rulers lead on their subjects, set themselves—take a stand, take counsel—lit., sit together, denoting their deliberation. Anointed—Hebrew, Messiah; Greek, Christ (John 1. 41). Anointing, as an emblem of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, was conferred on prophets, Isaiah 61. 1; priests, Exodus 30. 30; and kings, 1 Samuel 10. 1; 16. 13; 1 Kings 1. 39. Hence this title well suited Him who holds all these offices, and was generally used by the Jews before His coming, to denote Him (Daniel 9. 26). While the prophet has in view men's opposition generally, he here depicts it in its culminating aspect as seen in the events of Christ's great trial. Pilate and Herod, and the rulers of the Jews (Matthew 27. 1; Luke 23. 1-25), with the furious mob, are vividly portrayed. 3. The rebellious purposes of men are more distinctly announced by this representation of their avowal in words, as well as actions. bands and cords—denote the restraints of government. 4. By a figure whose boldness is only allowable to an inspired writer, God's conduct and language in view of this opposition are now related. He that sitteth in the heavens—enthroned in quiet dignities (cf. Psalm 29. 10; Isaiah 40. 22). shall laugh—in supreme contempt; their vain rage excites His derision. He is still the Lord, lit., Sovereign, though they rebel. 5. Then shall he speak—His righteous indignation as well as contempt is roused. For God to speak is for Him to act, for what He resolves He will do (Genesis 1. 3; Psalm 33. 9). vex them—agitate or terrify them (Psalm 83. 15). 6. The purpose here declared, in its execution, involves their overthrow. yet—lit., and, in an adversative sense. I have set—anointed, or firmly placed, with allusion in the Hebrew to "casting an image in a mould." The sense is not materially varied in either case. my king—appointed by me and for me (Numbers 27. 18). on my holy hill of Zion—Zion, selected by David as the abode of the ark, and the seat of God's visible residence, as (1 Kings 8. 1) also of David, the head of the Church and nation, and type of Christ, was called holy, and the Church itself came to be thus named (Psalm 9. 11; 51. 13; 99. 2; Isaiah 8. 18; 13. 7, &c.). 7. The King thus constituted declares the fundamental law of His kingdom, in the avowal of His Sonship, a relation involving His universal dominion. this day have I begotten thee—as 2 Samuel 7. 14, "he shall be my son," is a solemn recognition of this relation. The interpretation of this passage to describe the inauguration of Christ as Mediatorial King, by no means impugns the Eternal Sonship of His Divine nature. In Acts 13. 33, Paul's quotation does not imply an application of this passage to the resurrection; for raised up in v. 32 is used in the sense of Acts 2. 30; 3. 22, &c., to denote bringing him into being as a man; and not that of resurrection, which it has only when, as in v. 34, allusion is made to His death (Romans 1. 4), which says He was declared as to His Divine nature to be the Son of God, by the resurrection, only teaches that that event manifested a truth already existing. A similar recognition of His Sonship is introduced Hebrews 5. 5, by these ends, and by others in Matthew 3. 17; 17. 5. 8. The hopes of the rebels are thus overthrown, and not only so, the kingdom they opposed is destined to be coextensive with the earth. heathen—or, nations (v. 1). and the uttermost parts of the earth—Psalm 22. 27, denote universality. 9. His enemies shall be subject to His terrible power (Job 4. 9; 2 Thessalonians 2. 8), as His people to His grace (Psalm 110. 2, 3). rod of iron—denotes severity (Revelation 2. 27). a potter's vessel—when shivered cannot be mended, which will describe utter destruction. 10-12. kings . . . judges—for rulers generally (Psalm 148. 11), who have been leaders in rebellion should be examples of penitent submission, and with fear for His terrible judgments, mingled with trust in His mercy, acknowledge—kiss—the authority of the Son. perish from the way—i. e., is suddenly and hopelessly. kindled but a little—or, in a little time. put their trust in him—or take refuge in Him (Psalm 5. 11). Men still cherish opposition to Christ in their hearts, and evince it in their lives. Their ruin, without such trust, is inevitable (Hebrews 10. 29), while their happiness in His favour is equally sure.

PSALM III.

Ver. 1-8. For the historical occasion mentioned, cf. 2 Samuel chaps. 15-17. David, in the midst of great distress, with filial confidence, implores God's aid, and, anticipating relief, offers praise.

1. Lord . . . increased—The extent of the rebellion (2 Samuel 15. 13) surprises and grieves him. 2. say of my soul—i. e., of me (cf. Psalm 25. 3). This use of soul is common; perhaps it arose from regarding the soul as man's chief part. no help . . . in God—rejected by Him. This is the bitterest reproach for a pious man, and denotes a spirit of malignant triumph. Selah—This word is of very obscure meaning. It probably denotes rest or pause, both as to the music and singing, intimating something emphatic in the sentiment (cf. Psalm 9. 16). 3. But—lit., and (Psalm 2. 6). He repels the reproach by avowing his continued trust. shield—a favourite and often-used figure for protection. my glory—its source. lifter up of mine head—one who raises me from despondency. 4. cried . . . heard—Such has my experience. The last verb denotes a gracious hearing or answering. out of (or, from) his holy hill—Zion (Psalm 2. 6), His visible earthly residence. 5. the Lord sustained me—lit., will sustain me, as if his language or thought when he laid down, and the reason of his composure. 6. ten thousands of people—or, myriads, any very great number (cf. 2 Samuel 16. 18). 7. Arise, O Lord—God is figuratively represented as asleep to denote His apparent indifference (Psalm 7. 6). The use of cheek-bone and teeth represents his enemies as fierce, like wild beasts ready to devour (Psalm 27. 2), and smiting their cheek-bone (1 Kings 22. 24) denotes violence and insult. thou hast broken—God took his part, utterly depriving the enemy of power to injure. 8. An ascription of praise to a delivering God, whose favour is an efficient benefit.

PSALM IV.

Ver. 1-3. On Neginoth, i. e., stringed instruments, as the kind of musical accompaniment. On other parts of title, cf. Introduction. The historical occasion was probably the same as that of the foregoing. The writer, praying for further relief, admonishes his enemies of the vanity of attacking God's servant, exhorts them to repentance, and avows his confidence and peace in God's favour.

1. Hear—as Ps. 3. 4. God my righteousness—or, my righteous God, as my holy hill (Psalm 2. 6), who will act toward me on righteous principles. thou hast enlarged—expresses relief afforded in opposition to distress, which is expressed by a word denoting straits or pressure. Past favour is a ground of hope for future. 2. sons of men—Men of note or prominence (cf. 2 Chronicles 21. 9). turn my glory—or, royal dignity. to shame—or reproach. vanity—a foolish and hopeless enterprise (Psalm 2. 1). leasing—a lie. 3. godly—an object as well as subject of Divine favour (cf. Psalm 105. 14, 15). 4. stand in awe—(Ephesians 4. 26), from Septuagint—be angry. Both clauses are qualified by not. 5. Not only repent, but manifest penitence by sacrifices of righteousness or righteous sacrifices, &c. 6. 7. contrast true with vain confidence. light of countenance—figure for favour (Numbers 6. 26; Psalm 44. 3; 81. 16). corn and wine—lit., new corn and wine. increased—an abundant harvest giving great joy (Isaiah 9. 3). 8. both lay me down, &c.—or will lie down at once, and sleep in sure confidence and quiet repose (Psalm 3. 5).

PSALM V.

Ver. 1-12. Upon Nehiioth—flutes or wind instruments. The writer begs to be heard, on the ground of God's regard for His covenant people and true worshippers as contrasted with His holy hatred to the wicked. He prays for Divine guidance, on account of his watchful, malignant and deceitful enemies; and for their destruction as being also God's enemies. At the same time he expresses his confidence that God will extend aid to His people.

1. meditation—moanings of that half-uttered form to which deep feeling gives rise—groanings, as Romans 8. 26, 27. 2. Hearken—incline (the ear, Psalm 10. 17, cf. Psalm 61. 2)—give close attention. my cry—i. e., for help (Psalm 61. 2; Jeremiah 8. 19). my King—thus by covenant relation interested in my cause. 3. direct—lit., set in order, as the shewbread was placed or set in order (Exodus 40. 23). 4. For, &c.—God only regards sincere worshippers. evil—or, the evil man. dwell—lodge, remain under protection. 5. foolish—vainglorious and insolent. iniquity—especially such as denotes a negation, or defect, i. e., of moral principle. 6. leasing—a lie. the bloody . . . man—lit., man of blood—murderer. 7. But—(as Psalm 2. 6) lit., and. house—(1 Chronicles 9. 23), the tabernacle. temple—lit., palace, applied to God's residence, the Holy of Holies (1 Samuel 3. 3; 2 Samuel 22. 7); the inner part of the tabernacle. toward—not in, the high priest alone was allowed to enter. 8. enemies—lit., watchers (Psalm 27. 11), hence special need of guidance. in thy righteousness—an attribute implying faithfulness in promises as well as threatenings. make thy way straight—i. e., make the way of providence plain. 9. The wicked are not reliable, because by nature full of wickedness, or lit., wickednesses, of every kind (Romans 8. 7). sepulchre—a dwelling-place of corruption, emitting moral putridness. flatter—or, make smooth. their tongue—speaks deceitfully. 10. Destroy—or, condemn them to destruction as guilty. 11. defendest—(cf. Marginal). love thy name—thy manifested perfections (Psalm 9. 10). 12. with favour—or, acceptance, alluding to the favour shown to an acceptable offering and worshipper (Leviticus 7. 18; 19. 7). shield—(cf. Psalm 3. 3).

PSALM VI.

Ver. 1-10. On Neginoth (cf. Psalm 4) upon Sheminith—the eighth—an instrument for the eighth key—or, more probably, the bass, as it is contrasted with Alamoth (the treble, Psalm 46.) in 1 Chronicles 15. 20, 21. In deep affliction the Psalmist appeals to God's mercy for relief from chastisement, which otherwise must destroy him, and thus disable him from God's service. Sure of a gracious answer, he triumphantly rebukes his foes.

1. He owns his ill desert in begging a relief from chastisement. 2. I am weak—as a culled plant (Isaiah 24. 4). my bones—the very frame. arc vexed—(Psalm 2. 5)—shaken with fear. 3. how long?—shall this be so (cf.

Psalm 79. 5). but—or, and. thou—the sentence is incomplete as expressive of strong emotion. 4. Return—i. e., to my relief—or, turn, as now having His face averted. for thy mercies' sake—to illustrate thy mercy. 5. (Cf. Psalm 115. 17, 18; Isaiah 38. 18.) There is no incredulity as to a future state. The contrast is between this scene of life, and the grave or sheol, the unseen world of the dead. give . . . thanks—or, praise for mercies. 6. By a strong figure the abundance as well as intensity of grief is depicted. 7. consumed—or, has failed, denoting general debility (Psalm 13. 3; 83. 10). waxeth old—or, dim. grief—mingled with indignation. 8. 9. Assured of God's hearing, he suddenly defies his enemies by an address indicating that he no longer fears them; 10, and knows they will be disappointed and in their turn (cf. v. 3) be terror-stricken or confounded.

PSALM VII.

Ver. 1-17. Shiggaiion—a plaintive song or elegy. Though obscure in details, this title seems to intimate that the occasion of this Psalm was some event in David's persecution by Saul. He prays for relief, because he is innocent, and God will be glorified in his vindication. He thus passes to the celebration of God's righteous government, in defending the upright and punishing the wicked, whose malignant devices will result in their own ruin; and, confident of God's aid, closes with rejoicing.

1, 2. Though many enemies set upon him, one is singled out as prominent; and compared to a wild beast tearing his prey to pieces (cf. 1 Samuel 20. 1; 23. 23; 26. 19). 3. if I have done this—i. e., the crime charged in the "words of Cush" (cf. 1 Samuel 24. 9). 4. If I have injured my friend. yea, I have delivered, &c.—This makes a good sense, but interrupts the course of thought, and hence it is proposed to render—if I have spoiled my enemy—in either case, cf. 1 Samuel 24. 4-17; 31. 8, 11. 5. This is the consequence, if such has been his conduct. mine honour—(cf. Psalm 3. 3; 4. 2)—my personal and official dignity. 6. God is involved as if hitherto careless of him (Psalm 3. 7; 9. 18). rage—the most violent, like a flood rising over a river's banks. the judgment . . . commanded—or, ordained; a just decision. 7. compass thee—as those seeking justice. return thou on high—assume the judgment-seat, to be honoured as a just Ruler by them. 8. Though not claiming innocence in general, he can confidently do so in this case, and in demanding from the Judge of all the earth a judgment, he virtually asks acquittal. 9. the hearts and reins—the affections and motives of men, or the seat of them (cf. Psalm 16. 7; 26. 2); as we use heart and bosom or breast. 10. defence—lit., shield (Psalm 5. 12). 11. judgeth—as v. 8. the wicked—though not expressed, are implied, for they alone are left as objects of anger; 12, 13, and here distinctly pointed out, though by changing the person, a very common mode of speech, one is selected as a representative of wicked men generally. The military figures are of obvious meaning. against the persecutors—some render "for burning," but the former is the best sense. Arrows for burning would be appropriate in besieging a town, not in warring against one man or a company in open fight. 14. The first clause expresses the general idea that wicked men labour to do evil, the others carry out the figure fully. 15, 16. 1 Samuel 18. 17; 31. 2 illustrate the statement whether alluded to or not. These verses are expository of v. 14, showing how the devices of the wicked end in disappointment, falsifying their expectations. 17. his righteousness—(Psalm 5. 8). Thus illustrated in the defence of his servant and punishment of the wicked.

PSALM VIII.

Ver. 1-10. Upon (or according to the) Gittith, probably means that the musical performance was directed to be according to a tune of that name; which, derived from Gath, a wine-press, denotes a tune (used in connection with gathering the vintage) of a joyous character. All the Psalms to which this term is prefixed are of such a character. The Psalmist gives vent to his admiration of God's manifested perfections, by celebrating His condescending and beneficent providence to man as evinced by the position of the race, as originally created and assigned a dominion over the works of His hands.

1. thy name—perfections (Psalm 5, 11; 7, 17). who hast set—lit., which set thou thy glory, &c., or, which glory of thine set thou, &c., i. e., make it more conspicuous as if earth were too small a theatre for its display. A similar exposition suits the usual rendering. 2. So manifest are God's perfections, that by very weak instruments He conclusively sets forth His praise. Infants are not only wonderful illustrations of God's power and skill, in their physical constitution, instincts, and early developed intelligence, but also in their spontaneous admiration of God's works, by which they put to shame—still—or, silence men who rail and cavil against God. A special illustration of the passage is afforded in Matthew 21, 16, when our Saviour stilled the cavillers by quoting these words; for the glories with which God invested His incarnate Son, even in His humiliation, constitute a most wonderful display of the perfections of His wisdom, love, and power. In view of the scope of v. 4-8 (see below), this quotation by our Saviour may be regarded as an exposition of the prophetic character of the words. sucklings—among the Hebrews were probably of an age to speak (cf. 1 Samuel 1, 22-24; Mark 7, 27). ordained—founded, or prepared, and perfected, which occurs in Matthew 21, 16; taken from the Septuagint has the same meaning. strength—In the quotation in the New Testament, praise occurs as the consequence or effect put for the cause (cf. Psalm 118, 14). avenger—as in Psalm 44, 16; one desirous of revenge, disposed to be quarrelsome, and so apt to cavil against God's government. 3, 4. The allusion to the magnificence of the visible heavens is introduced for the purpose of illustrating God's condescension, who, though the mighty Creator of these glorious worlds of light, makes man the object of regard and recipient of favour. man—lit., frail man, an allusion to his essential infirmity. son of man—only varies the form of speech. visitest—in favour (Psalm 65, 10). This favour is now more fully illustrated. 5-8. God has placed man next in dignity to angels, and but a little lower, and crowned him with the empire of the world. glory and honour—are the attributes of royal dignity (Psalm 21, 5; 45, 3). The position assigned man is that described (Genesis 1, 26-28) as belonging to Adam, in his original condition, the terms employed in detailing the subjects of man's dominion corresponding with those there used. In a modified sense, in his present fallen state, man is still invested with some remains of this original dominion. It is very evident, however, by the apostle's inspired expositions (Hebrews 2, 6-8; 1 Corinthians 15, 27, 28) that the language here employed finds its fulfilment only in the final exaltation of Christ's human nature. There is no limit to the "all things" mentioned, God only excepted, who "puts all things under." Man, in the person and glorious destiny of Jesus of Nazareth, the second Adam, the head and representative of the race, will not only be restored to his original position, but exalted far beyond it. "The last enemy, death," through fear of which, man, in his present estate, is "all his lifetime in bondage," "shall be destroyed." Then all things will have been put under his feet, "principalities and powers being made subject to him." This view, so far from being alien from the scope of the passage, is more consistent than any other; for man as a race cannot well be conceived to have a higher honour put upon him than to be thus exalted in the person and destiny of Jesus of Nazareth. And at the same time, by no other of His glorious manifestations has God more illustriously declared those attributes which distinguish His name than in the scheme of redemption, of which this economy forms such an important and essential feature. In the generic import of the language, as describing man's present relation to the works of God's hands, it may be regarded as typical, thus allowing not only the usual application, but also this higher sense which the inspired writers of the New Testament have assigned it. 9. Appropriately, the writer closes this brief but pregnant and sublime song of praise with the terms of admiration with which it was opened.

PSALM IX.

Ver. 1-20. Upon Muth-labben, or, after the manner according to "death to the Son," by which some song was known, to whose air or melody the musician is directed to perform this Psalm. This mode of denoting a song by some prominent word or words is still common (cf. Psalm 22). The Psalmist praises God for deliverance from his enemies, and celebrates the Divine government, for providing security to God's people and punishment to the wicked. Thus encouraging himself, he prays for new occasions to recount God's mercies, and confident of His continued judgment on the wicked and vindication of the oppressed, he implores a prompt and efficient manifestation of the Divine sovereignty.

1. Heartfelt gratitude will find utterance. 3-5. When . . . are turned back—it is the result of God's power alone. He, as a righteous Judge (Psalm 7, 11), vindicates His people. He rebukes by acts as well as words (Psalm 6, 1; 18, 15), and so effectually as to destroy the names of nations as well as persons. 6. Lit., As to the enemy finished are his ruins for ever. Thou (God) hast destroyed, &c. (1 Samuel 15, 3, 7; 27, 8, 9). The wicked are utterly undone. Their ruins shall never be repaired. 7, 8. God's eternal possession of a throne of justice is contrasted with the ruin of the wicked. 9, 10. So that the oppressed, and all who know Him (Psalm 5, 3; 7, 1), find Him a sure refuge. 11. (Cf. Psalm 2, 6; 3, 4). 12. for blood—i. e., murders (Psalm 5, 6), including all the oppressions of His people. maketh inquisition—(cf. Genesis 9, 5). He will avenge their cause. 13. gates—or, regions—of death—gates being the entrance is put for the bounds. 14. gates . . . Zion—the enclosure of the city (cf. Psalm 48, 12; Isaiah 23, 12), or, church, as denoted by this phrase contrasted with that of death, carries out the idea of exaltation as well as deliverance. Signal favours should lead us to render signal and public thanks. 15, 16. The undesigned results of the devices of the wicked prove them to be of God's overruling and ordering, especially when those results are destructive to the wicked themselves. Higgaion—means meditation, and, combined with Selah, seems to denote a pause of unusual solemnity and emphasis (cf. Psalm 3, 2). Though Selah occurs seventy-three times, this is the only case in which Higgaion is found. In the view which is given here of the retribution on the wicked as an instance of God's wise and holy ordering, we may well pause in adoring wonder and faith. 17. shall be turned—or, shall turn, retreating under God's vengeance, and driven by Him to the extreme of destruction, even hell itself. Those who forget God are classed with the depraved and openly profane. 18. (Cf. Psalm 13.) the needy—lit., poor, as deprived of anything; hence miserable. expectation of the poor—or, meek, humble, made so by affliction. 19. Arise—(cf. Psalm 4, 7). let not man—(Psalm 8, 4). let . . . be judged—and of course condemned. 20. By their effectual subjection, make them to realize their frail nature (Psalm 8, 4), and deter them from all conceit and future rebellion.

PSALM X.

Ver. 1-18. The Psalmist mourns God's apparent indifference to his troubles, which are aggravated by the successful malice, blasphemy, pride, deceit, and profanity of the wicked. On the just and discriminating providence of God he relies for the destruction of their false security, and the defence of the needy.

1. These are, of course, figurative terms (cf. Psalm 7, 6; 13, 1; &c.). hidest—supp'y thine eyes or face. 2. Lit., In pride of the wicked they (the poor or humble, v. 17; Psalm 12, 5) shall be taken in the devices they (the proud) have imagined. 3. his heart's (or soul's) desire—i. e., his success in evil, and blesseth, &c.—he (the wicked) blesseth the covetous, he despiseth the Lord. 4. The face expresses the self-conceit, whose fruit is practical atheism (Psalm 14, 1). 5, 6. Such is his confidence in the permanence of his way or course of life, that he disregards God's providential government (out of sight, because he will not look, Isaiah 26, 11), sneers at his enemies, and boasts perpetual freedom from evil. 7-10. The malignity and deceit (Psa. m 140. 3) of such are followed by acts combining cunning, fraud, and violence (cf. Proverbs 1. 11, 18), aptly illustrated by the habits of the lion, and of hunters taking their prey. Poor, in v. 8, 10, 14, represents a word peculiar to this Psalm, meaning the sad or sorrowful; in v. 9, as usual, it means the pious or meek sufferer. eyes . . . privily set—he watches with half-closed eyes, appearing not to see. croucheth—as a lion gathers himself into as small compass as possible to make the greater spring. fall by his strong ones—the figure of the lion is dropped, and this phrase means the accomplices of the chief or leading wicked man. 11. As before, such conduct implies disbelief or disregard of God's government. 12. (Cf. Psalm 9. 19; 3. 7.) humble—(Cf. v. 17, and Marg.) lift up thine hand—exert thy power. 13, 14. It is in vain to suppose God will overlook sin, however forbearing; for He carefully examines or beholds all wickedness, and will mark it by His providential (thy hand) punishment. mischief and spite—provocation and trouble of the sufferer (cf. Psalm 6. 7; 7. 14). committeeth—or, leaves (his burden) on thee. 15. arm—power. till thou find none—so far from not requiting (v. 11, 13), God will utterly destroy the wicked and his deeds (Psalm 9. 5, 6; 34. 16; 37. 36). 16-18. God reigns. The wicked, if for a time successful, shall be cut off. He hears, and confirms the hearts of His suffering people (Psalm 112. 7), executes justice for the feeble, and represses the pride and violence of conceited though frail men (cf. Psalm 9. 16).

PSALM XI.

Ver. 1-7. On title, cf. Introduction. Alluding to some event in his history, as 1 Samuel 23, 13, the Psalmist avows his confidence in God, when admonished to flee from his raging persecutors, whose destruction of the usual foundations of safety rendered all his efforts useless. The grounds of his confidence are God's supreme dominion, His watchful care of His people, His hatred to the wicked, and judgments on them, and His love for righteousness and the righteous.

1. my soul—me (Psalm 3. 2). Flee—lit., flee ye; i. e., he and his companion. as a bird to your mountain—having as such no safety but in flight (cf. 1 Samuel 26. 20; Lamentations 3. 52). 2. privily—lit., in darkness, treacherously. 3. Lit., The foundations (i. e., of good order and law) will be destroyed, what has the righteous done (to sustain them)? All his efforts have failed. 4. temple . . . heaven—the connection seems to denote God's heavenly residence; the term used is taken from the place of His visible earthly abode (Psalm 2. 6; 3. 4; 5. 7). Thence He inspects men with close scrutiny. 5. The trial of the righteous results in their approval, as it is contrasted with God's hatred to the wicked. 6. Their punishment is described by vivid figures denoting abundant, sudden, furious, and utter destruction (cf. Genesis 19. 24; Job 18. 15; Psalm 7. 15; 9. 15). cup—is a frequent figure for God's favour or wrath (Psalm 16. 5; 23. 5; Matthew 20. 22, 23). 7. his countenance—lit., their faces—a use of the plural applied to God, like Genesis 1. 26; 3. 22; 11. 7; Isaiah 6. 8, &c., denoting the fulness of His perfections, or more probably originating in a reference to the trinity of persons. Faces is used as eyes (v. 4), expressing here God's complacency towards the upright (cf. Psalm 34. 15, 16).

PSALM XII.

Ver. 1-8. On title, cf. Introduction and Psalm 6. The Psalmist laments the decrease of good men. The pride and deceit of the wicked provokes God's wrath, whose promise to avenge the cause of pious sufferers will be verified even amidst prevailing iniquity.

1. the faithful—or lit., faithfulness (Psalm 31. 23). 2. The want of it is illustrated by the prevalence of deceit and instability. 3, 4. Boasting (Daniel 7. 25) is, like flattery, a species of lying. lips and . . . tongue—for persons. 5. The writer intimates his confidence by depicting God's actions (cf. Psalm 9. 19; 10. 12) as coming to save the poor at whom the wicked sneer (Psalm 10. 5). 6. The words —lit., saying of (v. 5). seven times—thoroughly (Daniel 3. 19). 7. them—(Marg.) 8. The wicked roam undisturbed, doing evil, when villainess or vile men are exalted.

PSALM XIII.

Ver. 1-6. On title, cf. Introduction. The Psalmist, mourning God's absence and the triumph of his enemies, prays for relief ere he is totally destroyed, and is encouraged to hope his trust will not be in vain.

1. The forms of expression and figure here used are frequent (cf. Psalm 9. 12, 13; 10. 11, 12). How long . . . for ever—shall it be for ever? 2. The counsels or devices of his heart afford no relief. 3. lighten mine eyes—dim with weakness, denoting approaching death (cf. 1 Samuel 14. 27-29; Psalm 6. 7; 38. 10). 4. rejoice—lit., shout as in triumph. I am moved—cast down from a firm position (Psalm 10. 6). 5, 6. Trust is followed by rejoicing in the deliverance which God effects, and, instead of his enemy, he can lift the song of triumph.

PSALM XIV.

Ver. 1-7. The practical atheism, and total and universal depravity of the wicked, with their hatred to the good, are set forth. Yet, as they dread God's judgments when He vindicates His people, the Psalmist prays for His delivering power.

1. Sinners are termed fools, because they think and act contrary to right reason (Genesis 34. 7; Joshua 7. 15; Psalm 39. 8; 74. 18, 22). in his heart—to himself (Genesis 6. 12). 2. looked—in earnest inquiry. understand—as opposed to fool. 3. filthy—lit., spoiled, or, soured, corrupted (Job 15. 16; Romans 3. 12). 4-6. Their conduct evinces indifference rather than ignorance of God; for when He appears in judgment they are stricken with great fear. who eat up my people—to express their beastly fury—(Proverbs 30. 14; Habakkuk 3. 14); to call on the Lord is to worship Him. 7. captivity—denotes any great evil. Zion—God's abode, from which He revealed His purposes of mercy, as He now does by the Church (cf. 3. 4; 20. 2), and which He rules and all other things for the good of His people (Ephesians 1. 22).

PSALM XV.

Ver. 1-5. Those who are fit for communion with God may be known by a conformity to His law, which is illustrated in various important particulars.

1. abide—or, sojourn (cf. Psalm 5. 4), where it means under God's protection here, as (Psalm 23. 6; 27. 4, 6) communion. tabernacle—seat of the ark (2 Samuel 6. 17), the symbol of God's presence. holy hill—(Cf. Psalm 2. 6). 2. walketh—(Cf. Psalm 1. 1.) uprightly—in a complete manner, as to all parts of conduct (Genesis 17. 1), not as to degree. worketh—or, does. righteousness—what is right. in his heart—sincerely (Proverbs 23. 7). 3. He neither slanders nor spreads slander. 4. Love and hate are regulated by a regard to God. swareth . . . hurt—or what so results (cf. Leviticus 5. 4). 5. (Cf. Leviticus 25. 37; Deuteronomy 23. 19, 20.) usury—is derived from a verb meaning to bite. All gains made by the wrongful loss of others are forbidden. takeeth reward, &c.—the innocent would not otherwise be condemned (cf. Exodus 23. 8; Deuteronomy 16. 19). Bribery of all sorts is denounced. doeth these, &c.—Such persons admitted to God's presence and favour shall never (Psalm 10. 6; 13. 5) be moved.

PSALM XVI.

Ver. 1-11. Michtam, or, by the change of one letter, Michtab—a writing, such as a poem or song (cf. Isaiah 38. 9). Such a change of the letter m for b was not unusual. The position of this word in connection with the author's name, being that usually occupied by some term, such as Psalm or song, denoting the style or matter of the composition, favours this view of its meaning, though we know not why this and Psalms 56-60, should be specially called a writing. A golden (Psalm), or a memorial, are explanations proposed by some—neither of which, however applicable here, appears adapted to the other Psalms where the term occurs. According to Peter (Acts 2, 25) and Paul (Acts 13, 35), this Psalm relates to Christ, and expresses the feelings of His human nature, in view of His sufferings and victory over death and the grave, including His subsequent exaltation at the right hand of God. Such was the exposition of the best earlier Christian interpreters. Some moderns have held that the Psalm relates exclusively to David; but this view is expressly contradicted by the apostles; others hold that the language of the Psalm is applicable to David as a type of Christ, capable of the higher sense assigned it in the New Testament. But then the language of v. 10 cannot be used of David in any sense, for "he saw corruption." Others again propose to refer the first part to David, and the last to Christ; but it is evident that no change in the subject of the Psalm is indicated. Indeed, the person who appeals to God for help is evidently the same who rejoices in having found it. In referring the whole Psalm to Christ, it is, however, by no means denied that much of its language is expressive of the feelings of His people, so far as in their humble measure they have the feelings of trust in God expressed by Him, their head and representative. Such use of His language, as recorded in His last prayer (John 17.), and even that He used in Gethsemane, under similar modifications, is equally proper. The propriety of this reference of the Psalm to Christ will appear in the scope and interpretation. In view of the sufferings before Him, the Saviour, with that instinctive dread of death manifested in Gethsemane, calls on God to "preserve" Him; He avows His delight in holiness and abhorrence of the wicked and their wickedness; and for "the joy that was set before Him, despising the shame," encourages Himself; contemplating the glories of the heritage appointed Him. Thus even death and the grave lose their terrors in the assurance of the victory to be attained and "the glory that should follow."

1. preserve me—keep or watch over my interests. In thee . . . I . . . trust—as one seeking shelter from pressing danger. 2. my soul—must be supplied; expressed in similar cases (Psalm 42, 5, 11). my goodness . . . thee—This obscure passage is variously expounded. Either one of two expositions falls in with the context. My goodness or merit is not on account of thee—i. e., is not for thy benefit. Then follows the contrast of v. 3 (but is), in respect, or for the saints, &c.—i. e., it ensures to them. Or, my goodness—or happiness is not besides thee—i. e., without thee I have no other source of happiness. Then, "to the saints," &c., means that the same privilege of deriving happiness from God only is theirs. The first is the most consonant with the Messianic character of the Psalm, though the latter is not inconsistent with it. 3. saints—or, persons consecrated to God, set apart from others to his service. in the earth—i. e., land of Palestine—the residence of God's chosen people—figuratively for the Church. excellent—or, nobles, distinguished for moral excellence. 4. He expresses his abhorrence of those who seek other sources of happiness or objects of worship, and, by characterizing their rites by drink offerings of blood, clearly denotes idolaters. The word for sorrows is by some rendered idols; but, though a similar word to that for idols, it is not the same. In selecting such a term, there may be an allusion, by the author, to the sorrows produced by idolatrous practices. 5-7. God is the chief good, and supplies all need (Deuteronomy 10, 9). portion of mine inheritance and of my cup—may contain an allusion to the daily supply of food, and also to the inheritance of Levi (Deuteronomy 18, 1, 2). maintainest—or, drawest out my lot—enlargest it. The next verse carries out this idea more fully. given me counsel—cared for me. my reins—the supposed seat of emotion and thought (Psalm 7, 9; 26, 2). instruct me—or, excite to acts of praise (Isaiah 53, 11, 12; Hebrews 12, 2). 8. With God's presence and aid he is sure of safety (Psalm 10, 6; 15, 5; John 12, 27, 28; Hebrews 5, 7, 8). 9. glory—as heart (Psalm 7, 5), for self. In (Acts 2, 26), after the Septuagint, my tongue as "the glory of the frame"—the instrument for praising God. flesh—if taken as opposed to soul (v. 10), it may mean the body; otherwise, the whole person (cf. Psalm 63, 1; 84, 2). rest in hope—(cf. Margin). 10. soul—or, self. This use of soul for the person is frequent (Genesis 12, 5; 46, 26; Psalm 3, 2; 7, 2; 11, 1), even when the body may be the part chiefly affected, as Psalm 85, 13; 105, 18. Some cases are cited, as Leviticus 22, 4; Numbers 6, 6; 9, 6, 10; 19, 13; Haggai 2, 13, &c., which seem to justify assigning the meaning of body, or dead body; but it will be found that the latter sense is given by some adjunct expressed or implied. In those cases person is the proper sense. wilt not leave . . . hell—abandon to the power of (Job 39, 14; Psalm 49, 10). Hell as (Genesis 42, 33; Psalm 6, 5; Jonah 2, 2) the state or region of death, and so frequently—or the grave itself (Job 14, 13; 17, 13; Ecclesiastes 9, 10, &c.). So the Greek Hades (cf. Acts 2, 27, 31). The context alone can settle whether the state mentioned is one of suffering and place of the damned (cf. Psalm 9, 17; Proverbs 5, 5; 7, 27). wilt . . . suffer—lit., give or appoint. Holy One—(Psalm 4, 3), one who is the object of God's favour, and so a recipient of Divine grace which he exhibits—pious. to see—or, experience—undergo (Luke 2, 26). corruption—Some render the word, the pit, which is possible, but for the obvious sense which the apostle's exposition (Acts 2, 27; 13, 36, 37) gives. The sense of the whole passage is clearly this: by the use of flesh and soul, the disembodied state produced by death is indicated; but, on the other hand, no more than the state of death is intended; for the last clause of v. 10 is strictly parallel with the first, and Holy One corresponds to soul, and corruption to hell. As Holy One, or David (Acts 13, 36, 37), which denotes the person, including soul and body, is used for body, of which only corruption can be predicated (cf. Acts 2, 31); so, on the contrary, soul, which literally means the immaterial part, is used for the person. The language may be thus paraphrased, "In death I shall hope for resurrection; for I shall not be left under its dominion and within its bounds, or be subject to the corruption which ordinarily ensues." 11. Raised from the dead, he shall die no more, death hath no more dominion over him. Thou wilt show me—guide me to attain. the path of life—or, lives—the plural denoting variety and abundance—immortal blessedness of every sort—as life often denotes. in thy presence—or, before thy faces. The frequent use of this plural form for faces may contain an allusion to the Trinity (Numbers 6, 25, 26; Psalm 17, 15; 31, 16). at thy right hand—to which Christ was exalted (Psalm 110, 1; Acts 2, 33; Colossians 3, 1; Hebrews 1, 3). In the glories of this state, He shall see of the travail (Isaiah 53, 10, 11; Philippians 2, 9) of his soul, and be satisfied.

PSALM XVII.

Ver. 1-15. This Psalm is termed a prayer, because the language of petition is predominant. With a just cause, sincerely presented, the writer prays for a just decision and help and protection. Pleading former mercies as a ground of hope, he urges his prayer in view of the malice, pride, rapacity, and selfishness of his foes, whose character is contrasted with his pious devotion and delight in God's favour. 2. sentence—acquitting judgment. from thy presence—thy tribunal. things that are equal—just and right, do thou regard. 3. proved . . . visited . . . tried—his character was most rigidly tested, at all times, and by all methods, affliction and others (Psalm 7, 10). purposed that, &c.—or, my mouth does not exceed my purpose—I am sincere. 4. works of men—sinful practices. by the word of thy lips—as a guide (Psalm 119, 9, 11, 95). destroyer—violent man. 5. may be read as an assertion, "my steps or goings have held on to thy paths." 6. wilt hear me—i. e., graciously (Psalm 3, 4). 7. show—set apart as special and eminent (Exodus 8, 18; Psalm 4, 3). thy right hand—for thy power. 8. Similar figures, denoting the preclusiveness of God's people in his sight, in Deuteronomy 32, 10, 11; Matthew 23, 37. 9. compass me—(Cf. Psalm 118, 10-12). 10. enclosed . . . fat—are become proud in prosperity, and insolent to God (Deuteronomy 32, 15; Psalm 73, 7). 11. They pursue us as beasts tracking their prey. 12. The figure made more special by that of a lion lurking. 13-15. disappoint—lit., come before or, encounter him. Supply with before sword (v. 13), and hand (v.

14). These denote God's power. men . . . world—all men of this present time. They appear, by fulness of bread and large families, to be prosperous; but (v. 15) he implies this will be transient, contrasting his better portion in a joyful union with God hereafter.

PSALM XVIII.

Ver. 1-50. "The servant of the Lord," which in the Hebrew precedes "David," is a significant part of the title (and not a mere epithet of David), denoting the inspired character of the song, as the production of one entrusted with the execution of God's will. He was not favoured by God because he served Him, but served Him because selected and appointed by God in His sovereign mercy. After a general expression of praise and confidence in God for the future, David gives a sublimely poetical description of God's deliverance, which he characterizes as an illustration of God's justice to the innocent and His righteous government. His own prowess and success are celebrated as the results of Divine aid, and, confident of its continuance, he closes in terms of triumphant praise. 2 Samuel 22, is a copy of this Psalm, with a few unimportant variations recorded there as a part of the history, and repeated here as part of a collection designed for permanent use.

1. I will love thee—with most tender affection. 2, 3. The various terms used describe God as an object of the most implicit and reliable trust. rock—lit., a cleft rock, for concealment. strength—a firm, immovable rock. horn of my salvation—the horn, as the means of attack or defence of some of the strongest animals, is a frequent emblem of power or strength efficiently exercised (cf. Deuteronomy 33. 17; Luke 1. 69). tower—lit., high place, beyond reach of danger. to be praised—for past favours, and worthy of confidence. 4. sorrows—lit., bands as of a net (Psalm 116. 3). floods—denotes multitude. death—and hell (cf. Psalm 16. 10)—are personified as man's great enemies (cf. Revelation 20. 13, 14). prevented—encountered me, crossed my path and endangered by safety. He does not mean he was in their power. 6. He relates his methods to procure relief when distressed, and his success. temple—(cf. Psalm 11. 4). 7, 8. God's coming described in figures drawn from his appearance on Sinai (cf. Deuteronomy 32. 22). smoke out . . . his nostrils—bitter in his wrath (cf. Psalm 74. 1). by it—i. e., the fire (Exodus 19. 18). 9. darkness—or, a dense cloud (Exodus 19. 16; Deuteronomy 5. 22). 10. cherub—angelic agents (cf. Genesis 3. 24), the figures of which were placed over the ark (1 Samuel 4. 4), representing God's dwelling; used here to enhance the majesty of the Divine advent. Angels and winds may represent all rational and irrational agencies of God's providence (cf. Psalm 104. 3, 4). did fly—rapidity of motion adds to the grandeur of the scene. 11. dark waters—or, clouds heavy with vapour. 12. Out of this obscurity, which impresses the beholder with awe and dread, He reveals Himself by sudden light and the means of His terrible wrath (Joshua 10. 11; Psalm 78. 47). 13. The storm breaks forth—thunder follows lightning, and hail with repeated lightning, as often seen, like balls or coals of fire, succeed (Exodus 9. 23). 14. The fiery brightness of lightning, in shape like burning arrows rapidly shot through the air, well represents the most terrible part of an awful storm. Before the terrors of such a scene the enemies are confounded and overthrown in dismay. 15. The tempest of the air is attended by appropriate results on earth. The language, though not expressive of any special physical changes, represents the utter subversion of the order of nature. Before such a God none can stand. 16-19. from above—as seated on a throne, directing these terrible scenes, God—sent—His hand (Psalm 144. 7), reached down to His humble worshipper and delivered him. many waters—calamities (Job 30. 14; Psalm 124. 4, 5). prevented—(v. 3). a large place—denotes safety or relief, as contrasted with the straits of distress (Psalm 4. 1). All his deliverance is ascribed to God, and this sublime poetical representation is given to inspire the pious with confidence and the wicked with dread. 20-24. The statements of innocence, righteousness, &c., refer, doubtless, to his personal and official conduct and his purposes, during all the trials to which he was subjected in Saul's persecutions and Absalom's rebellions, as well as the various wars in which he had been engaged as the head and defender of God's Church and people. upright before him—in my relation to God I have been perfect as to all parts of His law. The perfection does not relate to degree. mine iniquity—perhaps the thought of his heart to kill Saul (1 Samuel 24. 6). That David does not allude to all his conduct, in all relations, is evident from Psalm 51. 1, &c. 25-27. God renders to men according to their deeds in a penal, not vindictive, sense (Leviticus 26. 23, 24). merciful—or, kind (Psalm 4. 3). froward—contrary to. the afflicted people—i. e., the humbly pious. high looks—pride (Psalm 101. 5; 131. 1). 28. To give one light is to make prosperous (Job 18. 5, 6; 21. 17). thou—is emphatic, as if to say, I can fully confide in thee for help. 29. And this on past experience in his military life, set forth by these figures. 30-32. God's perfection is the source of his own, which has resulted from his trust on the one hand, and God's promised help on the other. tried—"as metals are tried by fire and proved genuine" (Psalm 12. 6). Shield (Psalm 3. 3). Gliding was essential to free motion on account of the looseness of Oriental dresses, hence it is an expressive figure for describing the gift of strength. 33-36. God's help further described—He gives swiftness to pursue or elude his enemies (Habakkuk 3. 19), strength, protection, and a firm footing. thy gentleness—as applied to God—condescension—or, that which He gives, in the sense of humility (cf. Proverbs 22. 4). enlarged my steps—made ample room (cf. Proverbs 4. 12). 37-41. In actual conflict, by God's aid, the defeat of his enemies is certain. A present and continued success is expressed. that rose up against me—lit., insurgents (Psalm 3. 1; 44. 5). given me the necks—lit., backs of the necks—made them retreat (Exodus 23. 27; Joshua 7. 8). 42. This conquest was complete. 43-45. Not only does He conquer civil foes, but foreigners, who are driven from their places of refuge. submit, &c.—(cf. Margin)—i. e., show a forced subjection. 46. The Lord liveth—contrasts Him with idols (1 Corinthians 8. 4). 47, 48. avengeth me—his cause is espoused by God as His own. liftest me up—to safety and honours. 49, 50. Paul (Romans 15. 9) quotes from this doxology to show that under the Old Testament economy, others than the Jews were regarded as subjects of that spiritual government of which David was head, and in which character his deliverances and victories were typical of the more illustrious triumphs of David's greater Son. The language of v. 50 justifies this view in its distinct allusion to the great promise (cf. 2 Samuel 7). In all David's successes he saw the pledges of a fulfilment of that promise, and he mourned in all his adversities not only in view of his personal suffering, but because he saw in them evidences of danger to the great interests which were committed to his keeping. It is in these aspects of his character that we are led properly to appreciate the importance attached to his sorrows and sufferings, his joys and successes.

PSALM XIX.

Ver. 1-14. After exhibiting the harmonious revelation of God's perfections made by His works and His word, the Psalmist prays for conformity to the Divine teaching.

1. the glory of God—is the sum of His perfections (Psalm 24. 7-10; Romans 1. 20). handywork—old English for work of his hands. firmament—another word for heavens (Genesis 1. 8). 2. uttereth—pours forth—as a stream—a perpetual testimony. 3. Though there is no articulate speech or words, yet without these their voice is heard (cf. Margin). 4. Their line—or instruction—the influence exerted by their tacit display of God's perfections. Paul (Romans 10. 8), quoting from the Septuagint, uses sound, which gives the same sense. 5, 6. The sun, as the most glorious heavenly body, is specially used to illustrate the sentiment; and his vigorous, cheerful, daily, and extensive course, and his reviving heat (including light), well display the wondrous wisdom of his Maker. 7-9. The law is described by six names, epithets, and effects. It is a rule, God's testimony for the truth, His special and general prescription of duty, fear (as its cause) and judicial decision. It is distinct and certain, reliable, right, pure, holy, and true. Hence it revives those depressed by doubts, makes wise the unskilled (2 Timothy 3. 15), rejoices the lover of truth, strengthens the desponding (Psalm 13. 4; 34. 6), provides permanent principles of conduct, and by God's grace brings a rich reward. 12-14. The clearer our view of the law, the more manifest are our sins. Still for its full effect we need Divine grace to show us our faults, acquit us, restrain us from the practice, and free us from the power of sin. Thus only can our conduct be blameless, and our words and thoughts acceptable to God.

PSALM XX.

Ver. 1-9. David probably composed this Psalm to express the prayers of the pious for his success as at once the head of the church and nation. Like other compositions of which David in such relations is the subject, its sentiments have a permanent value—the prosperity of Christ's kingdom being involved, as well as typified, in that of Israel and its king.

1. hear thee—graciously (Psalm 4. 1). name of—or manifested perfections, as power, wisdom, &c. defend thee—set thee on high from danger (Psalm 9. 9; 18. 3). 2. strengthen thee—sustain in conflict; even physical benefits may be included, as courage for war, &c., as such may proceed from a sense of Divine favour, secured in the use of spiritual privileges. 3. all thy offerings—or gifts, vegetable offerings. accept—lit., turn to ashes (cf. 1 Kings 18. 38). Selah—(Psalm 3. 2.) 4. thy counsel—or plan. 5. salvation—that wrought and experienced by him. set up our banners—(Numbers 2. 3, 10.) In usual sense, or, as some render, may we be made great. 6. He speaks as if suddenly assured of a hearing. his holy heaven—or, lit., the heavens of His holiness, where He resides (Psalm 2. 6; 11. 4). saving . . . hand—His power which brings salvation. his anointed—not only David personally, but as the specially appointed head of His church. 7. remember—or cause to remember, mention thankfully (1 Samuel 17. 45; Psalm 33. 16). 8. They—i. e., who trust in horses, &c. stand upright—lit., we have straightened ourselves up from our distress and fears. 9. let the king hear—as God's representative, delivered to deliver. Perhaps a better sense is, "Lord, save the king, hear us when we call," or pray.

PSALM XXI.

Ver. 1-13. The pious are led by the Psalmist to celebrate God's favour to the king in the bounties already conferred and in prospective victories. The doxology added may relate to both Psalms; the preceding petition, chiefly this of thanksgiving, ascribing honour to God for His display of grace and power to His church in all ages, not only under David, but also under his last greatest successor, "the King of the Jews."

1. thy strength . . . thy salvation—as supplied by thee. 2. The sentiment affirmed in the first clause is reaffirmed by the negation of its opposite in the second. 3. prevenest—lit., to meet here in good sense, or friendship (Psalm 59. 10; cf. opposite, Psalm 17. 13). blessings of goodness—which confer happiness. crown of pure gold—a figure for the highest royal prosperity. 4-6. (Cf. 2 Samuel 7. 13-16.) The glory and blessedness of the king as head of his line, including Christ, as well as in being God's specially selected servant, exceeded that of all others. made him most blessed—or set him to be blessings, as Abraham (Genesis 12. 2). with thy countenance—by sight of thee (Psalm 16. 11), or by thy favour expressed by the light of thy countenance (Numbers 6. 25), or both. 7. The mediate cause is the king's faith, the efficient, God's mercy. 8. The address is now made to the king. hand—denotes power, and—right hand—a more active and efficient degree of its exercise. find out—reach, lay hold of, indicating success in pursuit of his enemies. 9. The king is only God's agent. anger—lit., face, as appearing against them. as a fiery oven—as in it—10. fruit-children (Psalm 37. 25; Hosea 9. 16). 11. This terrible overthrow, reaching to posterity, is due to their crimes (Exodus 20. 5, 6). 12. turn their back—lit., place them [as to the] shoulder. against the face of them—The shooting against their faces would cause them to turn their backs in flight. 13. The glory of all is ascribable to God alone.

PSALM XXII.

Ver. 1-31. The obscure words Ajjeleth Shahar in this title have various explanations. Most interpreters agree in translating them by "hind of the morning." But great difference exists as to the meaning of these words. By some they are supposed (cf. Psalm 9.) to be the name of the tune to which the words of the Psalm were set; by others, the name of a musical instrument. Perhaps the best view is to regard the phrase as enigmatically expressive of the subject—the sufferer being likened to a hind pursued by hunters in the early morning (lit., the dawn of day)—or that, while hind suggests the idea of a meek, innocent sufferer, the addition of morning denotes relief obtained. The feelings of a pious sufferer in sorrow and deliverance are vividly portrayed. He earnestly pleads for Divine aid on the ground of his relation to God, whose past goodness to His people encourages hope, and then on account of the imminent danger by which he is threatened. The language of complaint is turned to that of rejoicing in the assured prospect of relief from suffering and triumph over his enemies. The use of the words of the first clause of v. 1 by our Saviour on the cross, and the quotation of v. 18 by John (19. 24), and of v. 22 by Paul (Hebrews 2. 12), as fulfilled in His history, clearly intimate the prophetic and Messianic purport of the Psalm. The intensity of the grief, and the completeness and glory of the deliverance and triumph, alike appear to be unsuitable representations of the fortunes of any less personage. In a general and modified sense (cf. on Psalm 16.), the experience here detailed may be adapted to the case of all Christians suffering from spiritual foes, and delivered by Divine aid, inasmuch as Christ in His human nature was their head and representative.

1. A summary of the complaint. Desertion by God, when overwhelmed by distress, is the climax of the sufferer's misery. words of my roaring—shows that the complaint is expressed intelligently, though the term roaring is figurative, taken from the conduct of irrational creatures in pain. 2. The long distress is evinced by—am not silent—lit., not silence to me, either meaning, I continually cry; or, corresponding with thou hearest not, or answerest not, it may mean, there is no rest or quiet to me. 3. Still he not only refrains from charging God foolishly, but evinces his confidence in God by appealing to him. thou art holy—or possessed of all the attributes which encourage trust, and the right object of the praises of the Church; hence the sufferer need not despair. 4, 5. Past experience of God's people is a ground of trust. The mention of "our fathers" does not destroy the applicability of the words as the language of our Saviour's human nature. 6. He who was despised and rejected of His own people, as a disgrace to the nation, might well use these words of deep abasement, which express not His real, but esteemed value. 7, 8. For the Jews used one of the gestures (Matthew 27. 39) here mentioned, when taunting Him on the cross, and (v. 43) reproached Him almost in the very language of this passage. trusted in the Lord lit., rolled—i. e., his burden (Psalm 37. 5; Proverbs 16. 3) on the Lord. This is the language of enemies sporting with his faith in the hour of his desertion. shoot out [or, open] the lip—(Cf. Psalm 35. 21.) 9, 10. Though ironically spoken, the exhortation to trust was well founded on his previous experience of Divine aid, the special illustration of which is drawn from the period of helpless infancy. didst make me hope—or lit., made me secure. 11. From this statement of reasons for the appeal, he renews it, pleading his double extremity, the nearness of trouble, and the absence of a helper. 12, 13. His enemies, with the vigour of bulls and rapacity of lions, surround him, eagerly seeking his ruin. The force of both figures is greater without the use of any particle denoting comparison. 14, 15.

Utter exhaustion and hopeless weakness, in these circumstances of pressing danger, are set forth by the most expressive figures; the solidity of the body is destroyed, and it becomes like water; the bones are parted; the heart, the very seat of vitality, melts like wax; all the juices of the system are dried up; the tongue can no longer perform its office, but lies parched and stiffened (cf. Genesis 49. 4; 2 Samuel 14. 11; Psalm 58. 8). In this, God is regarded as the ultimate source, and men as the instruments. the dust of death—of course denotes the grave. We need not try to find the exact counterpart of each item of the description in the particulars of our Saviour's sufferings. Figurative language resembles pictures of historical scenes, presenting substantial truth, under illustrations, which, though not essential to the facts, are not inconsistent with them. Were any portion of Christ's terrible sufferings specially designed, it was doubtless that of the garden of Gethsemane. 16. Evil-doers are well described as dogs, which, in the East, herding together, wild and rapacious, are justly objects of great abhorrence. The last clause has been a subject of much discussion (involving questions as to the genuineness of the Hebrew word translated pierce) which cannot be made intelligible to the English reader. Though not quoted in the New Testament, the remarkable aptness of the description to the facts of the Saviour's history, together with difficulties attending any other mode of explaining the clause in the Hebrew, justify an adherence to the terms of our version and their obvious meaning. 17. His emaciated frame, itself an item of his misery, is rendered more so as the object of delighted contemplation to his enemies. The verbs, look and stare, often occur as suggestive of feelings of satisfaction (cf. Psalm 27. 13; 51. 7; 118. 7). 18. This literally-fulfilled prediction closes the sad picture of the exposed and deserted sufferer. 19, 20. He now turns with unabated desire and trust to God, who, in His strength and faithfulness, is contrasted with the urgent dangers described. my soul—or self (cf. Psalm 3. 2; 16. 10). my darling—lit., my only one, or, solitary one, as desolate and afflicted (Psalm 25. 16; 35. 17). 21. Deliverance plead in view of former help, when in the most imminent danger, from the most powerful enemy, represented by the unicorn or wild buffalo. the lion's mouth—(Cf. v. 13.) The lion often used as a figure representing violent enemies; the connecting of the mouth intimates their rapacity. 22-24. He declares his purpose to celebrate God's gracious dealings and publish His manifested perfections (name, Psalm 5. 11), &c., and forthwith invites the pious, those who have a reverential fear of God, to unite in special praise for a deliverance, illustrating God's kind regard for the lowly, whom men neglect. To hide the face or eyes expresses a studied neglect of one's cause, and refusal of aid or sympathy (cf. Psalm 30. 7; Isaiah 1. 15). 25, 26. My praise shall be of thee—or, perhaps better, from thee—i. e., God gives grace to praise him. With offering praise, he farther evinces his gratitude by promising the payment of his vows, in celebrating the usual festival, as provided in the law (Deuteronomy 12. 13; 16. 11), of which the pious or humble, and they that seek the Lord, His true worshippers, shall partake abundantly, and join him in praise. In the enthusiasm produced by his lively feelings, he addresses such in words, assuring them of God's perpetual favour. The dying of the heart denotes death (1 Samuel 25. 37); so its living denotes life. 27-31. His case illustrates God's righteous government. Beyond the existing time and people, others shall be brought to acknowledge and worship God; the fat ones, or the rich as well as the poor, the helpless who cannot keep themselves alive, shall together unite in celebrating God's delivering power, and transmit to unborn people the records of His grace. It shall be accounted to the Lord for, &c.—or, it shall be told of the Lord to a generation. God's wonderful works shall be told from generation to generation. that he hath done—supply it, or this—i. e., what the Psalm has unfolded.

PSALM XXIII.

Ver. 1-6. Under a metaphor borrowed from scenes of pastoral life, with which David was familiar, he describes God's providential care in providing refreshment, guidance, protection, and abundance, and so affording grounds of confidence in His perpetual favour.

1. Christ's relation to His people is often represented by the figure of a shepherd (John 10. 14; Hebrews 13. 20; 1 Peter 2. 25; 5. 4), and therefore the opinion that He is the Lord here so described, and in Genesis 48. 15; Psalm 80. 1; Isaiah 40. 11, is not without some good reason. 2. green pastures—or, pastures of tender grass, are mentioned, not in respect to food, but as places of cool and refreshing rest. the still waters—are, lit., waters of stillness, whose quiet flow invites to repose. They are contrasted with boisterous streams on the one hand, and stagnant, offensive pools on the other. 3. To restore the soul is to revive or quicken it (Psalm 19. 7), or relieve it (Lamentations 1. 11, 19). paths of righteousness—those of safety, as directed by God, and pleasing to Him. for his name's sake—or, regard for His perfections, pledged for His people's welfare. 4. In the darkest and most trying hour God is near. the valley of the shadow of death—is a ravine overhung by high precipitous cliffs, filled with dense forests, and well calculated to inspire dread to the timid, and afford a covert to beasts of prey. While expressive of any great danger or cause of terror, it does not exclude the greatest of all, to which it is most popularly applied, and which its terms suggest. thy rod and thy staff—are symbols of a shepherd's office. By them he guides his sheep. 5, 6. Another figure expresses God's provident care. a table—or, food, anointing oil—the symbol of gladness, and the overflowing cup—which represents abundance—are prepared for the child of God, who may feast in spite of his enemies, confident that this favour will ever attend him. This beautiful Psalm most admirably sets before us, in its chief figure, that of a shepherd, the gentle, kind, and sure care extended to God's people, who, as a shepherd, both rules and feeds them. The closing verse shows that the blessings mentioned are spiritual.

PSALM XXIV.

Ver. 1-10. God's supreme sovereignty requires a befitting holiness of life and heart in His worshippers; a sentiment sublimely illustrated by describing His entrance into the sanctuary, by the symbol of His worship—the ark, as requiring the most profound homage to the glory of His Majesty.

1. fulness—every thing. world—the habitable globe, with they that dwell—forming a parallel expression to the first clause. 2. poetically represents the facts of Genesis 1. 9. 3, 4. The form of a question gives vivacity. Hands, tongue and heart are organs of action, speech, and feeling, which compose character. lifted up his soul—is to set the affections (Psalm 25. 1) on an object; here, vanity—or, any false thing, of which swearing falsely, or to falsehood, is a specification. hill of the Lord—(cf. Psalm 2. 6, &c.). His Church—the true or invisible, as typified by the earthly sanctuary. 5. righteousness—the rewards which God bestows on His people, or the grace to secure those rewards as well as the result. 6. Jacob—by “Jacob,” we may understand God's people (cf. Isaiah 43. 22; 44. 2, &c.), corresponding to “the generation,” &c., as if he had said, “those who seek thy face are thy chosen people.” 7-10. The entrance of the ark, with the attending procession, into the holy sanctuary is pictured to us. The repetition of the terms gives emphasis. Lord of hosts—or fully, Lord God of hosts (Hosea 12. 5; Amos 4. 13), describes God by a title indicative of supremacy over all creatures, and especially the heavenly armies (Joshua 5. 14; 1 Kings 22. 19). Whether, as some think, the actual enlargement of the ancient gates of Jerusalem be the basis of the figure, the effect of the whole is to impress us with a conception of the matchless majesty of God.

PSALM XXV.

Ver. 1-22. The general tone of this Psalm is that of prayer for help from enemies. Distress, however, exciting a sense of sin, humble confession, supplication for pardon, preservation from sin, and Divine guidance, are prominent topics.

1. lift up my soul—(Psalm 24. 4; 86. 4), set my affections (cf. Colossians 3. 2). 2. not be ashamed—by disappointment of hopes of relief. 3. The prayer generalized as to all who wait on God—i. e., who expect His favour. On the other hand, the disappointment of the perfidious, who, unprovoked, have done evil, is invoked (cf. 2 Samuel 22. 9). 4, 5. On the ground of former favour, he invokes Divine guidance, according to God's gracious ways of dealing and faithfulness. 6, 7. Confessing past and present sins, he pleads for mercy, not on palliations of sin, but on God's well-known benevolence. 8, 9. upright—acting according to His promise. sinner—the general term, limited by the meek—who are penitent. In judgment—rightly. the way—and his way—God's way of providence. 10. paths—similar sense—His modes of dealing (cf. v. 4). mercy and truth—(Job 14.), God's grace in promising and faithfulness in performing. 11. God's perfections of love, mercy, goodness, and truth are manifested (His name, cf. Psalm 9. 10) in pardoning sin, and the greatness of sin renders pardon more needed. 12, 13. What he asks for himself is the common lot of all the pious. The phrase—inherit the earth—(cf. Matthew 5. 5), alluding to the promise of Canaan, expresses all the blessings included in that promise, temporal as well as spiritual. 14. The reason of the blessing explained—the pious enjoy communion with God (cf. Proverbs 3. 21, 22), and, of course, learn His gracious terms of pardon. 15. His trust in God is fixed. net—is frequently used as a figure for dangers by enemies (Psalm 9. 15; 10. 9). 16-19. A series of earnest appeals for aid, because God had seemed to desert him (cf. Psalm 13. 1; 17. 13, &c.), his sins oppressed him, his enemies had enlarged his troubles and were multiplied, increasing in hate and violence (Psalm 9. 8; 18. 48). 20. keep my soul—(Psalm 16. 1.) put my trust—flee for refuge (Psalm 2. 12). 21. In conscious innocence of the faults charged by his enemies, he confidently commits his cause to God. Some refer—integrity, &c.—to God, meaning His covenant faithfulness. This sense, though good, is an unusual application of the terms. 22. Extend these blessings to all thy people in all their distresses.

PSALM XXVI.

Ver. 1-12. After appealing to God's judgment on his avowed integrity and innocence of the charges laid by his enemies, the Psalmist professes delight in God's worship, and prays for exemption from the fate of the wicked, expressing assurance of God's favour.

1. Judge—decide on my case—the appeal of innocence. in mine integrity—freedom from blemish (cf. Psalm 25. 21). His confidence of perseverance results from trust in God's sustaining grace. 2. He asks the most careful scrutiny of his affections and thoughts (Psalm 7. 9), or motives. 3. As often, the ground of prayer for present help is former favour. 4-8. As exemplified by the fruits of Divine grace, presented in his life, especially in his avoiding the wicked and his purposes of cleaving to God's worship. wash mine hands—expressive symbol of freedom from sinful acts (cf. Matthew 27. 24). the habitation of thy house—where thy house rests—as the tabernacle was not yet permanently fixed. honour dwelleth—conveys an allusion to the Holy of Holies. 9. Gather not, &c.—bring me not to death. bloody men—(cf. Psalm 5. 6). 10. Their whole conduct is that of violence and fraud. 11, 12. But, &c.—He contrasts his character and destiny with that of the wicked (cf. v. 1, 2). even place—free from occasions of stumbling—safety in his course is denoted. Hence he will render to God his praise publicly.

PSALM XXVII.

Ver. 1-14. With a general strain of confidence, hope, and joy, especially in God's worship, in the midst of dangers, the Psalmist introduces prayer for Divine help and guidance.

1. light—is a common figure for comfort. strength—or, stronghold—affording security against all violence. The interrogations give greater vividness to the negation implied. 2. eat . . . my flesh—(Job 19. 22; Psalm 14. 4.) The allusion to wild beasts illustrates their rapacity. they stumbled—"they" is emphatic; not I, but they were destroyed. 3. In the greatest dangers. in this—i. e., then, in such extremity. 4, 5. The secret of his confidence is his delight in communion with God (Psalm 16. 11; 23. 6), beholding the harmony of His perfections, and seeking His favour in His temple or palace; a term applicable to the tabernacle (cf. Psalm 5. 7). There he is safe (Psalm 31. 21; 61. 5). The figure is changed in the last clause, but the sentiment is the same. 6. head be lifted up—I shall be placed beyond the reach of my enemies. Hence he avows his purpose of rendering joyful thank offerings. 7. Still pressing need extorts prayer for help. cry with my voice—denotes earnestness. Other things equal, Christians in earnest pray audibly, even in secret. 8. The meaning is clear, though the construction in a literal translation is obscure. The English Version supplies the implied clause. To seek God's face is to seek His favour (Psalm 105. 4). 9. Hide not, &c.—(Psalm 4. 6; 22. 24.) Against rejection he pleads former mercy and love. 10. In the extremity of earthly destitution (Psalm 31. 11; 38. 11), God provides (cf. Matthew 25. 35). 11. thy way—of providence. a plain path—(Psalm 26. 12.) enemies—lit., watchers for my fall (Psalm 5. 8). 12. will—lit., soul, desire (Psalm 35. 25). enemies—lit., oppressors. Falsehood aids cruelty against him. breathe out—as being filled with it (Acts 9. 1). 13. The strong emotion is indicated by the incomplete sentence, for which the English Version supplies a proper clause; or, omitting that, and rendering, yet I believed, &c., the contrast of his faith and his danger is expressed. to see—is to experience (Psalm 22. 17). 14. Wait, &c.—in confident expectation. The last clause is, lit., and wait, &c., as if expecting new measures of help.

PSALM XXVIII.

Ver. 1-9. An earnest cry for Divine aid against his enemies, as being also those of God, is followed by the Psalmist's praise in assurance of a favourable answer, and a prayer for all God's people.

1. my rock—(Psalm 18. 2, 31.) be not silent to me—lit., from me, deaf or inattentive. become like them, &c.—share their fate. go down into the pit—or, grave (Psalm 30. 3). 2. lift up my hands—a gesture of prayer (Psalm 63. 4; 141. 2). oracle—place of speaking (Exodus 25. 22; Numbers 7. 89), where God answered His people (cf. Psalm 5. 7). 3. Draw me not, &c.—implies punishment as well as death (cf. Psalm 26. 9). Hypocrisy is the special wickedness mentioned. 4. The imprecation is justified in v. 5. The force of the passage is greatly enhanced by the accumulation of terms describing their sin. endeavours—points out their deliberate sinfulness. 5. Disregard of God's judgments brings a righteous punishment. destroy . . . build . . . up—The positive strengthened by the negative form. 6. supplications—or, cries for mercy. 7. The repetition of heart denotes his sincerity. 8. The distinction made between the people. their strength—and the anointed—may indicate Absalom's rebellion as the occasion. 9. The special prayer for the people sustains this view. feed them—as a shepherd (Psalm 23. 1, &c.).

PSALM XXIX.

Ver. 1-11. Trust in God is encouraged by the celebration of His mighty power as illustrated in His dominion over the natural world, in some of its most terrible and wonderful exhibitions.

1. Give—or, ascribe (Deuteronomy 32. 3). mighty—or, sons of the mighty (Psalm 89. 6). Heavenly beings, as angels. 2. name—as (Psalm 5. 11; 8. 1). beauty of holiness—the loveliness of a spiritual worship, of which the perceptible beauty of the sanctuary worship was but a type. 3. The voice of the Lord—audible exhibition of His power in the tempest, of which thunder is a specimen, but not the uniform or sole example. the waters—are the clouds or vapours (Psalm 18. 11; Jeremiah 10. 13). 4. powerful . . . majesty—lit., in power, in majesty. 5, 6. The tall and large cedars, especially of Lebanon, are shivered, utterly broken. The waving of the mountain forests before the wind is expressed by the figure of skipping or leaping. 7. divideth—lit., heaves off. The lightning, like flakes and splinters hewed from stone or wood, flies through the air. 8. the wilderness—especially Kadesh, south of Judea, is selected as another scene of this display of Divine power, as a vast and desolate region impresses the mind, like mountains, with images of grandeur. 9. Terror-stricken animals and denuded forests close the illustration. In view of this scene of awful sublimity, God's worshippers respond to the call of v. 2, and speak or cry, "glory!" By temple, or palace (God's residence, Psalm 5. 7), may here be meant heaven, or the whole frame of nature, as the angels are called on for praise. 10, 11. Over this terrible raging of the elements God is enthroned, directing and restraining by sovereign power; and hence the comfort of His people. "This awful God is ours, our Father and our Love."

PSALM XXX.

Ver. 1-12. Lit., A Psalm-song—a composition to be sung with musical instruments, or without them—or, "Song of the dedication," &c., specifying the particular character of the Psalm. Some suppose that "of David" should be connected with the name of the composition, and not with "house," and refer for the occasion to the selection of a site for the temple (1 Chronicles 21. 26-30; 22. 1). But "house" is never used absolutely for the temple, and dedication does not well apply to such an occasion. Though the phrase in the Hebrew, "dedication of the house of David," is an unusual form, yet it is equally unusual to disconnect the name of the author and the composition. As a "dedication of David's house" (as provided, Deuteronomy 20. 25), the scope of the Psalm well corresponds with the state of repose and meditation on his past trials suited to such an occasion (2 Samuel 5. 11; 7. 2). For beginning with a celebration of God's delivering favour, in which he invites others to join, he relates his prayer in distress, and God's gracious and prompt answer.

1. lifted me up—as one is drawn from a well (Psalm 40. 2). 2. healed me—affliction is often described as disease (Psalm 6. 2; 41. 4; 107. 20), and so relief by healing. 3. The terms describe extreme danger. soul—or, myself. grave—lit., hell, as in Psalm 16. 10. hast kept me . . . pit—quickened or revived me from the state of dying (cf. Psalm 23. 1). 4. remembrance—the thing remembered or memorial. holiness—as the sum of God's perfections (cf. Psalm 22. 3), used as name (Exodus 3. 15; Psalm 135. 13). 5. Relatively, the longest experience of Divine anger by the pious is momentary. These precious words have consoled millions. 6, 7. What particular prosperity is meant we do not know. Perhaps his accession to the throne. In his self-complacent elation he was checked by God's hiding His face (cf. Psalm 22. 24; 27. 9). troubled—confounded with fear (Psalm 2. 5). 8-11. As in Psalm 6. 5; 88. 10; Isaiah 38. 18, the appeal for mercy is based on the destruction of his agency in praising God here, which death would produce. The terms expressing relief are poetical, and not to be pressed, though dancing is the translation of a word which means a tute, whose cheerful notes are contrasted with mourning, or (Amos 5. 16) wailing. sackcloth—was used, even by kings, in distress (1 Chronicles 21. 16; Isaiah 37. 1); but gladness, used for a garment, shows the language to be figurative. 12. Though my—is supplied before—glory—it is better as Psalm 16. 10, to receive it as used for tongue, the organ of praise. The ultimate end of God's mercies to us is our praise to Him.

PSALM XXXI.

Ver. 1-24. The prayer of a believer in time of deep distress. In the first part, cries for help are mingled with expressions of confidence. Then the detail of griefs engrosses his attention, till, in the assurance of strong but submissive faith, he rises to the language of unmingled joyful trust, and exhorts others to like love and confidence towards God.

1. expresses the general tone of feeling of the Psalm. 2, 4. He seeks help in God's righteous government (Psalm

5. 8), and begs for an attentive hearing, and speedy and effectual aid. With no other help and no claim of merit, he relies solely on God's regard to his own perfections for a safe guidance and release from the snares of his enemies. On the terms "rocks," &c., (cf. Psalm 17. 2; 18. 2, 50; 20. 6; 23. 3; 25. 21). 5, 6. commit my spirit—my life, or myself. Our Saviour used the words on the cross, not as prophetic, but, as many pious men have done, as expressive of his unshaken confidence in God. The Psalmist rests on God's faithfulness to His promises to His people, and hence avows himself one of them, detesting all who revere objects of idolatry (cf. Deuteronomy 32. 21; 1 Corinthians 8. 4). 7. hast known my soul, &c.—had regard to me in trouble. 8. shut me up . . . enemy—abandon to (1 Samuel 23. 11). large room—place of safety (cf. Psalm 18. 19). 9, 10. mine eye, &c.—denote extreme weakness (cf. Psalm 6. 7). grief—mingled sorrow and indignation (Psalm 6. 7). soul and . . . belly—the whole person. Though the effects ascribed to grief are not mere figures of speech—spent; . . . consumed—must be taken in the modified sense of wasted and decayed. iniquity—or, suffering by it (cf. on Psalm 40. 12). 11. among—or, lit., from, or, by my enemies. The latter clauses describe the progress of his disgrace to the lowest degree, till, 12. he is forgotten as one dead, and contemned as a useless broken vessel. 13. For—introduces further reasons for his prayer, the unjust, deliberate, and murderous purposes of his foes. 14-18. In his profession of trust he includes the terms of the prayer expressing it. times—course of life. deliver . . . hand—opposed to "shut me up," &c., of v. 8. make . . . shine—(Cf. Numbers 6. 25; Psalm 4. 6.) Deprecating from himself, he implores on the wicked God's displeasure, and prays that their virulent persecution of him may be stopped. 19-21. God displays openly His purposed goodness to His people. the secret of thy presence—or, covering of thy countenance; the protection He thus affords; cf. Psalm 27. 5 for a similar figure; "dwelling" used there for "presence" here. The idea of security further presented by the figure of a tent and a fortified city. 22. For I said—lit., And I said, in an adversative sense. I, thus favoured, was dependent. in my haste—in my terror. cut off . . . eyes from all the protection of thy presence. 23, 24. the Lord . . . proud doer—lit., the Lord is keeping faith—i. e., with His people, and is repaying, &c. Then let none despair, but take courage, their hopes shall not be in vain.

PSALM XXXII.

Ver. 1-11. Maschil—lit., giving instruction. The Psalmist describes the blessings of His forgiveness, succeeding the pains of conviction, and deduces from his own experience instruction and exhortation to others.

1, 2. (Cf. Romans 4. 6.) forgiven—lit., taken away, opposed to retain (John 20. 23). covered—so that God no longer regards the sin (Psalm 85. 3). imputeth—charge to him, and treat him accordingly. no guile—or, deceit, no false estimate of himself, nor insincerity before God (cf. Romans 8. 1). 3, 4. A vivid description of felt but unacknowledged sin. when—lit., for, as v. 4. thy hand—of God, or, power in distressing him (Psalm 38. 2). moisture—vital juices of the body, the parching heat of which expresses the anguish of the soul. On the other figures, cf. Psalm 6. 2, 7; 31. 9-11. If composed on the occasion of the fifty-first Psalm, this distress may have been protracted for several months. 5. A prompt fulfilment of the purposed confession is followed by a prompt forgiveness. 6. For this—i. e., my happy experience. godly—pious in the sense of Psalm 4. 3. a time—(Isaiah 55. 6); when God's Spirit inclines us to seek pardon, He is ready to forgive. floods, &c.—denote great danger (Psalm 18. 17; 66. 12). 7. His experience illustrates the statement of v. 6. 8. Whether, as most likely, the language of David (cf. Psalm 51. 13), or that of God, this is a promise of Divine guidance. I will . . . mine eye—or, my eye shall be on thee, watching and directing thy way. 9. The latter clause, more literally, "in that they come not near thee"—i. e., because they will not come, &c., unless forced by bit and bridle. 10. The sorrows of the impenitent contrasted with the peace and safety secured by God's mercy. 11.

The righteous and upright, or those conforming to the Divine teaching for securing the Divine blessing, may well rejoice with shouting.

PSALM XXXIII.

Ver. 1-22. A call to lively and joyous praise to God for His glorious attributes and works, as displayed in creation, and His general and special providence, in view of which, the Psalmist, for all the pious, professes trust and joy, and invokes God's mercy.

1-3. The sentiment falls in with Psalm 32, 11 (cf. 1 Corinthians 14, 15). The instruments (Psalm 92, 3; 144, 9) do not exclude the voice. a new song—fresh, adapted to the occasion (Psalm 40, 3; 96, 1). play skilfully—(Cf. Psalm 15, 16, 21.) 4-9. Reasons for praise—first, God's truth, faithfulness, and mercy, generally; then, His creative power which all must honour. In word and breath—or, spirit, there may be an allusion to the Son (John 1, 1) and Holy Spirit. he spake—lit., said. It was—the addition of done weakens the sense (cf. Genesis 1, 3-10). 10, 11. In God's providence He thwarts men's purposes and executes His own. heathen—lit., nations. 12-19. The inference from the foregoing in v. 12 is illustrated by God's special providence, underlying which is His minute knowledge of all men. looketh—intently (Isaiah 14, 16). fashioneth—or, forms, and hence knows and controls (Proverbs 21, 1). alike—without exception. considereth—or, understands, God knows men's motives. 16, 17. Men's usual reliances in their greatest exigencies are, in themselves, useless. On the war horse (cf. Job 39, 19-25). a vain thing—a lie, which deceives us. 18, 19. Contrasted is God's guidance and power to save from the greatest earthly evil and its most painful precursor, and hence from all. 20-22. waiteth—in earnest expectation. holy name—(Cf. Psalm 5, 12; 22, 22; 30, 4.) Our faith measures mercy (Matthew 9, 29), and if of grace, it is no more of debt (Romans 11, 6).

PSALM XXXIV.

Ver. 1-22. On the title of 1 Samuel 21, 13. Abimelech was the general name of the sovereign (Genesis 20, 2). After celebrating God's gracious dealings with him, the Psalmist exhorts others to make trial of His providential care, instructing them how to secure it. He then contrasts God's care of His people and His punitive providence towards the wicked.

1-2. Even in distress, which excites supplication, there is always matter for praising and thanking God (cf. Ephesians 5, 20; Philipians 4, 6). make her boast—glory (Psalm 105, 3; cf. Galatians 6, 14). humble—the pious, as Psalm 9, 12; 25, 9. magnify the Lord—ascribe greatness to Him, an act of praise. together—alike (Psalm 33, 15), or, equally, without exception. delivered . . . fears—as well as actual evil (Psalm 64, 1). 5-7. God's favour to the pious generally, and to himself specially, is celebrated. looked—with desire for help. lightened—or, brightened, expressing joy, opposed to the downcast features of those who are ashamed or disappointed (Psalm 25, 2, 3). This poor man—lit., humble, himself as a specimen of such. angel—of the covenant (Isaiah 63, 9), of whom as a leader of God's host (Joshua 5, 14; 1 Kings 22, 19), the phrase—encampeth, &c.—is appropriate; or, angel used collectively for angels (Hebrews 1, 14). 8. taste and see—try and experience. 9. Those fear him—who are pious—fear and love (Proverbs 1, 7; 9, 10). saints—consecrated to his service (Isaiah 40, 31). 10. not want any good—"Good" is emphatic; they may be afflicted (cf. v. 10); but this may be a good (2 Corinthians 4, 17, 18; Hebrews 12, 10, 11). 11. children—subjects of instruction (Proverbs 1, 8, 10). 12. What man—whoever desires the blessings of piety let him attend. 13, 14. Sins of thought included in those of speech (Luke 6, 45), avoiding evil and doing good in our relations to men are based on a right relation to God. 15. eyes of the Lord are upon—(Psalm 32, 8; 33, 18.) 16. Face . . . against—opposed to them (Leviticus 17, 10; 20, 3). cut off the remembrance—utterly destroy (Psalm 109, 13). 17, 18. Humble penitents are objects of God's special tender regard (Psalm 51, 19; Isaiah 57, 15). 20. bones—framework of the body. 21, 22. Contrast in the destiny of righteous and wicked; the former shall be delivered and never come into condemnation (John 5, 24; Romans 8, 1), the latter left under condemnation and desolate.

PSALM XXXV.

Ver. 1-28. The Psalmist invokes God's aid, contrasting the hypocrisy, cunning, and malice of his enemies with his integrity and generosity. The imprecations of the first part including a brief notice of their conduct, the fuller exposition of their hypocrisy and malice in the second, and the earnest prayer for deliverance from their scornful triumph in the last, are each closed (v. 9, 10, 13, 27, 28) with promises of praise for the desired relief, in which his friends will unite. The historical occasion is probably 1 Samuel 24.

1-3. God is invoked in the character of a warrior (Exodus 15, 3; Deuteronomy 32, 41). fight against—lit., devour my devourers. stop the way against—lit., shut up (the way), to meet or oppose, &c. 1 . . . thy salvation—who saves thee. 4. (Cf. Psalm 9, 17.) devise my hurt—purpose for evil to me. 5, 6.—(cf. Psalm 1, 4)—a terrible fate; driven by wind on a slippery path in darkness, and hotly pursued by supernatural violence (2 Samuel 24, 16; Acts 12, 23). 7, 8. net in a pit—or, pit of their net—or, net-pit—as holy hill for hill of holiness—(Psalm 2, 6)—a figure from hunting (Psalm 7, 15). Their imprecations on impenitent rebels against God need no vindication; His justice and wrath are for such; His mercy for penitents. Cf. Psalm 7, 16; 11, 5, on the peculiar fate of the wicked here noticed. 9, 10. All my bones—every part. him that spoileth him—(cf. Psalm 10, 2). 11. False witnesses—lit., Witnesses of injustice and cruelty (cf. Psalm 11, 5; 25, 19). 12-14. Though they rendered evil for good, he showed a tender sympathy in their affliction. spoiling—lit., bereavement. The usual modes of showing grief are made, as figures, to express his sorrow. prayer . . . bosom—may denote either the posture—the head bowed—(cf. 1 Kings 18, 42)—or, that the prayer was in secret. Some think there is a reference to the result—the prayer would benefit him if not them. believed—lit., went on—denoting his habit. heavily—or, squalidly, his sorrowing occasioning neglect of his person. Altogether, his grief was that of one for a dearly-loved relative. 15, 16. On the contrary, they rejoiced in his affliction. Halting, or lameness, as Psalm 38, 17 for any distress. objects—either as cripples (cf. 2 Samuel 4, 4) contemptible; or, degraded persons, such as had been beaten (cf. Job 30, 1-8). I knew it not—either the persons, or, reasons of such conduct. tear me, and ceased not—lit., were not silent—showing that the tearing meant slandering. mockers—who were hired to make sport at feasts (Proverbs 28, 21). 17. darling—(cf. Psalm 22, 20, 21). 18. (Cf. Psalm 22, 22.) 19. enemies wrongfully—by false and slanderous imputations. wink with the eye—an insulting gesture (Proverbs 6, 13). without cause—manifests more malice than having a wrong cause. 20. deceitful matters—or, words of deceit. quiet in the land—the pious lovers of peace. 21. On the gesture cf. Psalm 22, 7, and on the expressions of malicious triumph cf. Psalm 10, 13; 28, 3. 23, 24. (Cf. Psalm 7, 6; 26, 1; 2 Thessalonians 1, 6.) God's righteous government is the hope of the pious and terror of the wicked. 25. swallowed him up—utterly destroyed him (Psalm 21, 9; Lamentations 2, 16). 26. clothed—covered wholly (Job 8, 22). 27. favour . . . cause—delight in it, as vindicated by thee. Let the Lord, &c.—Let him be greatly praised for His care of the just. 28. In this praise of God's equitable government (Psalm 5, 8) the writer promises ever to engage.

PSALM XXXVI.

Ver. 1-12. On servant of the Lord, cf. title Psalm 18. The wickedness of man contrasted with the excellency of God's perfections and dispensations; and the benefit of the latter sought, and the evils of the former deprecated.

1. The general sense of this difficult verse is, "that the wicked have no fear of God." The first clause may be rendered, "Saith transgression in my heart, in respect to the wicked, there is no fear," &c., i. e., such is my reflection on men's transgressions. 2-4. This reflection detailed, until his iniquity, &c.—lit., for finding his iniquity for hating; i. e., he persuades himself God will not so find it—"for hating" involving the idea of punishing. Hence his words of iniquity and deceit, and his bold rejection of all right principles of conduct. The climax is that he deliberately adopts and patronizes evil. The negative forms affirm more emphatically their contraries. 5, 6. mercy . . . and . . . faithfulness—as mercy and truth (Psalm 25. 10). righteousness and judgments—qualities of a good government (Psalm 5. 8; 31. 1). These all are set forth, by the figures used, as unbounded. 7. shadow of thy wings—(cf. Deuteronomy 32. 11; Psalm 91. 1). 8. fatness—richness. thy house—residence—for the privileges and blessings of communion with God (Psalm 23. 6; 27. 4). river of thy pleasures—plenteous supply—may allude to Eden. 9. Light is an emblem of all blessings—given of God as a means to gain more. 10. that know thee—right knowledge of God is the source of right affections and conduct. 11. foot of . . . hand . . . wicked—all kinds of violent dealing. 12. There—in the acting of violence, they are overthrown. A signal defeat.

PSALM XXXVII.

Ver. 1-40. A composed and uniform trust in God, and a constant course of integrity, are urged in view of the blessedness of the truly pious, contrasted in various aspects with the final ruin of the wicked. Thus the wisdom and justice of God's providence are vindicated, and its seeming inequalities, which excite the cavils of the wicked and the distrust of the pious, are explained. David's personal history abundantly illustrates the Psalm.

1, 2. The general sentiment of the whole Psalm is expressed. The righteous need not be vexed by the prosperity of the wicked; for it is transient, and their destiny undesirable. 3. Trust—sure of safety. shalt thou dwell—or, dwell thou—repose quietly. verily . . . fed—or, feed on truth—God's promise (Psalm 36. 5; cf. Hosea 12. 1). 4. desires—(Psalm 20. 5; 21. 2), what is lawful and right, really good (Psalm 84. 11). 5. commit thy way—(Proverbs 16. 3). Works—what you have to do and cannot—set forth as a burden. trust . . . in him—lit., on Him. He will do what you cannot (cf. Psalm 22. 8; 31. 6). He will not suffer your character to remain under suspicion. 7, 8. Rest in—lit., Be silent to the Lord. and wait—be submissive—avoid petulance and murmurings, anger and rash doing. 9. Two reasons. The prosperity of the wicked is short, and the pious, by humble trust, will secure all covenant blessings, denoted here by "inherit the earth" (cf. Psalm 25. 13). 10, 11. shall not be—lit., is not—is not to be found. peace—includes prosperity. 12. gnasheth . . . teeth—in beastly rage. 13. (cf. Psalm 2. 4) seeth—knows certainly. his day—of punishment, long delayed, shall yet come (Hebrews 10. 37). 14, 15. sword, and . . . bow—for any instruments of violence. slay—lit., slaughter (1 Samuel 25. 11). poor and needy—God's people (Psalm 10. 17; 12. 5). The punishment of the wicked as drawn on themselves—often mentioned (cf. Psalm 7. 15, 16; 35. 8). 16. riches—lit., noise and tumult, as incidental to much wealth (cf. Psalm 39. 6). Thus the contrast with the "little" of one man is more vivid. 17. Even the members of the body needed to hold weapons are destroyed. 18, 19. God, who knows his people's changes, provides against evil, and supplies all their need. 20. While the wicked, however mighty, are destroyed, and that utterly, as smoke which vanishes and leaves no trace. 21, 22. pay-ath not—not able; having grown poor (cf. Deuteronomy 15. 7.) Ability of the one and inability of the other do not exclude moral dispositions. God's blessing or cursing makes the difference. cut off—opposed to "inherit the earth" (cf. Leviticus 7. 20, 21). 23, 24. steps—way, or, course of life; as ordered by God, failures will not be permanent. 25, 26. his seed is blessed—lit., for a blessing (Genesis 12. 2; Psalm 21. 6). This position is still true as the rule of God's economy (1 Timothy 4. 8; 6. 6). 27-29.*********

The exhortation is sustained by the assurance of God's essential rectitude in that providential government which provides perpetual blessings for the good, and perpetual misery for the wicked. 30, 31. The righteous described as to the elements of character, thought, word, and action. steps—or, goings—for conduct which is unwavering (Psalm 18. 36). 32, 33. The devices of the wicked against the good fail, because God acquits them. 34. On the contrary, the good are not only blessed, but made to see the ruin of their foes. 35, 36. of which a picture is given, under the figure of a flourishing tree (cf. Margin), which soon withers. he was not—(cf. v. 10). 37. By the end is meant reward (Proverbs 23. 18; 24. 14), or expectation of success, as v. 33, which describes the end of the wicked in contrast, and that is cut off (cf. Psalm 73. 17). 38. together—at once—entirely (Psalm 4. 8). 39, 40. strength—(Psalm 27. 1; 28. 8). trouble—straits (Psalm 9. 9; 10. 1). In trust and quietness is the salvation of the pious from all foes and all their devices.

PSALM XXXVIII.

Ver. 1-22. To bring to remembrance, or, remind, God of His mercy and himself of his sin. Appealing to God for relief from His heavy chastisement, the Psalmist avows his integrity before men, complains of the defection of friends and persecution of enemies, and in a submissive spirit, casting himself on God, with penitent confession he pleads God's covenant relation and his innocence of the charges of his enemies, and prays for Divine comfort and help.

1-4. He deprecates deserved punishment, which is described (Psalm 6. 1), under the figure of bodily disease. arrows . . . and thy hand—the sharp and heavy afflictions he suffered (Deuteronomy 32. 23). iniquities—afflictions in punishment of his sin (2 Samuel 16. 12; Psalm 31. 10; 40. 12). gone over mine head—as a flood. 5-8. The loathsomeness, corruption, and wasting torture of severe physical disease set forth his mental anguish. It is possible some bodily disease was connected. The loins are the seat of strength. His exhaustion left him only the power to groan. 9. That God can hear (Romans 8. 26). 10. My heart panteth—as if barely surviving. light . . . from me—utter exhaustion (Psalm 6. 7; 13. 3). 11, 12. Friends desert, but foes increase in malignity. seek after my life—(1 Samuel 20. 1; 22. 23). 13, 14. He patiently submits, uttering no reproaches or replies (John 19. 9) to their insulting speeches; 15-17. for he is confident the Lord—lit., Sovereign (to whom he was a servant), would answer his prayer (Psalm 3. 4; 4. 1), and not permit their triumph in his partial halting, of which he was in danger. 18. Consciousness of sin makes suffering pungent, and suffering, rightly received, leads to confession. 19, 20. Still, while humbled before God, he is the victim of deadly enemies, full of malice and treachery. enemies are lively—lit., of life, who would take my life, i. e., deadly. 21, 22. (cf. Psalm 22. 19; 35. 3.) All terms of frequent use. In this Psalm the language is generally susceptible of application to Christ as a sufferer, David, as such, typifying Him. This does not require us to apply the confessions of sin, but only the pains or penalties which he bore for us.

PSALM XXXIX.

Ver. 1-13. To Jeduthun (1 Chronicles 16. 41, 42), one of the chief singers. His name mentioned, perhaps, as a special honour. Under depressing views of his frailty and the prosperity of the wicked, the Psalmist, tempted to murmur, checks the expression of his feelings, till, led to regard his case aright, he prays for a proper view of his condition and for the Divine compassion.

1. I said—or, resolved, will take heed—watch, ways—conduct, of which the use of the tongue is a part (James 1. 26). bridle—lit., muzzle (cf. Deuteronomy 25. 4). while . . . before me—in beholding their prosperity (Psalm 37. 10, 36). 2. even from good—(Genesis 31. 24), everything. 3. His emotions, as a smothered flame, burst forth. 4-7. Some take these words as those of fretting, but they are not essentially such. The tinge of discontent arises from the character of his suppressed emotions. But, addressing God, they are softened and subdued. make me to know—experimentally appreciate. how frail I am—lit., when I shall cease. 5-6. His prayer is answered in his obtaining an impressive view of the vanity of the life of all men, and their transient state. Their pomp is a mere image, and their wealth is gathered they know not for whom. 7. The interrogation makes the implied negative stronger. Though this world offers nothing to our expectation, God is worthy of all confidence. 8-10. Patiently submissive, he prays for the removal of his chastisement, and that he may not be a reproach. 11. From his own case, he argues to that of all, that the destruction of man's enjoyments is ascribable to sin. 12, 13. Consonant with the tenor of the Psalm, he prays for God's compassionate regard to him as a stranger here, and that, as such was the condition of his fathers, so, like them, he may be cheered instead of being bound under wrath and chastened in displeasure.

PSALM XL.

Ver. 1-17. In this Psalm a celebration of God's deliverance is followed by a profession of devotion to His service. Then follows a prayer for relief from imminent dangers, involving the overthrow of enemies and the rejoicing of sympathizing friends. In Hebrews 10, 5, &c., Paul quotes v. 6-8 as the words of Christ, offering himself as a better sacrifice. Some suppose Paul thus accommodated David's words to express Christ's sentiments. But the value of his quotation would be thus destroyed, as it would have no force in his argument, unless regarded by his readers as the original sense of the passage in the Old Testament. Others suppose the Psalm describes David's feelings in suffering and joy; but the language quoted by Paul, in the sense given by him, could not apply to David in any of his relations, for as a type the language is not adapted to describe any event or condition of David's career, and as an individual representing the pious generally, neither he nor they could properly use it (cf. on v. 7 below). The Psalm must be taken then, as the sixteenth, to express the feelings of Christ's human nature. The difficulties pertinent to this view will be considered as they occur.

1-3. The figures for deep distress are illustrated in Jeremiah's history (Jeremiah 38, 6-12). Patience and trust manifested in distress, deliverance in answer to prayer, and the blessed effect of it in eliciting praise from God's true worshippers, teach us that Christ's suffering is our example, and His deliverance our encouragement (Hebrews 5, 7, 8; 12, 3; 1 Peter 4, 12-16). inclined—(the ear, Psalm 17, 6), as if to catch the faintest sigh. a new song—(Psalm 33, 3). fear, and . . . trust—revere with love and faith. 4. Blessed—(Psalm 1, 1; 2, 12.) respecteth—lit., turns towards, as an object of confidence. turn aside—from true God and his law to falsehood in worship and conduct. 5. he reckoned up in order—(cf. Psalm 5, 3; 33, 14; Isaiah 44, 7), too many to be set forth regularly. This is but one instance of many. The use of the plural accords with the union of Christ and His people. In suffering and triumph, they are one with Him. 6-8. In Paul's view this passage has more meaning than the mere expression of grateful devotion to God's service. He represents Christ as declaring that the sacrifices, whether vegetable or animal, general or special expiatory offerings, would not avail to meet the demands of God's law, and that He had come to render the required satisfaction, which he states was effected by "the offering of the body of Christ," for that is the "will of God" which Christ came to fulfil or do, in order to effect man's redemption. We thus see that the contrast to the unsatisfactory character assigned the Old Testament offerings in v. 6 is found in the compliance with God's law (cf. v. 7, 8). Of course, as Paul and other New Testament writers explain Christ's work, it consisted in more than being made under the law or obeying its precepts. It required an "obedience unto death," and that is the compliance here chiefly intended, and which makes the contrast with v. 6 clear. mine ears hast thou opened—Whether allusion is made to the custom of boring a servant's ear, in token of voluntary and perpetual enslavement (Exodus 21, 6), or that the opening of the ear, as in Isaiah 43, 8; 50, 5 (though by a different word in Hebrew) denotes obedience by the common figure of hearing for obeying, it is evident that the clause is designed to express a devotion to God's will as avowed more fully in v. 8, and already explained. Paul, however, uses the words, "a body hast thou prepared me," which are found in the Septuagint in the place of the words, "mine ears hast thou opened." He does not lay any stress on this clause, and his argument is complete without it. It is, perhaps, to be regarded rather as an interpretation or free translation by the Septuagint, than either an addition or attempt at verbal translation. The Septuagint translators may have had reference to Christ's vicarious sufferings as taught in other Scriptures, as Isaiah 53.; at all events the sense is substantially the same, as a body was essential to the required obedience (cf. Romans 7, 4; 1 Peter 2, 24). 7. Then—in such case, without necessarily referring to order of time. Lo, I come—I am prepared to do, &c. in the volume of the book—roll of the book. Such rolls, resembling maps, are still used in the synagogues. written of me—or on me, prescribed to me (2 Kings 22, 13). The first is the sense adopted by Paul. In either case, the Pentateuch, or law of Moses, is meant, and while it contains much respecting Christ directly, as Genesis 3, 15; 49, 10; Deuteronomy 18, 15, and, indirectly, in the Levitical ritual, there is nowhere any allusion to David. 9, 10. Christ's prophetic office is taught. He "preached" the great truths of God's government of sinners. I have preached—lit., announced good tidings. 11. may be rendered as an assertion, that God will not withhold, &c. (Psalm 16, 1). 12. evils—inflicted by others. iniquities—or penal afflictions, and sometimes calamities in the wide sense. This meaning of the word is very common (Psalm 31, 11; 33, 4; cf. Genesis 4, 13, Cain's punishment; Genesis 19, 15, that of Sodom; 1 Samuel 28, 10, of the witch of Endor; also 2 Samuel 16, 12; Job 19, 29; Isaiah 5, 18; 53, 11). This meaning of the word is also favoured by the clause, taken hold of me, which follows, which can be said appropriately of sufferings, but not of sins (cf. Job 27, 20; Psalm 69, 24). Thus, the difficulties in referring this Psalm to Christ, arising from the usual reading of this verse, are removed. Of the terrible afflictions, or sufferings, alluded to and endured for us, cf. Luke 22, 39-44, and the narrative of the scenes of Calvary. my heart falleth me—(Matthew 26, 38), "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death," cannot look up—lit., I cannot see, not denoting the depression of conscious guilt, as Luke 18, 13, but exhaustion from suffering, as dimness of eyes (cf. Psalm 6, 7; 13, 4; 38, 10). The whole context thus sustains the sense assigned to iniquities. 13. (Cf. Psalm 22, 19.) 14, 15. The language is not necessarily imprecatory, but rather a confident expectation (Psalm 5, 11), though the former sense is not inconsistent with Christ's prayer for the forgiveness of His murderers, inasmuch as their confusion and shame might be the very means to prepare them for humbly seeking forgiveness (cf. Acts 2, 37). for a reward—lit., in consequence of. Aha—(Cf. Psalm 35, 21, 25.) 16. (Cf. Psalm 55, 27.) love thy salvation—delight in its bestowal on others as well as themselves. 17. A summary of his condition and hopes. thinketh upon—or provides for me. "He was heard," "when he had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears, unto Him that was able to save him from death."

PSALM XLI.

Ver. 1-13. The Psalmist celebrates the blessedness of those who compassionate the poor, conduct strongly contrasted with the spite of his enemies and neglect of his friends in his calamity. He prays for God's mercy in view of his ill desert, and, in confidence of relief, and that God will vindicate his cause, closes with a doxology.

1-3. God rewards kindness to the poor (Proverbs 19, 17). From v. 2 and 11 it may be inferred that the Psalmist describes his own conduct. poor—in person, position, and possessions. shall be blessed—lit., led aright, or safely, prospered (Psalm 23, 3). upon the earth—or land of promise (Psalm 25, 13; 27, 3-9, &c.). The figures of v. 3 are drawn from the acts of a kind nurse. 4. I said—I asked the mercy I show. heal my soul—(Cf. Psalm 30, 2.) "Sin and suffering are united," is one of the great teachings of the Psalmist. 5, 6. A graphic picture of the conduct of a malignant enemy. to see me—as if to spy out my case. he speaketh . . . itself—or, "he speaketh vanity as to his heart"—i. e., does not speak candidly, "he gathereth iniquity to him," collects elements for mischief, and then divulges the gains of his hypocrisy. 7, 8. So of others, *all act alike. An evil disease—lit., a word of Belial, some slander. cleaveth—lit., poured on him, that he lieth—who has now laid down, "he is utterly undone and our victory is sure." 9. mine . . . friend—lit., man of my peace. eat . . . bread—who depended on me or was well treated by me. lifted up his heel—in scornful violence. As David and his fortunes typified Christ and His (cf. Introduction), so these words expressed the treatment he received, and also that of his Son and Lord; hence, though not distinctly prophetic, our Saviour (John 13, 18) applies them to Judas, "that the Scripture may be fulfilled." This last phrase has a wide use in the New Testament, and is not restricted to denote special prophecies. 10. A lawful punishment of criminals is not revenge, nor inconsistent with their final good (cf. Psalm 40, 14, 15). 11-13. favourest—or tenderly lovest me (Genesis 34, 19), evinced by relief from his enemies; and, farther, God recognizes his innocence by upholding him. testest . . . before thy face—under thy watch and care, as God before man's face (Psalm 16, 8) is an object of trust and love. Blessed—praised, usually applied to God. The word usually applied to men denotes happiness (Psalm 1, 1; 32, 1). With this doxology the first book closes.*

PSALM XLII.

Ver. 1-11. Maschil—(cf. Psalm 32., title). For, or of (cf. Introduction) the sons of Korah. The writer, perhaps one of this Levitical family of singers accompanying David in exile, mourns his absence from the sanctuary, a cause of grief aggravated by the taunts of enemies, and is comforted in hopes of relief. This course of thought is repeated with some variety of detail, but closing with the same refrain.

1, 2—(Cf. Psalm 63, 1.) panteth—desires in a state of exhaustion. appear before God—in acts of worship, the terms used in the command for the stated personal appearance of the Jews at the sanctuary. 3. Where is thy God?—implying that He had forsaken him (cf. 2 Samuel 16, 7; Psalm 3, 2; 22, 8). 4. The verbs are properly rendered as futures, "I will remember," &c., &c.—i. e., the recollection of this season of distress will give greater zest to the privileges of God's worship, when obtained. 5. Hence he chides his despondent soul, assuring himself of a time of joy. help of his countenance—or, face (cf. Numbers 6, 25; Psalm 4, 6; 16, 11). 6. Dejection again described. therefore—i. e., finding no comfort in myself, I turn to thee, even in this distant "land of Jordan and the (mountains) Hermons," the country east of Jordan. hill Mizar—as a name of a small hill contrasted with the mountains round about Jerusalem, perhaps denoted the contempt with which the place of exile was regarded. 7. The roar of successive billows, responding to that of floods of rain, represented the heavy waves of sorrow which overwhelmed him. 8. Still he relies on as constant a flow of Divine mercy which will elicit his praise and encourage his prayer to God; 9, 10. in view of which, he dictates to himself a prayer based on his distress, aggravated as it was by the cruel taunts and infidel suggestions of his foes. 11. This brings on a renewed self-chiding, and excites hopes of relief. health [or, help] of my countenance—(Cf. v. 5) who cheers me, driving away clouds of sorrow from my face. my God—It is He of whose existence and favour my foes would have me doubt.

PSALM XLIII.

Ver. 1-5. Excepting the recurrence of the refrain, there is no good reason to suppose this a part of the preceding, though the scope is the same. It has always been placed separate.

1. Judge—or, vindicate (Psalm 10, 18). plead, &c.—(Psalm 35, 1.) ungodly—neither in character or condition objects of God's favour (cf. Psalm 4, 3). 2. God of my strength—by covenant relation my stronghold (Psalm 18, 1). cast me off—in scorn. because—or, in, i. e., in such circumstances of oppression. 3. light—as Psalm 27, 1. truth—or, faithfulness (Psalm 25, 5), manifest it by fulfilling promises. Light and truth are personified as messengers who will bring him to the privileged place of worship. tabernacles—plural, in allusion to the various courts. 4. the altar—as the chief place of worship. The mention of the harp suggests the prominence of praise in his offering.

PSALM XLIV.

Ver. 1-26. In a time of great national distress, probably in David's reign, the Psalmist recounts God's gracious dealings in former times, and the confidence they had learned to repose in him. After a vivid picture of their calamities, he humbly expostulates against God's apparent forgetfulness, reminding Him of their faithfulness and mourning their heavy sorrows.

1-3. This period is that of the settlement of Canaan (Joshua 24, 12; Judges 6, 3). have told—or, related (cf. Exodus 10, 2). plantedst them—i. e., our fathers, who are also, from the parallel construction of the last clause, to be regarded as the object of "cast them out," which means—lit., send them out, or, "extend them." Heathen and people denote the nations who were driven out to make room for the Israelites. 4. Thou art my King—lit., he who is my King, sustaining the same covenant relation as to the "fathers." 5. The figure drawn from the habits of the ox. 6-8. God is not only our sole help, but only worthy of praise. thy name—as Psalm 5, 11. put . . . to shame—(cf. Psalm 6, 10), disgraced. 9. But—contrasting, cast off as abhorrent (Psalm 43, 2). goest not forth—lit., will not go (2 Samuel 5, 23). In several consecutive verses the leading verb is future, and the following one past (in Hebrew), thus denoting the causes and effects. Thus (v. 10, 11, 12), when defeated, spoiling follows; when delivered as sheep, dispersion follows, &c. 11. The Babylonian captivity not necessarily meant. There were others (cf. 1 Kings 8, 46). 13, 14. (Cf. Deuteronomy 28, 37; Psalm 70, 4.) 15. shame of . . . face—blushes in disgrace. 16. Its cause, the taunts and presence of malignant enemies (Psalm 8, 2). 17-19. They had not apostatized totally—were still God's people. declined—turned aside from God's law. ore broken—crushed. place of dragons—desolate, barren, rocky wilderness (Psalm 63, 10; Isaiah 13, 22). shadow of death—(Cf. Psalm 23, 4.) 20, 21. A solemn appeal to God to witness their constancy. stretched out . . . hands—gesture of worship (Exodus 9, 29; Psalm 88, 9). 22. Their protracted sufferings as God's people attest the constancy. Paul (Romans 8, 36) uses this to describe Christian steadfastness in persecution. 23-26. This style of addressing God, as indifferent, is frequent (Psalm 3, 7; 9, 19; 13, 1, &c.). However low their condition, God is appealed to, for the honour, and for the honour, of His mercy.

PSALM XLV.

Ver. 1-17. Shoshannim—lit., Lilies, either descriptive of an instrument so shaped, or denoting some tune or air so called, after which the Psalm was to be sung (cf. Psalm 8., title). A song of loves, or, of beloved ones (plural and feminine)—a conjugal song. Maschil (cf. Psalm 32. and 42.) denotes the didactic character of the Psalm; that it gives instruction, the song being of allegorical and not literal import. The union and glories of Christ and his Church are described. He is addressed as a king possessed of all essential graces, as a conqueror exalted on the throne of a righteous and eternal government, and as a bridegroom arrayed in nuptial splendour. The Church is portrayed in the purity and loveliness of a royally adorned and attended bride, invited to forsake her home and share the honours of her affianced lord. The picture of an Oriental wedding thus opened is filled up by representing the complimentary gifts of the wealthy with which the occasion is honoured, the procession of the bride, clothed in splendid raiment, attended by her virgin companions, and the entrance of the joyous throng into the palace of the king. A prediction of a numerous and distinguished progeny, instead of the complimentary wish for it usually expressed (cf. Genesis 24, 60; Ruth 4, 11, 12), and an assurance of a perpetual fame, closes the Psalm. All ancient Jewish and Christian interpreters regarded this Psalm as an allegory of the purport above named. In the Song of Songs the allegory is carried out more fully. Hosea (ch. 1.-3.) treats the relation of God and His people under the same figure, and its use to set forth the relation of Christ and His Church runs through both parts of the Bible (cf. Isaiah 54, 5; 62, 4, 5; Matthew 22, 3; 25, 1; John 3, 29; Ephesians 5, 25-32, &c., &c.). Other methods of exposition have been suggested. Several Jewish monarchs, from Solomon to the wicked Ahab, and various foreign princes, have been named as the hero of the song. But to none of them can the terms here used be shown to apply, and it is hardly probable that any mere nuptial song, especially of a heathen king, would be permitted a place in the sacred songs of the Jews. The advocates for any other than the Messianic interpretation have generally silenced each other in succession, while the application of the most rigorous rules of a fair system of interpretation has but strengthened the evidences in its favour. The scope of the Psalm above given is easy and sustained by the explication of its details. The quotation of v. 6, 7 by Paul (Hebrews 1, 8, 9), as applicable to Christ, ought to be conclusive, and their special exposition shows the propriety of such an application.

1. An animated preface indicative of strong emotion. Lit., My heart overflows: a good matter I speak; the things which I have made, &c. inditing—lit., boiling up, as a fountain overflows. my tongue is the pen—a mere instrument of God's use. of a ready writer—i. e., it is fluent. The theme is inspiring and language flows fast. 2. To rich personal attractions is added grace of the lips, captivating powers of speech. This is given, and becomes a source of power and proves a blessing. Christ is a prophet (Luke 4, 22). 3, 4. The king is addressed as ready to go forth to battle. sword—(Cf. Revelation 1, 16; 19, 15.) Mighty—(Cf. Isaiah 9, 6.) glory and . . . majesty—generally used as Divine attributes (Psalm 96, 6; 104, 1; 111, 3), or as specially conferred on mortals (Psalm 21, 5), perhaps these typically. ride prosperously—or conduct a successful war. because of—for the interests of truth, &c. meekness . . . righteousness—without any connection—i. e., a righteousness or equity of government, distinguished by meekness or condescension (Psalm 18, 35). right hand—or power, as its organ. shall teach thee—point the way to terrible things—i. e., in conquest of enemies. 5. The result. people—whole nations are subdued. 6. No lawful construction can be devised to change the sense here given and sustained by the ancient versions, and above all by Paul (Hebrews 1, 8). Of the perpetuity of this government (cf. 2 Samuel 7, 13; Psalm 10, 16; 72, 5; 89, 4; 110, 4; Isaiah 9, 7). 7. As in v. 6 the Divine nature is made prominent, here the moral qualities of the human are alleged as the reason or ground of the mediatorial exultation. Some render "O God, thy God," instead of God thy God—but the latter is sustained by the same form (Psalm 50, 7), and it was only of His human nature that the anointing could be predicated (cf. Isaiah 61, 3). oil of gladness—or token of gladness, as used in feasts and other times of solemn joy (cf. 1 Kings 1, 39, 40). fellows—other kings. 8. The king thus inaugurated is now presented as a bridegroom, who appears in garments richly perfumed, brought out from ivory palaces, His royal residence; by which, as indications of the happy bridal occasion, He has been gladdened. 9. In completion of this picture of a marriage festival, female attendants or bridesmaids of the highest rank attend Him, while the queen, in rich apparel (v. 13), stands ready for the nuptial procession. 10, 11. She is invited to the union, for forming which she must leave her father's people. She representing, by the form of the allegory, the church, this address is illustrated by all those scriptures, from Genesis 12, 1 on, which speak of the people of God as a chosen, separate, and peculiar people. The relation of subjection to her spouse at once accords with the law of marriage, as given in Genesis 3, 16; 18, 12; Ephesians 5, 22; 1 Peter 3, 5, 6, and the relation of the church to Christ (Ephesians 5, 24). The love of the husband is intimately connected with the entire devotion to which the bride is exhorted. 12. daughter of Tyre—(Psalm 9, 14)—denotes the people. Tyre, celebrated for its great wealth, is selected to represent the richest nations, an idea confirmed by the next clause. These gifts are brought as means to conciliate the royal parties, representing the admitted subjection of the offerers. This well sets forth the exalted position of the church and her head, whose moral qualities receive the homage of the world. The contribution of material wealth to sustain the institutions of the church may be included (cf. "riches of the Gentiles," Psalm 72, 10; Isaiah 60, 5-10). 13. the king's daughter—a term of dignity. It may also intimate, with some allusion to the teaching of the allegory, that the bride of Christ, the church, is the daughter of the great king, God. within—not only is her outward raiment costly, but all her apparel of the richest texture. wrought gold—gold embroidery, or cloth in which gold is woven. 14, 15. The progress of the procession is described; according to the usual custom the bride and attendants are conducted to the palace. Some for the words—in raiment of needle-work—propose another rendering, on variegated (or embroidered) cloths—i. e., in the manner of the East, richly wrought tapestry was spread on the ground, on which the bride walked. As the dress had been already mentioned, this seems to be a probable translation. shall be brought—in solemn form (cf. Job 10, 19; 21, 22). The entrance into the palace with great joy closes the scene. So shall the church be finally brought to her Lord, and united amid the festivities of the holy beings in heaven. 16. As earthly monarchs govern widely extended empires by viceroys, this glorious king is represented as supplying all the principalities of earth with princes of his own numerous progeny. 17. The glories of this empire shall be as wide as the world and lasting as eternity. therefore—because thus glorious, the praise shall be universal and perpetual. Some writers have taxed their ingenuity to find in the history and fortunes of Christ and His church exact parallels for every part of this splendid allegory, not excepting its gorgeous Oriental imagery. Thus, by the dresses of the king and queen, are thought to be meant the eminent endowments and graces of Christ and His people. The attendant women, supposed (though inconsistently it might seem with the inspired character of the work) to be concubines, are thought to represent the Gentile churches, and the bride the Jewish, &c., &c. But it is evident that we cannot pursue such a mode of interpretation. For, following the allegory, we must suspend to the distant future the results of a union whose consummation as a marriage is still distant (cf. Revelation 21, 9). In fact, the imagery here and elsewhere sets before us the church in two aspects. As a body, it is yet incomplete, the whole is yet ungathered. As a moral institution, it is yet imperfect. In the final catastrophe it will be complete and perfect. Thus, as a bride adorned, &c., it will be united with its Lord. Thus the union of Christ and the church triumphant is set forth. On the other hand, in regard to its component parts, the relation of Christ as head, as husband, &c., already exists, and as these parts form an institution in this world, it is by His union with it, and the gifts and graces with which He endows it, that a spiritual seed arises and spreads in the world. Hence we must fix our minds only on the one simple but grand truth, that Christ loves the church, is head over all things for it, raises it in His exaltation to the highest moral dignity—a dignity of which every, even the meanest, sincere disciple will partake. As to the time, then, in which this allegorical prophecy is to be fulfilled, it may be said that no periods of time are specially designated. The characteristics of the relation of Christ and His church are indicated, and we may suppose that the whole process of His exaltation from the declaration of His Sonship, by His resurrection, to the grand catastrophe of the final judgment, with all the collateral blessings to the church and the world, lay before the vision of the inspired prophet.

PSALM XLVI.

Ver. 1-11. Upon Alamoth—most probably denotes the treble, or part sung by female voices, the word meaning virgins; and which was sung with some appropriately keyed instrument (cf. 1 Chronicles 15, 19-21; Psalm 6., title). The theme may be stated in Luther's well-known words, "A strong fortress is our God." The great deliverance (2 Kings 19, 35; Isaiah 37, 36) may have occasioned its composition.

1. refuge—lit., a place of trust (Psalm 2, 12). strength—(Psalm 18, 2.) present help—lit., a help he has been found exceedingly. trouble—as Psalm 18, 7. 2, 3. The most violent civil commotions are illustrated by the greatest physical commotions. swelling—well represents the pride and haughtiness of insolent foes. 4. God's favour is denoted by a river (cf. Psalm 36, 8; Zechariah 14, 8; Revelation 22, 1). city of God, the holy place—His earthly residence, Jerusalem and the temple (cf. Psalm 2, 6; 3, 4; 20, 2; 48, 2, &c.). God's favour, like a river whose waters are conducted in channels, is distributed to all parts of His church. Most High—denoting His supremacy (Psalm 17, 2). 5. right early—lit., at the turn of morning, or change from night to day, a critical time (Psalm 30, 5; cf. Isaiah 37, 36). 6. (Cf. v. 4.) earth melted—all powers dissolved by His mere word (Psalm 75, 3; Hosea 2, 22). 7. with us—on our side, His presence is terror to our enemies, safety to us. refuge—high place (Psalm 9, 9; cf. also Psalm 24, 6, 10). 8. what desolations—lit., who hath put desolations, destroying our enemies. 9. The usual weapons of war (Psalm 7, 12), as well as those using them, are brought to an end. 10. Be still, &c.—Lit., Leave off to oppose me and vex my people. I am over all for their safety (cf. Isaiah 2, 11; Ephesians 1, 22).

PSALM XLVII.

Ver. 1-9. Praise is given to God for victory, perhaps that recorded (2 Chronicles 20.); and His dominion over all people, Jews and Gentiles, is asserted.

1. clap . . . hands . . . people—lit., peoples, or nations (cf. Deuteronomy 32, 43; Psalm 18, 49; 98, 9). 2, 3. His universal sovereignty now exists, and will be made known. under us—i. e., His saints; Israel's temporal victories were types of the spiritual conquests of the true Church. 4. He shall . . . inheritance—the heathen to be possessed by His Church (Psalm 2, 8), as Canaan by the Jews. excellency of Jacob—lit., pride, or, that in which he glories (not necessarily, though often, in a bad sense), the privileges of the chosen people—whom he loved—His love being the sole cause of granting them. 5-7. God, victorious over His enemies, reascends to heaven, amid the triumphant praises of His people, who celebrate His sovereign dominion. This sovereignty is what the Psalm teaches; hence he adds—sing . . . praises with understanding—lit., sing and play an instructive (Psalm). The whole typifies Christ's ascension (cf. Psalm 68, 18). 8, 9. The instruction continued. throne of . . . holiness—or, holy throne (cf. on Psalm 2, 6; 23, 3). princes—who represent peoples. For—even—supply, as, or, to—i. e., they all become united under covenant with Abraham's God. shields—as Hosea 4, 18, rulers.

PSALM XLVIII.

Ver. 1-14. This is a spirited Psalm and song (cf. Psalm 30.), having probably been suggested by the same occasion as the foregoing. It sets forth the privileges and blessings of God's spiritual dominion as the terror of the wicked and joy of the righteous.

1. To be praised—always; it is an epithet, as Psalm 18, 3. mountain of his holiness—His Church (cf. Isaiah 2, 2, 3; 25, 6, 7, 10); the sanctuary was erected first on Mount Zion, then (as the temple) on Moriah; hence the figure. 2, 3. situation—lit., elevation, joy of, &c.—source of joy. sides of the north—poetically for eminent, lofty, distinguished, as the ancients believed the north to be the highest part of the earth (cf. Isaiah 14, 13). palaces—lit., citadels. refuge —(Psalm 9, 10; 18, 3.) He was so known in them, because they enjoyed His presence. 4-6. For—the reason is given. Though the kings (perhaps of Moab and Ammon, cf. Psalm 83, 3-5) combined, a conviction of God's presence with His people, evinced by the unusual courage with which the prophets (cf. 2 Chronicles 20, 12-20) had inspired them, seized on their minds, and smitten with sudden and intense alarm, they fled astonished. 7. ships of Tarsish—as engaged in a distant and lucrative trade, the most valuable. The phrase may illustrate God's control over all material agencies, whether their literal destruction be meant or not. 8. This present experience assures of that perpetual care which God extends to His Church. 9. thought of—lit., compared, or considered, in respect of former dealings, in the . . . temple—in acts of solemn worship (cf. 2 Chronicles 20, 28). 10. According . . . praise—i. e., as thy perfections manifested (cf. Psalm 8, 1; 20, 1-7), demand praise, it shall be given, everywhere. thy right hand, &c.—thy righteous government is displayed by thy power. 11. the daughters, &c.—the small towns, or the people, with the chief city, or rulers of the Church. Judgments—decisions and acts of right government. 12-14. The call to survey Zion, or the Church, as a fortified city, is designed to suggest "how well our God secures His fold." This security is perpetual, and its pledge is his guidance through this life.

PSALM XLIX.

Ver. 1-20. This Psalm instructs and consoles. It teaches that earthly advantages are not reliable for permanent happiness, and that, however prosperous worldly men may be for a time, their ultimate destiny is ruin, while the pious are safe in God's care.

1-3. All are called to hear what interests all. world—lit., duration of life, the present time. 4. incline—to hear attentively (Psalm 17, 6; 31, 2). parable—In Hebrew and Greek, parable and proverb are translations of the same word. It denotes a comparison, or form of speech, which under one image includes many, and is expressive of a general truth capable of various illustrations. Hence it may be used for the illustration itself. For the former sense, proverb (i. e., one word for several) is the usual English term, and for the latter, in which comparison is prominent, parable (i. e., one thing laid by another). The distinction is not always observed, since here, and Psalm 78, 2, proverb would better express the style of the composition (cf. also Proverbs 26, 7, 9; Habakkuk 2, 6; John 16, 25, 29). Such forms of speech are often very figurative and also obscure (cf. Matthew 13, 12-15). Hence the use of the parallel word—dark saying—or, riddle (cf. Ezekiel 17, 2). open—is to explain. upon the harp—the accompaniment for a lyric. 5. Iniquity—or, calamity (Psalm 40, 12). of my heels—lit., my supplanters (Genesis 27, 36), or oppressors: "I am surrounded by the evils they inflict." 6. They are vainglorious—7-9—yet unable to save themselves or others. it ceaseth for ever—i. e., the ransom fails, the price is too precious, costly. corruption—lit., pit, or, grave, thus showing that soul is used for life. 10. For he seeth—i. e., corruption, then follows the illustration. wise . . . fool—(Psalm 14, 1; Proverbs 1, 32; 10, 1)—likewise—alike altogether—(Psalm 4, 8)—die—All meet the same fate. 11. Still infatuated and flattered with hopes of perpetuity, they call their lands, or "celebrate their names on account of (their) lands." 12. Contrasted with this vanity is their frailty. However honoured, man abideth not—lit., lodgeth not, remains not till morning, but suddenly perishes as (wild) beasts, whose lives are taken without warning. 13. Though their way is folly, others follow the same course of life. 14. Like sheep—(cf. v. 12) unwittingly, they—are laid—or, put, &c. death shall feed on [or, better, shall rule] them—as a shepherd (cf. feed, Psalm 23, 9, Margin). have dominion over [or, subdue] them in the morning—suddenly, or in their turn. their beauty—lit., form or shape. shall consume—lit., is for the consumption, i. e., of the grave. from their dwelling—lit., from their home (they go to it, i. e., the grave. 15. The pious, delivered from the—power—lit., the hand, of death, are taken under God's care. 16-19. applies this instruction. Be not anxious (Psalm 37. 1, &c.), since death cuts off the prosperous wicked whom you dread. Though . . . lived, &c.—lit., For in his life he blessed his soul, or, himself (Luke 12. 19; 16. 25); yet (v. 19), he has had his portion. men will praise . . . thyself—Flatterers enhance the rich fool's self-complacency; the form of address to him strengthens the emphasis of the sentiment. 20. (Cf. v. 12.) The folly is more distinctly expressed by understandeth not, substituted for abideth not.

PSALM L.

Ver. 1-23. In the grandeur and solemnity of a Divine judgment, God is introduced as instructing men in the nature of true worship, exposing hypocrisy, warning the wicked, and encouraging the pious.

1-4. The description of this majestic appearance of God resembles that of His giving the law (cf. Exodus 19. 16; 20. 18; Deuteronomy 32. 1). from above—lit., above (Genesis 1. 7). heavens . . . earth—for all creatures are witnesses (Deuteronomy 4. 26; 30. 19; Isaiah 1. 2). 5. my saints—(Psalm 4. 3)—made—[lit., cut] a covenant, &c.,—alluding to the dividing of a victim of sacrifice, by which covenants were ratified, the parties passing between the divided portions (cf. Genesis 15. 10, 18). 6. The inhabitants of heaven, who well know God's character, attest His righteousness as a judge. 7. I will testify against—i. e., for failure to worship aught. thy God—and so, by covenant as well as creation, entitled to a pure worship. 8-15. However scrupulous in external worship, it was offered as if they conferred an obligation in giving God His own, and with a degrading view of Him as needing it. Reproving them for such foolish and blasphemous notions, He teaches them to offer, or lit., sacrifice, thanksgiving, and pay, or perform, their vows—i. e., to bring, with the external symbolical service, the homage of the heart, and faith, penitence, and love. To this is added an invitation to seek, and a promise to afford, all needed help in trouble. 16-20. the wicked—i. e., the formalists, as now exposed, and who lead vicious lives (cf. Romans 2. 21, 23). They are unworthy to use even the words of God's law. Their hypocrisy and vice are exposed by illustrations from sins against the seventh, eighth, and ninth commandments. 21, 22. God, no longer (even in appearance) disregarding such, exposes their sins and threatens a terrible punishment. forget God—this denotes unmindfulness of His true character. 23. offereth praise—(v. 14), so that the external worship is a true index of the heart. ordereth . . . aright—acts in a straight, right manner, opposed to turning aside (Psalm 25. 5). In such, pure worship and a pure life evince their true piety, and they will enjoy God's presence and favour.

PSALM LI.

Ver. 1-19. On the occasion of, 2 Samuel 11. 12. The Psalm illustrates true repentance, in which are comprised conviction, confession, sorrow, prayer for mercy, and purposes of amendment, and it is accompanied by a lively faith.

1-4. A plea for mercy is a confession of guilt. blot out—as from a register. transgressions—lit., rebellions (Psalm 19. 13; 32. 1). Wash me—Purity as well as pardon is desired by true penitents. For . . . before me—Conviction precedes forgiveness; and, as a gift of God, is a plea for it (2 Samuel 12. 13; Psalm 32. 5; 1 John 1. 9). Against thee—chiefly, and as sins against others are violations of God's law, in one sense only. that . . . judgest—i. e., all palliation of his crime is excluded; it is the design in making this confession to recognize God's justice, however severe the sentence. 5, 6. His guilt was aggravated by his essential, native sinfulness, which is as contrary to God's requisitions of inward purity as are outward sins to those for right conduct. thou shalt make, &c.,—may be taken to express God's gracious purpose in view of his strict requisition; a purpose of which David might have availed himself as a check to his native love for sin, and, in not doing so, aggravated his guilt. truth . . . and . . . wisdom—are terms often used for piety (cf. Job 28. 28; Psalm 119. 30). 7-12. A series of prayers for forgiveness and purifying. Purge . . . hyssop—The use of this plant in the ritual (Exodus 12. 22; Numbers 19. 6, 18) suggests the idea of atonement as prominent here; purge refers to vicarious satisfaction (Numbers 19. 17-20). Make . . . joy—by forgiving me, which will change distress to joy. Hide, &c.,—Turn from beholding. Create—a work of almighty power. in me—lit., to, or, for me: bestow as a gift, a heart free from taint of sin (Psalm 24. 4; 73. 1). renew—implies that he had possessed it; the essential principle of a new nature had not been lost, but its influence interrupted (Luke 22. 32); for v. 11 shows that he had not lost God's presence and Spirit (1 Samuel 16. 13), though he had lost the "joy of his salvation" (v. 12), for whose return he prays. right spirit—lit., constant, firm, not yielding to temptation. free spirit—thy ought not to be supplied, for the word free is, lit., willing, and spirit is that of David. "Let a willing spirit uphold me," i. e., with a soul willingly conformed to God's law, he would be preserved in a right course of conduct. 13. Then—such will be the effect of this gracious work. ways—of providence and human duty (Psalm 18. 21, 30; 32. 8; Luke 22. 32). 14. Deliver—or, Free me (Psalm 39. 8) from the guilt of murder (2 Samuel 12. 9, 10; Psalm 5. 6). righteousness—as Psalm 7. 17; 31. 1. 15. open . . . lips—by removing my sense of guilt. 16. Praise is better than sacrifice (Psalm 50. 14), and implying faith, penitence, and love, glorifies God. In true penitents the joys of pardon mingle with sorrow for sin. 18. Do good, &c.,—Visit not my sin on thy Church. build . . . walls—is to show favour; cf. Psalm 89. 40, for opposite form and idea. 19. God reconciled, material sacrifices will be acceptable (Psalm 4. 5; cf. Isaiah 1. 11-17).

PSALM LII.

Ver. 1-9. Cf. 1 Samuel 21. 1-10; 22. 1-10, for the history of the title. The first verse gives the theme; the boast of the wicked over the righteous is vain, for God constantly cares for His people. This is expanded by describing the malice and deceit, and then the ruin, of the wicked, and the happy state of the pious.

1. mighty man—lit., hero. Doeg may be thus addressed, ironically, in respect of his might in slander. 2. tongue—for self. mischiefs—evil to others (Psalm 5. 9; 33. 12). working deceitfully—(Psalm 10. 7), as a keen, smoothly moving razor, cutting quietly, but deeply. 3, 4. all-devouring—lit., swallowing, which utterly destroy (cf. Psalm 21. 9; 35. 25.) 5. likewise—or, so, also, as you have done to others God will do to you (Psalm 18. 27). The following terms describe the most entire ruin. 6. shall . . . fear—regard with religious awe. laugh at him—for his folly; 7. for trusting in riches and being strong in wickedness—lit., mischief (v. 2), instead of trusting in God. the man—lit., the mighty man, or hero (v. 1). 8. The figure used is common (Psalm 1. 3; Jeremiah 11. 16). green—fresh. house, &c.,—in communion with God (cf. Psalm 27. 4, 5). for ever and ever—qualifies mercy. 9. hast done—i. e., what the context supplies, preserved me (cf. Psalm 22. 31). wait . . . name—hope in thy perfections, manifested for my good (Psalm 5. 11; 20. 1). for it is good—i. e., thy name, and the whole method or result of its manifestation (Psalm 54. 6; 69. 16).

PSALM LIII.

Ver. 1-6. On Mahathath—(cf. Psalm 83., title). Why this repetition of Psalm 14. is given we do not know.

1-4, with few verbal changes, correspond with Psalm 14. 1-4. 5. Instead of assurances of God's presence with the pious, and a complaint of the wicked, Psalm 14. 5, 6 portrays the ruin of the latter, whose "bones" even "are scattered" (cf. Psalm 141. 7), and who are put to shame as contemptuously rejected of God.

PSALM LIV.

Ver. 1-7. Cf. title of Psalm 4. and 32.; for the history, 1 Samuel 23. 19, 29; 26. 1-25. After an earnest cry for help, the Psalmist promises praise in the assurance of a hearing.

1. by thy name—(Psalm 5. 11), specially, power. judge me—as Psalm 7. 8; 26. 1. 2. (Cf. Psalm 4. 1; 5. 1.) 3. strangers—perhaps Ziphites. oppressors—lit., terrible ones (Isaiah 13. 11; 25. 3). Such were Saul and his army. not set . . . them—acted as atheists, without God's fear (cf. Psalm 16. 8). 4. (Cf. Psalm 30. 10.) with them—on their side, and for me (cf. Psalm 46. 11). 5. He shall . . . evil—or, Evil shall return on (Psalm 7. 16) my enemies or watchers, i. e., to do me evil (Psalm 6. 7). in thy truth—thy verified promise. 6. I will freely, &c.—or, present a free-will offering (Leviticus 7. 16; Numbers 15. 3). 7. mine eye . . . desire—(cf. Psalm 59. 10; 112. 8), expresses satisfaction in beholding the overthrow of his enemies as those of God, without implying any selfish or unholy feeling (cf. Psalm 52. 6, 7).

PSALM LV.

Ver. 1-23. In great terror on account of enemies, and grieved by the treachery of a friend, the Psalmist offers an earnest prayer for relief. He mingles confident assurances of Divine favour to himself with invocations and predictions of God's avenging judgments on the wicked. The tone suits David's experience, both in the times of Saul and Absalom, though perhaps neither was exclusively before his mind.

1. hide not thyself, &c.—(cf. Psalm 13. 1; 27. 9), withhold not help. 2. The terms of the last clause express full indulgence of grief. 3. oppression—lit., persecution. they . . . iniquity—lit., they make evil doings slide upon me. 4, 5. express great alarm. come upon [or lit., into] me. 6. be at rest—lit., dwell, i. e., permanently. 7, 8. Even a wilderness is a safer place than exposure to such evils, terrible as storm and tempest. 9. Destroy—lit., Swallow (Psalm 21. 9). divide their tongues—or, confound their speech, and hence their counsels (Genesis 11. 7). the city—perhaps Jerusalem, the scene of anarchy. 10, 11, which is described in detail (cf. Psalm 7. 14-16). Wickedness—lit., Mischief, evils resulting from others (Psalm 5. 9; 52. 2, 7). streets—or lit., wide places, markets, courts of justice, and any public place. 12-14. This description of treachery does not deny, but aggravates, the injury from enemies. guide—lit., friend (Proverbs 16. 23; 17. 9). acquaintance—in Hebrew, a yet more intimate associate. in company—lit., with a crowd, in a festal procession. 15. Let death, &c.—or, "Desolations are on them." let them go (lit., they will go). quick—or, living in the midst of life, death will come (cf. Numbers 16. 33). among them—or, within them, in their hearts (Psalm 5. 9; 49. 11). 16-18. God answers his constant and repeated prayers. many with me—i. e., by the context, fighting with me. 19. God hears the wicked in wrath. abideth [or, sitteth] of old—enthroned as a sovereign. Because . . . no changes—Prosperity hardens them (Psalm 73. 5). 20, 21. The treachery is aggravated by hypocrisy. The changes of number, v. 15, 23, and here, enlivens the picture, and implies that the chief traitor and his accomplices are in view together. 22. thy burden—lit., gift, what is assigned you. he shall sustain—lit., supply food, and so all need (Psalm 157. 25; Matthew 6. 11). to be moved—from the secure position of his favour (cf. Psalm 10. 6). 23. bloody . . . days—(cf. Psalm 5. 6; 51. 14), deceit and murderous dispositions often united. The threat is directed specially (not as a general truth) against the wicked, then in the writer's view.

PSALM LVI.

Ver. 1-13. Upon Jonath-elem-rechokim—lit., upon the Dove of silence of distant places; either denoting a melody (cf. on Psalm 9.) of that name, to which this Psalm was to be performed; or it is an enigmatical form of denoting the subject, as given in the history referred to (1 Samuel 21. 11, &c.), David being regarded as an uncomplaining, meek dove, driven from his native home to wander in exile. Beset by domestic and foreign foes, David appeals confidently to God, recites his complaints, and closes with joyful and assured anticipations of God's continued help.

1, 2. would swallow—lit., pants as a raging beast (Acts 9. 1). enemies—watchers (Psalm 54. 5). Most High—as it is not elsewhere used absolutely for God, some render the word here, arrogantly, or proudly, as qualifying "those who fight," &c. 3. in [or lit., unto] thee—to whom he turns in trouble. 4. in God . . . his word—By His grace or aid (Psalm 60. 12; 108. 13), or, "I will boast in God as to His word;" in either case His word is the special matter and cause of praise. flesh—for mankind (Psalm 65. 2; Isaiah 31. 3), intimating frailty. 5, 6. A vivid picture of the conduct of malicious enemies. 7. Shall they escape?—or better, "Their escape is by iniquity." cast . . . people—humble those who so proudly oppose thy servant. 8. God is mindful of his exile and remembers his tears. The custom of bottling the tears of mourners as a memorial, which has existed in some Eastern nations, may explain the figure. 9. God is for me—or, on my side (Psalm 118. 6; 124. 1, 2), hence he is sure of the repulse of his foes. 12. I will . . . praise—will pay what I have vowed. 13. The question implies an affirmative answer, drawn from past experience. falling—as from a precipice. before God—in His favour during life.

PSALM LVII.

Ver. 1-11. Al-taschith—Destroy not. This is perhaps an enigmatical allusion to the critical circumstances connected with the history, for which cf. 1 Samuel 22. 1; 28. 1-3. In Moses' prayer (Deuteronomy 9. 26) it is a prominent petition deprecating God's anger against the people. This explanation suits the 58th and 59th also. Asaph uses it for the 75th, in the scope of which there is allusion to some emergency. Michtam—(Cf. Psalm 16.) To an earnest cry for Divine aid, the Psalmist adds, as often, the language of praise, in the assured hope of a favourable hearing.

1. my soul—or self, or life, which is threatened. shadow of thy wings—(Psalm 17. 8; 36. 7.) calamities—lit., mischiefs (Psalm 52. 2; 55. 10). 2. performeth—or, completes what he has begun. 3. from . . . swallow me up—that pants in rage after me (Psalm 56. 2). mercy and . . . truth—(Psalm 25. 10; 36. 5), as messengers (Psalm 43. 3) sent to deliver him. 4. The mingled figures of wild beasts (Psalm 10. 9; 17. 12) and weapons of war (Psalm 11. 2) heightens the picture of danger. whose . . . tongue—or slanders. 5. This doxology illustrates his view of the connection of his deliverance with God's glory. 6. (Cf. Psalm 7. 15; 9. 15, 16.) 7. I will . . . praise—both with voice and instrument. 8. Hence—he addresses his glory, or tongue (Psalm 16. 9; 30. 12), and his psalter, or lute and harp. I myself . . . early—lit., I will awaken dawn, poetically expressing his zeal and diligence. 9, 10. As His mercy and truth, so shall His praise, fill the universe.

PSALM LVIII.

Ver. 1-11. David's critical condition in some period of the Sauline persecution probably occasioned this Psalm, in which the Psalmist teaches that the innate and actual sinfulness of men deserves, and shall receive, God's righteous vengeance, while the pious may be consoled by the evidence of his wise and holy government of men.

1. Oh, congregation—lit., Oh dumb—the word used is never translated "congregation." "Are ye dumb? ye should speak righteousness," may be the translation. In any case, the writer remonstrates with them, perhaps a council, who were assembled to try his cause, and bound to give a right decision. 2. This they did not design; but weigh . . . violence—or give decisions of violence. Weigh is a figure to express the acts of judges. in the earth—publicly. 3-5, describe the wicked generally, who sin naturally, easily, malignantly and stubbornly. stopper her [or, lit., his] ear—i. e., the wicked man (the singular used collectively), who thus becomes like the deaf adder which has no ear. 6. He prays for their destruction, under the figure of ravenous beasts (Psalm 3. 7; 7. 2). 7. which run continually—lit., they shall go to themselves, utterly depart, as rapid mountain torrents. he bendeth . . . his arrows—prepares it. The term for preparing a bow applied to arrows (Psalm 64. 3). let them . . . pieces—lit., as if they cut themselves off—i. e., become blunted and of no avail. 8, 9. Other figures of this utter ruin; the last denoting rapidity. In a shorter time than pots feel the heat of thorns on fire—he shall take them away as with a whirlwind—lit., blow him (them) away. both living . . . wrath—lit., as the living or fresh, as the heated or burning—i. e., thorns—all easily blown away, so easily and quickly the wicked. The figure of the snail perhaps alludes to its loss of saliva when moving. Though obscure in its clauses, the general sense of the passage is clear. 10, 11. wash . . . wicked—denoting great slaughter. The joy of triumph over the destruction of the wicked is because they are God's enemies, and their overthrow shows that he reigneth (cf. Psalm 52, 5-7; 54, 7). In this assurance let heaven and earth rejoice (Psalm 96, 10; 97, 1, &c.).

PSALM LIX.

Ver. 1-17. Cf. Psalm 57., and for history, 1 Samuel 19, 11, &c. The scope is very similar to that of the 57th; prayer in view of malicious and violent foes, and joy in prospect of relief.

1. defend—(Cf. Margin.) rise up . . . me—(Cf. Psalm 17, 7.) 2. (Cf. Psalm 5, 5; 6, 8.) 4, 5. prepare, &c.—lit., set themselves as in array. awake—(Cf. Psalm 3, 7; 7, 6), appeals to God in his covenant relation to his people (Psalm 9, 18). 6, 7. They are as ravening dogs seeking prey, and as such, belch out—i. e., slanders, their impudent barkings. For who, say they—For the full expression with the supplied words, cf. Psalm 84, 5. 8. (Cf. Psalm 2, 4; 37, 13.) 9. By judicious expositors, and on good grounds, this is better rendered, "O my strength, on thee will I wait" (v. 17). defence—(Cf. Psalm 18, 3.) 10. prevent me—(Psalm 21, 3.) see my desire—in their overthrow (Psalm 54, 7). enemies—as Psalm 5, 8. 11. Slay them not—at once (Judges 2, 21-23); but perpetuate their punishment (Genesis 4, 12; Numbers 32, 13), by scattering or making them wander, and humble them. 12. let them be . . . taken in their pride—while evincing it—i. e., to be punished for their lies, &c. 13. Though delayed for wise reasons, the utter destruction of the wicked must come at last, and God's presence and power in and for his Church will be known abroad (1 Samuel 17, 46; Psalm 46, 10, 11). 14, 15. Meanwhile let the rapacious dogs prowl, they cannot hurt the pious; yea, they shall wander famished and sleepless. grudge if, &c.—lit., they shall stay all night—i. e., obtain nothing. 16, 17. contrast the lot of God's servant, who employs his time in God's praise. sing aloud . . . in the morning—when they retire famished and disappointed, or it may denote delightful diligence in praise, as Psalm 30, 5.

PSALM LX.

Ver. 1-12. Shushan-eduth—Lily of testimony. The lily is an emblem of beauty (cf. Psalm 45, title). As a description of the Psalm, those terms combined may denote a beautiful poem, witnessing—i. e., for God's faithfulness as evinced in the victories referred to in the history cited. Aram-naharaim—Syria of the two rivers, or Mesopotamia beyond the river (Euphrates) (2 Samuel 10, 16). Aram-zobah—Syria of Zobah (2 Samuel 10, 6), to whose king the king of the former was tributary. The war with Edom, by Joab and Abishai (2 Chronicles 13, 12, 25), occurred about the same time. Probably, while doubts and fears alternately prevailed respecting the issue of these wars, the writer composed this Psalm, in which he depicts, in the language of God's people, their sorrows under former disasters, offers prayer in present straits, and rejoices in confident hope of triumph by God's aid.

1-3. allude to disasters. cast . . . off—in scorn (Psalm 33, 2; 44, 9). scattered—broken our strength (cf. 2 Samuel 5, 20). Oh turn thyself—or, restore t'ous (prosperity). The figures of physical, denote great evil, commotions (Psalm 46, 2, 3). drink . . . wine of astonishment—lit., of staggering—i. e., made us weak (cf. Psalm 75, 8; Isaiah 51, 17, 22). 4, 5. Yet to God's banner they will rally, and pray that, led and sustained by his power (right hand, Psalm 17, 7; 20, 6), they may be safe. hear me—or hear us. 6-10. God hath spoken in [or, by] his holiness—(Psalm 89, 35; Amos 4, 2), on the pledge of his attributes (Psalm 22, 3; 30, 4). Taking courage from God's promise to give them possession (Exodus 23, 31; Deuteronomy 11, 24) (and perhaps renewed to him by special revelation), with triumphant joy he describes the conquest as already made. Shechem, and . . . Succoth—as widely separated points, and—Gilead . . . and Manasseh—as large districts, east and west of Jordan, represent the whole land. divide . . . and mete out—means to have entire control over. Ephraim—denotes the military (Deuteronomy 33, 17); and—Judah—(the lawgiver, Genesis 49, 10), the civil power. Foreign nations are then presented as subdued. Moab—is a washpot—the most ordinary vessel. over [or, at] Edom—(as a slave) he casts his shoe. Philistia, triumph . . . [or, rather, shout] for me—acknowledges subjection (cf. Psalm 108, 9, "over Philistia will I triumph"). 9, 10. He feels assured that, though once angry, God is now ready to favour his people. who will lead me—or, who has led me, as if the work were now begun. Wilt not thou—or, Is it not thou? 11, 12. Hence he closes with a prayer for success, and an assurance of a hearing.

PSALM LXI.

Ver. 1-8. Neginah—or, Neginoth (cf. Psalm 4, title). Separated from his usual spiritual privileges, perhaps by Absalom's rebellion, the Psalmist prays for Divine aid, and, in view of past mercies, with great confidence of being heard.

1-3. From the end, &c.—i. e., places remote from the sanctuary (Deuteronomy 28, 64). heart is overwhelmed—lit., covered over with darkness, or, distress. to the Rock (Psalm 18, 2; 40, 2) higher than I—which otherwise I cannot ascend. shelter . . . and strong tower—repeat the same sentiment. 4. I will abide—So I desire to do (cf. Psalm 23, 6). trust in the covert, &c.—make my refuge in the shadow (cf. Psalm 17, 8; 36, 7). 5. the heritage—or, part in the spiritual blessings of Israel (Psalm 21, 2-4). vows—implies prayers. 6, 7. the king—himself and his royal line ending in Christ. Mercy and truth personified, as Psalm 40, 11; 57, 3. abide before God—lit., sit as a king in God's presence, under his protection. 8. Thus for new blessings will new vows of praise ever be paid.

PSALM LXII.

Ver. 1-12. To Jeduthun—(cf. Psalm 39, title). The general tone of this Psalm is expressive of confidence in God. Occasion is taken to remind the wicked of their sin, their ruin, and their meanness.

1. waiteth—lit., is silent, trusts submissively and confidently as a servant. 2. The titles applied to God often occur (Psalm 9, 9; 13, 2). be greatly moved—(Psalm 10, 6) no injury shall be permanent, though devised by enemies. 3. Their destruction will come; as a tottering wall they already are feeble and falling. bowing wall shall ye be—better supply are. Some propose to apply these phrases to describe the condition of the man—i. e., the pious suffer: thus, "Will ye slay him," &c.; but the other is a good sense. 4. his excellency—or, elevation to which God had raised him (Psalm 4, 2). This they try to do by lies and duplicity (Psalm 5, 9). 5, 6. (Cf. Psalm 1, 2.) not be moved—not at all; his confidence has increased. 7. rock of my strength—or strongest support (Psalm 7, 10; 61, 3). 8. pour out your heart—give full expression to feeling (1 Samuel 1, 15; Job 30, 16; Psalm 42, 4). ye people—God's people. 9. No kind of men are reliable, compared with God (Isaiah 2, 22; Jeremiah 17, 5). altogether—alike, one as the other (Psalm 34, 3). 10. Not only are oppression and robbery, which are wicked means of wealth, no grounds of boasting, but even wealth, increasing lawfully, ought not to engross the heart. 11. once; twice—(as Job 33, 14; 40, 5), are used to give emphasis to the sentiment. God's power is tempered by His mercy, which it also sustains. 12. For thou renderest—lit., That thou renderest, &c., connected with "I heard this," as the phrase—"that power," &c.—teaching that by His power He can show both mercy and justice.

PSALM LXIII.

Ver. 1-11. The historical occasion referred to by the title was probably during Absalom's rebellion (cf. 2 Samuel 15, 23, 28; 16. 2). David expresses an earnest desire for God's favour, and a confident expectation of realizing it in his deliverance and the ruin of his enemies.

1. early . . . seek thee—earnestly (Isaiah 26. 9). The figurative terms—dry and thirsty—lit., weary, denoting moral destitution, suited his outward circumstances. soul—and—flesh—the whole man (Psalm 16. 9, 10). 2. The special object of desire was God's perfections as displayed in his worship (Psalm 27. 4). 3. Experiencing God's mercy, which exceeds all the blessings of life, his lips will be opened for his praise (Psalm 51. 15). 4. Thus—lit., Truly. will I bless—praise thee (Psalm 34. 1). lift up my hands—in worship (cf. Psalm 28. 2). in thy name—in praise of thy perfections. 5-8. Full spiritual blessings satisfy his desires, and acts of praise fill his thoughts and time. night—as well as day. Past favours assure him of future, and hence he presses earnestly near to God, whose power sustains him (Psalm 17. 8; 60. 5). 9, 10. those . . . to destroy it—or lit., to, or, for ruin—i. e., such as seek to injure me (are) for ruin—appointed to it (cf. Psalm 35. 8). shall go . . . earth—into the grave, or, to death; as their bodies are represented as a portion for—foxes—lit., jackals. 11. the king—i. e., David himself, and all who reverence God, "shall share a glorious part," while treacherous foes shall be for ever silenced (Psalm 62. 4).

PSALM LXIV.

Ver. 1-10. A prayer for deliverance from cunning and malicious enemies, with a confident view of their overthrow, which will honour God and give joy to the righteous.

1. preserve . . . fear—as well as the danger producing it. 2. insurrection—lit., uproar, noisy assaults, as well as their secret counsels. 3, 4. Similar figures for slander (Psalm 57. 4; 59. 7). bend—lit., tread, or, prepared. The allusion is to the mode of bending a bow by treading on it; here, and Psalm 58. 7, transferred to arrows. the perfect—one innocent of the charges made (Psalm 18. 23). and fear not—(Psalm 55. 19,) not regarding God. 5. A sentiment here more fully presented, by depicting their deliberate malice. 6. This is further evinced by their diligent efforts and deeply-laid schemes. 7. The contrast is heightened by representing God as using weapons like theirs. 8. their . . . tongue to fail, &c.—i. e., the consequences of their slanders, &c. (cf. Psalm 10. 2; 31. 16), all that see . . . away—their partners in evil shall be terrified. 9, 10. Men, generally, will acknowledge God's work, and the righteous, rejoicing in it, shall be encouraged to trust him (Psalm 58. 10).

PSALM LXV.

Ver. 1-13. This is a song of praise for God's spiritual blessings to his people and his kind providence over all the earth.

1. Praise waiteth for thee—lit., To thee silence praise, or (cf. Psalm 62. 1), To thee silence is praise—i. e., Praise is waiting as a servant—it is due to thee. So the last clause expresses the duty of paying vows. These two parts of acceptable worship, mentioned Psalm 50. 14, are rendered in Zion, where God chiefly displays His mercy and receives homage. 2. All are encouraged to pray by God's readiness to hear. 3. God's mercy alone delivers us from the burden of iniquities, by purging or expiating by an atonement the transgressions with which we are charged, and which are denoted by—iniquities—or lit., Words of iniquities. 4. dwell in thy courts; . . . [and] satisfied with the goodness . . . temple—denote communion with God (Psalm 15. 1; 23. 6; cf. Psalm 5. 7). This is a blessing for all God's people, as denoted by the change of number. 5. terrible things—i. e., by the manifestation of justice and wrath to enemies, accompanying that of mercy to his people (Psalm 63. 9-11; 64. 7-9). the confidence—object of it, of all . . . earth—the whole world—i. e., deservedly such, whether men think so or not. 6-13. God's great power and goodness are the grounds of this confidence. These are illustrated in His control of the mightiest agencies of nature and nations, affecting men with awe and dread (Psalm 26. 7; 98. 1, &c.), and in His fertilizing showers, causing the earth to produce abundantly for man and beast. outgoings of . . . rejoice—all people from east to west. visitest—in mercy (cf. Psalm 8. 4). river of God—His exhaustless resources. thy paths—ways of providence (Psalm 25. 4, 10). wilderness—places though not inhabited by men, fit for pasture (Leviticus 16. 21, 22; Job 24. 5). pastures—(In v. 12) is lit., folds, or, enclosures for flocks; and in v. 13 it may be lamb—the same word used and so translated (Psalm 37. 20); so that "the flocks are clothed with lambs," a figure for abundant increase, would be the form of expression.

PSALM LXVI.

Ver. 1. 20. The writer invites all men to unite in praise, cites some striking occasions for it, promises special acts of thanksgiving, and celebrates God's great mercy.

1. Make . . . noise—or, Shout. 2. his name—as Psalm 29. 2. make his praise glorious—lit., make or place honour, His praise, or, as to His praise—i. e., let His praise be such as will glorify Him, or, be honourable to Him. 3, 4. A specimen of the praise. How terrible—(Cf. Psalm 65. 8.) submit—(Cf. Margin), show a forced subjection (Psalm 18. 44), produced by terror. 5, 6. The terrible works illustrated in Israel's history (Exodus 14. 21). By this example let rebels be admonished. 7. behold the nations—watch their conduct. 8, 9. Here is, perhaps, cited a case of recent deliverance. holdeth . . . in life—lit., putteth our soul in life—i. e., out of danger (Psalm 30. 3; 49. 15). to be moved (Cf. Psalm 10. 6; 55. 22). 10-12. Out of severe trials, God had brought them to safety (cf. Isaiah 48. 10; 1 Peter 1. 7). affliction—lit., pressure, or, as Psalm 55. 3, oppression, which, laid on the—loins—the seat of strength (Deuteronomy 33. 11), enfeebles the frame. men to ride over our heads—made us to pass—through fire, &c.—figures describing prostration and critical dangers (cf. Isaiah 43. 2; Ezekiel 36. 12). wealthy—lit., overflowing, or, irrigated, and hence fertile. 13-15. These full and varied offerings constitute the payment of vows (Leviticus 22. 18-23). I will offer—lit., make to ascend—alluding to the smoke of burnt offering, which explains the use of—incense—elsewhere always denoting the fumes of aromatics. 16-20. With these he unites his public thanks, inviting those who fear God (Psalm 60. 4; 61. 5, His true worshippers) to hear. He vindicates his sincerity, inasmuch as God would not hear hypocrites, but had heard him. he was extolled with my tongue—lit., exaltation (was) under my tongue, as a place of deposit, whence it proceeded—i. e., honouring God was habitual. If I regard iniquity—lit., see iniquity with pleasure.

PSALM LXVII.

Ver. 1-7. A prayer that, by God's blessing on His people, His salvation and praise may be extended over the earth.

1. cause his face to shine—show us favour (Numbers 6. 24, 25; Psalm 31. 16). 2. thy way—of gracious dealing (Isaiah 55. 8), as explained by—saving health—or lit., salvation. 3-5. Thanks will be rendered for the blessings of His wise and holy government (cf. Isaiah 2. 3, 4; 11. 4). 6, 7. The blessings of a fruitful harvest are mentioned as types of greater and spiritual blessings, under which all nations shall fear and love God.

PSALM LXVIII.

Ver. 1-35. This is a Psalm-song (cf. Psalm 30., title), perhaps suggested by David's victories, which secured his throne and gave rest to the nation. In general terms, the judgment of God on the wicked, and the equity and goodness of His government to the pious are celebrated. The sentiment is illustrated by examples of God's dealings, cited from the Jewish history, and related in highly poetical terms. Hence the writer intimates an expectation of equal and even greater triumphs, and summons all nations to unite in praises of the God of Israel. The Psalm is evidently typical of the relation which God, in the person of His Son, sustains to the Church (cf. v. 18).

1-3. Cf. Numbers 10. 35; Psalm 1. 4; 22. 14, on the figures here used. before him—as in v. 2, from His presence, as dreaded; but in v. 3, in His presence, as under His protection (Psalm 61. 7). the righteous—all truly pious, whether of Israel or not. 4. extol him . . . heavens—lit., "cast up for him who rideth in the deserts, or wilderness" (cf. v. 7), alluding to the poetical representation of His leading His people in the wilderness as a conqueror, before whom a way is to be prepared, or cast up (cf. Isaiah 40. 3; 62. 10). by his name JAH—or, Jehovah, of which it is a contraction (Exodus 15. 3; Isaiah 12. 2) (Hebrew). name—or, perfections (Psalm 9. 10; 20. 1), which—5, 6—are illustrated by the protection to the helpless, vindication of the innocent, and punishment of rebels, ascribed to Him. setteth the solitary in families—lit., settleth the lonely (as wanderers) at home. Though a general truth, there is perhaps allusion to the wandering and settlement of the Israelites. rebellious dwell in a dry land—removed from all the comforts of home. 7, 8—(Cf. Exodus 10. 16-18.) thou wentest—in the pillar of fire—thou didst march—lit., in thy tread, thy majestic movement. even Sinai itself—lit., that Sinai, as Judges 5. 5. 9, 10. a plentiful rain—a rain of gifts, as manna and quails. Thy congregation—lit., troop, as 2 Samuel 23. 11, 13—the military aspect of the people being prominent, according to the figures of the context. therein—i. e., in the land of promise. the poor—thy humble people (v. 9; cf. Psalm 10. 17; 12. 5). 11. gave the word—i. e., of triumph. company—or, choir of females, celebrating victory (Exodus 15. 20). 12. Kings of armies—i. e., with their armies. she that . . . at home—mostly females so remained, and the ease of victory appears in that such, without danger, quietly enjoyed the spoils. 13. Some translate this, "When ye shall lie between the borders, ye shall," &c., comparing the peaceful rest in the borders or limits of the promised land to the proverbial beauty of a gentle dove. Others understand by the word rendered "pots," the smoked sides of caves, in which the Israelites took refuge from enemies in the times of the Judges; or, taking the whole figuratively, the rows of stones on which cooking vessels were hung; and thus that a contrast is drawn between their former low and afflicted state and their succeeding prosperity. In either case, a state of quiet and peace is described by a beautiful figure. 14. Their enemies dispersed, the contrast of their prosperity with their former distress is represented by that of the snow with the dark and sombre shades of Salmon. 15, 16. Mountains are often symbols of nations (Psalm 46. 2; 65. 6). That of Bashan, N.E. of Palestine, denotes a heathen nation, which is described as a hill of God, or a great hill. Such are represented as envious of the hill (Zion) on which God resides; 17. and, to the assertion of God's purpose to make it His dwelling, is added evidence of His protecting care. He is described as in the midst of His heavenly armies—thousands of angels—lit., thousands of repetitions, or, thousands of thousands—i. e., of chariots. The word—angels—was perhaps introduced in our version, from Deuteronomy 33. 2, and Galatians 3. 19. They are, of course, implied as conductors of the chariots. as . . . Sinai, in the holy place—i. e., He has appeared in Zion as once in Sinai. 18. From the scene of conquest He ascends to His throne, leading—captivity—[or, many captives (Judges 5. 12)] captive. received gifts for men—accepting their homage, even when forced, as that of rebels. that the Lord God might dwell—or lit., to dwell, oh Lord God (cf. v. 16)—i. e., to make this hill, His people or Church, His dwelling. This Psalm typifies the conquests of the Church under her Divine leader, Christ. He, indeed, "who was with the Church in the wilderness" (Acts 7. 33) is the Lord, described in this ideal ascension. Hence Paul (Ephesians 4. 8) applies this language to describe His real ascension, when, having conquered sin, death, and hell, the Lord of glory triumphantly entered heaven, attended by throngs of adoring angels, to sit on the throne and wield the sceptre of an eternal dominion. The phrase—received gifts for [or lit., among] men—is by Paul, "gave gifts to men." Both describe the acts of a conqueror, who receives and distributes spoils. The Psalmist uses "receiving" as evincing the success, Paul "gave" as the act, of the conqueror, who, having subdued his enemies, proceeds to reward his friends. The special application of the passage by Paul was in proof of Christ's exaltation. What the Old Testament represents of His descending and ascending corresponds with his history. He who descended is the same who has ascended. As then ascension was an element of His triumph, so is it now; and he, who, in His humiliation, must be recognized as our vicarious sacrifice and the High Priest of our profession, must also be adored as Head of His Church and author of all her spiritual benefits. 19-21. God daily and fully supplies us. The issues or escapes from death are under His control, who is the God that saves us, and destroys His and our enemies. wound the head—or, violently destroy (Numbers 24. 8; Psalm 110. 6). goeth on still in . . . trespasses—perseveringly impenitent. 22. Former examples of God's deliverance are generalized: as He has done so He will do. from Bashan—the farthest region; and—depths of the sea—the severest afflictions. Out of all, God will bring them. The figures of v. 23 denote the completeness of the conquest, not implying any savage cruelty (cf. 2 Kings 9. 36; Isaiah 63. 1-6; Jeremlah 15. 3). 24-27. The triumphal procession, after the deliverance, is depicted. They have seen—impersonally, "There have been seen," the goings of my God—as leading the procession, the ark, the symbol of His presence, being in front. The various bands of music (v. 25) follow, and all who are—from [or lit., of] the fountain of Israel—i. e., lineal descendants of Jacob, are invited to unite in the doxology. Then by one of the nearest tribes, one of the most eminent, and two of the most remote, are represented the whole nation of Israel, passing forward (Numbers 7). 28, 29. Thanks for the past, and confident prayer for the future victories of Zion are mingled in a song of praise. thy temple—at [or lit., over] Jerusalem—His palace or residence (Psalm 5. 7) symbolized His protecting presence among His people, and hence is the object of homage on the part of others. 30. The strongest nations are represented by the strongest beasts (cf. Margin). 31. Princes—or, lit., Fat ones, the most eminent from the most wealthy, and the most distant nation, represent the universal subjection. stretch out [or, make to run] her hands—denoting haste. 32-36. To Him who is presented as riding in triumph through His ancient heavens and proclaiming His presence—to Him who, in nature, and still more in the wonders of His spiritual government, out of His holy place (Psalm 43. 3), is terrible, who rules His Church, and, by His Church, rules the world in righteousness—let all nations and kingdoms give honour and power and dominion evermore.

PSALM LXIX.

Ver. 1-36. Upon Shoshannim—(cf. Psalm 45., title). Mingling the language of prayer and complaint, the sufferer, whose condition is here set forth, pleads for God's help as one suffering in His cause, implores the Divine retribution on his malicious enemies, and, viewing his deliverance as sure, promises praise by himself, and others, to whom God will extend like blessings. This Psalm is referred to seven times in the New Testament as prophetic of Christ and the gospel times. Although the character in which the Psalmist appears to some in v. 5 is that of a sinner; yet his condition as a sufferer innocent of alleged crimes sustains the typical character of the composition, and it may be therefore regarded throughout, as the 22d, as typically expressive of the feelings of our Saviour in the flesh.

1, 2—(Cf. Psalm 40. 2.) come in unto my soul—lit., come even to my soul, endanger my life by drowning (Jonah 2. 5). 3—(Cf. Psalm 6. 6.) mine eyes fail—in watching (Psalm 119. 82). 4. hate me, &c.—(Cf. John 15. 25.) On the number and power of his enemies, cf. Psalm 40. 12. then I restored . . . away—i. e., he suffered wrongfully under the imputation of robbery. 5. This may be regarded as an appeal, vindicating his innocence, as if he had said, "If sinful, thou knowest," &c. Though David's condition as a sufferer may typify Christ's, without requiring that a parallel be found in character. 6. for my sake—lit., in me, in my confusion and shame. 7-12. This plea contemplates his relation to God as a sufferer in His cause. Reproach, domestic estrangement (Mark 3. 21; John 7. 5), exhaustion in God's service (John 2. 17), revilings and taunts of base men were the sufferings. wept (and chastened) my soul—lit., wept away my soul, a strongly figurative description of deep grief. sit in the gate—public place (Proverbs 31. 31). 13-15. With increasing reliance on God, he prays for help, describing his distress in the figures of v. 1, 2, 16-18. These earnest terms are often used, and the address to God, as indifferent or averse, is found in Psalm 3. 7; 22. 24; 27. 9, &c. 19, 20. Calling God to witness his distress, he presents its aggravation produced by the want of sympathizing friends (cf. Isaiah 63. 5; Mark 14. 50). 21. Instead of such, his enemies increase his pain by giving him most distasteful food and drink. The Psalmist may have thus described by figure what Christ found in reality (cf. John 19. 29, 30). 22, 23. With unimportant verbal changes, this language is used by Paul to describe the rejection of the Jews who refused to receive the Saviour (Romans 11. 9, 10). The purport of the figures used is, that blessings shall become curses, the table of joy (as one of food) a snare, their welfare, lit., peaceful condition, or security, a trap. Darkened eyes and failing strength complete the picture of the ruin falling on them under the invoked retribution. continually to shake—lit., to swerve or bend in weakness. 24, 25. An utter desolation awaits them. They will not only be driven from their homes, but their homes—or lit., palaces, indicative of wealth—shall be desolate (cf. Matthew 23. 38). 26. Though smitten of God (Isaiah 53. 4), men were not less guilty in persecuting the sufferer (Acts 2. 23). talk to the grief—in respect to, about it, implying derision and taunts. wounded—or, lit., mortally wounded. 27, 28. iniquity—or, punishment (Psalm 40. 12). come . . . righteousness—partake of its benefits. book of the living—or life, with the next clause, a figurative mode of representing those saved, as having their names in a register (cf. Exodus 32. 32; Isaiah 4. 3). 29. poor and sorrowful—the afflicted pious, often denoted by such terms (cf. Psalm 10. 17; 12. 5). set me . . . high—out of danger. 30, 31. Spiritual are better than mere material offerings (Psalm 40. 6; 50. 8); hence a promise of the former, and rather contemptuous terms are used of the latter. 32, 33. Others shall rejoice. Humble and poor, as v. 29. your heart, &c.—address to such (cf. Psalm 22. 26). prisoners—peculiarly liable to be despised. 34-36. The call on the universe for praise is well sustained by the prediction of the perpetual and extended blessings which shall come upon the covenant people of God. Though, as usual, the imagery is taken from terms used of Palestine, the whole tenor of the context indicates that the spiritual privileges and blessings of the Church are meant.

PSALM LXX.

Ver. 1-5. This corresponds with Psalm 40. 13-17 with a very few variations, as "turn back" (v. 3) for "desolate," and "make haste unto me" (v. 5) for "thinketh upon me." It forms a suitable appendix to the preceding, and is called "a Psalm to bring to remembrance," as the 38th.

PSALM LXXI.

Ver. 1-24. The Psalmist, probably in old age, appeals to God for help from his enemies, pleading his past favours, and stating his present need, and, in confidence of a hearing, promises his grateful thanks and praise.

1-3—(Cf. Psalm 30. 1-3.) rock . . . fortress—(Psalm 18. 2.) given commandment—lit., ordained, as Psalm 44. 4; 68. 28. 4, 5. cruel man—corrupt and ill-natured—lit., sour. trust—place of trust. 6-9. His history from early infancy illustrated God's care, and his wonderful deliverances were at once occasions of praise and ground of confidence for the future. my praise . . . of thee—lit., in or by thee (Psalm 22. 25). 10, 11. The craft and malicious taunts of his enemies now led him to call for aid (cf. on the terms used, 2 Samuel 17. 12; Psalm 3. 2; 7. 2). 12—(Cf. Psalm 22. 13; 40. 4.) 13—(Cf. Psalm 35. 4; 40. 14.) 14-16. The ruin of his enemies, as illustrating God's faithfulness, is his deliverance, and a reason for future confidence. for I know . . . thereof—innumerable, as he had not time to count them. in the strength, &c.—or, relying on it. thy righteousness—or, faithful performance of promises to the pious (Psalm 7. 17; 31. 1). 17-21. Past experience again encourages. taught me, &c.—by providential dealings. is very high—distinguished (Psalm 36. 5; Isaiah 55. 9). depths of the earth—debased, low condition. increase, &c.—i. e., the great things done for me (v. 19; cf. Psalm 40. 5). 22-24. To the occasion of praise he now adds the promise to render it. will . . . praise—lit., will thank. even thy truth—as to thy truth or faithfulness.

PSALM LXXII.

Ver. 1-19. For, or lit., of Solomon. The closing verse rather relates to the 2d book of Psalms, of which this is the last, and was perhaps added by some collector, to intimate that the collection, to which, as chief author, David's name was appended, was closed. In this view, these may consistently be the productions of others included, as of Asaph, sons of Korah, and Solomon; and a few of David's may be placed in the latter series. The fact that here the usual mode of denoting authorship is used, is strongly conclusive that Solomon was the author, especially as no stronger objection appears than what has been now set aside. The Psalm, in highly wrought figurative style, describes the reign of a king as "righteous, universal, beneficent, and perpetual." By the older Jewish and most modern Christian interpreters, it has been referred to Christ, whose reign, present and prospective, alone corresponds with its statements. As the imagery of the 2d Psalm was drawn from the martial character of David's reign, that of this is from the peaceful and prosperous state of Solomon's.

1. Give the king, &c.—a prayer which is equivalent to a prediction. judgments—the acts, and (figuratively) the principles of a right government (John 5. 22; 9. 39). righteousness—qualifications for conducting such a government. king's son—same person as a king—a very proper title for Christ, as such in both natures. 2, &c. The effects of such a government by one thus endowed are detailed. thy people . . . and thy poor—or, meek, the pious subjects of his government. 3. As mountains and hills are not usually productive, they are here selected to show the abundance of peace, being represented as—bringing—or, lit., bearing it as a produce. by righteousness—i. e., by means of his eminently just and good methods of ruling. 4. That peace, including prosperity, as an eminent characteristic of Christ's reign (Isaiah 2. 4; 9. 6; 11. 9), will be illustrated in the security provided for the helpless and needy, and the punishment inflicted on oppressors, whose power to injure or mar the peace of others will be destroyed (cf. Isaiah 65. 25; Zechariah 9. 10). children of the needy—for the needy (cf. sons of strangers, Psalm 18. 45). 5. as long as . . . endure—lit., with the sun, coeval with its existence, and before, or, in presence of the moon, while it lasts (cf. Genesis 1. 28, before Terah, lit., in presence of, while he lived). 6. A beautiful figure expresses the grateful nature of His influence; 7, and, carrying out the figure, the results are described in an abundant production. the righteous—lit., righteousness. flourish—lit., sprout, or, spring forth. 8. The foreign nations mentioned (v. 9, 10) could not be included in the limits, if designed to indicate the boundaries of Solomon's kingdom. The terms, though derived from those used (Exodus 23. 31; Deuteronomy 11. 24) to denote the possessions of Israel, must have a wider sense. Thus, "ends of the earth" is never used of Palestine, but always of the world (cf. Margin). 9-11. The extent of the conquests. They that dwell in the wilderness—the wild, untutored tribes of deserts. bow . . . dust—in profound submission. The remotest and wealthiest nations shall acknowledge him (cf. Psalm 45. 12). 12-14. They are not the conquests of arms, but the influences of humane and peaceful principles (cf. Isaiah 9. 7; 11. 1-9; Zechariah 9. 9, 10). 15. In his prolonged life he will continue to receive the honourable gifts of the rich, and the prayers of his people shall be made for him, and their praises given to him. 16. The spiritual blessings, as often in Scripture, are set forth by material, the abundance of which is described by a figure, in which a handful (or lit., a piece, or small portion) of corn in the most unpropitious locality, shall produce a crop, waving in the wind in its luxuriant growth, like the forests of Lebanon. they of the city . . . earth—This clause denotes the rapid and abundant increase of population—of [or, from] the city—Jerusalem, the centre and seat of the typical kingdom. flourish—or, glitter as new grass—i. e., bloom. This increase corresponds with the increased productiveness. So, as the gospel blessings are diffused, there shall arise increasing recipients of them, out of the Church in which Christ resides as head. 17. His name—or, glorious perfections. as long as the sun—(Cf. v. 5) men shall be blessed—(Genesis 12. 3; 18. 18.) 18, 19. These words close the Psalm in terms consistent with the style of the context, while 20 is evidently, from its prosaic style, an addition for the purpose above explained. ended—lit., finished, or completed; the word never denotes fulfillment, except in a very late usage, as Ezra 1. 1; Daniel 12. 7.

PSALM LXXIII.

Ver. 1-23. Of Asaph—(cf. Introduction). God is good to His people. For although the prosperity of the wicked, and the afflictions of the righteous, tempted the Psalmist to misgivings of God's government, yet the sudden and fearful ruin of the ungodly, seen in the light of God's revelation, reassures his heart, and, chiding himself for his folly, he is led to confide renewedly in God, and celebrates His goodness and love.

1. The abrupt announcement of the theme indicates that it is the conclusion of a perplexing mental conflict, which is then detailed (cf. Jeremiah 12. 1-4). Truly—or, Surely it is so. clean heart—(Psalm 18. 26) describes the true Israel. 2. The figures express his wavering faith, by terms denoting tottering and weakness (cf. Psalm 22. 5; 62. 3). 3-9. The prosperous wicked are insolently proud (cf. Psalm 5. 5). They die, as well as live, free from perplexities: pride adorns them, and violence is their clothing; indeed they are inflated with unexpected success. With all this—they are corrupt—or, lit., they deride, they speak maliciously and arrogantly, and invade even heaven with blasphemy (Revelation 13. 6), and cover earth with slanders (Job 21. 7-14). 10-12. Hence God's people are confounded, turned hither (or back) and thither, perplexed with doubts of God's knowledge and care, and filled with sorrow. prosper in the world—lit., secure for ever. 13, 14. The Psalmist, partaking of these troubles, is especially disturbed in view of his own case, that with all his diligent efforts for a holy life, he is still sorely tried. 15. Freed from idiomatic phrases, this verse expresses a supposition, as, "Had I thus spoken, I should," &c., intimating that he had kept his troubles to himself. generation of thy children—thy people (1 John 3. 1). offend—lit., deceive, mislead. 16, 17. Still he—thought—lit., studied, or, pondered this riddle; but in vain; it remained a toil (cf. Margin), till he—went into the sanctuary—to inquire (cf. Exodus 25. 22; Psalm 5. 7; 27. 4). 18-20. Their end, or, future (Psalm 37. 37, 38), which is dismal and terribly sudden (Proverbs 1. 27; 29. 1), aggravated and hastened by terror. As one despises an unsubstantial dream, so God, waking up to judgment (Psalm 7. 6; 41. 23), despises their vain shadow of happiness (Psalm 39. 6; Isaiah 29. 7). They are thrown into ruins as a building falling to pieces (Psalm 71. 3). 21, 22. He confesses how—foolish—lit., stupid, and—ignorant—lit., not discerning, had been his course of thought. before thee—lit., with thee, in conduct respecting thee. 23. Still he was with God, as a dependent beneficiary, and so kept from falling (v. 2). 24. All doubts are silenced in confidence of Divine guidance and future glory. receive me to glory—lit., take for (me) glory (cf. Psalm 68. 18; Ephesians 4. 8). 25, 26. God is his only satisfying good. strength—lit., rock (Psalm 18. 2). portion—(Psalm 16. 5; Lamentations 3. 24.) 27, 28. The lot of apostates, described by a figure of frequent use (Jeremiah 3. 1. 3; Ezekiel 23. 35), is contrasted with his, who finds happiness in nearness to God (James 4. 8), and his delightful work the declaration of His praise.

PSALM LXXIV.

Ver. 1-23. If the historical allusions of v. 6-8, &c., be referred, as is probable, to the period of the captivity, the author was probably a descendant and namesake of Asaph, David's contemporary and singer (cf. 2 Chronicles 35. 15; Ezra 2. 41). He complains of God's desertion of His Church, and appeals for aid, encouraging himself by recounting some of God's mighty deeds, and urges his prayer on the ground of God's covenant relation to His people, and the wickedness of His and their common enemy.

1. cast . . . off—with abhorrence (cf. Psalm 43. 2; 44. 9). There is no disavowal of guilt implied. The figure of fire to denote God's anger is often used; and here, and Deuteronomy 29. 20, by the word "smoke," suggests its continuance. sheep . . . pasture—(Cf. Psalm 80. 1; 95. 7) 2. The terms to denote God's relation to His people increase in force: "congregation"—"purchased"—"redeemed"—"Zion," His dwelling. 3. Lift . . . feet—(Genesis 29. 1)—i. e., Come (to behold) the desolations (Psalm 73. 19). 4. roar—with bestial fury. congregations—lit., worshipping assemblies. ensigns—lit., signs—substituted their idolatrous objects, or tokens of authority, for those articles of the temple which denoted God's presence. 5, 6. Though some terms and clauses here are very obscure, the general sense is, that the spoilers destroyed the beauties of the temple with the violence of woodmen. was famous—lit., was known. carved work—(1 Kings 6. 29). thereof—i. e., of the temple, in the writer's mind, though not expressed till v. 7, in which its utter destruction by fire is mentioned (2 Kings 25. 9; Isaiah 64. 11). defiled—or, profaned, as Psalm 89. 39. 8. together—at once, all alike. synagogues—lit., assemblies, for places of assembly, whether such as schools of the prophets (2 Kings 4. 23), or synagogues in the usual sense, there is much doubt. 9. signs—of God's presence, as altar, ark, &c. (cf. v. 4; 2 Chronicles 36. 18, 19; Daniel 5. 2). no more any prophet—(Isaiah 3. 2; Jeremiah 40. 1; 43. 6). how long—this is to last. Jeremiah's prophecy (25. 11), if published, may not have been generally known or understood. To the bulk of the people, during the captivity, the occasional and local prophetic services of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel would not make an exception to the clause, "there is no more any prophet." 10. (Cf. Psalm 31. 1.) how long . . . reproach—us as deserted of God. blaspheme thy name—or, perfections, as power, goodness, &c. (Psalm 29. 2). 11. Why cease to help us? (Cf. Psalm 3. 7; 7. 6; 60. 5) 12. For—lit., And, in an adversative sense. 13-15. Examples of the "salvation wrought" are cited. divide the sea—i. e., Red Sea. brakest . . . waters—Pharaoh and his host (cf. Isaiah 51. 9, 10; Ezekiel 29. 3, 4). heads of leviathan—the word is a collective, and so used for many. the people . . . wilderness—i. e., wild beasts, as conies (Proverbs 30. 25, 26), are called a people. Others take the passages literally, that the sea monsters thrown out on dry land were food for the wandering Arabs. cleave the fountain—i. e., the rocks of Horeb and Kadesh—for fountains. driedst up—Jordan, and, perhaps, Arnon and Jabok (Numbers 21. 14). 16, 17. The fixed orders of nature and bounds of earth are of God. 18. (Cf. v. 10; Deuteronomy 32. 6.) The contrast is striking—that such a God should be thus insulted! 19. multitude—lit., beast, their flock or company of men (Psalm 68. 10). turtle-dove—i. e., the meek and lonely Church. congregation—lit., company, as above—thus the Church is represented as the spoiled and defeated remnant of an army, exposed to violence. 20. And the prevalence of injustice in heathen lands is a reason for invoking God's regard to His promise (cf. Numbers 14. 21; Psalm 7. 16; 18. 48). 21. oppressed—broken (Psalm 9. 9). return—from seeking God. ashamed—(Psalm 35. 4). 22, 23. (Cf. Psalm 3. 7; 7. 6.) God hears the wicked to their own ruin (Genesis 4. 10; 18. 20).

PSALM LXXV.

Ver. 1-10. At-taschith—(cf. Psalm 57., title). In impending danger, the Psalmist, anticipating relief in view of God's righteous government, takes courage and renders praise.

1. God's name or perfections are set forth by His wondrous works. 2, 3. These verses express the purpose of God to administer a just government, and in a time of anarchy that He sustains the nation. Some apply the words to the Psalmist. receive the congregation—lit., take a set time (Psalm 102. 13; Hosea 2. 3), or an assembly at a set time—i. e., for judging. Pillars of earth—(1 Samuel 2. 8). 4-8. Here the writer speaks in view of God's declaration, warning the wicked. Lift . . . up the horn—to exalt power, here, of the wicked himself—i. e., to be arrogant or self-elated. Speak . . . neck—insolently. pronounce—lit., a lifting up. God is the only right judge of merit. In the hand . . . a cup . . . red—God's wrath often thus represented (cf. Isaiah 51. 17; Jeremiah 25. 15). but the dregs—lit., surely the dregs, they shall drain it. 9, 10. Contrasted is the lot of the pious who will praise God, and, acting under His direction, will destroy the power of the wicked, and exalt that of the righteous.

PSALM LXXVI.

Ver. 1-12. On Neginoth—(cf. Psalm 4, title). This Psalm commemorates what the preceding anticipates: God's deliverance of His people by a signal interposition of power against their enemies. The occasion was probably the events narrated 2 Kings 19. 35; Isaiah 37. (Cf. Psalm 46.)

1, 2. These well known terms denote God's people and Church and His intimate and glorious relations to them. Salem—(Genesis 14. 18) is Jerusalem. 3. brake . . . the arrows—lit., thunderbolts (Psalm 78. 48), from their rapid flight or ignition (cf. Psalm 18. 14; Ephesians 6. 16). the battle—for arms (Hosea 2. 18). 4. Thou—God, mountains of prey—great victorious nations, as Assyria (Isaiah 41. 15; Ezekiel 38. 11, 12; Zechariah 4. 7). 5. slept their sleep—(Psalm 13. 3). none . . . found . . . hands—are powerless. 6. chariot and horse—for those fighting on them (cf. Psalm 68. 17). 7. may . . . sight—contend with thee (Deuteronomy 9. 4; Joshua 7. 12). 8, 9. God's judgment on the wicked is His people's deliverance (Psalm 9. 12; 10. 7). 10. Man's wrath praises God by its futility before His power. restrain—or, gird—i. e., thyself, as with a sword, with which to destroy, or as an ornament to thy praise. 11, 12. Invite homage to such a God (2 Chronicles 32. 23), who can stop the breath of kings and princes when he will (Daniel 5. 23).

PSALM LXXVII.

Ver. 1-20. To Jeduthun—(cf. Psalm 39, title). In a time of great affliction, when ready to despair, the Psalmist derives relief from calling to mind God's former and wonderful works of delivering power and grace.

1, expresses the purport of the Psalm, 2, his importunity. my sore ran . . . night—lit., my hand was spread, or, stretched out (cf. Psalm 44. 20). ceased not—lit., grew not numb, or, feeble (Genesis 45. 26; Psalm 38. 8). my soul . . . comforted—(cf. Genesis 37. 35; Jeremiah 31. 15). 3-9. His sad state contrasted with former joys. was troubled—lit., violently agitated, or disquieted (Psalm 39. 6; 41. 5). my spirit was overwhelmed—or, fainted (Psalm 107. 5; Jonah 2. 7). holdest . . . waking—or, fast, that I cannot sleep. Thus he is led to express his anxious feelings in several earnest questions indicative of impatient sorrow. 10. Omitting the supplied words, we may read, "This is my affliction—the years of," &c.—years being taken as parallel to affliction (cf. Psalm 90. 15), as of God's ordering. 11, 12. He finds relief in contrasting God's former deliverances. Shall we receive good at His hands, and not evil? Both are orderings of unerring mercy and unfailling love. 13. Thy way . . . in the sanctuary—God's ways of grace and providence (Psalm 22. 3; 67. 2), ordered on holy principles, as developed in His worship; or implied in His perfections, if holiness be used for sanctuary, as some prefer translating (cf. Exodus 15. 11). 14-20. Illustrations of God's power in His special interventions for His people (Exodus 14.), and, in the more common, but sublime, control of nature (Psalm 22. 11-14; Habakkuk 3. 14) which may have attended those miraculous events (Exodus 14. 24). Jacob and Joseph—representing all. footsteps . . . waters—may refer to His actual leading the people through the sea, though also expressing the mysteries of providence.

PSALM LXXVIII.

Ver. 1-72. This Psalm appears to have been occasioned by the removal of the sanctuary from Shiloh in the tribe of Ephraim to Zion in the tribe of Judah, and the coincident transfer of pre-eminence in Israel from the former to the latter tribe, as clearly evinced by David's settlement as the head of the Church and nation. Though this was the execution of God's purpose, the writer here shows that it also proceeded from the Divine judgment on Ephraim, under whose leadership the people had manifested the same sinful and rebellious character which had distinguished their ancestors in Egypt.

1. my people . . . my law—the language of a religious teacher (v. 2; Lamentations 3. 14; Romans 2. 16, 27; cf. Psalm 49. 4). The history which follows was a "dark saying," or riddle, if left unexplained, and its right apprehension required wisdom and attention. 3-8. This history had been handed down (Exodus 12. 14; Deuteronomy 6. 20) for God's honour, and that the principles of His law might be known and observed by posterity. This important sentiment is reiterated in (v. 7, 8) negative form. testimony—(Psalm 19. 7.) stubborn and rebellious—(Deuteronomy 21. 18.) set not their heart—on God's service (2 Chronicles 12. 14). 9-11. The privileges of the first-born which belonged to Joseph (1 Chronicles 5. 1, 2) were assigned to Ephraim by Jacob (Genesis 48. 1). The supremacy of the tribe thus intimated was recognized by its position (in the marching of the nation to Canaan) next to the ark (Numbers 2. 18-24), by the selection of the first permanent locality for the ark within its borders at Shiloh, and by the extensive and fertile province given for its possession. Traces of this prominence remained after the schism under Rehoboam, in the use, by later writers, of Ephraim for Israel (cf. Hosea 5. 3-14; 11. 3-12). Though a strong, well armed tribe, and, from an early period, emulous and haughty (cf. Joshua 17. 14; Judges 8. 1-3; 2 Samuel 19. 41), it appears, in this place, that it had rather led the rest in cowardice than courage; and had incurred God's displeasure, because, diffident of His promise, though often heretofore fulfilled, it had failed as a leader to carry out the terms of the covenant, by driving out the heathen (Exodus 23. 24; Deuteronomy 31. 16; 2 Kings 17. 15). 12-14. A record of God's dealings and the sins of the people is now made. The writer gives the history from the exode to the retreat from Kadesh; then contrasts their sins with their reasons for confidence, shown by a detail of God's dealings in Egypt, and presents a summary of the subsequent history to David's time. Zaan—for Egypt, as its ancient capital (Numbers 13. 22; Isaiah 19. 11). 15, 16. There were two similar miracles (Exodus 17. 6; Numbers 20. 11). great depths—and rivers—denote abundance. 17-20. yet more—lit., added to sin, instead of being led to repentance (Romans 2. 4). in their heart—(Matthew 15. 19.) for their lust—lit., soul, or, desire. provoking—and—tempted—illustrated by their absurd doubts, 19, 20, in the face of His admitted power. 21. fire—the effect of the anger (Numbers 11. 1). 22. (Cf. Hebrews 8. 8, 9.) 23-29. (Cf. Exodus 16.; Numbers 11.) angels' food—lit., bread of the mighty (cf. Psalm 100. 40); so called, as it came from heaven. meat—lit., victuals, as for a journey. their . . . desire—what they longed for. 30, 31. not estranged . . . lust—or, desire—i. e., were indulging in. slew . . . fattest—or, among the fattest; some of them—chosen—the young and strong (Isaiah 40. 31), and so none could resist. 33-39. Though there were partial reformations after chastisement, and God, in pity, withdrew his hand for a time, yet their general conduct was rebellious, and He was thus provoked to waste and destroy them, by long and fruitless wandering in the desert. Heed . . . tongues—a feigned obedience (Psalm 18. 44). heart . . . not right—or, firm (cf. v. 8; Psalm 51. 10). a wind . . . again—lit., a breath, thin air (cf. Psalm 103. 16; James 4. 14). 40, 41. There were ten temptations (Numbers 14. 22). limited—as v. 19, 20. Though some prefer grieved or provoked. The retreat from Kadesh (Deuteronomy 1. 19-23) is meant, whether—turned—be for turning back, or to denote repetition of offence. 43.

wrought—set or held forth. 45. The dog-fly or the mosquito. 46. caterpillar—the Hebrew name, from its voracity, and that of locust—from its multitude. 47, 48. The additional effects of the storm here mentioned (cf. Exodus 9. 23-31) are consistent with Moses' account. gave . . . cattle—lit., shut up (cf. Psalm 81. 8). 49. evil angels—or, angels of evil—many were perhaps employed, and other evils inflicted. 50, 51. made a way—removed obstacles, gave it full scope. chief of their strength—lit., first-fruits, or, first-born (Genesis 49. 3; Deuteronomy 21. 17). Ham—one of whose sons gave name (Mizraim, Hebrew) to Egypt. 52-54. made his . . . forth—or, brought them by periodical journeys (cf. Exodus 15. 1). border of his sanctuary—or, holy border—i. e., region of which—this mountain—(Zion) was, as the seat of civil and religious government, the representative, used for the whole land, as afterwards for the Church (Isaiah 25. 6. 7). purchased—or, procured by His right hand or power (Psalm 60. 5). 55. by line—or, the portion thus measured. divided them—i. e., the heathen, put for their possessions, so tents—i. e., of the heathen (cf. Deuteronomy 6. 11). 56, 57. a deceitful bow—which turns back, and so fails to project the arrow (2 Samuel 1. 22; Hosea 7. 16). They relapsed. 58. Idolatry resulted from sparing the heathen (cf. v. 9-11). 59, 60. heard—perceived (Genesis 11. 7). abhorred—but not utterly. tent . . . placed—lit., caused to dwell, set up (Joshua 18. 1). 61. his strength—the ark, as symbolical of it (Psalm 96. 6). 62. gave—or, shut up. his people—(v. 48; 1 Samuel 4. 10-17). 63. fire—either figure of the slaughter (1 Samuel 4. 10), or a literal burning by the heathen. given to marriage—lit., praised—i. e., as brides. 64—(Cf. 1 Samuel 4. 17); and there were, doubtless, others. made no lamentation—either because stupefied by grief, or hindered by the enemy. 65. (Cf. Psalm 22. 16; Isaiah 42. 13.) 66. And he smote . . . part—or, struck His enemies' back. The Philistines never regained their position after their defeats by David. 67, 68. tabernacle of Joseph—or, home, or tribe, to which—tribe of Ephraim—is parallel (cf. Revelation 7. 8). Its pre-eminence was, like Saul's, only permitted. Judah had been the choice (Genesis 49. 10). 69. Exalted as—high palaces—or, mountains, and abiding as—the earth. 70-72. God's sovereignty was illustrated in this choice. The contrast is striking—humility and exaltation—and the correspondence is beautiful. following . . . ewes, &c.—lit., ewes giving suck (cf. Isaiah 40. 11). On the pastoral terms, cf. Psalm 79. 13.

PSALM LXXIX.

Ver. 1-13. This Psalm, like the 74th, probably depicts the desolations of the Chaldeans (Jeremiah 52. 12-24). It comprises the usual complaint, prayer, and promised thanks for relief.

1. (Cf. Psalm 74. 2-7.) 2, 3. (Cf. Jeremiah 15. 3; 16. 4.) 4. (Cf. Psalm 44. 13; Jeremiah 42. 18; Lamentations 2. 15.) 5. How long—(Psalm 13. 1) be angry—(Psalm 74. 1-10.) jealousy burn—(Deuteronomy 29. 20.) 6, 7. (Cf. Jeremiah 10. 25.) Though we deserve much, do not the heathen deserve more for their violence to us (Jeremiah 51. 3-5; Zechariah 1. 14)? The singular denotes the chief power, and the use of the plural indicates the combined confederates. called upon [or, by] thy name—proclaimed thy attributes and professed allegiance (Isaiah 12. 4; Acts 2. 21). 8. former iniquities—lit., iniquities of former times. prevent [lit., meet] us—as Psalm 21. 3. 9. for . . . glory of thy name [and for] name's sake—both mean for illustrating thy attributes, faithfulness, power, &c. purge . . . sins—lit., make, or provide, atonement for us. Deliverance from sin and suffering, for their good and God's glory, often distinguish the prayers of Old Testament saints (cf. Ephesians 1. 7). 10. This ground of pleading often used (Exodus 32. 12; Numbers 14. 13-16). blood . . . shed—(v. 3). 11. prisoner—the whole captive people. power—lit., arm (Psalm 10. 15). 12. into their bosom—the lap or folds of the dress is used by Eastern people for receiving articles. The figure denotes retaliation (cf. Isaiah 65. 6, 7). They reproached God as well as his people. 13. sheep . . . pasture—(Cf. Psalm 74. 1; 78, 70.)

PSALM LXXX.

Ver. 1-19. Shoshannim—Lilies (Psalm 45., title). Eduth—Testimony, referring to the topic as a testimony of God to his people (cf. Psalm 19. 7). This Psalm probably relates to the captivity of the ten tribes, as the former to that of Judah. Its complaint is aggravated by the contrast of former prosperity, and the prayer for relief occurs as a refrain through the Psalm.

1, 2. Joseph—for Ephraim (1 Chronicles 7. 20-29; Psalm 78. 67; Revelation 7. 8), for Israel. Shepherd—(Cf. Genesis 49. 24.) leadest, &c.—(Psalm 77. 20.) dwelling . . . cherubim—(Exodus 25. 20.) The place of God's visible glory, whence He communed with the people (Hebrews 9. 5). shine forth—appear (Psalm 50. 2; 94. 1). Before Ephraim, &c.—These tribes marched next the ark (Numbers 2. 18-24). The name of Benjamin may be introduced merely in allusion to that fact, and not because that tribe was identified with Israel in the schism (1 Kings 12. 16-21; cf. also Numbers 10. 24). 3. Turn us—i. e., from captivity. thy face to shine—(Numbers 6. 25.) 4. be angry—(Cf. Marginal.) 5. bread of tears—still an Eastern figure for affliction. 6. strife—object or cause of (Isaiah 9. 11). On last clause cf. Psalm 79. 4; Ezekiel 36. 4. 8-11. brought—or plucked up, as by roots, to be replanted, a vine—(Psalm 78. 47.) The figure (Isaiah 16. 8) represents the flourishing state of Israel, as predicted (Genesis 28. 14), and verified (1 Kings 4. 20-25). 12. hedges—(Isaiah 5. 5.) 13. The boar—may represent the ravaging Assyrian and the wild beast other heathen. 14, 15. visit this vine—favourably (Psalm 8. 4). And the vineyard—or, "And protect or guard what thy right hand," &c. the branch—lit., "over the Son of man," preceding this phrase, with "protect" or "watch," for thyselves—a tacit allusion to the plea for help; for 16. it—(the vine) or they—(the people) are suffering from thy displeasure. 17. thy hand . . . upon—i. e., strengthen (Ezra 7. 6; 8. 22). Man of . . . hand—may allude to Benjamin (Genesis 35. 18). The terms in the latter clause correspond with those of v. 15, from "and the branch," &c., literally, and confirm the exposition given above. 18. We need quickening grace (Psalm 71. 20; 119. 25) to persevere in thy right worship (Genesis 4. 26; Romans 10. 11). 19. (Cf. v. 3, O God; v. 7, O God of hosts.)

PSALM LXXXI.

Ver. 1-16. Githith—(Cf. Psalm 8., title.) A festal Psalm, probably for the passover (cf. Matthew 26. 30), in which, after an exhortation to praise God, He is introduced, reminding Israel of their obligations, chiding their neglect, and depicting the happy results of obedience.

1. our strength—(Psalm 38. 7.) 2. unites the most joyful kinds of music, vocal and instrumental. 3. the new moon—or the month. the time appointed—(Cf. Proverbs 7. 20.) 5. a testimony—the feasts, especially the passover, attested God's relation to His people. Joseph—for Israel (Psalm 80. 1). went out through—or over, i. e., Israel in the exode. I heard—change of person. The writer speaks for the nation. language—lit., lip (Psalm 14. 1). An aggravation or element of their distress that their oppressors were foreigners (Deuteronomy 23. 49). 6. God's language alludes to the burdensome slavery of the Israelites. 7. secret place—the cloud from which He troubled the Egyptians (Exodus 14. 24). proved thee—(Psalm 7. 10; 17. 3)—tested their faith by the miracle. 8. (Cf. Psalm 50. 7.) The reproof follows to v. 12. if thou wilt hearken—He then propounds the terms of His covenant: they should worship Him alone, who (v. 10) had delivered them, and would still confer all needed blessings. 11, 12. They failed, and He gave them up to their own desires and hardness of heart (Deuteronomy 29. 18; Proverbs 1. 30; Romans 11. 25). 13-16. Obedience would have secured all promised blessings and the subjection of foes. In this passage, "should have," "would have," &c., are better, "should" and "would" expressing God's intention at the time, i. e., when they left Egypt.

PSALM LXXXII.

Ver. 1-8. Before the great Judge the judges of the earth are rebuked, exhorted, and threatened.

1. congregation—(Cf. Exodus 12. 3; 16. 1.) of the mighty—i. e., of God, of His appointment, the gods—or judges (Exodus 21. 6; 22. 9), God's representatives. 2. accept the persons—lit., take or lift up the faces, i. e., from dejection, or admit to favour and communion, regardless of merit (Leviticus 19. 15; Proverbs 18. 5). 3, 4. So must good judges act (Psalm 10. 14; 29. 12). poor and needy—(Cf. Psalm 34. 10; 41. 1.) 5. By the wilful ignorance and negligence of judges, anarchy ensues (Psalm 11. 3; 75. 3). out of course—(Cf. Margin; Psalm 9. 6; 62. 2.) 6, 7. Though God admitted their official dignity (John 10. 34), He reminds them of their mortality. fall like, &c.—be cut off suddenly (Psalm 20. 8; 91. 7). 8. As rightful sovereign of earth, God is invoked personally to correct the evils of His representatives.

PSALM LXXXIII.

Ver. 1-18. Of Asaph—(Cf. Psalm 74., title.) The historical occasion is probably that of 2 Chronicles 20. 1, 2 (cf. Psalms 47., 48). After a general petition, the craft and rage of the combined enemies are described, God's former dealings recited, and a like summary and speedy destruction on them is invoked.

1. God addressed as indifferent (cf. Psalm 35. 22; 39. 12). be not still—lit., not quiet, as opposed to action. 2. thine enemies—as well as ours (Psalm 74. 23; Isaiah 37. 23). 3. hidden ones—whom God specially protects (Psalm 27. 5; 91. 1). 4. from being a nation—utter destruction (Isaiah 7. 8; 23. 1). Israel—here used for Judah, having been the common name. 5. they have consulted—with heart, or cordially. together—all alike. 6-8. tabernacles—for people (Psalm 78. 67). they—all these united with the children of Lot, or Ammonites and Moabites (cf. 2 Chronicles 20. 1). 9-11. Compare the similar fate of these (2 Chronicles 20. 23) with that of the foes mentioned in Judges 7. 22, here referred to. They destroyed one another (Judges 4. 6-24; 7. 25). Human remains form manure (cf. 2 Kings 9. 37; Jeremiah 9. 22). 12. The language of the invaders. houses—lit., residences, enclosures, as for flocks (Psalm 65. 12). of God—as the proprietors of the land (2 Chronicles 20. 11; Isaiah 14. 25). 13. like a wheel—or whirling of any light thing (Isaiah 17. 13), as stubble or chaff (Psalm 1. 4). 14, 15. Pursue them to an utter destruction. 16. that they may seek—or as v. 18, supply "men," since v. 17, 18 amplify the sentiment of v. 16, expressing more fully the measure of destruction, and the lesson of God's being and perfections (cf. 2 Chronicles 20. 29) taught to all men.

PSALM LXXXIV.

Ver. 1-12. Cf. on titles of Psalms 8., 42. The writer describes the desirableness of God's worship, and prays for a restoration to its privileges.

1. amiable—not lovely, but beloved. tabernacles—(Psalm 43. 3). 2. lougeth—most intensely (Genesis 31. 30; Psalm 17. 12). fatigeth—exhausted with desire. courts—as tabernacles (v. 1)—the whole building. crieth out—lit., sings for joy; but here, and Lamentations 2. 19, expresses an act of sorrow as the corresponding noun (Psalm 17. 1; 61. 2). heart and . . . flesh—as Psalm 63. 1. 3. thine altars—i. e., of burnt offering and incense, used for the whole tabernacle. Its structure afforded facilities for sparrows and swallows to indulge their known predilections for such places. Some understand the statement as to the birds as a comparison: "as they find homes, so do I desire thine altars," &c. 4. This view is favoured by the language here, which, as Psalm 15. 1; 23. 6, recognizes the blessing of membership in God's family by terms denoting a dwelling in His house. 5. (Cf. Psalm 63. 23.) in whose heart . . . ways—i. e., who knows and loves the way to God's favour (Proverbs 16. 17; Isaiah 49. 3, 4). 6. valley of Baca—or weeping. Through such, by reason of their dry and barren condition, the worshippers often had to pass to Jerusalem. As they might become wells, or fountains, or pools, supplied by refreshing rain, so the grace of God, by the exercises of His worship, refreshes and revives the hearts of His people, so that for sorrows they have "rivers of delight" (Psalm 36. 8; 46. 4). 7. The figure of the pilgrim is carried out. As such daily refit their bodily strength till they reach Jerusalem, so the spiritual worshipper is daily supplied with spiritual strength by God's grace till he appears before God in heaven. appeareth . . . God—the terms of the requisition for the attendance on the feasts (cf. Deuteronomy 16. 16). 9. God is addressed as a shield (cf. v. 11). thine anointed—David (1 Samuel 16. 12). 10. I had . . . doorkeeper—lit., I choose to sit on the threshold, the meanest place. 11, 12. As a sun God enlightens (Psalm 27. 1); as a shield, protects. Grace is God's favour, its fruit—glory the honour He bestows. uprightly—(Psalm 15. 2; 18. 23.) that trusteth—constantly.

PSALM LXXXV.

Ver. 1-13. On the ground of former mercies, the Psalmist prays for renewed blessings, and, confidently expecting them, rejoices.

1. captivity—not necessarily the Babylonian, but any great evil (Psalm 14. 7). 2, 3—(Cf. Psalm 32. 1-5.) To turn from the fierceness, &c., implies that He was reconcilable, though (4-7) having still occasion for the anger which is deprecating. draw out—or, prolong (Psalm 36. 10). 8. He is confident God will favour His penitent people (Psalm 51. 17; 80. 18). saints—as Psalm 4. 3, the "godly." 9. They are here termed "them that fear him;" and grace produces glory (Psalm 84. 11). 10. God's promises of mercy will be verified by His truth (cf. Psalm 25. 10; 40. 10; and the "work of righteousness" in His holy government shall be "peace" (Isaiah 32. 17). There is an implied contrast with a dispensation under which God's truth sustains His threatened wrath, and His righteousness inflicts misery on the wicked. 11. Earth and heaven shall abound with the blessings of this government; 12-13, and, under this, the deserted land shall be productive, and men be set, or guided in God's holy ways. Doubtless, in this description of God's returning favour, the writer had in view that more glorious period, when Christ shall establish His government on God's reconciled justice and abounding mercy.

PSALM LXXXVI.

Ver. 1-17. This is a prayer in which the writer, with deep emotion, mingles petitions and praises, now urgent for help, and now elated with hope, in view of former mercies. The occurrence of many terms and phrases peculiar to David's Psalms clearly intimates its authorship.

1, 2. poor and needy—a suffering child of God, as Psalm 10. 12, 17; 18. 27. I am holy—or, godly, as Psalm 4. 3; 85. 8. 4. lift up my soul—with strong desire (Psalm 25. 1). 5-7. unto all . . . that call upon thee—or, worship thee (Psalm 50. 15; 91. 15) however undeserving (Exodus 34. 6; Leviticus 11. 9-13). 8. neither . . . works—lit., nothing like thy works, the gods have none at all. 9, 10. The pious Jews believed that God's common relation to all would be ultimately acknowledged by all men (Psalm 45. 12-16; 47. 9). 11. Teach—Show, point out. the way—of Providence. walk in thy truth—according to its declarations. unite my heart—fix all my affections (Psalm 12. 2; James 4. 8). to fear thy name—(cf. v. 12) to honour thy perfections. 13, 14. The reason; God had delivered him from death and the power of insolent, violent, and godless persecutors (Psalm 54. 3; Ezekiel 8. 12). 15. Contrasts God with his enemies (cf. v. 5). 16. son . . . handmaid—home-born servant (cf. Luke 15. 17). 17. Show me—lit., Make with me a token, by thy providential care. Thus in and by his prosperity his enemies would be confounded.

PSALM LXXXVII.

Ver. 1-7. This triumphal song was probably occasioned by the same event as the 46th. The writer celebrates the glory of the Church, as the means of spiritual blessing to the nation.

1. His (i. e., God's) foundation—or, what He has founded, i. e., Zion (Isaiah 14. 32). is in the holy mountains—the location of Zion, in the wide sense, for the capital, or Jerusalem, being on several hills. 2. gates—for the enclosures, or city to which they opened (Psalm 9. 14; 122. 2; cf. Psalm 132. 13, 14). 3. spoken of (or in) thee—i. e., the city of God (Psalm 46. 4; 48. 2). 4. This is what is spoken by God. to them . . . me—lit., for my knowers, they are true worshippers (Psalm 36. 10; Isaiah 19. 21). These are mentioned as specimens. This (i. e., nation) . . . was born here—Of each it is said, "This was born, or is a native of Zion, spiritually." 5. The writer resumes—This and that man—lit., man and man, or many (Genesis 14. 10; Exodus . 10, 14), or all (Isaiah 44. 5; Galatians 3. 28). the Highest her—God is her protector. 6. The same idea is set forth under the figure of a register made by God (cf. Isaiah . 3). 7. As in a great procession of those thus written up, or registered, seeking Zion (Isaiah 2. 3; Jeremiah 50. 5), *the singers and players, or pipers, shall precede. all my prizes—*so each shall say, "All my sources of spiritual joy are in thee" (Psalm 46. 4; 84. 6).

PSALM LXXXVIII.

Ver. 1-18. *Upon Mahalath—*either an instrument, as a lute, to be used as an accompaniment, Leannoth, for singing, or, as others think, an enigmatic title (cf. Psalm 5. 22 and 45. titles), denoting the subject—i. e., "sickness or disease, for humbling," the idea of spiritual maladies being often represented by disease (cf. Psalm 6. 5, 6; 22. 14, 15, &c.). On the other terms (cf. Psalm 42. 32) Heman and Ethan (Psalm 89. title) were David's singers (1 Chronicles 6. 18, 33; 15. 17), of the family of Kohath. If the persons alluded to (1 Kings 4. 31; 1 Chronicles 2. 6), they were probably adopted into the tribe of Judah. Though called a song, which usually implies joy (Psalm 83. 1), both the style and matter of the Psalm are very despondent; yet the appeals to God evince faith, and we may suppose that the word song might be extended to such compositions.

1, 2. Cf. on the terms used, Psalm 22. 2; 31. 2. 3. grave—lit., hell (Psalm 16. 10), death in wide sense. 4. go . . . pit—of destruction (Psalm 28. 1). as a man—lit., a stout man, whose strength is utterly gone. 5. Free . . . dead—Cut off from God's care, as are the slain, who, falling under His wrath, are left, no longer sustained by His hand. 6. Similar figures for distress in Psalm 63. 9; 69. 3. 7. Cf. Psalm 83. 2, on first, and Psalm 42. 7, on last clause. 8. Both cut off from sympathy and made hateful to friends (Psalm 31. 11). 9. mine eye mourneth—lit., decays, or fails, denoting exhaustion (Psalm 6. 7; 31. 9). I . . . called—(Psalm 86. 5, 7). stretched out—for help (Psalm 44. 20). 10. shall the dead [the remains of ghosts] arise—lit., rise up, i. e., as dead persons. 11, 12 amplify the foregoing, the whole purport (as Psalm 6. 5) being to contrast death and life as seasons for praising God. 13. prevent—meet—i. e., he will diligently come before God for help (Psalm 18. 41). 14. On the terms (Psalm 27. 9; 74. 1; 77. 7). 15. from . . . youth up—all my life. With 16, 17 the extremes of anguish and despair are depicted. 18. into darkness—Better omit "into"—mine acquaintances (are) darkness, the gloom of death, &c. (Job 17. 13, 14).

PSALM LXXXIX.

Ver. 1-52. Of Ethan—(see Psalm 88. title). The Psalm was composed during some season of great national distress, perhaps Absalom's rebellion. It contrasts the promised prosperity and perpetuity of David's throne (with reference to the great promise of 2 Samuel 7.), with a time when God appeared to have forgotten His covenant. The picture thus drawn may typify the promises and the adversities of Christ's kingdom, and the terms of confiding appeal to God provided appropriate prayers for the Divine aid and promised blessing.

1. mercies—those promised (Isaiah 55. 3; Acts 13. 34), and —faithfulness—i. e., in fulfilling them. 2. I have said—expressed, as well as felt, my convictions (2 Corinthians 4. 13). 3, 4. The object of this faith expressed in God's words (2 Samuel 7. 11-16). with [or lit., to] my chosen—as the covenant is in the form of a promise. 6, 7. This is worthy of our belief, for His faithfulness (is praised) by the congregation of saints or holy ones, i. e., angels (cf. Deuteronomy 33. 2; Daniel 8. 13). sons of . . . mighty—(cf. Psalm 29. 1.) So is He to be admired on earth. 8-14. To illustrate His power and faithfulness examples are cited from history His control of the sea (the most mighty and unstable object in nature), and of Egypt (Psalm 87. 4), the first great foe of Israel (subjected to utter helplessness from pride and insolence), are specimens. At the same time, the whole frame of nature founded and sustained by Him, Tabor and Hermon for east and west, and "north and south," together representing the whole world, declare the same truth as to His attributes. rejoice in thy name—praise thy perfections by their very existence. 15. His government of righteousness is served by mercy and truth as ministers (Psalm 85. 10-13). know the joyful sound—understand and appreciate the spiritual blessings symbolized by the feasts to which the people were called by the trumpet (Leviticus 25. 9, &c.). walk . . . countenance—live in His favour (Psalm 4. 6; 44. 3). 16, 17. in [or, by] thy righteousness—thy faithful just rule, glory [or, beauty] of their strength—they shall be adorned as well as protected. our horn—exalt our power (Psalm 75. 10; Luke 1. 69). 18. (Cf. Margin.) Thus is introduced the promise to "our shield," "our king," David. 19-37. Then—When the covenant was established, of whose execution the exalted views of God now given furnish assurance. thou . . . to thy Holy One—or godly saint, object of favour (Psalm 4. 3). Nathan is meant (2 Samuel 7. 17; 1 Chronicles 17. 9-15). laid help—lit., given help. David was chosen and then exalted. 20. I have found—having sought and then selected him (1 Samuel 16. 1-6), 21, will protect and sustain (Isaiah 41. 10), 22-25, by restraining and conquering his enemies, and performing my gracious purpose of extending his dominion—hand [and] right hand—power (Psalm 17. 7; 60. 5). sea, and . . . rivers—limits of his empire (Psalm 72. 8). 26, 27. first born—one who is chief, most beloved or distinguished (Exodus 4. 22; Colossians 1. 15). In God's sight and purposes he was the first among all monarchs, and specially so in his typical relation to Christ. 28-37. This relation is perpetual with David's descendants, as a whole typical in official position of his last greatest descendant. Hence though in personal relations any of them might be faithless and so punished, their typical relation shall continue. His oath confirms his promise, and the most enduring objects of earth and heaven illustrate its perpetual force (Psalm 72. 5, 7, 17). by my holiness—as a holy God. once—one thing (Psalm 27. 4). that I will not lie—lit., if I lie—part of the form of swearing (1 Samuel 24. 6; 2 Samuel 3. 35). It shall . . . moon . . . heaven—lit., "As the moon, and the witness in the sky is sure, i. e., the moon." 38-52 present a striking contrast to these glowing promises, in mournful evidences of a loss of God's favour. 38. cast off—and rejected (cf. Psalm 15. 4; 43. 2; 41. 9). 39. An insult to the crowns, as of Divine origin, was a profanation. 40-45. The ruin is depicted under several figures—a vineyard whose broken hedges, and a stronghold whose ruins invite spoilers and invaders; a warrior, whose enemies are aided by God, and whose sword's edge—lit., rock or strength (Joshua 5. 2) is useless; and a youth prematurely old. days of his youth—or, youthful vigour, i. e., of the royal line, or promised perpetual kingdom, under the figure of a man. 46. How long? &c.—(Cf. Psalm 13. 1; 88. 14; Jeremiah 4. 4). 47. These expostulations are excited in view of the identity of the prosperity of this kingdom with the welfare of all mankind (Genesis 22. 18; Psalm 72. 17; Isaiah 9. 7; 11. 1-10); for if such is the fate of this chosen royal line. 48. What man—lit., strong man—shall live? and, indeed, have not all men been made in vain, as to glorifying God? 49-51. The terms of expostulation are used in view of the actual appearance that God had forsaken His people and forgotten His promise, and the plea for aid is urged in view of the reproaches of His and His people's enemies (cf. Isaiah 37. 17-35). bear in my bosom—as feeling the affliction of the people (Psalm 69. 9). footsteps—ways (Psalm 56. 6). Blessed, &c.—denotes returning confidence (Psalm 34. 1-3). Amen, and Amen—closes the third book of Psalms.

PSALM XC.

Ver. 1-17. Contrasting man's frailty with God's eternity, the writer mourns over it as the punishment of sin, and prays for a return of the Divine favour. A Prayer [mainly such] of Moses the man of God—(Deuteronomy 33. 1; Joshua 14. 6); as such he wrote this (cf. titles of Psalm 18. and Psalm 36).

1. dwelling-place—home (cf. Ezekiel 11. 16), as a refuge (Deuteronomy 33. 27). 2. brought forth [and] formed—both express the idea of production by birth. 3. to destruction—lit., even to dust (Genesis 3. 19), which is partly quoted in the last clause. 4. Even were our days now 1000 years, as Adam's, our life would be but a moment in God's sight (2 Peter 3. 8). a watch—or, third part of a night (cf. Exodus 14. 24). 5, 6. Life is like grass, which, though changing under the influence of the night's dew, and flourishing in the morning, is soon cut down and withereth (Psalm 103. 15; 1 Peter 1. 24). 7, 8. For—A reason, this is the infliction of God's wrath. troubled—lit., confounded by terror (Psalm 2. 5). Death is by sin (Romans 5. 12). Though secret, the light of God's countenance, as a andle, will bring sin to view (Proverbs 20. 27; 1 Corinthians 13. 5). 9. are passed—lit., turn, as to depart (Jeremiah 6. 4). spend—lit., consume. as a tale—lit., a thought, or, a sigh (Ezekiel 2. 10). 10. Moses' life was an exception (Deuteronomy 34. 7). it is . . . cut off—or, driven, as is said of the quails in using the same word (Numbers 11. 31). In view of this certain and speedy end, life is full of sorrow. 11. The whole verse may be read as a question implying the negative, "No one knows what thy anger can do, and what thy wrath is, estimated by a true piety." 12. This he prays we may know or understand, so as properly to number or appreciate the shortness of our days, that we may be wise. 13. (Cf. Psalm 13. 2.) let it repent—a strong figure, as Exodus 32. 12, imploring a change in His dealings. 14. early—promptly. 15. As have been our sorrows, so let our joys be great and long. 16. thy work—or, providential acts. thy glory—(Psalm 8. 5; 45. 3), the honour accruing from thy work of mercy to us. 17. let the beauty—or sum of His gracious acts, in their harmony, be illustrated in us, and favour our enterprise.

PSALM XCI.

Ver. 1-16. David is the most probable author; and the pestilence, mentioned 2 Samuel 24., the most probable of any special occasion to which the Psalm may refer. The changes of person allowable in poetry are here frequently made.

1. To dwell in the secret place (Psalm 27. 5; 31. 20), denotes nearness to God. Such as do so abide or lodge secure from assaults, and can well use the terms of trust in v. 2. 3. snare . . . [and] noisome pestilence—lit., plagues of mischiefs (Psalm 5. 9; 52. 7), are expressive figures for various evils. 4. For the first figure cf. Deuteronomy 32. 11; Mark 23. 37. bucler—lit., surrounding—i. e., a kind of shield covering all over. 5. terror—or, what causes it (Proverbs 20. 2). by night—then aggravated. arrow—i. e., of enemies. 7-8. The security is more valuable, as being special, and, therefore, evidently of God; and while ten thousands of the wicked fall, the righteous are in such safety, that they only see the calamity. 9-12. This exemption from evil is the result of trust in God, who employs angels as ministering spirits (Hebrews 1. 14). 13. Even the fiercest, strongest and most insidious animals may be trampled on with impunity. 14-16. God Himself speaks (cf. Psalm 46. 10; 75. 2, 3). All the terms to express safety and peace indicate the most undoubting confidence (cf. Psalm 18. 2; 20. 1; 22. 5). set his love—that of the most ardent kind. show him—lit., make him see (Psalm 50. 23; Luke 2. 30).

PSALM XCII.

Ver. 1-15. A Psalm-song—(Cf. Psalm 30., title.) The theme is, that God should be praised for His righteous judgments on the wicked and His care and defence of His people. Such a topic, at all times proper, is specially so for the refections of the Sabbath-day.

1. sing . . . name—celebrate thy perfections. 2. In the morning . . . every night—diligently and constantly (Psalm 42. 8). loving-kindness—lit., mercy. faithfulness—in fulfilling promises (Psalm 89. 14). 3. In such a work all proper aid must be used. with a . . . sound—or, on Higgaion (cf. Psalm 9. 16), perhaps an instrument of that name, from its sound resembling the muttered sound of meditation, as expressed also by the word. This is joined with the harp. 4. thy work—i. e., of providence (Psalm 90. 16, 17). 5. great . . . works—correspond to deep or vast thoughts (Psalm 40. 5; Romans 11. 23). 6. A brutish man knoweth not—i. e., God's works, so the Psalmist describes himself (Psalm 73. 22) when amazed by the prosperity of the wicked, now understood and explained. 8. This he does in part, by contrasting their ruin with God's exaltation and eternity. most high—as occupying the highest place in heaven (Psalm 7. 7; 18. 16). 9, 10. A further contrast with the wicked, in the lot of the righteous, safety and triumph. horn . . . exalt—is to increase power (Psalm 75. 5). anointed . . . fresh [or, new] oil—(Psalm 23. 5) a figure for refreshment (cf. Luke 7. 46). Such use of oil is still common in the East. 11. see . . . [and] hear my desire—or, lit., look on my enemies and hear of the wicked (cf. Psalm 27. 11; 51. 7)—i. e., I shall be gratified by their fall. 12-14. The vigorous growth, longevity, utility, fragrance, and beauty of these noble trees, set forth the life, character, and destiny of the pious; 15, and they thus declare God's glory as their strong and righteous ruler.

PSALM XCIII.

Ver. 1-5. This and the six following Psalms were applied by the Jews to the times of the Messiah. The theme is God's supremacy in creation and providence.

1. God is described as a king entering on His reign, and, for robes of royalty, investing Himself with the glorious attributes of His nature. The result of His thus reigning is the durability of the world. 2-4. His undervied power exceeds the most sublime exhibitions of the most powerful objects in nature (Psalm 89. 9). 5. While His power inspires dread, His revealed will should secure our confidence (cf. Psalm 19. 7; 25. 10), and thus fear and love combined, producing all holy emotions, should distinguish the worship we offer in His house, both earthly and heavenly.

PSALM XCIV.

Ver. 1-23. The writer, appealing to God in view of the oppression of enemies, rebukes them for their wickedness and folly, and encourages himself, in the confidence that God will punish evil-doers, and favour His people.

1, 2. God's revenge is His judicial infliction of righteous punishment. show thyself—(Cf. Margin.) Lift up thyself—or, Arise, both figures representing God as heretofore indifferent (cf. Psalm 3. 7; 22. 16, 20). 3, 4. In an earnest expostulation he expresses his desire that the insolent triumph of the wicked may be ended. 5, 6. people [and] heritage—are synonymous, the people being often called God's heritage. As justice to the weak is a sign of the best government, their oppression is a sign of the worst (Deuteronomy 10. 18; Isaiah 10. 2). 7. Their cruelty is only exceeded by their wicked and absurd presumption (Psalm 10. 11; 59. 7). 8. ye brutish—(Cf. Psalm 73. 22; 92. 6.) 9-11. The evidence of God's providential government is found in His creative power and omniscience, which also assure us that He can punish the wicked in regard to all their vain purposes. 12, 13. On the other hand he favours, though he chastens, the pious, and will teach and preserve them till the prosperous wicked are overthrown. 14, 15. This results from His abiding love (Deuteronomy 32. 15), which is further evinced by His restoring order in His government, whose right administration will be approved by the good. 16. These questions imply that none other than God will help (Psalm 60. 9), 17-19, a fact fully confirmed by his past experience. dwelt in silence—as in the grave (Psalm 31. 17). my thoughts—or, anxious cares. 20. throne—power, rulers. iniquity [and] mischiefs—both denote evils done to others, as 21. explains. 22, 23. Yet he is safe in God's care. defence—(Psalm 59. 9.) rock of . . . refuge—(Psalm 9. 9; 18. 2.) bring . . . iniquity—(Cf. Psalm 5. 10; 7. 16.) in their . . . wickedness—while they are engaged in evil-doing.

PSALM XCV.

Ver. 1-11. David (Hebrews 4. 7) exhorts men to praise

God for His greatness, and warns them, in God's words, against neglecting His service.

1. The terms used to express the highest kind of joy. Rock—A firm basis, giving certainty of salvation (Psalm 62. 7). 2. come . . . presence—lit., approach, or, meet Him (Psalm 17. 13). 3. above . . . gods—esteemed such by men, though really nothing (Jeremiah 5. 7; 10. 10-15). 4, 5. The terms used describe the world in its whole extent, subject to God. 6. come—or, enter, with solemn forms, as well as hearts. 7. This relation illustrates our entire dependence (cf. Psalm 22. 3; 74. 1). The last clause is united by Paul (Hebrews 3. 7) to the following (cf. Psalm 81. 8), 8-11, warning against neglect; and this is sustained by citing the melancholy fate of their rebellious ancestors, whose provoking insolence is described by quoting the language of God's complaint (Numbers 14. 11) of their conduct at Meribah and Massah, names given (Exodus 17. 7) to commemorate their strife and contention with Him (Psalm 78. 13, 41). err in their heart—their wanderings in the desert were but types of their innate ignorance and perverseness. that they should not—lit., if they, &c., part of the form of swearing (cf. Numbers 14. 30; Psalm 89. 35).

PSALM XCVI.

Ver. 1-13. The substance of this Psalm, and portions of the 97th, 98th, and 100th, are found in 1 Chronicles 16, which was used by David's directions in the dedication of the tabernacle on Mount Zion. The dispensation of the Messiah was typified by that event, involving, as it did, a more permanent seat of worship, and the introduction of additional and more spiritual services. Hence the language of these Psalms may be regarded as having a higher import than that pertinent to the occasion on which it was thus publicly used.

1-3. All nations are invited to unite in this most joyful praise. new song—lit., fresh, for new mercies (Psalm 33. 3; 40. 3). show forth—lit., declare joyful tidings. The salvation illustrates His glory in its wonders of love and mercy. 4, 5. For He is not a local God, but of universal agency, while idols are nothing. 6. Honour and majesty—are His attendants, declared in His mighty works, while power and grace are specially seen in His spiritual relations to His people. 7-9. Give—or, ascribe (Psalm 29. 1) due honour to Him, by acts of appointed and solemn worship in His house. offering—of thanks, beauty of holiness—(Psalm 29. 2.) fear . . . him—(Psalm 2. 11.) 10. Let all know that the government of the world is ordered in justice, and they shall enjoy firm and lasting peace (cf. Psalm 72. 3, 7; Isaiah 9. 6, 7). 11-13. For which reason the universe is invoked to unite in joy, and even inanimate nature (Romans 8. 14-22) is poetically represented as capable of joining in the anthem of praise.

PSALM XCVII.

Ver. 1-13. The writer celebrates the Lord's dominion over nations and nature, describes its effect on foes and friends, and exhorts and encourages the latter.

1-2. This dominion is a cause of joy, because, however our minds are oppressed with terror before the throne of the King of kings (Exodus 19. 16; Deuteronomy 5. 22), we know it is based on righteous principles and judgments which are according to truth. 3-5. The attending illustrations of God's awful justice on enemies (Psalm 83. 14) are seen in the disclosures of His almighty power on the elements of nature (cf. Psalm 46. 2; 77. 17; Habakkuk 3. 6, &c.). 6. heavens—or, their inhabitants (Psalm 50. 6), as opposed to nations in the latter clause (cf. Isaiah 40. 5; 66. 18). 7. Idolaters are utterly put to shame, for if angels must worship Him, how much more those who worshipped them. all ye gods—lit., all ye angels (Psalm 8. 5; 133. 1; Hebrews 1. 6; 2. 7) Paul quotes, not as a prophecy, but as language used in regard to the Lord Jehovah, who in the Old Testament theophania is the second person of the Godhead. 8, 9. The exaltation of Zion's king is joy to the righteous and sorrow to the wicked. daughters of Judah—(Cf. Psalm 48. 11.) above all gods—(Psalm 95. 3.) 10-13. Let gratitude for the blessings of providence and grace incite saints (Psalm 4. 3) to holy living. Spiritual blessings are in store, represented by light (Psalm 27. 1) and gladness. sown—to spring forth abundantly for such, who alone can and well may rejoice in the holy government of their sovereign Lord (cf. Psalm 30. 4; 32. 11)

PSALM XCVIII.

Ver. 1-9. In view of the wonders of grace and righteousness displayed in God's salvation, the whole creation is invited to unite in praise.

1. gotten . . . victory—lit., made salvation, enabled Him to save His people. right hand, and . . . arm—denote power. holy arm—or, arm of holiness, the power of His united moral perfections (Psalm 22. 3; 32. 11). 2. The salvation is the result of His righteousness (Psalm 7. 17; 31. 1, and both are publicly displayed. 3. The union of mercy and truth (Psalm 57. 3; 85. 10) secure the blessings of the promise (Genesis 12. 3; 18. 18) to all the world (Isaiah 52. 10). 4-6. make a loud noise—or, burst forth (Isaiah 14. 7; 44. 23). before . . . King—hail Him as your sovereign; and while with every aid to demonstrate zeal and joy, intelligent creatures are invited to praise, as in Psalm 96. 11-13, inanimate nature is also summoned to honour Him who triumphs and rules in righteousness and equity.

PSALM XCIX.

Ver. 1-9. God's government is especially exercised in and for His Church, which should praise Him for His gracious dealings.

1. sitteth . . . cherubim—(cf. 1 Samuel 4. 4; Psalm 80. 1). tremble . . . be moved—inspired with fear by His judgments on the wicked. 2. great in Zion—where He dwells (Psalm 9. 11). 3. thy . . . name—perfections of justice, power, &c. great and terrible—producing dread (Deuteronomy 10. 17), and to be praised by those over whom He is exalted (Psalm 97. 9). it is holy—or, He is holy (v. 5, 9; Isaiah 6. 3). 4, 5. To His wise and righteous government all nations should render honour. king's . . . judgment—His power is combined with justice. he is holy—(cf. Psalm 22. 3). 6-8. The experience of these servants of God is cited for encouragement. among . . . priests, among . . . upon the Lord [and] He spake . . . pillar—may be referred to all three (cf. Exodus 18. 19; Leviticus 8. 15; Deuteronomy 5. 5; 1 Samuel 9. 13). The cloudy pillar was the medium of Divine intercourse (Exodus 33. 9; Numbers 12. 5). Obedience was united with worship. God answered them as intercessors for the people, who, though forgiven, were yet chastened (Exodus 32. 10, 34).

PSALM C.

Ver. 1-5. As closing this series (cf. on Psalm 94), this Psalm is a general call on all the earth to render exalted praise to God, the creator, preserver, and benefactor of men.

1, 2. With thankful praise, unite service as the subjects of a king (Psalm 2. 11, 12). 3. To the obligations of a creature and subject is added that of a beneficiary (Psalm 95. 7). 4. Join joyfully in His public worship. The terms are, of course, figurative (cf. Psalm 84. 2; 92. 13; Isaiah 66. 23). Enter—or, Come with solemnity (Psalm 95. 6). 5. The reason: God's eternal mercy and truth (Psalm 25. 8; 89. 7).

PSALM CI.

Ver. 1-8. In this Psalm the profession of the principles of His domestic and political government testifies, as well as actions in accordance with it, David's appreciation of God's mercy to him, and His judgment on his enemies; and thus he sings or celebrates God's dealings.

2. He avows his sincere purpose, by God's aid, to act uprightly (Genesis 17. 1; Psalm 18. 30). 3. set . . . eyes—as an example to be approved and followed. no wicked thing—lit., word, plan or purpose of Belial (Psalm 41. 8). work of . . . aside—apostates. not cleave to me—I will not be implicated in it (cf. Psalm 1. 1-3). 4. A froward [or, perverse] heart—(Psalm 18. 26.) Such a temper I will not indulge, nor even know evil or wickedness. 5, 6. The slanderers and haughty persons, so mischievous in society, I will disown; but—mine eyes . . . upon—or, I will select reliable and honest men for my servants. 7. not dwel—lit., not sit, or tarry, or be established. 8. will early—or, diligently. city of the Lord—or, holy place (Psalm 48. 2), where wicked men shall not be tolerated.

PSALM CII.

Ver. 1-28. A prayer of the afflicted, &c.—The general terms seem to denote the propriety of regarding the Psalm as suitably expressive of the anxieties of any one of David's descendants, piously concerned for the welfare of the Church. It was probably David's composition, and, though specially suggested by some peculiar trials, descriptive of future times. Overwhelmed—(cf. Psalm 61. 2). Complaint—(Psalm 55. 2). Pouring out the soul—(Psalm 62. 8.) The tone of complaint predominates, though in view of God's promises and abiding faithfulness, it is sometimes exchanged for that of confidence and hope.

1-3. The terms used occur in Psalm 4. 1; 17. 1, 6; 18. 6; 31. 2, 10; 37. 20. 4. (Cf. Psalm 121. 6.) so that I forget—or, have forgotten, i. e., in my distress (Psalm 107. 18), and hence strength fails. 5. voice . . . groaning—effect put for cause, my agony emaciates me. 6, 7. The figures express extreme loneliness. 8. sworn against me—or lit., by me, wishing others as miserable as I am (Numbers 5. 21). 9. ashes—a figure of grief, my bread; weeping or tears, my drink (Psalm 80. 5). 10. lifted . . . cast me down—or, cast me away as stubble by a whirlwind (Isaiah 64. 6). 11. shadow . . . declineth—soon to vanish in the darkness of night. 12. Contrast with man's frailty (cf. Psalm 90. 1-7). thy remembrance—that by which thou art remembered, thy promise. 13, 14. Hence it is here adduced. for [or, when] . . . the set time, &c.—the time promised, the indication of which is the interest felt for Zion by the people of God. 15-17. God's favour to the Church will affect her persecutors with fear. When the Lord shall build—or better, Because the Lord hath built, &c., as a reason for the effect on others; for in thus acting and hearing the humble, He is most glorious. 18. people . . . created—(cf. Psalm 22. 31), an organized body, as a Church. 19-22. A summary of what shall be written. For—or, That, as introducing the statement of God's condescension. to loose . . . appointed—or, deliver them (Psalm 79. 11). To declare, &c., or, That God's name may be celebrated in the assemblies of His Church, gathered from all nations (Zechariah 8. 20-23), and devoted to His service. 23-28. The writer, speaking for the Church, finds encouragement in the midst of all his distresses. God's eternal existence is a pledge of faithfulness to His promises. in the way—of providence. weakened—lit., afflicted, and made fearful of a premature end, a figure of the apprehensions of the Church, lest God might not perform His promise, drawn from those of a person in view of the dangers of early death (cf. Psalm 89. 47). Paul (Hebrews 1. 10) quotes v. 20-23 as addressed to Christ in His Divine nature. The scope of the Psalm, as already seen, so far from opposing, favours this view, especially by the sentiments of v. 12-15 (cf. Isaiah 60. 1). The association of the Messiah with a day of future glory to the Church was very intimate in the minds of Old Testament writers, and with correct views of His nature it is very consistent that He should be addressed as the Lord and Head of His Church, who would bring about that glorious future on which they ever dwelt with fond and delightful anticipations.

PSALM CIII.

Ver. 1-22. A Psalm of joyous praise, in which the writer rises to a thankful acknowledgment of personal blessings to a lively celebration of God's gracious attributes, as not only intrinsically worthy of praise, but as specially suited to man's frailty, and concludes by invoking all creatures to unite in his song.

1. Bless, &c.—when God is the object, praise. my soul—myself (Psalm 3. 3; 25. 1), with allusion to the act, as one of intelligence. all . . . within me—(Deuteronomy 6. 5) his holy name—(Psalm 5. 11), His complete moral perfections. 2. forget not all—not any, none of His benefits. 3. diseases, as penal inflictions (Deuteronomy 39. 2; 2 Chronicles 21. 19). 4. redeemeth—cost is implied. de- struction—lit., pit of corruption (Psalm 16. 10). crowmeth—or, adorneth (Psalm 65. 11). tender mercies—compassions (cf. Psalm 25. 6; 40. 11). 5. By God's provision, the saint retains a youthful vigour like the eagles (Psalm 92. 14; cf. Isaiah 40. 31). 6. Lit., righteousness and judgments, denoting various acts of God's government. 7. ways—of providence, &c., as usual (Psalm 25. 4; 67. 2). acts—lit., wonders (Psalm 7. 11; 78. 17). 8-10. God's benevolence implies no merit. He shows it to sinners, who also are chastened for a time (Exodus 34. 6). keep (anger)—in Leviticus 19. 18, bear a grudge (Jeremiah 3. 5, 12). 11. great—efficient. 12. removed . . . from us—so as no longer to affect our relations to Him. 13. pitieth—lit., has compassion on. 14. he [who formed, Psalm 94. 9] knoweth our frame—lit., our form. we are dust—made of and tending to it (Genesis 2. 7). 15, 16. So short and frail is life that a breath may destroy it. it is gone—lit., it is not. know it no more—no more recognize him (Psalm 90. 6; Isaiah 40. 6-8). 17, 18. For similar contrast cf. Psalm 90. 2-6; 102. 27, 28. such . . . covenant—limits the general terms preceding. righteousness—as usual (Psalm 7. 17; 31. 1). 19. God's firm and universal dominion is a pledge that He will keep His promises (Psalm 11. 4; 47. 8). 20-22. do his commandments . . . word—or, lit., so as to hearken. &c., i. e., their acts of obedience are prompt, so that they are ever ready to hear, and know, and follow implicitly His declared will (cf. Deuteronomy 26. 17; Luke 1. 19). ye his hosts—myriads, or armies, as corresponding to angels of great power: denoting multitudes also. all his works—creatures of every sort, everywhere.

PSALM CIV.

Ver. 1-35. The Psalmist celebrates God's glory in His works of creation and providence, teaching the dependence of all living creatures; and contrasting the happiness of those who praise Him with the awful end of the wicked.

1. God's essential glory, and also that displayed by His mighty works, afford ground for praise. 2. Light—is a figurative representation of the glory of the invisible God (Matthew 17. 2; 1 Timothy 6. 16). Its use in this connection may refer to the first work of creation (Genesis 1. 3). stretches out the heavens—the visible heavens or sky which cover the earth as a curtain (Isaiah 40. 12). 3. in the waters—or, it may be with; using this fluid for the beams, or frames, of His residence accords with the figure of clouds for chariots, and winds as means of conveyance. walketh—or, moveth (cf. Psalm 18. 10, 11; Amos 9. 6). 4. This is quoted by Paul (Hebrews 1. 7) to denote the subordinate position of angels, i. e., they are only messengers as other and material agencies. spirits—lit., winds. flaming fire—(Psalm 105. 32) being here so called. 5. The earth is firmly fixed by His power. 6-9. These verses rather describe the wonders of the flood than the creation (Genesis 7. 19, 20; 2 Peter 3. 5, 6). God's method of arresting the flood and making its waters subside is poetically called a rebuke (Psalm 76. 6; Isaiah 50. 2), and the process of their subsiding by undulations among the hills and valleys is vividly described. 10-13. Once destructive, these waters are subjected to the service of God's creatures. In rain and dew from His chambers (cf. v. 3), and fountains and streams, they give drink to thirsting animals, and fertilize the soil. Trees thus nourished supply homes to singing birds, and the earth teems with the productions of God's wise agencies, 14, 15, so that men and beasts are abundantly provided with food. for the service—lit., for the culture, &c., by which he secures the results. oil . . . shine—lit., makes his face to shine more than oil, i. e., so cheers and invigorates him, that outwardly he appears better than if anointed. strengtheneth . . . heart—gives vigour to man (cf. Judges 19. 5). 16-19. God's care of even wild animals and uncultivated parts of the earth. 20-23. He provides and adapts to man's wants the appointed times and seasons. 24-26. From a view of the earth thus full of God's blessings, the writer passes to the sea, which, in its immensity, and as a scene and means of man's activity in commerce, and the home of countless multitudes of creatures, also displays Divine power and beneficence. The mention of leviathan—(Job 40. 20) heightens the estimate of the sea's greatness, and of His power who gives such a place for sport to one of His creatures. 27-30. The entire dependence of this immense family on God is set forth. With Him, to kill or make alive is equally easy. To hide His face is to withdraw favour (Psalm 13. 1). By His spirit, or breath, or mere word, He gives life. It is His constant providence which repairs the wastes of time and disease. 31-34. While God could equally glorify His power in destruction, that He does it in preservation is of His rich goodness and mercy, so that we may well spend our lives in grateful praise, honouring to Him, and delightful to pious hearts (Psalm 147. 1). 35. Those who refuse such a protector and withhold such a service mar the beauty of His works, and must perish from His presence. The Psalm closes with an invocation of praise, the translation of a Hebrew phrase, which is used as an English word, "Hallelujah," and may have served the purpose of a chorus, as often in our psalmody, or to give fuller expression to the writer's emotions. It is peculiar to Psalms composed after the captivity, as Setah is to those of an earlier date.

PSALM CV.

Ver. 1-45. After an exhortation to praise God, addressed especially to the chosen people, the writer presents the special reason for praise, in a summary of their history from the calling of Abraham to their settlement in Canaan, and reminds them that their obedience was the end of all God's gracious dealings.

1. call . . . name—(Psalm 79. 6; Romans 10. 13.) Call on Him, according to His historically manifested glory. After the example of Abraham, who, as often as God acquired for Himself a name in guiding him, called in solemn worship upon the name of the Lord (Genesis 12. 8; 13. 4). among the people—or, peoples (Psalm 18. 49). deeds—or, wonders (Psalm 103. 7). 3. 4. Seeking God's favour is the only true mode of getting true happiness, and His strength is the only true source of protection (cf. Psalm 32. 11; 40. 16). Glory . . . name—Boast in His perfections. The world glories in its horses and chariots against the Church of God lying in the dust; but our hope is in the name, i. e., the power and love of God to His people, manifested in past deliverances. 5, 6. judgments . . . mouth—His judicial decisions for the good and against the wicked. chosen—rather qualifies children than Jacob, as a plural. 7. Rather, "He, Jehovah, is our God." His title, Jehovah, implies that He, the unchangeable, self-existing Being, makes things to be, i. e., fulfils His promises, and therefore will not forsake His people. Though specially of His people, He is God over all. 8-11. The covenant was often ratified. commanded—or, ordained (Psalm 63. 28). word—answering to "covenant" in the parallel clause, viz., the word of promise, which, according to v. 10, He set forth for an inviolable law. to a . . . generations—perpetually. A verbal allusion to Deuteronomy 7. 9 (cf. Exodus 20. 6). 9. Which covenant—or, "Word" (v. 8). 10, 11. Alluding to God's promise to Jacob (Genesis 28. 13). Out of the whole storehouse of the promises of God, only one is prominently brought forward, namely, that concerning the possession of Canaan. Every thing revolves round this. The wonders and judgments have all for their ultimate design the fulfilment of this promise. 12-15. few . . . in number—alluding to Jacob's words (Genesis 34. 30), "I being few in number." yea, very few—lit., "as a few," i. e., like fewness itself (cf. Isaiah 1. 9). strangers—sojourners in the land of their future inheritance, as in a strange country (Hebrews 11. 9). 13. from one nation to another—and so from danger to danger; now in Egypt, now in the wilderness, and lastly in Canaan. Though a few strangers, wandering among various nations, God protected them. reproved kings—Pharaoh of Egypt and Abimelech of Gerar (Genesis 12. 17; 20. 3). Touch not—Referring to Genesis 26. 11, where Abimelech says of Isaac, "He that toucheth this man or his wife shall surely be put to death." mine anointed—as specially consecrated to me (Psalm 2. 2). The patriarch was the prophet, priest, and king of his family. my prophets—in a similar sense

(cf. Genesis 20. 7). The "anointed" are those vessels of God, consecrated to His service, "in whom (as Pharaoh said of Joseph, Genesis 41. 38) the Spirit of God is." [HENGSTENBERG.] 16. God ordered the famine. God "called for famine," as if it were a servant, ready to come at God's bidding. Cf. the centurion's words, as to disease being God's servant (Matthew 8. 8, 9). staff of bread—what supports life (Leviticus 26. 26; Psalm 104. 15; Isaiah 3. 1). upon the land—viz., Canaan (Genesis 41. 51). 17-21. Joseph was sent of God (Genesis 45. 5). hurt with fetters—(Genesis 40. 3). was laid in iron—lit., his soul, or, he (Psalm 16. 10) came into iron, or, he was bound to his grief (cf. Psalm 3. 2; 11. 1). Joseph is referred to as being an appropriate type of those "bound in affliction and iron" (Psalm 107. 10). The "soul" is put for the whole person, because the soul of the captive suffers still more than the body. his word came—His prophecy (Genesis 41. 11-20) to the officers came to pass, or was fulfilled (Judges 13. 12, 17; 1 Samuel 9. 6, explain the form of speech). the word [or, saying, or decree] of the Lord tried [or, proved] him—by the afflictions it appointed him to endure before his elevation (cf. Genesis 41. 40-43). 22. To bind—Not literally bind; but exercise over them absolute control, as the parallel in the second clause shows; also Genesis 41. 40, 44, in which not literal fettering, but commanding obedience, is spoken of. It refers to v. 18. The soul that was once bound itself now binds others, even princes. The same moral binding is assigned to the saints (Psalm 149. 8). teach . . . senators wisdom—the ground of his exaltation by Pharaoh was his wisdom (Genesis 41. 39), viz., in state policy, and ordering well a kingdom. 23-25. Israel . . . and Jacob—i. e., Jacob himself is meant, as v. 24 speaks of his people. Still, he came with his whole house (Genesis 46. 6, 7). sojourned—(Genesis 47. 4). land of Ham—or, Egypt (Psalm 78. 51). turned their heart—God controls men's free acts (cf. 1 Samuel 10. 9). "When Saul had turned his back to go from (God's prophet) Samuel, God turned (Margin) him to another heart" (see Exodus 1. 8, &c.). Whatever evil the wicked man plots against God's people, God holds bound even his heart, so as not to lay a single plan except what God permits. Thus Isaiah (43. 17) saith it was God who brought forth the army of Pharaoh to pursue Israel to their own destruction (Exodus 4. 21; 7. 3). Moses . . . chosen—both what they were by Divine choice (Psalm 78. 70). 27. signs—lit., words of signs, or rather, as words in Hebrew mean things, "things of His signs," i. e., His marvellous tokens of power (Psalm 145. 5, Margin). Cf. the same Hebraism (Psalm 65. 3, Margin). 28-36. The ninth plague is made prominent as peculiarly wonderful. they rebelled not—Moses and Aaron promptly obeyed God (Hebrews 11. 27) (cf. Exodus 7. 11, and Psalm 78. 44-51, with which this summary substantially agrees). Or, rather, the "darkness" here is figurative (Jeremiah 13. 16), the literal plague of darkness (Exodus 10. 22, 23) being only alluded to as the symbol of God's wrath which overhung Egypt as a dark cloud during all the plagues. Hence, it is placed first, out of the historical order. Thus, "They rebelled not (i. e., no longer) against His word," refers to the Egyptians. Whenever God sent a plague on them, they were ready to let Israel go, though refusing when the plague ceased. "His word" is His command to let Israel go. [HENGSTENBERG.] Of the ten plagues, only eight are mentioned, the fifth, the murrain of beasts, and the sixth, the boils, being omitted. 29, 30. He deprived them of their favourite fish, and gave them instead, out of the water, loathsome frogs, and (v. 31) upon their land tormenting flies (the dog-fly, according to MAURER) and lice (gnats, HENGSTENBERG). 32. hall for rain—instead of fertilizing showers, hail destructive to trees. This forms the transition to the vegetable kingdom. The locusts in v. 34 similarly are destructive to plants. gave them—referring to Leviticus 26. 4, "I give you rain in due season." His "gift" to Israel's foes is one of a very different kind from that bestowed on His people. 33. their coasts—all their land (Psalm 78. 54). 34. caterpillars—lit., the tickers up, devouring insects; probably the hairy-winged locust. 36. the chief—lit., the firstlings, &c. The ascending climax passes from the food of man to man himself. The language here is quoted from Psalm 78. 51. 37. with silver and gold—presented them by the Egyptians, as an acknowledgment due for their labours in their bondage (cf. Exodus 12. 35). one feeble person—or, stumbler, unfit for the line of march. Cf. "harnessed," i. e., accoutred and marshalled as an army on march (Exodus 13. 18; Isaiah 5. 27). 38—(Cf. Exodus 12. 33; Deuteronomy 11. 25.) 39. covering—in sense of protection (cf. Exodus 13. 21; Numbers 10. 34). In the burning sands of the desert the cloud protected the congregation from the heat of the sun; an emblem of God's protecting favour of His people, as interpreted by Isaiah (Isaiah 4. 5, 6; cf. Numbers 9. 16). 42-45. The reasons for these dealings: (1) God's faithfulness to His covenant, "His holy promise" of Canaan, is the fountain whence flowed so many acts of marvellous kindness to His people (cf. v. 8. 11). Exodus 2. 24 is the fundamental passage. [HENGSTENBERG.] (2) That they might be obedient. The observance of God's commands by Abraham was the object of the covenant with him (Genesis 18. 19), as it was also the object of the covenant with Israel, that they might observe God's statutes. remembered . . . and Abraham—or, "remembered His holy word (i. e., covenant confirmed) with Abraham." inherited the labour—i. e., the fruits of their labour; their corn and vineyards (Joshua 21. 43-45).

PSALM CVI.

Ver. 1-48. This Psalm gives a detailed confession of the sins of Israel in all periods of their history, with special reference to the terms of the covenant as intimated (Psalm 105. 45). It is introduced by praise to God for the wonders of His mercy, and concluded by a supplication for His favour to His afflicted people, and a doxology.

1. Praise, &c.—(Psalm 104. 24), begins and ends the Psalm, intimating the obligations of praise, however we sin and suffer. 1 Chronicles 16. 34-36 is the source from which the beginning and end of this Psalm are derived. 2. His acts exceed our comprehension, as His praise our powers of expression (Romans 11. 33). Their unutterable greatness is not to keep us back, but to urge us the more to try to praise Him as best we can (Psalm 40. 5; 71. 15). 3. The blessing is limited to those whose principles and acts are right. How "blessed" Israel would be now, if he had "observed God's statutes" (Psalm 105. 45). 4, 5. In view of the desert of sins to be confessed, the writer invokes God's covenant mercy to himself and the Church, in whose welfare he rejoices. The speaker, me, I, is not the Psalmist himself, but the people, the present generation (cf. v. 6). visit—(Cf. Psalm 8. 4.) see the good—participate in it (Psalm 37. 13.) thy chosen—viz., Israel, God's elect (Isaiah 43. 20; 45. 4). As God seems to have forgotten them, they pray that He would "remember" them with the favour which belongs to His own people, and which once they had enjoyed. thine inheritance—(Deuteronomy 9. 29; 32. 9.) 6. Cf. 1 Kings 8. 47; Daniel 9. 5, where the same three verbs occur in the same order and connection, the original of the two later passages being the first one, the prayer of Solomon in dedicating the temple. sinned . . . fathers—like them, and so partaking of their guilt. The terms denote a rising gradation of sinning (cf. Psalm 1. 1). with our fathers—we and they together forming one mass of corruption. 7-12. Special confession. Their rebellion at the sea (Exodus 14. 11) was because they had not remembered nor understood God's miracles on their behalf. That God saved them in their unbelief was of His mere mercy, and for His own glory. the sea . . . the Red Sea—the very words in which Moses' song celebrated the scene of Israel's deliverance (Exodus 15. 4). Israel began to rebel against God at the very moment and scene of His deliverance by God! 8. for his name's sake—(Ezekiel 20. 14.) 9. rebuked—(Psalm 104. 7.) as through the wilderness—(Isaiah 63. 11-14.) 12. believed . . . his words—this is said not to praise the Israelites, but God, who constrained even so unbelieving a people momentarily to "believe" whilst in immediate view of His wonders, a faith which they immediately after lost (v. 13; Exodus 14. 31; 15. 1). 13-15. The faith induced by God's display of power in their behalf was short-lived, and their new rebellion and temptation was visited by God with fresh punishment, inflicted by leaving them to the result of their own gratified appetites, and sending on their spiritual poverty (Numbers 11. 18). They soon forgot—lit., They hastid, they forgot (cf. Exodus 32. 8). "They have turned aside quickly (or hastily) out of the way." The haste of our desires is such that we can scarcely allow God one day. Unless He immediately answer our call, instantly then arise impatience, and at length despair. his works—(Deuteronomy 11. 3, 4; Daniel 9. 14.) his counsel—they waited not for the development of God's counsel, or plan for their deliverance, at His own time, and in His own way. 14. Lit., lusted a lust (quoted from Numbers 11. 4, Margin). Previously, there had been impatience as to necessaries of life; here it is lusting (Psalm 78. 18). 15. but sent leanness—rather, "and sent," i. e., and thus, even in doing so, the punishment was inflicted at the very time their request was granted. So Psalm 78. 30, "While their meat was yet in their mouths, the wrath of God came upon them." soul—the animal soul, which craves for food (Numbers 11. 6; Psalm 107. 18.) This soul got its wish, and with it and in it its own punishment. The place was therefore called Kibroth-hattaavah, "the graves of lust," because there they buried the people who had lusted. Animal desires when gratified mostly give only a hungry craving for more (Jeremiah 2. 13). 16, 18. All the congregation took part with Dathan, Korah, &c., and their accomplices (Numbers 16. 41). Aaron the saint—lit., the holy one, as consecrated priest; not a moral attribute, but one designating his office as holy to the Lord. The rebellion was followed by a double punishment: (1) (v. 17) of the non-Levitical rebels, the Reubenites, Dathan and Abiram, &c. (Deuteronomy 11. 6; Numbers 26. 10), these were swallowed up by the earth. covered—"closed upon them" (Numbers 16. 33). (2) Of the Levitical rebels, with Korah at their head (v. 18; Numbers 16. 35; 26. 10), these had sinned by fire, and were punished by fire, as Aaron's (being high priest) sons had been (Leviticus 10. 2; Numbers 16. 1-35). 19-23. From indirect setting God at naught, they pass to direct. made—though prohibited in Exodus 20. 4, 5 to make a likeness, even of the true God. calf—called so in contempt. They would have made an ox or bull, but their idol turned out but a calf; an imitation of the Divine symbols, the cherubim; or of the sacred bull of Egyptian idolatry. This idolatry was more sinful in view of their recent experience of God's power in Egypt and His wonders at Sinai (Exodus 32. 1-6). Though intending to worship Jehovah under the symbol of the calf, yet as this was incompatible with his nature (Deuteronomy 4. 15-17), they in reality gave up Him, and so were given up by Him. Instead of the Lord of heaven, they had as their glory the image of an ox that does nothing but eat grass. 23. he said—viz., to Moses (Deuteronomy 9. 13). With God, saying is as certain as doing; but His purpose, whilst full of wrath against sin, takes into account the mediation of Him of whom Moses was the type (Exodus 32. 11-14; Deuteronomy 9. 18, 19). Moses his chosen—i. e., to be his servant (cf. Psalm 105. 26). in the breach—as a warrior covers with his body the broken part of a wall or fortress besieged, a perilous place (Ezekiel 13. 5; 22. 30). to turn away [or, prevent] his wrath—(Numbers 25. 11; Psalm 78. 33.) 24-27. The sin of refusing to invade Canaan "the pleasant land" (Jeremiah 3. 19; Ezekiel 20. 6; Daniel 8. 9), "the land of beauty," was punished by the destruction of that generation (Numbers 14. 28), and the threat of dispersion (Deuteronomy 4. 25; 28. 32) afterwards made to their posterity, and fulfilled in the great calamities now bewailed, may have also been then added. despised—(Numbers 14. 31.) believed not his word—by which He promised He would give them the land; but rather the word of the faithless spies (cf. Psalm 78. 22). lifted up his hand—or, swore, the usual form of swearing (cf. Numbers 14. 30, Margin). 27. To overthrow—lit., "To make them fall," alluding to the words (Numbers 14. 39). among . . . nations lands—the "wilderness" was not more destructive to the fathers (v. 26) than residence among the heathen ("nations") shall be to the children. Leviticus 26. 33, 38 is here, before the Psalmist's mind, the determination against the "seed" when rebellious, being not expressed in Numbers 14. 31-33, but implied in the determination against the fathers. 28-30. sacrifices of the dead—i. e., of lifeless idols, contrasted with "the living God" (Jeremiah 10. 3-10; cf. Psalm 115. 4-7; 1 Corinthians 12. 2). On the words, "joined themselves to Baal-peor," see Numbers 25. 2, 3, 5. Baal-peor, i. e., the possessor of Peor, the mountain on which Chemosh, the idol of Moab, was worshipped, and at the foot of which Israel at the time lay encamped (Numbers 23, 28). The name never occurs except in connection with that locality and that circumstance. provoked—excited grief and indignation (Psalm 6. 7; 78. 58). stood—as Aaron "stood between the living and the dead, and the plague was stayed" (Numbers 16. 48). executed judgment—lit., judged, including sentence and act. 31. counted . . . righteousness—"a just and rewardable action." for—or, unto, to the procuring of righteousness, as in Romans 4. 2; 10. 4. Here it was a particular act, not faith, nor its object Christ; and what was procured was not justifying righteousness, or what was to be rewarded with eternal life; for no one act of man's can be taken for complete obedience. But it was that which God approved and rewarded with a perpetual priesthood to him and his descendants (Numbers 25. 13; 1 Chronicles 6. 4, &c.). 32, 33. (Cf. Numbers 20. 3-12; Deuteronomy 1. 37; 3. 26.) went ill with [lit., was bad for] Moses—his conduct, though under great provocation, was punished by exclusion from Canaan. 34-39. They not only failed to expel the heathen, as God "commanded" (Exodus 23. 32, 33), lit., said (they should), but conformed to their idolatries, and thus became spiritual adulterers (Psalm 73. 27). unto devils—Septuagint, demons (cf. 1 Corinthians 10. 20), or evil spirits. polluted with blood—lit., blood, or murder (Psalm 5. 6; 26. 9). 40-43. Those nations first seduced and then oppressed them (cf. Judges 1. 34; 2. 14; 3. 30). Their apostasies ungratefully repaid God's many mercies till He finally abandoned them to punishment (Leviticus 26. 39). 44-46. If, as is probable, this Psalm was written at the time of the captivity, the writer now intimates the tokens of God's returning favour. repented—(cf. Psalm 90. 13). made . . . pitied—(1 Kings 8. 50; Daniel 1. 9). These tokens encourage the prayer and the promise of praise (Psalm 30. 4), which is well closed by a doxology.

PSALM CVII.

Ver. 1-13. Although the general theme of this Psalm may have been suggested by God's special favour to the Israelites in their restoration from captivity, it must be regarded as an instructive celebration of God's praise for His merciful providence to all men in their various emergencies. Of these several are given—captivity and bondage, wanderings by land and sea, and famine; some as evidences of God's displeasure, and all the deliverances as evidences of His goodness and mercy to them who humbly seek Him.

1, 2. This call for thankful praise is the burden or chorus (cf. v. 8. 15, &c.). redeemed of the Lord—(cf. Isaiah 35. 9, 10). say—i. e., that His mercy, &c. hand of—or, power of enemy. 3. gathered—alluding to the dispersion of captives throughout the Babylonian empire. from the south—lit., the sea, or, Red Sea (Psalm 114. 3), which was on the south. 4-7. A graphic picture is given of the sufferings of those who from distant lands returned to Jerusalem; or, as city of habitation may mean the land of Palestine. fainted—was overwhelmed (Psalm 61. 3; 77. 3). 8, 9. To the chorus is added, as a reason for praise, an example of the extreme distress from which they had been delivered—extreme hunger, the severest privation of a journey in the desert. 10-16. Their sufferings were for their rebellion against (Psalm 105. 28) the words, or purposes, or promises, of God for their benefit. When humbled they cry to God, who delivers them from bondage, described as a dark dungeon with doors and bars of metal, in which they are bound in iron—i. e., chains and fetters. shadow of death—darkness with danger (Psalm 23. 4). broken—lit., shivered (Isaiah 45. 2). 17-22. Whether the same or not, this exigency illustrates that dispensation of God according to which sin brings its own punishment. are afflicted—lit., afflict themselves, i. e., bring on disease, denoted by loathing of food, and drawing near unto [lit., even to] the gates [or, domains, Psalm 9. 16] of death. sent his word—i. e., put forth His power. their destructions—i. e., that which threatened them. To the chorus is added the mode of giving thanks, by a sacrifice and joyful singing (Psalm 50. 14). 23-32. Here are set forth the perils of seafaring, futility of man's and efficiency of God's help. go . . . sea—Alluding to the elevation of the land at the coast. These see . . . deep—Illustrated both by the storm He raises and the calm He makes with a word (Psalm 33. 9). waves thereof—lit., His waves (God's, Psalm 42. 7). are . . . end—lit., all their wisdom swallows up itself, destroys itself by vain and contradictory devices, such as despair induces. He maketh . . . calm—or, to stand to stillness, or in quiet. Instead of acts of temple worship, those of the synagogue are here described, where the people with the assembly, or session of elders, convened for reading, singing, prayer, and teaching. 33-41. God's providence is illustriously displayed in His influence on two great elements of human prosperity, the earth's productivity, and the powers of government. He punishes the wicked by destroying the sources of fertility, or, in mercy, gives fruitfulness to deserts, which become the homes of a busy and successful agricultural population. By a permitted misrule and tyranny, this scene of prosperity is changed to one of adversity. He rules rulers, setting up one and putting down another. wander . . . wilderness—reduced to misery (Job 12. 24). 42, 43. In this providential government, good men will rejoice, and the cavils of the wicked will be stopped (Job 5. 16; Isaiah 52. 15), and all who take right views will appreciate God's unfailing mercy and unbounded love.

PSALM CVIII.

Ver. 1-13. This Psalm is composed, v. 1-5 of Psalm 57. 7-11, and v. 6-12 of Psalm 60. 5-12. The varieties are verbal and trivial, except that in v. 9, "over Philistia will I triumph," differs from Psalm 60. 8, the interpretation of which it confirms. Its altogether triumphant tone may intimate that it was prepared by David, omitting the plaintive portions of the other Psalms, as commemorative of God's favour in the victories of His people.

PSALM CIX.

Ver. 1-31. The writer complains of his virulent enemies, on whom he imprecates God's righteous punishment, and to a prayer for a Divine interposition in his behalf appends the expression of his confidence and a promise of his praises. This Psalm is remarkable for the number and severity of its imprecations. Its evident typical character (cf. v. 8) justifies the explanation of these already given, that as the language of David respecting his own enemies, or those of Christ, it has respect not to the penitent, but to the impenitent and implacable foes of good men, and of God and His cause, whose inevitable fate is thus indicated by inspired authority.

1. God of my praise—its object, thus recognizing God as a certain helper. Be not silent (cf. Psalm 17. 13; 28. 1). 2. For the mouth . . . opened [or, They have opened a wicked mouth] against me—lit., with me, i. e., Their intercourse is lying, or, they slander me to my face (Matthew 26. 59). 3. (Cf. Psalm 35. 7; 69. 4.) 4, 5. They return evil for good (cf. Psalm 27. 12; Proverbs 17. 13). I give myself unto prayer—or lit., I (am) prayer, or, as for me, prayer, i. e., it is my resource for comfort in distress. 6. over him—one of his enemies prominent in malignity (Psalm 55. 12). let Satan stand—as an accuser, whose place was the right hand of the accused (Zechariah 3. 1, 2). 7. The condemnation is aggravated when prayer for relief is treated as a sin. 8. The opposite blessing is long life (Psalm 91. 16; Proverbs 3. 2). The last clause is quoted as to Judas by Peter (Acts 1. 20). office—lit., charge, Septuagint, and Peter, oversight. 9, 10. Let his family share the punishment, his children be as wandering beggars to prowl in their desolate homes, a greedy and relentless creditor grasp his substance, his labour, or the fruit of it, enure to strangers and not his heirs, and his unprotected, fatherless children fall in want, so that his posterity shall utterly fail. 13. posterity—lit., end, as Psalm 37. 38, or, what comes after, i. e., reward, or success, or its expectation, of which posterity was to a Jew a prominent part. 14, 15. Added to the terrible overthrow following his own sin, let there be the imputation of his parents' guilt, that it may now come before God, for His meting out its full consequences, in cutting off the memory of them (i. e., the parents) from the earth (Psalm 34. 16). 16. Let God remember guilt, because he (the wicked) did not remember mercy. poor and needy . . . broken in heart—i. e., pious sufferer (Psalm 34. 18; 35. 10; 40. 17). 17-19. Let his loved sin, cursing, come upon him in punishment (Psalm 35. 8), thoroughly fill him as water and oil, permeating to every part of his system (cf. Numbers 5. 22-27), and become a garment and a girdle for a perpetual dress. 20. Let this . . . reward—or, wages, pay for labour, the fruit of the enemy's wickedness. from the Lord—as His judicial act. 21, 22. do . . . for me—i. e., kindness. wounded—lit., pierced (Psalm 69. 16, 29). 23. like the shadow—(Cf. Psalm 102. 11.) tossed up and down—or, driven (Exodus 10. 19). 24, 25. Taunts and reproaches aggravate his afflicted and feeble state (Psalm 22. 6, 7). 26, 27. Let my deliverance glorify thee (cf. Psalm 59. 13). 28-31. In confidence that God's blessing would come on him, and confusion and shame on his enemies (Psalm 73. 13), he ceases to regard their curses, and anticipates a season of joyful and public thanksgiving; for God is near to protect (Psalm 16. 8; 34. 6) the poor from all unrighteous judges who may condemn him.

PSALM CX.

Ver. 1-7. The explicit application of this Psalm to our Saviour, by Him (Matthew 22. 42-45) and by the apostles (Acts 2. 34; 1 Corinthians 15. 25; Hebrews 1. 13), and their frequent reference to its language and purport (Ephesians 1. 20-22; Philemon 2. 9-11; Hebrews 10. 12, 13), leave no doubt of its purely prophetic character. Not only was there nothing in the position or character, personal or official, of David or any other descendant, to justify a reference to either, but the utter severance from the royal office of all priestly functions (so clearly assigned the subject of this Psalm) positively forbids such a reference. The Psalm celebrates the exaltation of Christ to the throne of an eternal and increasing kingdom, and a perpetual priesthood (Zechariah 6. 13), involving the subjugation of His enemies and the multiplication of His subjects, and rendered infallibly certain by the word and oath of Almighty God.

1. The Lord said—lit., A saying of the Lord (cf. Psalm 36. 1), a formula, used in prophetic or other solemn or express declarations. my Lord—That the Jews understood this term to denote the Messiah their traditions show, and Christ's mode of arguing on such an assumption (Matthew 22. 44) also proves. To sit at the right hand was not only a mark of honour (1 Kings 2. 19), but also implied participation of power (Psalm 45. 9; Mark 16. 19; Ephesians 1. 20). Sit—as a king (Psalm 29. 10), though the position rather than posture is intimated (cf. Acts 7. 55, 56). until I make, &c.—The dominion of Christ over His enemies, as commissioned by God, and entrusted with all power (Matthew 28. 18) for their subjugation, will assuredly be established (1 Corinthians 15. 24-28). This is neither His government as God, nor that which, as the incarnate Saviour, He exercises over His people, of whom He will ever be Head. thine enemies thy footstool—an expression taken from the custom of Eastern conquerors (cf. Joshua 10. 24; Judges 1. 7) to signify a complete subjection. 2. the rod of thy strength—the rod of correction (Isaiah 9. 4; 10. 15; Jeremiah 48. 12), by which thy strength will be known. This is His Word of truth (Isaiah 2. 3; 11. 4), converting some and confounding others (cf. 2 Thessalonians 2. 8). out of Zion—or, the Church, in which God dwells by His Spirit, as once by a visible symbol in the tabernacle on Zion (cf. Psalm 2. 6). rule thou, &c.—over enemies now conquered. in their midst—once set upon, as by ferocious beasts (Psalm 22. 16), now humbly, though reluctantly, confessed as Lord (Philippians 2. 10, 11). 3.

Thy people . . . willing—lit., Thy people (are) free-will offerings; for such is the proper rendering of the word "willing," which is a plural noun, and not an adjective (cf. Exodus 25. 2; Psalm 54. 6), also a similar form (Judges 5. 2-9). in the day of thy power—thy people freely offer themselves (Romans 12. 1) in thy service, enlisting under thy banner. in the beauties of holiness—either as Psalm 29. 2, the loveliness of a spiritual worship, of which the temple service, in all its material splendours, was but a type; or more probably, the appearance of the worshippers, who, in this spiritual kingdom, are a nation of kings and priests (1 Peter 2. 9; Revelation 1. 5), attending this Priest and King, clothed in those eminent graces which the beautiful vestments of the Aaronic priests (Leviticus 16. 4) typified. The last very obscure clause—from the womb . . . youth—may, according to this view, be thus explained: The word youth denotes a period of life distinguished for strength and activity (cf. Ecclesiastes 11. 9)—the dew is a constant emblem of whatever is refreshing and strengthening (Proverbs 19. 12; Hosea 14. 5). The Messiah, then, as leading His people, is represented as continually in the vigour of youth, refreshed and strengthened by the early dew of God's grace and Spirit. Thus the phrase corresponds as a member of a parallelism with "the day of thy power" in the first clause. "In the beauty of holiness" belongs to this latter clause, corresponding to "Thy people" in the first, and the colon after "morning" is omitted. Others prefer: Thy youth, or youthful vigour, or body, shall be constantly refreshed by successive accessions of people as dew from the early morning; and this accords with the New Testament idea that the Church is Christ's body (cf. Micah 5. 7). 4. The perpetuity of the priesthood, here asserted on God's oath, corresponds with that of the kingly office just explained. after the order—(Hebrews 7. 15) after the similitude of Melchisedek, is fully expounded by Paul, to denote not only perpetuity, appointment of God, and a royal priesthood, but also the absence of priestly descent and succession, and superiority to the Aaronic order. 5. at thy right hand—as Psalm 109. 31, upholding and aiding, which is not inconsistent with v. 1, where the figure denotes participation of power, for here He is presented in another aspect, as a warrior going against enemies, and sustained by God. strike through—smite or crush. kings—not common men, but their rulers, and so all under them (Psalm 2. 2, 10). 6. The person is again changed. The Messiah's conquests are described, though His work and God's are the same. As after a battle, whose field is strewn with corpses, the conqueror ascends the seat of empire, so shall He judge or rule among many nations, and subdue the head [or (as used collectively for many) the heads] over many lands. wound—lit., smite, or crush (cf. v. 5). 7. As a conqueror, "faint, yet pursuing," He shall be refreshed by "the brook in the way," and pursue to completion His divine and glorious triumphs.

PSALM CXI.

Ver. 1-10. The Psalmist celebrates God's gracious dealings with His people, of which a summary statement is given.

1. Praise ye the Lord—or, Hallelujah (Psalm 104. 35). This seems to serve as a title to those of the later Psalms, which, like this, set forth God's gracious government and its blessed fruits. This praise claims the whole heart (Psalm 86. 12), and is rendered publicly. upright—a title of the true Israel (Psalm 32. 11). 2. His works, i. e., of providence and grace, are sought—or, carefully studied, by all desiring to know them. 3, 4. honourable and glorious—lit., honour and majesty, which illustrate His glorious perfections. righteousness—(Psalm 7. 17; 31. 1), which He has made memorable by wonders of love and mercy, in supplying the wants of His people according to covenant engagements. 6-8. His power was shown especially in giving them the promised land, and His faithfulness and justice thus displayed are, like His precepts, reliable and of permanent obligation. 9. The deliverance He provided accorded to His established covenant. Thus He manifested Himself in the sum of His perfections (Psalm 20. 1, 7; 22. 3) worthy of reverence. 10. And hence love and fear of such a God is the chief element of true wisdom (cf. Proverbs 1. 7; 9. 10).

PSALM CXII.

Ver. 1-10. This Psalm may be regarded as an exposition of Psalm 111: 19, presenting the happiness of those who fear and obey God, and contrasting the fate of the ungodly.

1. True fear produces obedience and this happiness. 2, 3. Temporal blessings follow the service of God, exceptions occurring only as they are seen by God to be inconsistent with those spiritual blessings which are better. 4. light—fig. for relief (Psalm 27. 1; 97. 11). The upright are like God (Leviticus 6. 36; Psalm 111. 4). 5-9. Generosity, sound judgment in business, and confidence in God, form a character which preserves from fear of evil and ensures success against enemies. While a man thus truly pious is liberal, he increases in substance. not be moved—(cf. Psalm 13. 4; 15. 5.) heart is established—or, firm in right principles. see his desire—(Psalm 50. 23; 54. 7.) 10. Disappointed in their malevolent wishes by the prosperity of the pious, the wicked are punished by the working of their evil passions, and come to naught.

PSALM CXIII.

Ver. 1-9. God's majesty contrasted with His condescension and gracious dealings towards the humble furnish matter and a call for praise. The Jews, it is said, used this and Psalm 114-118, on their great festivals, and called them the Greater Hallel, or Hymn.

1-3. Earnestness and zeal are denoted by the emphatic repetitions. servants—or, all the people of God. name of the Lord—perfections (Psalm 5. 11; 111. 9). From the rising, &c.—All the world. 4-6. God's exaltation enhances His condescension; 7, 8, which is illustrated as often in raising the worthy poor and needy to honour (cf. 1 Samuel 2. 8; Psalm 44. 25). 9. On this special case, cf. 1 Samuel 2. 21. Barrenness was regarded as a disgrace, and is a type of a deserted Church (Isaiah 54. 1). the barren woman . . . house—lit., the barren of the house, so that the supplied words may be omitted.

PSALM CXIV.

Ver. 1-8. The writer briefly and beautifully celebrates God's former care of His people, to whose benefit nature was miraculously made to contribute.

1-4. of strange language—(cf. Psalm 81. 5.) skipped . . . rams—(Psalm 29. 6), describes the waving of mountain forests, poetically representing the motion of the mountains. The poetical description of the effect of God's presence on the sea and Jordan alludes to the history (Exodus 14. 21; Joshua 3. 14-17). Judah is put as a parallel to Israel, because of the destined as well as real prominence of that tribe. 5-8. The questions place the implied answers in a more striking form. at the presence—lit., from before, as if affrighted by the wonderful display of God's power. Well may such a God be trusted, and great should be His praise.

PSALM CXV.

Ver. 1-18. The Psalmist prays that God would vindicate His glory, which is contrasted with the vanity of idols, while the folly of their worshippers is contrasted with the trust of God's people, who are encouraged to its exercise and to unite in the praise which it occasions.

1-3. The vindication of God's mercy and faithfulness (Psalm 25. 10; 36. 6) is the glory of His name, which is desired to be illustrated in the deliverance of His people, as the implied mode of its manifestation. In view of the taunts of the heathen, faith in His dominion as enthroned in the heaven (Psalm 2. 4; 11. 4) is avowed. where is now, &c.—now is "not a particle of time, but of entreaty," as in our forms of speech, "Come now," "See now," &c. 4-7. (Cf. Isaiah 40. 18-20; 44. 9-20.) speak . . . throat—lit., mitter, not even utter articulate sounds. 8. every one that trusteth—they who trust, whether makers or not. 9-13. The repetitions imply earnestness. 14. Opposed to the decrease pending and during the captivity. 15-17. They were not only God's peculiar people, but as living inhabitants of earth, assigned the work of His praise as monuments of Divine power, wisdom and goodness. 18. Hence let us fulfil the purpose of our creation, and evermore show forth His praise.

PSALM CXVI.

Ver. 1-19. The writer celebrates the deliverance from extreme perils by which he was favoured, and pledges grateful and pious public acknowledgments.

1, 2. A truly grateful love will be evinced by acts of worship, which calling on God expresses (v. 13; Psalm 55. 16; 86. 7; cf. Psalm 17. 6; 31. 2). 3, 4. For similar figures for distress (Psalm 18. 4, 5). gat hold upon me—another sense ("found") of the same word follows, as we speak of disease finding us, and of our finding or catching disease. 5-8. The relief which he asked is the result not of his merit, but of God's known pity and tenderness, which is acknowledged in assuring himself (his soul, Psalm 11. 1; 16. 10) of rest and peace. All calamities are represented by death, tears and falling of the feet (Psalm 56. 13). 9. walk before the Lord—act, or live under His favour and guidance (Genesis 17. 1; Psalm 61. 7). land of the living—(Psalm 27. 13). 10, 11. Confidence in God opposed to distrust of men, as not reliable (Psalm 68. 8, 9). He speaks from an experience of the result of his faith. in my haste—lit., terror, or agitation, produced by his affliction (cf. Psalm 31. 22). 12-14. These are modes of expressing acts of worship (cf. v. 4; Psalm 50. 14; Jonah 2. 9). the cup of salvation—the drink offering which was part of the thank offering (Numbers 15. 3-5). now—(cf. Psalm 115. 2). "Oh, that (I may do it)" in the presence, &c. 15, 16. By the plea of being a home-born servant, he intimates his claim on God's covenant love to His people. 17-19. An ampler declaration of his purpose, designating the place, the Lord's house, or earthly residence in Jerusalem.

PSALM CXVII.

Ver. 1, 2. This may be regarded as a doxology, suitable to be appended to any Psalm of similar character, and prophetic of the prevalence of God's grace in the world, in which aspect Paul quotes it (Romans 15. 11; cf. Psalm 47. 2; 66. 8).

2. is great toward us—lit., prevailed over or protected us.

PSALM CXVIII.

Ver. 1-29. After invoking others to unite in praise, the writer celebrates God's protecting and delivering care towards him, and then represents himself and the people of God as entering the sanctuary and uniting in solemn praise, with prayer for a continued blessing. Whether composed by David on his accession to power, or by some later writer in memory of the restoration from Babylon, its tone is joyful and trusting, and, in describing the fortune and destiny of the Jewish Church and its visible head, it is typically prophetic of the Christian Church and her greater and invisible Head.

1-4. The trine repetitions are emphatic (cf. v. 10-12, 15, 16; Psalm 115. 12, 13). Let . . . say—Oh! that Israel may say. now—as Psalm 115. 2; so in v. 3, 4. After "now say" supply "give thanks." that his mercy—or for his mercy. 5. distress—lit., straits, to which large place corresponds, as Psalm 4. 1; 31. 8. 6, 7. Men are helpless to hurt him, if God be with him (Psalm 56. 9), and, if enemies, will be vanquished (Psalm 54. 7). 8, 9. Even the most powerful men are less to be trusted than God. 10-12. Though as numerous and irritating as bees, by God's help his enemies would be destroyed. as the fire of thorns—suddenly. in the name, &c.—by the power (Psalm 20. 5; 124. 8). 13-16. The enemy is triumphantly addressed as if present. rejoicing and salvation—the latter as cause of the former. right hand . . . is exalted—His power greatly exerted. 17, 18. He would live, because confident his life would be for God's glory. 19-21. Whether an actual or figurative entrance into God's house be meant, the purpose of solemn praise is intimated, in which only the righteous would or could engage. 22, 23. These words are applied by Christ (Matthew 21, 42) to Himself, as the foundation of the Church (cf. Acts 4, 11; Ephesians 2, 20; 1 Peter 2, 4, 7). It may here denote God's wondrous exaltation to power and influence of him whom the rulers of the nation despised. Whether (see above) David or Zerubbabel (cf. Haggai 2, 2; Zechariah 4, 7-10) be primarily meant, there is here typically represented God's more wonderful doings in exalting Christ, crucified as an impostor, to be the Prince and Saviour and Head of His Church. 24. This is the day—or period distinguished by God's favour of all others. 25. Save now—Hebrew, Hosannah (cf. Psalm 115, 2, &c., as to now), a form of prayer (Psalm 20, 9), since, in our use, of praise. 26. he that cometh . . . Lord—As above intimated, this may be applied to the visible head of the Jewish Church entering the sanctuary, as leading the procession; typically it belongs to Him of whom the phrase became an epithet (Malachi 3, 1; Matthew 21, 9). 27-29. showed us light—or favour (Psalm 27, 1; 97, 11). With the sacrificial victim brought bound to the altar is united the more spiritual offering of praise (Psalm 50, 14, 23), expressed in the terms with which the Psalm opened.

PSALM CXIX.

Ver. 1-176. This celebrated Psalm has several peculiarities. It is divided into twenty-two parts or stanzas, denoted by the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Each stanza contains eight verses, and the first letter of each verse is that which gives name to the stanza. Its contents are mainly praises of God's word, exhortations to its perusal, and reverence for it, prayers for its proper influence, and complaints of the wicked for despising it. There are but two verses (122, 132) which do not contain some term or description of God's word. These terms are of various derivations, but here used, for the most part, synonymously, though the use of a variety of terms seems designed, in order to express better the several aspects in which our relations to the revealed word of God are presented. The Psalm does not appear to have any relation to any special occasion or interest of the Jewish Church or nation, but was evidently "intended as a manual of pious thoughts, especially for instructing the young, and its peculiar artificial structure was probably adopted to aid the memory in retaining the language."

1. undefiled—lit., complete, perfect, or sincere (cf. Psalm 37, 37). in [or of] the way—course of life. walk [act] in the law—according to it (cf. Luke 1, 6). Law, from a word meaning to teach, is a term of rather general purport, denoting the instruction of God's word. 2. testimonies—The word of God is so called, because in it He testifies for truth and against sin. seek Him—i. e., a knowledge of Him, with desire for conformity to His will. 3. his ways—the course He reveals as right. 4-6. precepts—are those directions which relate to special conduct, from a word meaning to inspect. statutes—or ordinances, positive laws of permanent nature. Both words originally denote rather positive than moral laws, such as derive force from the Divine appointment, whether their nature or the reasons for them are apprehended by us or not. commandments—or institutions. The term is comprehensive, but rather denotes fundamental directions for conduct, both enjoining and forbidding. have respect unto—or regard carefully as to their whole purport. 7. judgments—rules of conduct formed by God's judicial decisions. Hence the wide sense of the word in the Psalms, so that it includes decisions of approval as well as condemnation. 8. Recognizes the need of Divine grace.

9. The whole verse may be read as a question; for, By taking heed—is better, for taking heed, i. e., so as to do it. The answer is implied, and inferable from v. 5, 10, 18, &c., i. e., by God's grace. 10-16. We must carefully treasure up the word of God, declare it to others, meditate on it, and heartily delight in it, and then by His grace we shall act according to it.

17-20. Life is desirable in order to serve God; that we may do so aright, we should seek to have our eyes opened to behold His truth, and earnestly desire fully to understand it. 21-24. God will rebuke those who despise His word, and deliver His servants from their reproach, giving them boldness in and by His truth, even before the greatest men.

25-27. Submitting ourselves in depression to God, He will revive us by His promises, and lead us to declare His mercy to others. 28-32. In order to adhere to His word, we must seek deliverance from temptations to sin as well as from despondency. enlarge [or expand] my heart—with gracious affections.

33-38. To encourage us in prayer for Divine aid in adhering to His truth, we are permitted to believe that by His help we shall succeed. the way of thy statutes—i. e., the way or manner of life prescribed by them. The help we hope to obtain by prayer is to be the basis on which our resolutions should rest. Turn away mine eyes—lit., Make my eyes to pass, not noticing evil, vanity—lit., falsehood, all other objects of trust than God; idols, human power, &c. (Psalm 31, 6; 40, 4; 60, 11; 62, 9). quicken . . . in thy way—make me with living energy to pursue the way marked out by thee. Revive me from the death of spiritual helplessness (v. 17, 25, 40, 50; Psalm 116, 3). who is devoted to thy fear—or better, which (i. e., thy word) is for thy fear, for producing it. "Which is to those who fear thee." God's word of promise belongs peculiarly to such (cf. Genesis 18, 19; 1 Kings 2, 4; 8, 25). [HENGSTENBERG.] 39, 40. Our hope of freedom from the reproach of inconsistency is in God's power, quickening us to live according to His word, which He leads us to love. for thy judgments are good—the time must therefore be at hand when thy justice will turn the "reproach" from thy Church upon the world (Isaiah 25, 8; 66, 5; Zephaniah 2, 8-10).

41-44. The sentiment more fully carried out. God's mercies and salvation, as revealed in His Word, provide hope of forgiveness for the past and security in a righteous course for the future. 42. The possession of God's gift of "salvation" (v. 41) will be the Psalmist's answer to the foe's "reproach," that his hope was a fallacious one. 45-48. To freedom from reproach, when imbued with God's truth, there is added "great boldness in the faith," accompanied with increasing delight in the holy law itself, which becomes an element of happiness. 48. My hands . . . lift up unto . . . commandments—i. e., I will prayerfully (Psalm 28, 2) direct my heart to keep thy commandments.

49-51. Resting on the promises consoles under affliction and the tauntings of the insolent. 49. upon which—rather, "Remember thy word unto thy servant, because," &c. So the Hebrew requires. [HENGSTENBERG.] 50. for—rather, "This is my comfort . . . that," &c. [MAURER.] hath quickened—what the word has already done is to faith a pledge of what it shall yet do. 52-56. The pious take comfort, when harassed and distressed by wickedness of men who forsake God's law, in remembering that the great principles of God's truth will still abide; and also God's "judgments of old" (v. 52), i. e., His past interpositions in behalf of His people are a pledge that He will again interpose to deliver them; and they become the theme of constant and delightful meditation. The more we keep the more we love the law of God. 53. Horror—rather, "Vehement wrath." [HENGSTENBERG.] 54. songs—as the exile sings songs of his home (Psalm 137, 3), so the child of God, "a stranger on earth," sings the songs of heaven, his true home (Psalm 39, 12). In ancient times, laws were put in verse, to imprint them the more on the memory of the people. So God's laws are the believer's songs. house of my pilgrimage—present life (Genesis 17, 8; 47, 9; Hebrews 11, 13). 56. Rather, "This is peculiarly mine (lit., to me), that I keep thy precepts." [HENGSTENBERG and MAURER.]

57-60. Sincere desires for God's favour, penitence, and activity in a new obedience, truly evince the sincerity of those who profess to find God a portion (Numbers 18, 20; Psalm 16, 5; Lamentations 3, 24). 58. favour—Hebrew, "face" (Psalm 45, 12). 59. So the prodigal son, when reduced to straits of misery (Luke 15, 17, 18). 61, 62. This the more, if opposition of enemies, or love of ease, is overcome in thus honouring God's law. have robbed me—better, surrounded me, either as forcible constraints like fetters, or as the cords of their nets. HENGSTENBERG translates, "snares." 62. At midnight—HENGSTENBERG supposes a reference to the time when the Lord went forth to slay the Egyptian first-born (Exodus 11. 4; 12. 29; cf. Job 34. 20). But it rather refers to the Psalmist's own praises and prayers in the night-time. Cf. Paul and Silas (Acts 16. 25; cf. Psalm 63. 6). 63. The communion of the saints. Delight in their company is an evidence of belonging to them (Psalm 16. 3; Amos 3. 3; Malachi 3. 16). 64. While opposed by the wicked, and opposing them, the pious delight in those who fear God, but, after all, rely for favour and guidance not on merit, but mercy.

65-72. The reliance on promises (v. 49) is strengthened by experience of past dealings according with promises, and a prayer for guidance, encouraged by sanctified affliction. 66. Teach me good judgment and knowledge—viz., in thy word (so as to fathom its deep spirituality); for the corresponding expression (v. 12. 64, 68), is "Teach me thy statutes." 67. Referred by HENGSTENBERG to the chastening effect produced on the Jews' minds by the captivity (Jeremiah 31. 18, 19). The truth is a general one (Job 5. 6; John 15. 2; Hebrews 12. 11). 68. Cf. as to the Lord Jesus (Acts 10. 38). 69, 70. The crafty malice of the wicked, in slandering him, so far from turning him away, but binds him closer to God's word, which they are too stupid in sin to appreciate. HENGSTENBERG refers the "lie" (v. 69) to such slanders against the Jews during the captivity, as that in Ezra 4. of sedition. fat as grease—spiritually insensible (Psalm 17. 10; 73. 7; Isaiah 6. 10). 71, 72. So also affliction of any kind acts as a wholesome discipline in leading the pious more highly to value the truth and promises of God.

73. As God made, so He can best control, us. So as to Israel, he owed to God his whole internal and external existence (Deuteronomy 32. 6). 74. So when He has led us to rely on His truth, He will "make us to the praise of His grace" by others. "Those who fear thee will be glad at my prosperity, as they consider my cause their cause" (Psalm 34. 2; 142. 7). 75-78. in faithfulness—i. e., without in the least violating thy faithfulness; because my sins deserved and needed fatherly chastisement. Enduring chastisement with a filial temper (Hebrews 12. 6-11), God's promises of mercy (Romans 8. 28) will be fulfilled, and He will give comfort in sorrow (Lamentations 3. 22; 2 Corinthians 1. 3, 4). 77. Let thy tender mercies come unto me—As I am not able to come unto them. But the wicked will be confounded. 78. but I . . . meditate in thy precepts—and so shall not be "ashamed," i. e., put to shame (v. 80). 79, 80. Those who may have thought his afflictions an evidence of God's rejection will then be led to return to Him; as the friends of Job did on his restoration, having been previously led through his afflictions to doubt the reality of his religion. Let my . . . be sound—i. e., perfect, sincere. ashamed—disappointed in my hope of salvation.

81-83. In sorrow the pious heart yearns for the comforts of God's promises (Psalm 73. 26; 84. 2). 82. Mine eyes fail for thy word—i. e., with yearning desire for thy word. When the eyes fail, yet faith must not. 83. bottle in the smoke—as a skin bottle dried and shriveled up in smoke, so is he withered by sorrow. Wine bottles of skin used to be hung up in smoke to dry them, before the wine was put in them. [MAURER.] 84-87. The shortness of my life requires that the relief afforded to me from mine enemies should be speedy. 85. pits—plots for my destruction. which—rather, "who," i. e., the proud: "pits" is not the antecedent. 87. consumed me upon earth—HENGSTENBERG translates, "in the land;" understanding "me" of the nation Israel, of which but a small remnant was left. But English Version is simpler; either, "They have consumed me so as to leave almost nothing of me on earth;" or, "They have almost destroyed and prostrated me on the earth." [MAURER.] 87. I forsook not—Whatever else I am forsaken of, I forsake not thy precepts, and so am not mistaken of thee (Psalm 39. 5, 13; 2 Corinthians 4. 8, 9), and the injuries and insults of the wicked increase the need for it. But, however they act regardless of God's law, the pious, adhering to its teaching, receive quickening grace, and are sustained steadfast.

89-91. In all changes God's word remains firm (1 Peter 1. 25). Like the heavens, it continually attests God's un-failing power and unchanging care (Psalm 89. 2). is settled in—i. e., stands as firmly as the heaven in which it dwells, and whence it emanated. 90. (Psalm 33. 9.) 91. They—The heaven (v. 89) and the earth (v. 90). HENGSTENBERG translates, "They stand for thy judgments," i. e., ready, as obedient servants, to execute them. The usage of this Psalm favours this view. But see Jeremiah 33. 25. 92-94. Hence the pious are encouraged and inclined to seek a knowledge of it, and persevere amidst the efforts of those planning and waiting to destroy him. 92. my delights—plural, not merely delight, but equal to all other delights. 93. The bounds of created perfection may be defined, but those of God's law in its nature, application, and influence, are infinite. There is no human thing so perfect but that something is wanting to it; its limits are narrow, whereas God's law is of infinite breadth, reaching to all cases, perfectly meeting what each requires, and to all times (Psalm 19. 3, 6, 7-11; Ecclesiastes 3. 11). It cannot be cramped within any definitions of man's dogmatical systems. Man never outgrows the word. It does not shock the ignorant man with declared anticipations of discoveries which he had not yet made; whilst in it the man of science finds his newest discoveries by tacit anticipations provided for.

97. This characteristic love for God's law (cf. Psalm 1. 2) ensures increase. 98-100. of knowledge, both of the matter of all useful, moral truth, and an experience of its application. 98. wiser than mine enemies—with all their carnal cunning (Deuteronomy 4. 6, 8). they are ever with me—The Hebrew is, rather singular, "it is ever with me;" the commandments forming one complete whole, thy law. 100. more than the ancients—antiquity is no help against stupidity, where it does not accord with God's word [LUTHER] (Job 32. 7-9). The Bible is the key of all knowledge, the history of the world, past, present, and to come (Psalm 111. 10). He who does the will of God shall know of the doctrine (John 7. 17). understanding—is practical skill (Psalm 2. 10; 32. 8). 101-104. Avoidance of sinful courses is both the effect and means of increasing in Divine knowledge (cf. Psalm 19. 10).

105. Not only does the word of God inform us of His will, but, as a light on a path in darkness, shows us how to follow the right and avoid the wrong way. The lamp of the word is not the sun. He would blind our eyes in our present fallen state; but we may bless God for the light shining as in a dark place, to guide us until the Sun of Righteousness shall come, and we shall be made capable of seeing Him (2 Peter 1. 19; Revelation 22. 4). The lamp is fed with the oil of the Spirit. The allusion is to the lamps and torches carried at night before an Eastern caravan. 106-108. Such was the national covenant at Sinai and in the fields of Moab. 108. free-will offerings—the spontaneous expressions of his gratitude, as contrasted with the appointed "offerings" of the temple (Hosea 14. 2; Hebrews 13. 15). He determines to pursue this way, relying on God's quickening power (v. 50) in affliction, and a gracious acceptance of his "spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise" (Psalm 50. 5, 14, 23). 109, 110. In the midst of deadly perils (the phrase is drawn from the fact that what we carry in our hands may easily slip from them, Judges 12. 3; 1 Samuel 28. 21; Job 13. 14; cf. 1 Samuel 19. 5), and exposed to crafty enemies, his safety and guidance is in the truth and promises of God. 111, 112. These he joyfully takes as his perpetual heritage, to perform the duties and receive the comforts they teach, evermore.

113. vain thoughts—better, unstable persons, lit., divided men, those of a divided, doubting mind (James 1. 8), "a double-minded man" (HENGSTENBERG), skeptics, or, skeptical notions as opposed to the certainty of God's word. 114. hiding-place—(Cf. Psalm 27. 5.) shield—(Psalm 3. 3; 7-10). hope in thy word—confidently rest on its teachings and promises. 115-117. Hence he fears not wicked men, nor dreads disappointment, sustained by God in making His law the rule of life. Depart from me—Ye can do nothing with me; for, &c. (Psalm 6. 8). 118-120. But the disobedient and rebellious will be visited by God's wrath, which impresses the pious with wholesome fear and awe. their deceit is falsehood—i. e., all their cunning deceit, wherewith they seek to entrap the godly, is in vain. 120. The "judgments" are those on the wicked (v. 119). Joyful hope goes hand in hand with fear (Habakkuk 3. 16-18).

121-126. On the grounds of his integrity, desire for God's word, and covenant relation to Him, the servant of God may plead, for His protecting care against the wicked, gracious guidance to the knowledge of truth, and His effective vindication of the righteous and their cause, which is also His own. Be surety—Stand for me against my oppressors (Genesis 43. 9; Isaiah 38. 14). 127, 128. Therefore [i. e., In view of these benefits, or, Because of the glory of thy law, so much praised in the previous parts of the Psalm] I love, &c. [and] Therefore (repeated)—All its precepts, on all subjects, are estimable for their purity, and lead one imbued with their spirit to hate all evil (Psalm 19. 10). The word of God admits of no eclecticism; its least title is perfect (Psalm 12. 6; Matthew 5. 17-19).

129. wonderful—lit., wonders, i. e., of moral excellence. 130. The entrance—lit., opening; God's words, as an open door, let in light, or knowledge. Rather, as HENGSTENBERG explains it, "The opening up, or, 'explanation of thy word.'" To the natural man the doors of God's word are shut. Luke 24. 27, 31; Acts 17. 3; Ephesians 1. 18, confirms this view, "Opening (i. e., explaining) and alleging," &c. unto the simple—those needing or desiring it (cf. Psalm 19. 7). 131-135. An ardent desire (cf. Psalm 56. 1, 2) for spiritual enlightening, establishment in a right course, deliverance from the wicked, and evidence of God's favour is expressed. I opened my mouth, and painted—as a traveller in a hot desert pants for the cooling breeze (Psalm 63. 1; 84. 2). Look . . . upon me—opposed to hiding or averting the face (cf. Psalm 25. 15; 86. 6; 102. 17). as thou usest to do—or, "as it is right in regard to those who love thy name." Such have a right to the manifestations of God's grace, resting on the nature of God as faithful to His promise to such, not on their own merits. Order my steps—Make firm, so that there be no halting (Psalm 40. 2). any iniquity—v. 34 favours HENGSTENBERG, "any iniquitous man," any "oppressor." But the parallel first clause in this (v. 33) favours English Version (Psalm 19. 13). His hope of deliverance from external oppression of man (v. 34) is founded on his deliverance from the internal "dominion of iniquity," in answer to his prayer (v. 33). 136. Zealous himself to keep God's law, he is deeply afflicted when others violate it (cf. v. 53). Lit., Mine eyes come down (dissolved) like water-brooks (Lamentations 3. 48; Jeremiah 9. 1). because, &c.—(Cf. Ezekiel 9. 4; Jeremiah 13. 17).

137-139. God's justice and faithfulness in His government aggravate the neglect of the wicked, and more excite the lively zeal of His people. 139. (Psalm 69. 9.) 140. very pure—lit., refined, shown pure by trial. 141. The pious, however despised of men, are distinguished in God's sight by a regard for His law. 142-144. The principles of God's government are permanent and reliable, and in the deepest distress His people find them a theme of delightful meditation and a source of reviving power (v. 17, 116). everlasting—(Psalm 111. 3), though to outward appearance seeming dead. law is truth—it therefore cannot deceive as to its promises.

145-149. An intelligent devotion is led by Divine promises, and is directed to an increase of gracious affections, arising from a contemplation of revealed truth. prevented—lit., came before, anticipated not only the dawn, but even the usual periods of the night; when the night-watches, which might be expected to find me asleep, come, they find me awake (Psalm 63. 6; 77. 4; Lamentations 2. 19). Such is the earnestness of the desire and love for God's truth. quicken me—revive my heart according to those principles of justice, founded on thine own nature, and revealed in thy law, which specially set forth thy mercy to the humble as well as justice to the wicked (cf.

v. 30). 150-152. Though the wicked are near to injure, because far from God's law, He is near to help, and faithful to His word, which abides for ever.

153-155. Though the remembering of God's law is not meritorious, yet it evinces a filial temper, and provides the pious with promises to plead, while the wicked in neglecting His law, reject God and despise His promises (cf. Psalm 9. 13; 43. 1; 69. 18). 154. Plead, &c.—HENGSTENBERG translates, "Fight my fight." (See Psalm 35. 1; 43. 1; Micah 7. 9.) 156. (Cf. v. 149.) 157. (Cf. v. 86, 87, 95.) 158. (Cf. v. 136.) transgressors—or, lit., traitors, who are faithless to a righteous sovereign, and side with His enemies (cf. Psalm 25. 3, 8). 159. (Cf. v. 121-126; 153-155.) quicken, &c.—(v. 88.) This prayer occurs here for the ninth time, showing a deep sense of frailty. 160. God has been ever faithful, and the principles of His government will ever continue worthy of confidence. from the beginning—i. e., "every word from Genesis (called by the Jews from its first words, 'In the beginning') to the end of the Scriptures is true," HENGSTENBERG translates more lit., "The sum of thy words is truth." The sense is substantially the same. The whole body of revelation is truth. "Thy word is nothing but truth." [LUTHER.]

161-165. (Cf. v. 46, 86.) 161. awe—reverential, not slavish fear, which could not coexist with love (v. 163; 1 John 4. 8). Instead of fearing his persecutors, he fears God's word alone (Luke 12. 4, 5). The Jews inscribe in the first page of the great Bible (Genesis 23.), "How dreadful is this place! This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven!" 162. (Cf. Matthew 13. 44, 45.) Though persecuted by the mighty, the pious are not turned from revering God's authority to seek their favour, but rejoice in the possession of this "pearl of great price," as great victors in spoils. Hating falsehood and loving truth, often, every day, praising God for it, they find peace and freedom from temptation. 163. lying—i. e., as in v. 29, unfaithfulness to the covenant of God with His people; apostasy. nothing shall offend them—or, cause them to offend (cf. Margin). 166-168. As they keep God's law from motives of love for it, and are free from slavish fear, they are ready to subject their lives to his inspection. 168. all my ways are before thee—I wish to order my ways as before thee, rather than in reference to man (Genesis 19. 1; Psalm 73. 23). All men's ways are under God's eye (Proverbs 5. 21); the godly alone realize the fact, and live accordingly.

169, 170. The prayer for understanding of the truth precedes that for deliverance. The fulfilment of the first is the basis of the fulfilment of the second (Psalm 90. 11-17). On the terms "cry" and "supplication" (cf. Psalm 6. 9; 17. 1). 171, 172. shall utter—or, pour out praise (cf. Psalm 19. 2); shall cause thy praises to stream forth as from a bubbling, overflowing fountain. My tongue shall speak thy word—lit., answer thy word, i. e., with praise, respond to thy word. Every expression in which we praise God and his word is a response, or acknowledgment, corresponding to the perfections of Him whom we praise. 173, 174. (Cf. v. 77, 81, 92.) I have chosen—in preference to all other objects of delight. 175. Save me that I may praise thee. thy judgments—as v. 149, 156. 176. Though a wanderer from God, the truly pious ever desires to be drawn back to Him, and, though for a time negligent of duty, never forgets the commandments by which it is taught. lost—therefore utterly helpless as to recovering itself (Jeremiah 50. 6; Luke 15. 4). Not only the sinner before conversion, but the believer after conversion, is unable to recover himself; but the latter, after temporary wandering, knows to whom to look for restoration. These last two verses seem to sum up the petitions, confessions, and professions of the Psalm. The writer desires God's favour, that he may praise Him for His truth, confesses that he has erred, but, in the midst of all his wanderings and adversities, professes an abiding attachment to the revealed word of God, the theme of such repeated eulogies, and the recognized source of such great and unnumbered blessings. Thus the Psalm, though more than usually didactic, is made the medium of both parts of devotion—prayer and praise.

PSALM CXX.

Ver. 1-7. This is the first of fifteen Psalms (120-134), entitled "A song of Degrees" (121st—lit., A song for the degrees), or, ascents. It seems most probable they were designed for the use of the people when going up (cf. 1 Kings 12, 27, 28) to Jerusalem on the festival occasions (Deuteronomy 16, 16), three times a year. David appears as the author of four, Solomon of one (127.), and the other ten are anonymous, probably composed after the captivity. In this Psalm the writer acknowledges God's mercy, prays for relief from a malicious foe, whose punishment he anticipates, and then repeats his complaint.

2, 3. Slander and deceit charged on his foes implies his innocence. tongue—as Psalm 52, 2, 4. 4. coals of juniper—which retain heat long. Sharp arrows of the mighty—Destructive inflictions. This verse may be read as a description of the wicked, but better as their punishment, in reply to the question of v. 3. 5. A residence in these remote lands pictures his miserable condition. 6, 7. While those who surrounded him were maliciously hostile, he was disposed to peace. This Psalm may well begin such a series as this, as a contrast to the promised joys of God's worship.

PSALM CXXI.

Ver. 1-8. God's guardian care of His people celebrated.

1. To lift up the eyes expresses desire (cf. Psalm 25, 1), mingled with expectation. The last clause, read as a question, is answered, 2, by avowing God to be the helper, of whose ability His creative power is a pledge (Psalm 115, 15), to which, 3, 4, His sleepless vigilance is added. to be moved—(Cf. Psalm 38, 16; 66, 9.) 5. upon thy right hand—a protector's place (Psalm 109, 31; 110, 5). 6-8. God keeps His people at all times and in all perils. nor the moon by night—poetically represents the dangers of the night, over which the moon presides (Genesis 1, 16). thy going out, &c.—All thy ways (Deuteronomy 28, 19; Psalm 104, 23). evermore—includes a future state.

PSALM CXXII.

Ver. 1-9. This Psalm might well express the sacred joy of the pilgrims on entering the holy city, where praise, as the religious as well as civil metropolis, is celebrated, and for whose prosperity, as representing the Church, prayer is offered.

1, 2. Our feet shall stand—lit., are standing. gates—(Cf. Psalm 9, 14; 87, 2.) 3-5. compact together—All parts united, as in David's time. testimony—If unto is supplied, this may denote the ark (Exodus 25, 10-21); otherwise the act of going is denoted, called a testimony in allusion to the requisition (Deuteronomy 16, 16), with which it was a compliance. there are set thrones—or, do sit, thrones used for the occupants, David's sons (2 Samuel 8, 18). 6, 7. Let peace, including prosperity, everywhere prevail. 8, 9. In the welfare of the city, as its civil, and especially the religious relations, was involved that of Israel. now—as Psalm 115, 2. Let me say—house of . . . God—in wider sense, the Church, whose welfare would be promoted by the good of Jerusalem.

PSALM CXXIII.

Ver. 1-4. An earnest and expecting prayer for Divine aid in distress.

1. (Cf. Psalm 121, 1.) thou that dwellest—lit., sittest as enthroned (cf. Psalm 2, 4; 113, 4, 5). 2. Deference, submission, and trust, are all expressed by the figure. In the East, servants in attending on their masters are almost wholly directed by signs, which require the closest observance of the hands of the latter. The servants of God should look (1.) to His directing hand, to appoint them their work; (2.) to His supplying hand (Psalm 104, 28), to give them their portion in due season; (3.) to His protecting hand, to right them when wronged; (4.) to His correcting hand (Isaiah 9, 13; 1 Peter 5, 6; cf. Genesis 16, 6); (5.) to His rewarding hand. 3. The contempt was that of the heathen, and, perhaps, Samaritans (Nehemiah 1, 3; 2, 19.) 4. of those that are at ease—self-complacently, disregarding God's law, and despising His people.

PSALM CXXIV.

Ver. 1-8. The writer, for the Church, praises God for past, and expresses trust for future, deliverance from foes.

1, 2. on our side—for us (Psalm 56, 9). now—or, oh! let Israel, &c. rose . . . against, &c.—(Psalm 3, 1; 56, 11). Then—i. e., The time of our danger. quick—lit., living (Numbers 16, 32, 33), description of ferocity. 4, 5. (Cf. Psalm 18, 4, 16.) The epithet proud added to waters denotes insolent enemies. 6, 7. The figure is changed to that of a rapacious wild beast (Psalm 3, 7), and then of a fowler (Psalm 91, 3), and complete escape is denoted by breaking the net, 8. (Cf. Psalm 121, 2). name—in the usual sense (Psalm 5, 11; 20, 1). He thus places over against the great danger the omnipotent God, and drowns, as it were in an anthem, the wickedness of the whole world and of hell, just as a great fire consumes a little drop of water. [LUTHER.]

PSALM CXXV.

Ver. 1-5. God honours the confidence of His people, by protection and deliverance, and leaves hypocrites to the doom of the wicked.

1, 2. Mount Zion—as an emblem of permanence, and locality of Jerusalem as one of security, represent the firm and protected condition of God's people (cf. Psalm 46, 5), supported not only by Providence, but by covenant promise. Even the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but God's kindness shall not depart, nor His covenant of peace be removed (Isaiah 54, 10). They that trust—(v. 1) are "His people," (v. 2). 3. Though God may leave them for a time under the rod, or power (Psalm 2, 9), and oppression of the wicked for a time, as a chastisement, He will not suffer them to be tempted so as to fall into sin (1 Corinthians 10, 13). The wicked shall only prove a correcting rod to them, not a destroying sword; even this rod shall not remain ("rest") on them, lest they be tempted to despair and apostasy (Psalm 73, 13, 14). God may even try His people to the uttermost: when nothing is before our eyes but pure despair, then He delivers us and gives life in death, and makes us blessed in the curse (2 Corinthians 1, 8, 9). [LUTHER.] the lot—the possession, lit., Canaan, spiritually, the heavenly inheritance of holiness and bliss which is appointed to the righteous. Sin's dominion shall not permanently come between the believer and his inheritance. 4. (Cf. Psalm 7, 10; 84, 11.) 5. Those who turn aside (under temptation) permanently show that they are hypocrites, and their lot or portion shall be with the wicked (Psalm 28, 3). crooked ways—(Cf. Deuteronomy 9, 16; Malachi 2, 8, 9.) "Theirs" is emphatic; the "crooked ways" proceed from their own hearts. The true Israel is here distinguished from the false. Scripture everywhere opposes the Jewish delusion that mere outward descent would save (Romans 2, 28, 29; 9, 6, 7; Galatians 6, 16). The byways of sin from the way of life.

PSALM CXXVI.

Ver. 1-6. To praise for God's favour to His people is added a prayer for its continued manifestation.

1-3. The joy of those returned from Babylon was ecstatic, and elicited the admiration even of the heathen, as illustrating God's great power and goodness. turned again the captivity—i. e., restored from it (Job 39, 12; Psalm 14, 7; Proverbs 12, 14). HENGSTENBERG translates, "When the Lord turned Himself to the turning of Zion" (see Margin), God returns to His people when they return to Him (Deuteronomy 30, 2, 3). 4. All did not return at once; hence the prayer for repeated favours. as the streams in the south—or, the torrents in the deserts south of Judea, dependent on rain (Joshua 15, 19), reappearing after dry seasons (cf. Job 6, 15; Psalm 68, 9). The point of comparison is joy at the reappearing of what has been so painfully missed. 5, 6. As in husbandry the sower may cast his seed in a dry and parched soil with desponding fears, so those shall reap abundant fruit who toil in tears with the prayer of faith. (Cf. the history, Ezra 6, 16, 22). He that goeth forth—lit., better, "He goes—he comes, he comes," &c. The repetition implies there is no end of weeping here, as there shall be no end of joy hereafter (Isaiah 35. 10). precious seed—rather, seed to be drawn from the seed-box for sowing; lit., seed-draught. Cf. on this Psalm, Jeremiah 31. 9, &c.

PSALM CXXVII.

Ver. 1-5. The theme of this Psalm, that human enterprises only succeed by the Divine blessing, was probably associated with the building of the temple by Solomon, its author. It may have been adopted in this view, as suited to this series especially, as appropriately expressing the sentiments of God's worshippers in relation to the erection of the second temple.

1, 2 suggest the view of the theme given. so he giveth his beloved sleep—i. e., His providential care gives sleep which no efforts of ours can otherwise procure, and this is a reason for trust as to other things (cf. Matthew 6. 26-32). 3-5. Posterity is often represented as a blessing from God (Genesis 30. 2, 15; 1 Samuel 1. 19, 20). Children are represented as the defenders (arrows) of their parents in war, and in litigation. Adversaries in the gate, or place of public business (cf. Job 5. 4; Psalm 69. 12).

PSALM CXXVIII.

Ver. 1-6. The temporal blessings of true piety. The 8th ch. of Zechariah is a virtual commentary on this Psalm. Cf. v. 3 with Zechariah 8. 5; and v. 2 with Leviticus 26. 16; Deuteronomy 28. 33; Zechariah 8. 10; and v. 6 with Zechariah 8. 4.

1. (Cf. Psalm 1. 1.) 2. For thou shalt eat—i. e., It is a blessing to live on the fruits of one's own industry. 3. by the sides—or, within (Psalm 48. 2). olive plants—are peculiarly luxuriant (Psalm 52. 8). 5. In temporal blessings the pious do not forget the richer blessings of God's grace, which they shall ever enjoy. 6. Long life crowns all other temporal favours. As Psalm 125. 5, this Psalm closes with a prayer for peace, with prosperity for God's people.

PSALM CXXIX.

Ver. 1-8. The people of God, often delivered from enemies, are confident of His favour, by their overthrow in future.

1, 2. may Israel now say—or, oh! let Israel say (Psalm 121. 1). Israel's youth was the sojourn in Egypt (Jeremiah 2. 2; Hosea 2. 15). prevailed—lit., been able, i. e., to accomplish their purpose against me (Psalm 13. 4). 3, 4. The ploughing is a figure of scourging, which most severe physical infliction aptly represents all kinds. the cords—i. e., which fasten the plough to the ox; and cutting, this denotes God's arresting the persecution. 5, 6. The ill-rooted grass, which withers before it grows up, and procures for those gathering it no harvest blessing (Ruth 2. 4), sets forth the utter uselessness and the rejection of the wicked.

PSALM CXXX.

Ver. 1-8. The penitent sinner's hope is in God's mercy only.

1, 2. depths—for great distress (Psalm 40. 2; 69. 3). 3. shouldest mark—or, take strict account (Job 10. 14; 14. 16), implying a confession of the existence of sin. who shall stand—(Psalm 1. 6). Standing is opposed to the guilty sinking down in fear and self-condemnation (Malachi 3. 2; Revelation 6. 15, 16). The question implies a negative, which is thus more strongly stated. 4. Pardon produces filial fear and love. Judgment without the hope of pardon creates fear and dislike. The sense of forgiveness, so far from producing licentiousness, produces holiness (Jeremiah 33. 9; Ezekiel 16. 62, 63; 1 Peter 2. 16). "There is forgiveness with thee, not that thou mayest be presumed upon, but feared." 5, 6. wait for the Lord—in expectation (Psalm 27. 14). watch for, &c.—in earnestness and anxiety. 7, 8. Let Israel, &c.—i. e., All are invited to seek and share Divine forgiveness. from all his iniquities—or, punishments of them (Psalm 40. 12, &c.).

PSALM CXXXI.

Ver. 1-3. This Psalm, while expressive of David's pious feelings on assuming the royal office, teaches the humble, submissive temper of a true child of God.

1. eyes lofty—a sign of pride (Psalm 18. 27). exercise myself—lit., walk in, or meddle with. 2. surely, &c.—The form is that of an oath or strongest assertion. Submission is denoted by the figure of a weaned child. As the child weaned by his mother from the breast, so I still the motions of pride in me (Matthew 18. 3, 4; Isaiah 11. 8; 28. 9). Hebrew children were often not weaned till three years old. Soul may be taken for desire, which gives a more definite sense, though one included in the idea conveyed by the usual meaning, myself.

PSALM CXXXII.

Ver. 1-18. The writer, perhaps Solomon (cf. v. 8, 9), after relating David's pious zeal for God's service, pleads for the fulfilment of the promise (2 Samuel 7. 16), which, providing for a perpetuation of David's kingdom, involved that of God's right worship and the establishment of the greater and spiritual kingdom of David's greater Son. Of Him and His kingdom both the temple and its worship, and the kings and kingdom of Judah, were types. The congruity of such a topic with the tenor of this series of Psalms is obvious.

1-5. This vow is not elsewhere recorded. It expresses, in strong language, David's intense desire to see the establishment of God's worship as well as of His kingdom. remember David—lit., remember for David, i. e., all his troubles and anxieties on the matter. habitation—lit., dwellings, generally used to denote the sanctuary. 6. These may be the "words of David" and his pious friends, who, at Ephrathah, or Bethlehem (Genesis 48. 7), where he once lived, may have heard of the ark, which he found for the first time in the fields of the wood—or, Jair, or Kirjath-jearim (City of woods) (1 Samuel 7. 1; 2 Samuel 6. 3, 4), whence it was brought to Zion. 7. The purpose of engaging in God's worship is avowed. 8, 9. The solemn entry of the ark, symbolical of God's presence and power, with the attending priests, into the sanctuary, is proclaimed in the words used by Solomon (2 Chronicles 6. 41). 10-12. For thy servant David's sake [i. e., On account of the promise made to him] turn . . . anointed—Repulse not him who, as David's descendant, pleads the promise to perpetuate his royal line. After reciting the promise, substantially from 2 Samuel 7. 12-16 (cf. Acts 2. 30, &c.), an additional plea, 13, is made on the ground of God's choice of Zion (here used for Jerusalem) as His dwelling, inasmuch as the prosperity of the kingdom was connected with that of the Church (Psalm 122. 8, 9). 14-18. That choice is expressed in God's words, I will sit or dwell, or sit enthroned. The joy of the people springs from the blessings of His grace, conferred through the medium of the priesthood. make the horn . . . to bud—enlarge his power. a lamp—the figure of prosperity (Psalm 18. 10, 28; 89. 17). With the confounding of his enemies is united his prosperity and the unceasing splendour of his crown.

PSALM CXXXIII.

Ver. 1-3. The blessings of fraternal unity.

1, 2. As the fragrant oil is refreshing, so this affords delight. The holy anointing oil for the high priest was olive oil mixed with four of the best spices (Exodus 30. 22, 25, 30). Its rich profusion typified the abundance of the Spirit's graces. As the copious dew, such as fell on Hermon, falls in fertilizing power on the mountains of Zion, so this unity is fruitful in good works. 3. there—i. e., in Zion, the Church; the material Zion, blessed with enriching dews, suggests this allusion to the source of the influence enjoyed by the spiritual Zion. commanded the blessing—(Cf. Psalm 68. 28.)

PSALM CXXXIV.

Ver. 1-3. 1, 2. The pilgrim bands arriving at the sanctuary call on the priests, who stand in the house of the Lord at the time of the evening sacrifice, to unite in praising God in their name and that of the people, using appropriate gestures, to which the priests reply, pronouncing the Mosaic blessing which they alone could pronounce. A fit epilogue to the whole pilgrim-book, Psalms 120-131. 3. After the manner directed (Numbers 6, 23). by night—the evening service (Psalm 141, 2), as opposed to morning (Psalm 92, 2). lift up your hands—(Cf. Psalm 28, 2.) out of Zion—the Church, as His residence, and thus seat of blessings. Thus close the songs of degrees.

PSALM CXXXV.

Ver. 1-21. A Psalm of praise, in which God's relations to His Church, His power in the natural world, and in delivering His people, are contrasted with the vanity of idols and idol worship.

1-3. In the general call for praise, the priests, that stand in the house of the Lord, are specially mentioned. 4-7. God's choice of Israel is the first reason assigned for rendering praise; the next, His manifested greatness in creation and providence. heaven, and . . . seas, and all . . . ends of the earth—denote universality. 8, 9. The last plague is cited to illustrate His "tokens and wonders." 10-12. The conquest of Canaan was by God's power, not that of the people. heritage—or, possession. 13. name [and] memorial—Each denote that by which God is made known. 14. will judge—do justice (Psalm 72, 2). repent himself—change his dealings (Psalm 90, 13). 15-18—(Cf. Psalm 115, 4-8.) are like unto them—or, shall be like, &c. Idolaters become spiritually stupid, and perish with their idols (Isaiah 1, 31). 19-21—(Cf. Psalm 115, 9-11.) There we have trust for bless here. out of Zion—(Cf. Psalm 110, 2; 131, 3.) From the Church, as a centre, His praise is diffused throughout the earth.

PSALM CXXXVI.

Ver. 1-26. The theme is the same as that of 135th. God should be praised for His works of creation and providence, His deliverance and care of His people, and judgments on their enemies, and His goodness to all. The chorus to every verse is in terms of that of Psalm 106, 1; 113, 1-4, and was perhaps used at the Amen by the people, in worship (cf. 1 Chronicles 16, 36; Psalm 105, 45).

1-3. The Divine titles denote supremacy. 4. alone—excluding all help. 5, 6. by [or, in] wisdom—(Psalm 104, 24). made—lit., maker of. above [or, higher than] the waters—(Psalm 24, 2.) 12. Cf. similar expressions (Exodus 3, 20; Deuteronomy 4, 31, &c.). 15. overthrew—lit., shook off, as Exodus 14, 27, as a contemptuous rejection of a reptile. 23. remembered us—or, for us (Psalm 132, 1). our low estate—i. e., captivity. 24. And hath redeemed [or, lit., snatched] us—alluding to the sudden deliverance effected by the overthrow of Babylon. 25. To the special favours to His people is added the record of God's goodness to all His creatures (cf. Matthew 6, 30). 26. God of heaven—occurs but once (Jonah 1, 9) before the captivity. It is used by the later writers as specially distinguishing God from idols.

PSALM CXXXVII.

Ver. 1-9. This Psalm records the mourning of the captive Israelites, and a prayer and prediction respecting the destruction of their enemies.

1. rivers of Babylon—The name of the city used for the whole country. remembered Zion—or, Jerusalem, as Psalm 132, 13. 2. upon the willows—which may have grown there then, if not now; as the palm, which was once common, is now rare in Palestine. 3, 4. Whether the request was in curiosity or derision, the answer intimates that a compliance was incongruous with their mournful feelings (Proverbs 25, 20). 5, 6. For joyful songs would imply forgetfulness of their desolated homes and fallen Church. The solemn imprecations on the "hand" and "tongue," if thus forgetful, relate to the cunning or skill in playing, and the power of slinging. 7-9. Remember . . . the children of Edom—(Cf. Psalm 132, 1), i. e., to punish. the day of Jerusalem—its downfall (Lamentations 4, 21, 22; Obadiah 11-13). daughter of Babylon—the people (Psalm 9, 13). Their destruction had been abundantly foretold (Isaiah 13, 14; Jeremiah 51, 23). For the terribleness of that destruction, God's righteous judgment, and not the passions of the chafed Israelites, was responsible.

PSALM CXXXVIII.

Ver. 1-8. David thanks God for His benefits, and anticipating a wider extension of God's glory by His means, assures himself of His continued presence and faithfulness.

1. (Cf. Psalm 9, 1.) before the gods—whether angels (Psalm 8, 5); or princes (Exodus 21, 6; Psalm 82, 6); or idols (Psalm 97, 7); denotes a readiness to worship the true God alone, and a contempt of all other objects of worship. 2. (Cf. Psalm 5, 7.) thy word above all thy name—i. e., God's promise (2 Samuel 7, 7), sustained by His mercy and truth, exceeded all other manifestations of Himself as subject of praise. 3-5. That promise, as an answer to his prayers in distress, revived and strengthened his faith, and, as the basis of other revelations of the Messiah, will be the occasion of praise by all who hear and receive it (Psalm 68, 29, 31; Isaiah 4, 3). for great (is) the glory—or, when the glory shall be great, in God's fulfilling His purposes of redemption. 6, 7. On this general principle of God's government (Isaiah 2, 11; 57, 15; 66, 2), he relies for God's favour in saving him, and overthrowing his enemies. knoweth afar off—their ways and deserts (Psalm 1, 6). 8. God will fulfil His promise.

PSALM CXXXIX.

Ver. 1-24. After presenting the sublime doctrines of God's omnipresence and omniscience, the Psalmist appeals to Him, avowing his innocence, his abhorrence of the wicked, and his ready submission to the closest scrutiny. Admonition to the wicked and comfort to the pious are alike implied inferences from these doctrines.

PSALM CXL.

Ver. 1-13. The style of this Psalm resembles those of David in the former part of the book, presenting the usual complaint, prayer, and confident hope of relief.

1. evil man—which of David's enemies is meant is not important. 2-5. This character of the wicked, and the devices planned against the pious, correspond to Psalm 10, 7; 31, 13; 58, 4, &c. sharpened . . . like a serpent—not like a serpent does, but they are thus like a serpent in cunning and venom. snare (and) net—for threatening dangers (cf. Psalm 38, 12; 57, 6). 6. (Cf. Psalm 5, 1-12; 16, 2). 7. day of battle—lit., of armour, i. e., when using it. 8. (Cf. Psalm 37, 12; 66, 7.) lest they exalt themselves—or, they will be exalted if permitted to prosper. 9. Contrasts his head covered by God (v. 7) with theirs, or (as head may be used for persons) with them, covered with the results of their wicked deeds (Psalm 7, 16). 10. (Cf. Psalm 11, 6; 120, 4.) To cast into fire and deep pits, figures for utter destruction. 11. an evil speaker—or, slanderer will not be tolerated (Psalm 101, 7). The last clause may be translated: "an evil (man) He (God) shall hunt," &c. 12. (Cf. Psalm 9, 4.) 13. After all changes, the righteous shall have cause for praise. Such shall dwell, or sit securely, under God's protection (Psalm 21, 6; 41, 12).

PSALM CXLI.

Ver. 1-10. This Psalm evinces its authorship as the preceding, by its structure and the character of its contents. It is a prayer for deliverance from sins to which affliction tempted him, and from the enemies who caused it.

PSALM CXLII.

Ver. 1-7. Maschil—(cf. Psalm 32, title). When he was in the cave, either of Adullam (1 Samuel 22, 1), or En-gedi (1 Samuel 24, 3). This does not mean that the Psalm was composed in the cave, but that the precarious mode of life, of which his refuge in caves was a striking illustration, occasioned the complaint, which constitutes the first part of the Psalm, and furnishes the reason for the prayer with which it concludes, and which, as the prominent characteristic, gives its name.

1. with my voice—audibly, because earnestly. 2. (Cf. Psalm 62. 8.) complaint—or, a sad musing. 3. thou knewest . . . path—the appeal is indicative of conscious innocence; knowest it to be right, and that my affliction is owing to the snares of enemies, and is not deserved (cf. Psalm 42. 4; 61. 2). 4. Utter desolation is meant. right hand—the place of a protector (Psalm 110. 5), care for—lit., sought after, to do good. 5. (Cf. Psalm 31. 14; 62. 7.) 6. (Cf. Psalm 17. 1.) 7. (Cf. Psalm 25. 17.) that I may praise—lit., for praising, or that thy name may be praised, i. e., by the righteous, who shall surround me with sympathizing joy (Psalm 35. 27).

PSALM CXLIII.

Ver. 1-12. In structure and style, like the preceding (Psalms 140-142.), this Psalm is clearly evinced to be David's. It is a prayer for pardon, and for relief from enemies; afflictions, as usual, producing confession and penitence.

1. in thy faithfulness . . . and . . . righteousness— or, God's regard to the claims which He has permitted His people to make in His covenant. 2. enter . . . judgment—deal not in strict justice. shall no . . . justified— or, is no man justified, or innocent (Job 14. 3; Romans 3. 20). 3, 4. The exciting reason for his prayer—his afflictions—led to confession as just made: he now makes the complaint, as those that have been long dead—deprived of life's comforts (cf. Psalm 40. 15; 88. 3-6). 5, 6. The distress is aggravated by the contrast of former comfort (Psalm 22. 3-5), for whose return he longs. a thirsty land—which needs rain, as did his spirit God's gracious visits (Psalm 23. 1; 89. 17). 7. spirit falleth—is exhausted. 8. (Cf. Psalm 25. 1-4; 59. 16). the way . . . walk—i. e., the way of safety and righteousness (Psalm 142. 3-6). 9. (Cf. Psalm 31. 15-20). 10. (Cf. Psalm 5. 3; 27. 11.) land of uprightness—lit., an even land (Psalm 26. 12). 11. (Cf. Psalm 23. 3; 119. 156.) 12. God's mercy to his people is often wrath to His and their enemies (cf. Psalm 31. 17). thy servant—as chosen to be such, entitled to Divine regard.

PSALM CXLIV.

Ver. 1-15. David's praise of God as his all-sufficient help is enhanced by a recognition of the intrinsic worthlessness of man. Confidently imploring God's interposition against his enemies, he breaks forth into praise and joyful anticipations of the prosperity of his kingdom, when freed from vain and wicked men.

PSALM CXLV.

Ver. 1-21. A Psalm of praise to God for His mighty, righteous, and gracious government of all men, and of His humble and suffering people in particular.

1, 2. (Cf. Psalm 30. 1.) bless thy name—celebrate thy perfections (Psalm 5. 11). God is addressed as king, alluding to His government of men. 3. (Cf. Psalm 18. 3; 48. 1.) greatness—as displayed in his works. 4. shall declare—lit., they shall declare, i. e., all generations. 5. I will speak— or, muse (Psalm 77. 12; 119. 15). thy wondrous works— or, words of thy wonders, i. e., which described them (Psalm 105. 27, Margin). 6. terrible acts—which produce dread or fear. 7. memory—(Psalm 6. 5), remembrance, or what causes to be remembered. righteousness—as Psalm 143. 1, goodness according to covenant engagement. 8, 9. (Cf. 103. 3; 111. 4.) over all, &c.—rests on all His works. 10. bless—as v. 1, to praise with reverence, more than merely to praise. 11, 12. The declaration of God's glory is for the extension of his knowledge and perfections in the world. 13. (Cf. Daniel 4. 3, 34.) 14. (Cf. Psalm 37. 17; 54. 4.) 15, 16. eyes of . . . thee—or, look with expecting faith (Psalm 104. 27, 28). 17. holy . . . works—lit., merciful or kind, goodness (Psalm 144. 2) is the corresponding noun. righteous—in a similar relation of meaning to righteousness (v. 7). 18, 19. (Cf. Psalm 34. 7, 10.) 20. Those who fear him (v. 19) are those who are here said to love him. 21. (Cf. Psalm 23. 21.) all flesh—(Psalm 65. 2)

The Psalm ends, as it began, with ascriptions of praise, in which the pious will ever delight to join.

PSALM CXLVI.

Ver. 1-10. An exhortation to praise God, who, by the gracious and faithful exercise of His power in goodness to the needy, is alone worthy of implicit trust.

PSALM CXLVII.

Ver. 1-20. This and the remaining Psalms have been represented as specially designed to celebrate the rebuilding of Jerusalem (cf. Nehemiah 6. 16; 12. 27). They all open and close with the stirring call for praise. This specially declares God's providential care towards all creatures, and particularly His people.

1. (Cf. Psalm 92. 1; 135. 3.) 2. (Cf. Psalm 107. 3; Isaiah 11. 12.) 3. Though applicable to the captive Israelites, this is a general and precious truth. wounds—(Cf. Margin.) 4, 5. God's power in nature (Isaiah 40. 26-28, and often) is presented as a pledge of His power to help His people. tell—eth . . . stars—what no man can do (Genesis 15. 5). 6. That power is put forth for the good of the meek and suffering pious, and confusion of the wicked (Psalm 146. 8, 9). 7-9. His providence supplies beautifully the wild animals in their mountain homes. Sing . . . Lord—lit., Answer the Lord, i. e., in grateful praise to his goodness, thus declared in His acts. 10, 11. The advantages afforded, as in war by the strength of the horse or the agility of man, do not incline God to favour any; but those who fear and, of course, trust Him, will obtain his approbation and aid. 12-14. Strengthened . . . gates—or, means of defence against invaders. maketh . . . borders—or, territories (Genesis 23. 17; Isaiah 54. 12). fillet—thce, &c.—(Cf. Margin.) 15-18. God's word, as a swift messenger, executes His purpose, for with Him to command is to perform (Genesis 1. 3; Psalm 33. 9), and He brings about the wonders of providence as easily as men cast crumbs. morsels—used as to food (Genesis 18. 5), perhaps here denotes hail. 19, 20. This mighty ruler and benefactor of heaven and earth is thus especially to His chosen people, to whom alone (Deuteronomy 4. 32-34) He has made known His will, while others have been left in darkness. Therefore unite in the great hallelujah.

PSALM CXLVIII.

Ver. 1-14. The scope of this Psalm is the same as of the preceding.

1. heavens [and] heights—are synonymous. 2. hosts— (cf. Psalm 103. 21). 4. heavens of heavens—the very highest. waters—clouds, resting above the visible heavens (cf. Genesis 1. 7). 5. praise the name—as representing His perfections. he commanded—He is emphatic, ascribing creation to God alone. 6. The perpetuity of the frame of nature is, of course, subject to Him who formed it. a decree . . . pass—His ordinances respecting them shall not change (Jeremiah 36. 31), or perish (Job 34. 20; Psalm 37. 36). 7-10. The call on the earth, as opposed to heaven, includes seas or depths, whose inhabitants the dragon, as one of the largest (cf. on Leviathan, Psalm 104. 26), is selected to represent. The most destructive and ungovernable agents of inanimate nature are introduced. fulfilling his word—or, law, may be understood of each. Next the most distinguished productions of the vegetable world. fruitful trees—or, trees of fruit, as opposed to forest trees. Wild and domestic, large and small, animals are comprehended. 11, 12. Next all rational beings, from the highest in rank to little children. princes—or, military leaders. 13. let them—all mentioned. excellent—or, exalted (Isaiah 12. 4). his glory—majesty (Psalm 45. 3). above . . . heaven—their united splendours fall to match His. 14. exalteth the horn—established power (Psalm 75. 5, 6). praise of [or lit., for] his saints—i. e., occasions for them to praise Him. They are further described as His people, and near Him, sustaining by covenanted care a peculiarly intimate relation.

PSALM CXLIX.

Ver. 1-9. This Psalm sustains a close connection with the foregoing. The chosen people are exhorted to praise God, in view of past favours, and also future victories over enemies, of which they are impliedly assured.

1. (Cf. Psalm 96. 1.) 2. God had signalized His relation as a sovereign, in restoring them to their land. 3. in the dance—(Psalm 30. 11.) The dance is connected with other terms, expressive of the great joy of the occasion. The word may be rendered lute, to which the other instruments are joined. sing praises—or, sing and play. 4. takeeth pleasure—lit., accepts, alluding to acceptance of propitiatory offerings (cf. Psalm 7. 18). beautify, &c.—adorn the humble with faith, hope, joy, and peace. 5. in glory—the honourable condition to which they are raised. upon their beds—once a place of mourning (Psalm 6. 6). 6. high (praises)—or, deeds. They shall go forth as religious warriors, as once religious labourers (Nehemiah 4. 17). 7. The destruction of the incorrigibly wicked attends the propagation of God's truth, so that the military successes of the Jews, after the captivity, typified the triumphs of the gospel. 9. the judgment written—either in God's decrees, or perhaps as Deuteronomy 32. 41-43. this honour—i. e., to be thus employed, will be an honourable service, to be assigned his saints—or, godly ones (Psalm 16. 3).

PSALM CL.

Ver. 1-6. This is a suitable doxology for the whole book, reciting the "place, theme, mode, and extent of God's high praise."

1. in his sanctuary—on earth. firmament, &c.—which illustrates His power. 2. mighty acts—(Psalm 145. 4.) excellent greatness—or, abundance of greatness. 3, 4. The trumpet was used to call religious assemblies; the organ, or pipe, a wind instrument, and the others were used in worship. 5. cymbals—suited to loud praise (Nehemiah 12. 27). 6. LIVING VOICES SHALL TAKE UP THE FAILING SOUNDS OF DEAD INSTRUMENTS, AND AS THEY CEASE ON EARTH, THOSE OF INTELLIGENT RANSOMED SPIRITS AND HOLY ANGELS, AS WITH THE SOUND OF MIGHTY THUNDERS, WILL PROLONG ETERNALLY THE PRAISE, SAYING: "ALLELUIA! SALVATION, AND GLORY, AND HONOUR, AND POWER, UNTO THE LORD OUR GOD;" "ALLELUIA! FOR THE LORD GOD OMNIPOTENT REIGNETH." AMEN!

BOOK OF PROVERBS.

INTRODUCTION.

I. THE NATURE AND USE OF PROVERBS.—A proverb is a pithy sentence, concisely expressing some well-established truth susceptible of various illustrations and applications. The word is of Latin derivation, literally meaning for a word, speech, or discourse, i. e., one expression for many. The Hebrew word for proverb (maschal) means a comparison. Many suppose it was used, because the form or matter of the proverb, or both, involved the idea of comparison. Most of the proverbs are in complets or triplets, or some modifications of them, the members of which correspond in structure and length, as if arranged to be compared one with another. They illustrate the varieties of parallelism, a distinguishing feature of Hebrew poetry. Cf. Introduction to Poetical Books. Many also clearly involve the idea of comparison in the sentiments expressed (cf. ch. 12. 1-10; 23. 10-15; 26. 1-9). Sometimes, however, the designed omission of one member of the comparison, exercising the reader's sagacity or study for its supply, presents the proverb as a "riddle" or "dark saying" (cf. ch. 30. 15-33; 1. 6; Psalm 49. 4). The sententious form of expression, which thus became a marked feature of the proverbial style, was also adopted for continuous discourse, even when not always preserving traces of comparison, either in form or matter (cf. chs. 1-9). In Ezekiel 17. 1; 24. 3, we find the same word properly translated parable, to designate an illustrative discourse. Then the Greek translators have used a word, parabola (parable), which the gospel writers (except John) employ for our Lord's discourses of the same character, and which also seems to involve the idea of comparison, though that may not be its primary meaning. It might seem, therefore, that the proverbial and parabolic styles of writing were originally and essentially the same. The proverb is a "concentrated parable, and the parable an extension of the proverb by a full illustration." The proverb is thus the moral or theme of a parable, which sometimes precedes it, as Matthew 19. 30 (cf. ch. 20. 1); or succeeds it, as Matthew 22. 1-16; Luke 15. 1-10. The style being poetical, and adapted to the expression of a high order of poetical sentiment, such as prophecy, we find the same term used to designate such compositions (cf. Numbers 23. 7; Micah 2. 4; Habakkuk 2. 6).

Though the Hebrews used the same term for proverb and parable, the Greek employs two, though the sacred writers have not always appeared to recognize a distinction. The term for proverb is, paroimion, which the Greek translators employ for the title of this book, evidently with special reference to the later definition of a proverb, as a trite, sententious form of speech, which appears to be the best meaning of the term. John uses the same term to designate our Saviour's instructions, in view of their characteristic obscurity (cf. ch. 16. 25-29, Greek), and even for his illustrative discourses (ch. 10. 6), whose sense was not at once obvious to all his hearers. This form of instruction was well adapted to aid the learner. The parallel structure of sentences, the repetition, contrast, or comparison of thought, were all calculated to facilitate the efforts of memory; and precepts of practical wisdom which, extended into logical discourses, might have failed to make abiding impressions by reason of their length or complicated character, were thus compressed into pithy, and, for the most part, very plain statements. Such a mode of instruction has distinguished the written or traditional literature of all nations, and was, and still is, peculiarly current in the East.

In this book, however, we are supplied with a proverbial wisdom commended by the seal of Divine inspiration. God has condescended to become our teacher on the practical affairs belonging to all the relations of life. He has adapted His instruction to the plain and unlettered, and presented, in this striking and impressive method, the great principles of duty to Him and to our fellow-men. To the prime motive of all right conduct, the fear of God, are added all lawful and subordinate incentives, such as honour, interest, love, fear, and natural affection. Besides the terror excited by an apprehension of God's justly-provoked judgments, we are warned against evil-doing by the exhibition of the inevitable temporal results of impiety, injustice, profligacy, idleness, laziness, indolence, drunkenness, and debauchery. To the rewards of true piety which follow in eternity, are promised the peace, security, love, and approbation of the good, and the comforts of a clear conscience, which render this life truly happy.

II. INSPIRATION AND AUTHORSHIP.—With no important exception, Jewish and Christian writers have received this book as the inspired production of Solomon. It is the first book of the Bible prefaced by the name of the author. The New Testament abounds with citations from the Proverbs. Its intrinsic excellence commends it to us as the production of a higher authority than the apocryphal writings, such as Wisdom or Ecclesiasticus. Solomon lived 500 years before the "seven wise men" of Greece, and 700 before the age of Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle. It is thus very evident, whatever theory of his sources of knowledge be adopted, that he did not draw upon any heathen repositories with which we are acquainted. It is far more probable, that by the various migrations, captivities, and dispersions of the Jews, heathen philosophers drew from this inspired fountain many of those streams which continue to refresh mankind amidst the otherwise barren and parched deserts of profane literature.

As, however, the Psalms are ascribed to David, because he was the leading author, so the ascription of this book to Solomon is entirely consistent with the titles of chs. 30. and 31., which assign those chapters to Agur and Lemuel respectively. Of these persons we know nothing. This is not the place for discussing the various speculations respecting them. By a slight change of reading some propose to translate ch. 30. 1: "The words of Agur, the son of her who was obeyed (i. e., the queen of) Massa;" and ch. 31. 1: "The words of Lemuel, king of Massa;" but to this the earliest versions are contradictory, and nothing other than the strongest exegetical necessity ought to be allowed to justify a departure from a well-established reading and version when nothing useful to our knowledge is gained. It is better to confess ignorance than indulge in useless conjectures.

It is probable that his of the "three thousand proverbs" (1 Kings 4. 32) which Solomon spoke, he selected and edited chs. 1.-24. during his life. Chs. 25.-29. were also of his production, and copied out in the days of Hezekiah, by his "men," perhaps, the prophets Isaiah, Hosea, and Micah. Such a work was evidently in the spirit of this pious monarch, who set his heart so fully on a reformation of God's worship. Learned men have endeavoured to establish the theory that Solomon himself was only a collector; or that the other parts of the book, as these chapters, were also selections by later hands; but the reasons adduced to maintain these views have never appeared so satisfactory as to change the usual opinions on the subject, which have the sanction of the most ancient and reliable authorities.

III. DIVISIONS OF THE BOOK.—Such a work is, of course, not susceptible of any logical analysis. There are, however, some well-defined marks of division, so that very generally the book is divided into five or six parts.

1. The first contains nine chapters, in which are discussed and enforced by illustration, admonition, and encouragement the principles and blessings of wisdom, and the pernicious schemes and practices of sinful persons. These chapters are introductory. With few specimens of the proper proverb, they are distinguished by its conciseness and terseness. The sentences follow very strictly the form of parallelism, and generally of the synonymous species, only forty of the synthetic and four (ch. 3. 32-35) of the antithetic appearing. The style is ornate, the figures bolder and fuller, and the illustrations more striking and extended.

2. The antithetic and synthetic parallelism to the exclusion of the synonymous distinguish chs. 10.-22. 16, and the verses are entirely unconnected, each containing a complete sense in itself.

3. Chs. 22. 16.-24. present a series of admonitions as if addressed to a pupil, and generally each topic occupies two or more verses.

4. Chs. 25.-29. are entitled to be regarded as a distinct portion, for the reason above given as to its origin. The style is very much mixed; of the peculiarities, cf. parts 2 and 3.

5. Ch. 30. is peculiar not only for its authorship, but as a specimen of the kind of proverb which has been described as "dark sayings" or "riddles."

6. To a few pregnant but concise admonitions, suitable for a king, is added a most inimitable portraiture of female character. In both parts 5 and 6 the distinctive peculiarity of the original proverbial style gives place to the modifications already mentioned as marking a later composition, though both retain the concise and nervous method of stating truth, equally valuable for its deep impression and permanent retention by the memory.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-33. After the title the writer defines the design and nature of the instructions of the book. He paternally invites attention to those instructions, and warns his readers against the enticements of the wicked. In a beautiful personification wisdom is then introduced in a most solemn and impressive manner, publicly inviting men to receive its teachings, warning those who reject, and encouraging those who accept, the proffered instructions.

1-4. (Cf. Introduction, I.) To know . . . instruction—lit., for knowing, i. e., such is the design of these writings. wisdom—or the use of the best means for the best ends, is generally employed in this book for true piety. instruction—discipline, by which men are trained. to perceive [lit., for perceiving, the design (as above)] . . . understanding—i. e., words which enable one to discern good and evil. To receive . . . of wisdom—For receiving that discipline which discretion imparts. The Hebrew for wisdom differs from that of v. 2, and denotes rather discreet counsel. Cf. the opposite traits of the fool (ch. 16. 22). justice . . . equity—all the attributes of one upright in all his relations to God and man. simple—one easily led to good or evil; so the parallel. young man—one inexperienced. subtily—or prudence (ch. 3. 21; 5. 21). discretion—lit., device, both qualities, either good or bad, according to their use. Here good, as they imply war-ness by which to escape evil and find good. 5, 6. Such writings the wise, who pursue right ends by right means, will value. learning—not the act, but matter of it. wise counsels—or the art and principles of governing. To understand—so as to . . . such will be the result. Interpretation—(Cf. Margin.) words of the wise—(Cf. v. 2.) dark sayings—(Cf. Psalm 49. 4; John 16. 25; and Introduction, I.) 7. The fear of the Lord—The principle of true piety (cf. ch. 2. 5; 14. 26, 27; Job 28. 28; Psalm 34. 11; 111. 10; Acts 9. 31). beginning—first part, foundation. fools—the stupid and indifferent to God's character and government; hence the wicked. 8. My son—This paternal form denotes a tender regard for the reader. Filial sentiments rank next to piety towards God, and ensure most distinguished rewards (cf. ch. 6. 20; Ephesians 6. 2, 3). On the figures of v. 9, cf. Genesis 41. 42; Song of Solomon 1. 10; 4. 9. 10-19. A solemn warning against temptation. 10. entice—lit., open the way. consent . . . not—sin is in consenting or yielding to temptation, not in being tempted. 11-14. Murder and robbery are given as specific illustrations. lay wait . . . lurk privily—express an effort and hope for successful concealment. swallow . . . grave—utterly destroy the victim and traces of the crime (Numbers 16. 33; Psalm 55. 15). Abundant rewards of villainy are promised as the fruits of this easy and safe course. 15, 16. The society of the wicked (way or path) is dangerous. Avoid the beginnings of sin (ch. 4. 14; Psalm 1. 1; 119. 131). 17-19. Men warned ought to escape danger as birds instinctively avoid visibly spread nets. But stupid sinners rush to their own ruin (Psalm 9, 16), and, greedy of gain, succeed in the very schemes which destroy them (1 Timothy 6, 10), not only failing to catch others, but procuring their own destruction. 20-33. Some interpreters regard this address as the language of the Son of God under the name of Wisdom (cf. Luke 11, 49). Others think that wisdom, as the Divine attribute specially employed in acts of counsel and admonition, is here personified, and represents God. In either case the address is a most solemn and Divine admonition, whose matter and spirit are eminently evangelical and impressive (cf. note on ch. 8). 20. Wisdom—lit., Wisdoms, the plural used either because of the unusual sense, or as indicative of the great excellency of wisdom (cf. ch. 9, 1). streets—or most public places, not secretly. 21. The publicity further indicated by terms designating places of most common resort. 22. simple ones—(Cf. v. 4.) simpli- cidity—implying ignorance. scorners—(Psalm 1, 1)—who despise, as well as reject, truth. fools—though a different word is used from that of v. 7, yet it is of the same meaning. 23. reproof—implying conviction deserving it (cf. John 16, 8, Margin). pour out—abundantly impart. my Spirit—whether of wisdom personified, or of Christ, a Divine agent. 24. stretched . . . hand—earnestness, especially in beseeching, is denoted by the figure (cf. Job 11, 13; Psalm 63, 31; 88, 9). 25. set at naught—rejected as of no value. would none of—lit., were not willing or inclined to it. 26, 27. In their extreme distress He will not only refuse help, but aggravate it by derision. fear—the object of it. desolation—lit., a tumultuous noise, denoting their utter confusion. destruction—or calamity (v. 26) compared to a whirlwind, as to fatal rapidity. distress—(Psalm 4, 1; 44, 11). anguish—a state of inextricable oppression, the deepest despair. 28. Now no prayers or most diligent seeking will avail (ch. 8, 17). 29, 30. The sinner's infatuated rejection brings his ruin. 31. fruit . . . way—result of conduct (Isaiah 3, 10; Ezekiel 11, 21; Romans 6, 21; Galatians 6, 7, 8). be filled—even to repletion (Psalm 123, 4). 32. turning away—i. e., from the call of v. 23. simple—as v. 22. prosperity—quiet, implying indifference. 33. dwell safely—lit., in confidence (Deuteronomy 12, 10). be quiet—or at ease, in real prosperity. from fear—without fear.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-22. Men are invited to seek wisdom, because it teaches those principles by which they may obtain God's guidance, and avoid the society and influence of the wicked, whose pernicious courses are described.

1-5. Diligence in hearing and praying for instruction must be used to secure the great principle of godliness, the fear of God. 1. hide . . . with thee—lay up in store (cf. ch. 7, 1). 2. Listen attentively and reflect seriously (ch. 1, 24; Psalm 130, 2). understanding—right perception of truth. 3. Yea, if—lit., When if, i. e., In such a case. knowledge—or, discrimination. understanding—as v. 2, 4. There must be earnest prayer and effort. 5. understand—or, perceive intelligently. find—obtain. 6. For—God is ready (James 1, 5; 4, 8). out of his mouth—by revelation from Him. 7. sound wisdom—lit., substance, opposed to what is fictitious. According to the context, this may be assistance, as here corresponding with bucket, or safety, or wisdom, which procures it (cf. ch. 3, 21; 8, 14; 18, 1; Job 6, 13; 12, 13). layeth up—provides, ever ready. 8. keepeth . . . way—God defends the right way, and those in it. saints—objects of favour (cf. Psalm 4, 3, &c.). He guides and guards them. 9. Then—emphatic, in such a case. righteousness . . . path—all parts of duty to God and man. 10, 11. Idea of v. 9, amplified; on terms cf. v. 4 and v. 2. 13-15. To deliver—as from great danger (ch. 6, 5). way . . . man—(Psalm 1, 1). froward things—perversity (ch. 6, 14; 23, 23), what is opposed to truth. paths of uprightness—or, plainness. walk—habitually act; 14, and that with pleasure, in ignorance of good and pursuit of evil. frowardness—not only their own perversity, but that of others is their delight. They love most the worst things. 15. crooked—tortuous, unprincipled. froward—lit., (they) are going back, not only aside from right, but opposite to it. 16-19. Deliverance from another danger. the strange woman—this term is often used for harlot, or loose woman (Judges 11, 1, 2), married (ch. 7, 5, 19) or not (1 Kings 11, 1), so called, because such were, perhaps at first, foreigners, though strange may also denote whatever is opposed to right or proper, as strange fire (Numbers 3, 4); strange incense (Exodus 30, 9). flattereth—lit., smooths. her words—(Psalm 5, 9). 17. guide . . . youth—lawful husband (Jeremiah 3, 4). covenant . . . God—of marriage made in God's name. 18. inclineth—sinks down (cf. Numbers 13, 31). the dead—or shades of the departed (Psalm 88, 10). 19. i. e., such as remain impenitent (cf. Ecclesiastes 7, 26). paths of life—(Psalm 16, 11), opposed to paths unto the dead. 20. That . . . way of good—i. e., Such is the object of these warnings. 21, 22. (Cf. Psalm 37, 3, 9, 22, 27.) transgressors—or impious rebels (cf. Jeremiah 9, 2). rooted out—utterly destroyed, as trees plucked up by the roots.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-35. The study of truth commended. God must be feared, honoured and trusted, and filial submission, under chastisement, exhibited. The excellence of wisdom urged and illustrated by its place in the Divine counsels. Piety enforced by a contrast of the destiny of the righteous and the wicked.

1. law and commandments—all Divine instructions (cf. Psalm 119). let thine heart keep—or sincerely observe (ch. 4, 13; 5, 2). 2. length . . . life—often promised as blessings (Psalm 21, 4; 91, 16). peace—includes prosperity (Psalm 125, 5). add—abundant to thee. 3. mercy and truth—God's faithfulness to His promises is oftener expressed by these terms (Psalm 25, 10; 57, 3). As attributes of men, they express integrity in a wide sense (ch. 16, 6; 20, 23). bind . . . write . . . heart—outwardly adorn and inwardly govern motives. 4. favour—grace, amiability (ch. 22, 11; Psalm 45, 2); united with this, a good understanding—(cf. Margin), a discrimination, which secures success. in the sight . . . man—such as God and man approve. 5. Trust . . . heart—This is the centre and marrow of true wisdom (ch. 22, 19; 28, 25). The positive duty has its corresponding negation in the admonition against self-confidence. 6. ways—(Psalm 1, 1). acknowledge—by seeking His wise aid (ch. 16, 3; Psalm 37, 5; Jeremiah 9, 23, 24). direct—lit., make plain (cf. Hebrews 12, 13). 7. (Cf. ch. 27, 2; Romans 12, 16.) fear . . . evil—reverentially regarding His law. 8. It—This conduct. health—(Cf. Margin), to thy navel—for all the organs of nourishment. marrow—(Cf. Margin), bones—frame of body. True piety promotes bodily health. 9, 10. (Cf. ch. 11, 25; Exodus 23, 19; Deuteronomy 18, 4; Isaiah 32, 8; 2 Corinthians 9, 13.) presses—or wine fats (Joel 2, 24; 3, 13). 11, 12. The true intent of afflictions considered; they do not contradict the assertion of the blessed state of the pious (Job 5, 17; Hebrews 12, 5, 6). he delighteth—or receiveth as denoting reconciliation regarding the offence which produced chastisement. 13. findeth—lit., reaches, or obtains by seeking. getteth—lit., draws out, as metals by digging. 14, 15. The figure of v. 13 carried out. it—i. e., wisdom. merchandise—acquisition by trading. fine gold—dug gold, sold as a nugget. rubies—gems, or pearls. 16, 17. Wisdom personified as bringing the best blessings (cf. Matthew 6, 33; 1 Timothy 4, 8). Her ways—Such as she directs us to take. 18. Wisdom allegorized as a tree of life—(Genesis 2, 9; 3, 22), whose fruit preserves life, gives all that makes living a blessing. 19, 20. The place of wisdom in the economy of creation and providence commends it to men, who, in proportion to their finite powers, may possess this invaluable attribute, and are thus encouraged by the Divine example of its use to seek its possession. 21. sound wisdom—(cf. ch. 2, 7). let . . . eyes—i. e., these words of instruction. 22-24, assign reasons in their value for happiness and ornament, guidance and support in dangers, both when waking and sleeping. 25. Be not—or, You shall not be. sudden fear —what causes it (ch. 1. 27), any unlooked-for evil (Psalm 46. 3; 91. 12; 1 Peter 3. 11). desolation—(ch. 1. 27). 26. The reason; such as are objects of God's favour. be thy confidence—lit., in thy confidence, in the source of thy strength (cf. Nahum 3. 9, for the same construction, Hebrew). 27, 28. Promptly fulfil all obligations both of justice and charity (cf. James 2. 15, 16). 29, 30. Do not abuse confidence, and avoid litigation. 31. oppressor—or man of mischief. The destiny of successful evil-doers warns against desiring their lot (Psalm 37. 1, 2, 35, 36). 32-35. Reasons for the warning, froward—(Ch. 2. 15.) secret . . . righteous—in their communion (Amos 3. 7). 33. curse . . . wicked—it abides with them, and will be manifested. 34. The retribution of sinners, as Psalm 18. 26. 35. inherit—as a portion. shame—or disgrace, as opposed to honour. promotion—(cf. Margin), as honour for well-doing makes men conspicuous, so fools are signalized by disgrace.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-27. To an earnest call for attention to his teachings, the writer adds a commendation of wisdom, preceded and enforced by the counsels of his father and teacher. To this he adds a caution (against the devices of the wicked), and a series of exhortations to docility, integrity, and uprightness.

1, 2. (Cf. ch. 1. 8.) to know—in order to know. doctrine—the matter of learning (ch. 1. 5), such as he had received (Lamentations 3. 1). 3. father's son—emphatic, a son specially regarded, and so called tender, as an object of special care (cf. 1 Chronicles 22. 7; 29. 1); an idea further expressed by only beloved—(or, as an only son), (Genesis 22. 2), though he had brothers (1 Chronicles 3. 5). 4. He taught—or directed me. retain—as well as receive. keep . . . and live—observe, that you may live (ch. 7. 2). 5. Get—As a possession not to be given up. neither decline—i. e., from obeying my word. 6. Not only accept but love wisdom, who will keep thee from evil, and evil from thee. 7. (Cf. Job 23. 23.) getting—or possession, a desire for wisdom is wise. 8. As you highly esteem her, she will raise you to honour. embrace her—with fond affection. 9. ornament—such as the chaplet or wreath of conquerors. deliver—(Cf. Genesis 14. 20.) The allusion to a shield, contained in the Hebrew, suggests protection as well as honour (cf. v. 6). 10—(Cf. ch. 2. 1; 3. 2.) 11, 12. way of wisdom—which it prescribes. led thee—lit., caused thee to tread, as a path (Psalm 107. 7). not be straitened—have ample room (Psalm 18. 36). 13—(Cf. ch. 3. 13.) The figure of laying hold with the hand suggests earnest effort. 14. (Cf. Psalm 1. 1.) Avoid all temptations to the beginning of evil. 16, 17. The reason is found in the character of sinners, whose zeal to do evil is forcibly depicted (ch. 6. 4; Psalm 36. 5). They live by flagrant vices (ch. 1. 13). Some prefer to render, "Their bread is wickedness, their drink violence" (cf. Job 15. 16; 34. 7). 18, 19. As shining light increases from twilight to noonday splendour, so the course of the just increases in purity, but that of the wicked is as thickest darkness, in which one knows not on what he stumbles. 20-22. (Cf. v. 10, 13; ch. 3. 8, &c.) 22. health . . . flesh—by preserving from vices destructive of health. 23. with all diligence—or, above, or more than all, custody (cf. Margin), all that is kept (cf. Ezekiel 33. 7), because the heart is the depository of all wisdom and the source of whatever affects life and character (Matthew 12. 35; 15. 19). 24. a froward mouth—i. e., a mouth, or words of ill nature. The Hebrew word differs from that used (ch. 2. 15; 3. 32). perverse—or, quarrelling. lips—or, words. 25. Let . . . before thee—i. e., pursue a sincere and direct purpose, avoiding temptations. 26. Ponder—Well consider; a wise course results from wise forethought. 27. (Cf. v. 25.) Avoid all by-paths of evil (Deuteronomy 2. 27; 17. 11). A life of integrity requires attention to heart, speech, eyes, and conduct.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-23. A warning against the seductive arts of wicked women, enforced by considering the advantages of chastity, and the miserable end of the wicked.

1. This connection of wisdom and understanding is frequent (ch. 2. 2; 3. 7); the first denotes the use of wise means for wise ends; the other, the exercise of a proper discrimination in their discovery. 2. regard—or, observe. keep—preserve constantly. 3. (Cf. ch. 2. 16.) Her enticing promises are deceitful. 4. her end—lit., her future, in sense of reward, what follows (cf. Psalm 37. 37; 73. 17). Its nature is evinced by the use of figures, opposite those of v. 3. The physical and moral suffering of the deluded profligate are notoriously terrible. 5. feet . . . steps—i. e., course of life ends in death. 6. her ways . . . know—Some prefer, "that she may not ponder the path of life," &c.; but perhaps a better sense is, "her ways are varied, so as to prevent your knowledge of her true character, and so of true happiness." 8, 9. Avoid the slightest temptation. thine honour—in whatever consisting, strength (ch. 3. 13) or wealth. thy years—by cutting them off in dissipation. to the cruel—for such the sensual are apt to become. 10. wealth—lit., strength, or the result of it. labours—the fruit of thy painful exertions (Psalm 127. 2). There may be a reference to slavery, a commuted punishment for death due the adulterer (Deuteronomy 22. 22). 11. at the last—the end, or reward (cf. v. 4). mourn—roar in pain. flesh and . . . body—the whole person under incurable disease. 12-14. The ruined sinner vainly laments his neglect of warning and his sad fate in being brought to public disgrace. evil—for affliction, as Genesis 19. 20; 49. 15. 15-20. By figures, in which well, cistern, and fountain, represent the wife, and rivers of waters the children, men are exhorted to constancy and satisfaction in lawful conjugal enjoyments. In v. 16, fountains (in the plural) rather denote the produce or waters of a spring, lit., what is from a spring, and corresponds with rivers of waters. only thine own—harlots' children have no known father. wife . . . youth—married in youth. loving . . . roe—other figures for a wife from the well-known beauty of these animals. breasts—(Cf. Song of Solomon 1. 13; Ezekiel 23. 3, 8.) ravished—lit., intoxicated, i. e., fully satisfied. 21. The reason, God's eye is on you, 22, 23, and He will cause sin to bring its punishment. without instruction—lit., in want of instruction, having refused it (cf. Job 13. 13; Hebrews 11. 24.) go astray—lit., be drunken. The word ravished (v. 19) here denotes fulness of punishment.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-35. After admonitions against suretyship and sloth (cf. v. 6-8), the character and fate of the wicked generally are set forth, and the writer (v. 20-35) resumes the warnings against incontinence, pointing out its certain and terrible results. This train of thought seems to intimate the kindred of these vices.

1, 2. If—the condition extends through both verses. be surety—art pledged. stricken . . . hand—bargained (cf. Job 17. 3). with a stranger—i. e., for a friend (cf. ch. 11. 15; 17. 18). 3. come . . . friend—in his power. humble . . . sure thy friend—urge as a suppliant, i. e., induce the friend to provide otherwise for his debt, or secure the surety. 4, 5. The danger requires promptness. 6-8. The improvident sluggards usually want sureties. Hence, such are advised to industry by the ant's example. 9, 10. Their conduct graphically described; 11, and the fruits of their self-indulgence and indolence presented. as . . . travel—lit., one who walks backwards and forwards, i. e., a highwayman. armed man—i. e., one prepared to destroy. 12. A naughty person—lit., A man of Belial, or of worthlessness, i. e., for good, and so depraved, or wicked (cf. 1 Samuel 25. 25; 30. 22, &c.). Idleness and vice are allied. Though indolent in acts, he actively and habitually (walketh) is ill-natured in speech (ch. 4. 24). 13, 14. If, for fear of detection, he does not speak, he uses signs to carry on his intrigues. These signs are still so used in the East. deviseth—lit., constructs, as an artisan. mischief—evil to others. Frowardness—As ch. 2. 14. discord—especially litigation. Cunning is the talent of the weak and lazy. 15. Suddenness aggravates evil (cf. v. 11; ch. 23. 1). calamity—lit., a crushing weight. broken—shivered as a potter's vessel; utterly destroyed (Psalm 2. 9). 16-19. six . . .

"MY SON, KEEP MY WORDS."—PROV. VII. 1.

seven—a mode of speaking to arrest attention (ch. 30. 15, 18; Job 5. 19). proud look—lit., eyes of loftiness (Psalm 131. 1). Eyes, tongue, &c., for persons. spcaketh—lit., breathes out, habitually speaks (Psalm 27. 12; Acts 9. 1). 20-23. Cf. ch. 1. 8; 3. 3, &c.). 1†—(cf. v. 23) denotes the instruction of parents (v. 20), to which all the qualities of a safe guide and guard and ready teacher are ascribed. It prevents the ingress of evil by supplying good thoughts, even in dreams (ch. 3. 21-23; Psalm 19. 9; 2 Peter 1. 19). reproofs—(ch. 1. 23) the convictions of error produced by instruction. 24. A specimen of its benefit. By appreciating truth, men are not affected by lying flattery. 25. One of the cautions of this instruction, avoid alluring beauty. take [or, ensnare] . . . eyelids—by painting the lashes, females enhanced beauty. 26. The supplied words give a better sense than the old version: "The price of a whore is a piece of bread." adulteress—(cf. Margin), which the parallel and context (29-35) sustains. Of similar results of this sin, cf. ch. 5. 9-12. will hunt—alluding to the snares spread by harlots (cf. ch. 7. 6-8). precious life—more valuable than all else. 27-29. The guilt and danger most obvious. 30, 31. Such a thief is pitied, though heavily punished. sevenfold—(cf. Exodus 22. 1-4), for many, ample (cf. Genesis 4. 24; Matthew 18. 21), even if all his wealth is taken. 32. lacketh understanding—or, heart; destitute of moral principle and prudence. 33. dishonour—or, shame, as well as hurt of body (ch. 3. 35). reproach . . . away—no restitution will suffice; 34, 35, nor any terms of reconciliation be admitted. regard [or, accept] any ransom.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-27. The subject continued, by a delineation of the arts of strange women, as a caution to the unwary.

1-4. Similar calls (ch. 3. 1-3; 4. 10, &c.). apple . . . eye—pupil of eye, a custody (ch. 4. 23) of special value. Bind . . . fingers—as inscriptions on rings. 5. The design of the teaching (cf. ch. 2. 16; 6. 24). 6. For—or, since, introducing an example to illustrate the warning, which, whether a narrative or a parable, is equally pertinent. window [or, opening of the] casement—or lattice. looked—lit., watched earnestly (Judges 5. 28). 7. simple—as ch. 1. 4. void of, &c.—(Cf. ch. 6. 32.) 8. her corner—where she was usually found. went . . . house—implying, perhaps, confidence in himself by his manner, as denoted in the word "went"—lit., tread pompously. 9. The time, twilight, ending in darkness. black . . . night—lit., pupil, or, eye, i. e., middle of night. 10. attire—that of harlots was sometimes peculiar. subtile—or, wary, cunning. 11, 12. loud—or, noisy, bustling. stubborn—not submissive. without . . . streets, . . . corner—(Cf. 1 Timothy 5. 13; Titus 2. 5.) 13-15. The preparations for a feast do not necessarily imply peculiar religious professions. The offerer retained part of the victim for a feast (Leviticus 3. 9, &c.). This feast she professes was prepared for him whom she boldly addresses as one sought specially to partake of it. 16, 17. my bed—or, couch, adorned in the costliest manner. bed—in v. 17, a place for sleeping. 18-20. There is no fear of discovery. the day appointed—perhaps, lit., a full moon, i. e., a fortnight's time (cf. v. 19). 21. caused . . . yield—or, inclines. flattering—(Cf. ch. 5. 3.) forced him—by persuasion overcoming his scruples. 22. straight-way—quickly, either as ignorant of danger, or incapable of resistance. 23. Till—He is now caught (ch. 6. 26). 24. The inferential admonition is followed, 26, 27, by a more general allegation of the evils of this vice. Even the mightiest fail to resist her deathly allurements.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-36. Contrasted with sensual allurements are the advantages of Divine wisdom, which publicly invites men, offers the best principles of life, and the most valuable benefits resulting from receiving her counsels. Her relations to the Divine plans and acts is introduced, as in ch. 3. 19, 20, though more fully, to commend her desirableness for men, and the whole is closed by an assurance that those finding her find God's favour, and those neglecting ruin themselves. Many regard the passage as a description of the Son of God by the title, Wisdom, which the older Jews used (and by which He is called, Luke 11. 49), as John 1. 1, &c., describes Him by that of Logos, the Word. But the passage may be taken as a personification of wisdom: for, 1. Though described as with God, wisdom is not asserted to be God. 2. The use of personal attributes is equally consistent with a personification, as with the description of a real person. 3. The personal pronouns used accord with the gender (fem.) of wisdom constantly, and are never changed to that of the person meant, as sometimes occurs in a corresponding use of spirit, which is neuter in Greek, but to which masculine pronouns are often applied (John 16. 14), when the acts of the Holy Spirit are described. 4. Such a personification is agreeable to the style of this book (cf. chs. 1. 20; 3. 16, 17; 4. 8; 6. 20-22; 9. 1-4), whereas no prophetic or other allusions to the Saviour or the new dispensation are found among the quotations of this book in the New Testament, and unless this be such, none exist. 5. Nothing is lost as to the importance of this passage, which still remains a most ornate and also solemn and impressive teaching of inspiration on the value of wisdom.

1-4. The publicty and universality of the call contrast with the secrecy and intrigues of the wicked (ch. 7. 8, &c.). 5. wisdom—lit., subtily in a good sense, or, prudence. fools—as ch. 1. 22. 6. excellent things—or, plain, manifest. opening . . . things—upright words. 7. For . . . truth—lit., My palate shall meditate, or (as Orientals did) mutter, my thoughts expressed only to myself are truth. wickedness—specially falsehood, as opposed to truth. 8. in righteousness—or, righteous (Psalm 9. 8; 11. 7). froward—lit., twisted, or contradictory, i. e., to truth. 9. plain . . . understandeth—easily seen by those who apply their minds. that find—implying search. 10. not silver—preferable to it, so last clause implies comparison. 11. (Cf. ch. 3. 14, 15.) 12. prudence—as v. 5. The connection of wisdom and prudence is that of the dictates of sound wisdom and its application. find . . . inventions—or, devices, discreet ways (ch. 1. 4). 13. For such is the effect of the fear of God, by which hatred to evil preserves from it. froward mouth—or, speech (ch. 2. 12; 6. 14). 14. It also gives the elements of good character in counsel. sound wisdom—(Ch. 2. 7.) I . . . strength—or, "As for me, understanding is strength to me," the source of power (Ecclesiastes 9. 16); good judgment gives more efficiency to actions; 15, 16, of which a wisely-conducted government is an example. 17. early—or, diligently, which may include the usual sense of early in life. 18. durable . . . righteousness—such are the riches, enduring sources of happiness in moral possessions (cf. ch. 3. 16). 19. (Cf. v. 11; 3. 16). 20, 21. The courses in which wisdom leads conduct to a true present prosperity (ch. 23. 5). 22-31. Strictly, God's attributes are part of Himself. Yet, to the poetical structure of the whole passage, this commendation of wisdom is entirely consonant. In order of time all His attributes are coincident and eternal as Himself. But to set forth the importance of wisdom as devising the products of benevolence and power, it is here assigned a precedence. As it has such in Divine, so should it be desired in human affairs (cf. ch. 3. 19). 22. possessed—or, created, in either sense, the idea of precedence. in the beginning—or simply, beginning, in apposition with me. before . . . of old—preceding the most ancient deeds. 23. I was set up—ordained, or inaugurated (Psalm 2. 6). The other terms carry out the idea of the earliest antiquity, and 24-29 illustrate it by the details of creation. brought forth—(Cf. Psalm 90. 2.) abounding—or, laden with water. settled—i. e., sunk in foundations. fields—or, out-places, deserts, as opposite to (habitable) worls. highest part—or, sum, all particles together. when he set . . . depth—marked out the circle, according to the popular idea of the earth, as circular, surrounded by depths on which the visible concave heavens rested. established . . . deep—i. e., so as to sustain the waters above and repress those below the firmament (Genesis 1. 7-11; Job 26. 8). commandment—better, the shore, i. e., of the sea. foundations—figuratively denotes the solid structure (Job 38. 4; Psalm 24. 2). 30, 31. one brought up—an object of special and pleasing regard. The bestowal of wisdom on men is represented by its finding a delightful residence and pleasing God. 32-36. Such an attribute men are urged to seek. watching . . . waiting—lit., so as to watch; wait, denoting a most sedulous attention. sinueth . . . me—or better, missing me, as opposed to finding. 35. (Cf. Luke 13. 23, 24.) love death—act as if they did (cf. ch. 17. 9).

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-18. The commendation of wisdom continued, under the figure of a liberal host, and its provisions under that of a feast (cf. Luke 14. 16-24). The character of those who are invited is followed by a contrasted description of the rejectors of good counsel; and with the invitations of wisdom are contrasted the allurements of the wicked woman.

1. house—(cf. ch. 8. 34). her—or, its (the house). seven pillars—the number seven for many, or a sufficiency (ch. 6. 31). 2. mingled—to enhance the flavour (ch. 23. 30; Isaiah 5. 22). furnished—lit., set out, arranged. 3. maidens—servants to invite (cf. Psalm 68. 11; Isaiah 40. 9). highest places—ridges of heights, conspicuous places. 4-6. (Cf. ch. 1. 4; 6. 32.) Wisdom not only supplies right but forbids wrong principles. 7, 8. shame—(Cf. ch. 3. 35.) a blot—or, stain on character. Both terms denote the evil done by others to one whose faithfulness secures a wise man's love. 9. The more a wise man learns, the more he loves wisdom. 10. (Cf. ch. 1. 7.) of the Holy—lit., holies, persons or things, or both. This knowledge gives right perception. 11. (Cf. ch. 3. 16-18; 4. 10.) 12. You are mainly concerned in your own conduct. 13. foolish woman—or lit., woman of folly, specially manifested by such as are described. clamorous—or, noisy (ch. 7. 11). knoweth nothing—lit., knoweth not what, i. e., is right and proper. 14. on a seat—lit., throne, takes a prominent place, impudently and haughtily. 15, 16. to allure those who are right-minded, and who are addressed as in v. 4, as simple—i. e., easily led (ch. 1. 4) and unsettled, though willing to do right. 17. The language of a proverb, meaning that forbidden delights are sweet and pleasant, as fruits of risk and danger. 18. (Cf. ch. 2. 18, 19; 7. 27.)

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-32. Here begins the second part of the book, chs. 10-22, 16, which, with the third, ch. 22. 16-ch. 25., contains series of proverbs whose sense is complete in one or two verses, and which, having no logical connection, admit of no analysis. The parallelism of chs. 10-15. are mostly antithetic; and those of chs. 16-22. 16, synthetic. The evidences of art in the structure are very clear, and indicate, probably, a purpose of facilitating the labour of memorizing.

1. wise [and] foolish—as they follow or reject the precepts of wisdom. maketh . . . father—or, gladdens a father. heaviness—or, grief. 2. Treasures . . . nothing—i. e., ill-gotten gains give no true happiness (cf. ch. 4. 17; Matthew 6. 19). righteousness—especially benevolence (Psalm 112. 9). death—the greatest of all evils. 3. (Cf. Psalm 37. 16-20.) The last clause is better: "He will repel the greedy desires of the wicked." 4. maketh rich—(cf. v. 22.) slack—lit., deceitful, falling of its purpose (cf. Hosea 7. 16). 5. son—as ch. 1. 8, 10, and often. sleepeth—in indolence, and not for rest. causeth shame—lit., is base (cf. ch. 14. 35; 17. 2). 6. Blessings—lit., Praises. The last clause is better: "The mouth of the wicked covereth, or concealeth, violence, or mischievous devices," to be executed in due time (Psalm 5. 9; 10. 7; Romans 3. 14), and hence has no praises (cf. v. 11). 7. blessed—lit., for a blessing, or praise. shall rot—lit., be worm-eaten, useless and disgusting. 8. wise, &c.—(cf. ch. 9. 8, 9, 16), opposed to prating fool—dr, fool of lips of wicked language. fall—headlong, suddenly. 9. perverteth his way—acts deceitfully. known—discovered and punished. 10. Two vices contrasted; hypocrisy, or insinuating evil against one (ch. 6.

13; Psalm 35. 19), and rashness of speech. In each case, the results are on the evil-doers. 11. a well—or, source of good to himself and others (John 7. 37, 38). On last clause cf. v. 6. 12. strifes—or, litigations. covereth—by forgiveness and forbearance. 13. In the lips . . . found—hence, not beaten, as the wicked-speaking fool. void of understanding—(ch. 6. 32; 7. 7.) 14. lay up knowledge—i. e., as treasures for good use. mouth . . . destruction—or, as to the mouth, &c., destruction is near; they expose themselves to evil by prating. 15. Both by trusting in "uncertain riches" (1 Timothy 6. 17), or by the evils of poverty (ch. 30. 9), men, not fearing God, fall into dangers. 16. The industry of the righteous is alone truly successful, while the earnings of the wicked tempt and lead to sin. 17. keepeth—observes (ch. 3. 18; 4. 22). refuseth—or, turns from reproof, which might direct him aright. 18. Both vices must one day be known and punished, and hence their folly. 19. Much speech involves risk of sin; hence the wisdom of restraining the tongue (Psalm 39. 1; James 1. 26). 20. Right speech is the fruit of a good heart, but the wicked show theirs to be useless. 21. The fool not only fails to benefit others, as do the righteous, but procure their own ruin (cf. v. 11, 17; Hosea 4. 6). 22. it maketh, &c.—it is emphatic. Riches from God are without the sorrow of ill-gotten wealth (cf. Ecclesiastes 2. 21-23; 1 Timothy 6. 9, 10, 17). 23. Sin is the pleasure of the wicked; wisdom that of the good. 24. it—the very thing. The wicked get dreaded evil; the righteous, desired good. 25. (Cf. Psalm 1. 4; 37. 9, 10, 36.) righteous . . . foundation—well laid and firm (Matthew 7. 24, 25). 26. i. e., causes vexation. 27. (Cf. ch. 9. 11; Psalm 55. 23.) 28. gladness—in confidence of realizing it. expectation . . . perish—in disappointment. 29. The way, &c.—i. e., God's providence sustains the righteous, and overthrows the wicked (Hosea 14. 9). 30. (Cf. ch. 12. 3; Psalm 37. 9-11; 102. 23.) earth—or, land of promise. 31. bringeth forth—lit., germinates as a plant. froward—(Cf. ch. 2. 12, 14). cut off—as an unproductive plant. 32. known—regard and provide for (Psalm 1. 6). frowardness—all kinds of deceit and ill-nature. The word is plural.

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-31. 1. (Cf. Margin.) The Hebrews used stones for weights. just—complete in measure. 2. Self-conceit is unteachable; the humble grow wise (cf. ch. 16. 18; 18. 12). 3. guide—to lead, as a shepherd (ch. 6. 37; Psalm 78. 52). perverseness—ill-nature. destroy—with violence. 4. (Cf. ch. 10. 2.) wrath—i. e., of God. 5. direct—or, make plain; wicked ways are not plain (ch. 13. 17). 6. deliver them—i. e., from evil, which the wicked suffer by their own doings (ch. 5. 22; Psalm 9. 16). 7. expectation . . . perish—for death cuts short all his plans (Luke 16. 25). hope of unjust—better, "hope of wealth," or power (cf. Isaiah 40. 29, Hebrew). This gives an advance on the sentiment of the first clause. Even hopes of gain die with him. 8. Perhaps the trouble prepared by the wicked, and which he inherits (cf. v. 6). 9. (Cf. Psalm 35. 16; Daniel 11. 32.) The just is saved by superior discernment. 10, 11. The last may be a reason for the first. Together, they set forth the relative moral worth of good and bad men. By the blessing—implying active benevolence. despiseth—or, reviles, a course contrasted with the prudent silence of the wise. holdeth his peace—as if neither hearing nor telling. 13. tale-bearer—(cf. Margin), one trading as a peddler in scandal, whose propensity to talk leads him to betray confidence. 14. counsel—the art of governing (ch. 1. 5). counsellors—lit., one giving counsel; the participle used as a collective. 15. (Cf. ch. 6. 1.) suretiship—(Cf. Margin), the actors put for the action, which may be lawfully hated. 16. retain—or lit., lay hold of as a support. Honour is to a feeble woman thus as valuable as riches to men. 17. merciful—kind to others; opposed to cruel. Such benefit themselves by doing good to others (cf. ch. 24. 5), while the cruel injure themselves as well as others. flesh—i. e., his body, by penuriousness (Colossians 2. 23). 18. a deceitful work—or, wages, which fail to satisfy, or flee away (ch. 10. 2; 23. 5). sure reward—or, gain, as from trading (Hosea 10. 12; Galatians 6. 8, 9). 19. Inference from v. 18 (cf. v. 5, 6; ch. 10. 16). 20. (Cf. v. 5.) froward—as ch. 2. 15, opposed to the simplicity and purity of the up-right. in their way—or, conduct. 21. The combined power of the wicked cannot free them from just punishment, while the unaided children of the righteous find deliverance by reason of their pious relationship (Psalm 37. 25, 26). 22. Jewels were often suspended from the nose (Genesis 24. 47; Isaiah 3. 21). Thus adorned, a hog disgusts less than a fair and indiscreet woman. 23. (Cf. ch. 10. 28.) The wrath is that of God. 24–31. The scope of the whole is a comment on v. 23. Thus liberality (v. 24), by God's blessing, secures increase, while penuriousness, instead of expected gain, procures poverty. 25. liberal soul—(Cf. Margin.) made fat—prosperes (ch. 28. 25; Deuteronomy 32. 15; Luke 6. 33). watereth . . . watered—a common figure for blessing. 26. Another example of the truth of v. 23; the miser loses reputation, though he saves corn. scalth it—i. e., at a fair price. 27. good [and] mischief—i. e., of others. procureth . . . seeketh—implying success. 28. (Cf. ch. 10. 15; Psalm 49. 6; 1 Timothy 6. 17.) righteous . . . branch—(Psalm 1. 3; Jeremiah 17. 8.) 29. troubleth—as ch. 15. 27 explains, by greediness for gain (cf. v. 17). inherit . . . wind—even successful, his gains are of no real value. So the fool, thus acting, either comes to poverty, or heaps up for others. 30. a tree of life—blessings to others proceed from the works of the righteous (ch. 3. 18). winneth souls—(Cf. Margin.) to do them good as opposed to ch. 6. 25; Ezekiel 13. 18 (cf. Luke 5. 10). 31. Behold—Thus calling attention to the illustrations (cf. v. 23), the sentiment of which is confirmed even in time, not excluding future rewards and punishments.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1–28. 1. loveth knowledge—as the fruit of instruction or training (ch. 1. 2). hateth reproof—(Ch. 10. 17.) brutish—stupid, regardless of his own welfare (Psalm 49. 10; 73. 22). 3. Wickedness cannot give permanent prosperity. root . . . not be moved—firm as a flourishing tree—(Psalm 1. 3; 15. 5; Jeremiah 17. 8). 4. a virtuous woman—in the wide sense of well disposed to all moral duties (ch. 31. 10). maketh ashamed—i. e., by misconduct. rottenness—an incurable evil. 5. thoughts—or, purposes. are right—lit., are judgment, i. e., true decisions. counsels—(Cf. ch. 11. 14.) deceit—contrary to truth and honesty. 6. Psalm 73, 6). 12. (Cf. ch. 15, 33; 16, 18.) 13. Hasty speech evinces self-conceit, and ensures shame (ch. 26, 12). 14. infirmity—bodily sickness, or outward evil. The spirit, which sustains, being wounded, no support is left, except, as implied, in God. 15. (Cf. ch. 1, 5, 15, 31.) 16. (Cf. ch. 17, 8, 23.) Disapproval of the fact stated is implied. 17. One-sided statements are not reliable. searcheth—thoroughly (ch. 17, 9, 19). 18. The lot—whose disposal is of God (ch. 16, 13), may, properly used, be a right mode of settling disputes. 19. No feuds so difficult of adjustment as those of relatives; hence great care should be used to avoid them. 20. (Cf. ch. 12, 14; 13, 2.) Men's words are the fruit, or, increase of lips, and when good, benefit them. satisfied with—(Cf. ch. 1, 31; 14, 14.) 21. Death and life—or, The greatest evil and good. that love it—i. e., the tongue, or its use for good or evil. eat . . . fruit—(Cf. v. 19; James 1, 19.) 22. The old versions supply "good" before the "wife," as the last clause, and ch. 19, 14 imply (cf. ch. 31, 10). 23. the rich . . . roughly—he is tolerated because rich, implying that the estimate of men by wealth is wrong. 24. A man . . . friendly—better, "A man . . . (is) to, or may triumph (Psalm 108, 9), or, shout for joy (Psalm 5, 11), i. e., may congratulate himself." Indeed, there is a Friend who is better than a brother; such is the "Friend of sinners," who may have been before the writer's mind.

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 1-29. 1. (Cf. ch. 28, 6.) "Rich" for "fool" here. Integrity is better than riches (ch. 15, 16, 17; 16, 8). 2. The last illustrates the first clause. Rashness, the result of ignorance, brings trouble. 3. perverteth . . . way—turns him back from right (ch. 13, 6; James 1, 13); and he blames God for his failures. 4. (Cf. ch. 14, 20.) Such facts are often adduced with implied disapprobation. 5. Cf. v. 9, where "perish" explains "not escape" here (cf. Psalm 88, 9, 10). 8. (Cf. Margin.; ch. 15, 32.) loveth . . . soul—or, himself, which he evinces by regarding his best interests. keepeth—or, regards. 10. (Cf. ch. 17, 7.) The fool is incapable of properly using pleasure as knowledge, yet for him to have it is less incongruous than the undue elevation of servants. Let each abide in his calling (1 Corinthians 7. 20). 11. (Cf. ch. 14. 29; 16. 32.) This inculcation of a forgiving spirit shows that true religion is always the same (Matthew 5. 22-24). 12. (Cf. ch. 16. 14, 15; 20. 2.) A motive to submission to lawful authority. 13. calamity—lit., calamities, varied and many. continual dropping—a perpetual annoyance, wearing out patience. 14. A contrast of men's gifts and God's, who, though author of both blessings, confers the latter by His more special providence. and—or, but, implying that the evils of v. 13 are only avoided by His care. 15. a deep sleep—a state of utter indifference. idle soul—or, person (cf. ch. 10. 4; 12. 24). 16. (Cf. ch. 10. 17; 13. 13.) despiset . . . way—opposed to keeping or observing, neglects (ch. 16. 17) (as unworthy of regard) his moral conduct. 17. (Cf. ch. 14. 21; Psalm 37. 26.) hath pity—shown by acts (cf. Margin). 18. (Cf. ch. 13. 24; 23. 13.) let not . . . spare—lit., do not lift up thy soul (Psalm 24. 4; 25. 1), i. e., do not desire to his death; a caution to passionate parents against angry chastisement. 19. Repeated efforts of kindness are lost on ill-natured persons. 20. (Cf. ch. 13. 18-20.) latter end—(Ch. 5. 11.) In youth prepare for age. 21. (Cf. ch. 16. 1, 9; Psalm 33. 10, 11.) The failure of man's devices is implied. 22. desire—i. e., to do good, indicates a kind disposition (ch. 11. 23); and the poor thus affected are better than liars, who say and do not. 23. The fear . . . life—(Cf. ch. 3. 2.) abide—or, remain contented (1 Timothy 4. 8). not visited . . . evil—(ch. 10. 3; Psalm 37. 25), as a judgment, in which sense visit is often used (Psalm 89. 32; Jeremiah 6. 15). 24. bosom—lit., a wide dish in which the hand was plunged in eating (Matthew 26. 23). Cf. ch. 26. 15, the sentiment expressed with equal irony and less exaggeration. 25. Such is the benefit of reproof, even the simple profit, much more the wise. 26. Unfilial conduct often condemned (ch. 17. 21-25; 20. 20; Deuteronomy 21. 18, 21). 27. Avoid whatever leads from truth. 28. ungodly witness—(cf. Margin), one false by bad principles (cf. ch. 6. 12). scorneth judgment—sets at naught the dictates of justice. devoureth—lit., swalloweth, as something delightful. 29. Their punishment is sure, fixed and ready (cf. ch. 3. 31; 10. 13).

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1-30. 1. mocker—or, scorner. Such men are made by wine. raging—or, boisterous as a drunkard, strong drink—made by spicing wine (cf. Isaiah 5. 11, 22); and it may include wine. deceived—lit., erring, or reeling. 2. (Cf. ch. 19. 12.) Men who resist authority injure themselves (Romans 13. 2). 3. to cease . . . strife—or, better, "to dwell from or without strife," denoting the habit of life. fool . . . meddling—(Ch. 17. 14.) 4. shall . . . beg—lit., ask (in this sense, Psalm 109. 10). 5. Counsel . . . water—i. e., deeply hidden (ch. 18. 4; Psalm 13. 2). The wise can discern well. 6. Boasters are unreliable. goodness—or, kind disposition. 7. The conduct of good men proclaims their sound principles. God's covenant and their good example secure blessing to their children (ch. 4. 26; Psalm 112. 1, 2). 8. As ch. 14. 35; 16. 10, 15, this is the character of a good king, not of all kings. 9. The interrogation in the affirmative strengthens the implied negation (cf. Job 15. 14; Ecclesiastes 7. 20). 10. Various measures, implying that some are wrong (cf. ch. 11. 1; 16. 11). 11. The conduct of children even is the best test of principle (cf. Matthew 7. 16). 12. Hence, of course, God will know all you do (Psalm 94. 9). 13. Activity and diligence contrasted with sloth (ch. 6. 9; 10. 11). lest . . . poverty—lit., be deprived of inheritance. 14. when . . . his way—implying that he goes about boasting of his bargains. 15. The contrast denotes the greater value of knowledge (cf. ch. 3. 14-16). 16. To take the garment implies severe exaction, justified by the surety's rashness. a strange woman—by some readings, strangers, but the former here, and ch. 27. 13, is allowable, and strengthens the sense. The debauchee is less reliable than the merely careless. 17. Bread . . . sweet—either as unlawfully (ch. 9. 17) or easily obtained. mouth . . . gravel—well expresses the pain and grief given at last. 18. (Cf. ch. 15. 22.) Psalm 27. 14; Romans 12. 17-19.) 23. (Cf. v. 10; ch. 11. 1.) 24. Man's goings—lit., Stately steppings of a strong man, a man—any common man, understand [or, perceive] his . . . way. 25. devoureth . . . holy—or, better, who rashly speaks promises, or devotes what is holy, consecrating any thing. This suits better the last clause, which expresses a similar view of the results of rashly vowing. 26. (Cf. v. 8.) bringeth . . . over them—the wheel was used for threshing grain. The figure denotes severity (cf. Amos 1. 3). 27. The spirit . . . Lord—men's minds are God's gifts, and thus able to search one another (cf. v. 5; ch. 18. 8, 17; 1 Corinthians 2. 11). 28. (Cf. ch. 3. 3; 16. 6, 12.) 29. Each age has its peculiar excellence (ch. 16. 31). 30. bluness—lit., joining, the process of uniting the edges of a wound throws off purulent matter. stripes . . . belly—so punishment provides healing of soul (ch. 18. 8), by deterring from evil courses.

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 1-31. 1. rivers—irrigating channels (Psalm 1. 3), whose course was easily turned (cf. Deuteronomy 11. 10). God disposes even kings as He pleases (ch. 16. 9; Psalm 33. 15). 2. (Cf. ch. 14. 2; 16. 2-25.) 3. (Cf. Psalm 50. 7-15; Isaiah 1. 11, 17.) 4. high look—(Cf. Margin; Psalm 131. 1.) proud heart—or, heart of breadth, one that is swollen (cf. Psalm 101. 5). ploughing—better lamp, a frequent figure for prosperity (ch. 20. 20), hence joy or delight. 5. The contrast is between steady industry and rashness (cf. ch. 19. 2). 6. The getting—or, what is obtained (cf. Job 7. 2; Jeremiah 22. 13, Hebrew). vanity . . . to and fro—as fleeting as chaff or stubble in the wind (cf. ch. 20. 17-21; Psalm 62. 10). Such gettings are unsatisfactory. them . . . death—act as if they did (ch. 8. 36; 17. 19). 7. robbery—or, destruction, especially oppression, of which they are authors. shall destroy—lit., cut with a saw (1 Kings 7. 9), i. e., utterly ruin them. Their sins shall be visited on them in kind. to do judgment—what is just and right. 8. of man—any one, his way is opposed to truth, and also estranged from it. The pure proves himself such by his right conduct. 9. corner—a turret or arbour on the roof. brawling—or contentious. wide house—lit., house of fellowship, or large enough for several families. 10. So strongly does he desire to do evil (Psalm 10. 3; Ecclesiastes 8. 11), that he will not even spare his friend if in his way. 11. (Cf. ch. 19. 25.) That which the simple learn by the terrors of punishment, the wise learn by teaching. 12. (Cf. Psalm 37. 35-38; 73. 17, 20.) house—family or interests. overthroweth—either supply God (cf. ch. 10. 24), or the word is used impersonally. 13. The principles of retribution, often taught (cf. Psalm 18. 26; Matthew 7. 1-12). 14. The effect of bribery (ch. 17. 23) is enhanced by secrecy, as the bribed person does not wish his motives made known. 15. But the just love right, and need no bribes. The wicked at last meet destruction, though for a time happy in concealing corruption. 16. the way of understanding—(Cf. ch. 12. 26; 14. 22.) remain—i. e., rest as at a journey's end; death will be his unchanging home. 17. Costly luxuries impoverish. 18. (Cf. ch. 11. 8.) By suffering what they had devised for the righteous, or brought on them, the wicked became their ransom, in the usual sense of substitutes (cf. Joshua 7. 26; Esther 7. 9). 19. (Cf. v. 9.) wilderness—pasture, though uninhabitable ground (Psalm 65. 12). 20. The wise, by diligence and care, lay up and increase wealth, while fools spend lit., swallow it up, greedily. 21. He who tries to act justly and kindly (Psalm 34. 14) will prosper and obtain justice and honour. 22. "Wisdom is better than strength" (Ecclesiastes 7. 19; 9. 15). strength . . . thereof—that in which they confide. 23. (Cf. ch. 13. 2, 3; James 3. 6-10.) 24. The reproachful name is deserved by those who treat others with anger and contempt. 25. desire—i. e. of ease and idleness, brings him to starvation. 26. The sin of covetousness marks the sluggard, as the virtue of benevolence the righteous. 27. God regards the heart, and hypocrisy is more odious than open inconsistency. wicked mind—or design (ch. 1. 4). 28. (Cf. ch. 19. 5.) that heareth—or hears instruction, and so grows wise. speaketh constantly—or sincerely (cf. Habakkuk 1. 5), and hence is believed (ch. 12. 19; James 1. 19). 29. hardeneth his face—is obstinate. directeth . . . way—considers it, and acts advisedly. 30, 31. Men's best devices and reliances are vain compared with God's, or without His aid (ch. 19. 21; Psalm 20. 7; 33. 17).

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 1-29. 1. A good name—(Job 30. 8, Hebrew.) Good is supplied here from Ecclesiastes 7. 1. loving favour—kind regard, i. e., of the wise and good. 2. Before God all are on the same footing (ch. 14. 31; 17. 5). 3. are punished—i. e., for their temerity; for the evil is not necessarily punitive, as the prudent might otherwise be its objects. 4. humility and the fear of the Lord—are in opposition; one produces the other. On the results, cf. ch. 3. 16; 8. 13. 5. he that . . . them—those who properly watch over their own souls are thus preserved from the dangers which attend the way of perverse men (ch. 16. 17). 6. Train—initiate, or early instruct. the way—lit., his way, that selected for him in which he should go; for early training secures habitual walking in it. 7. The influence of wealth sets aside moral distinctions is implied, and, of course, disapproved (cf. ch. 19. 6; 21. 14, &c.). 8. (Cf. ch. 11. 18; Psalm 109. 16-20; Galatians 6. 7, 8.) the rod . . . fail—his power to do evil will be destroyed. 9. a bountiful eye—i. e., a beneficent disposition. for he giveth . . . poor—his acts prove it. 10. Cast out—or drive away. Scorners foster strife by taunts and revilings. 11. (Cf. Margin.) pureness of heart—and gentle, kind words win favour, even from kings. 12. preserve—or guard. knowledge—its principles and possessors. overthroweth—utterly confounds and destroys the wicked. 13. Frivolous excuses satisfy the indolent man's conscience. 14. The mouth—or flattering speeches (ch. 5. 3; 7. 5) ensnare man, as pits, beasts. God makes their own sin their punishment. 15. is bound—or firmly fixed. Chastisement deters from crime, and so leads to reformation of principle. 16. These two vices pertain to the same selfish feeling, and are both deservedly odious to God, and incur punishment. 17. Here begins another division of the book, marked by those encouragements to the pursuit of wisdom, which are found in the earlier chapters. It will be observed that from v. 22 to ch. 24. 12, the proverbs are generally expressed in two verses instead of one (cf. Introduction). 18. These lessons must be laid up in the mind, and fitted, or better, fixed in the lips so as to be ever ready. 19. That . . . Lord—This is the design of the instruction. 20. excellent things—or probably of former times. counsels and knowledge—both advice and instruction. 21. Specially he desires to secure accuracy, so that his pupil may teach others. 22, 23. Here follow ten precepts of two verses each. Though men fail to defend the poor, God will (ch. 17. 5; Psalm 12. 5). in the gate—place of public gathering (Job 5. 4; Psalm 69. 12). 24, 25. (Cf. ch. 2. 12-15; 4. 14.) a snare . . . soul—the unsuspecting are often misled by bad company. 26, 27. (Cf. ch. 6. 1; 17. 18.) should he take, &c.—i. e., the creditor. 28. (Cf. ch. 23. 10.) Do not entrench on others (Deuteronomy 19. 14; 27. 17). 29. Success rewards diligence (ch. 10. 4; 21. 5).

men, whose courtesies even you will repent of having accepted. evil eye—or purpose (ch. 22. 9; Deuteronomy 15. 9; Matthew 6. 23). The morsel . . . words—i. e., disgusted with his true character, all pleasant intercourse will be destroyed. 9. (Cf. ch. 9. 8.) "Cast not your pearls," &c. (Matthew 7. 6). 10, 11. (Cf. ch. 22. 22, 23.) Redeemer—or Avenger (Leviticus 25. 25, 26; Numbers 35. 12), hence Advocate (Job 19. 25). plead . . . thee—(Cf. Job 31. 21; Psalm 35. 1; 68. 5.) 12. Here begins another series of precepts. 13, 14. While there is little danger that the use of the "Divine ordinance of the rod" will produce bodily harm, there is great hope of spiritual good. 15, 16. The pleasure afforded the teacher by the pupil's progress is a motive to diligence. my reins—(Cf. Psalm 7. 9.) 17, 18. (Cf. Margin.) The prosperity of the wicked is short. an end—or hereafter, another time, when apparent inequalities shall be adjusted (cf. Psalm 37. 28-38). 19-21. guide . . . way—or direct thy thoughts to a right course of conduct (cf. ch. 4. 4; 9. 6). riotous . . . flesh—prodigal, or eating more than necessary. Instead of their flesh (cf. Margin), better, "flesh to them," i. e., used for pleasure. drowsiness—the dreamy sleep of the slothful. 22. Harken—i. e., obey (ch. 1. 8; Ephesians 6. 1). despise . . . old—adults revere the parents whom, as children, they once obeyed. 23. Buy—lit., get (ch. 4. 5). truth—generally and specially as opposed to errors of all kinds. 24, 25. (Cf. ch. 10. 1; 17. 21, 25.) 26-35. A solemn warning against whoredom and drunkenness (Hosea 4. 11). 26. give . . . heart—This is the address of that Divine wisdom so often presented (ch. 8. 1; 9. 3, &c.). heart—confidence. observe—or keep. my ways—such as I teach you (ch. 3. 17; 9. 6). 27, 28. deep ditch—a narrow pit, out of which it is hard to climb. lieh in wait—to ensnare men into the pit, as hunters entrap game (cf. ch. 22. 14). increaseth . . . transgressors—(Ch. 5. 8-10.) The vice alluded to is peculiarly hardening to the heart. 29, 30. This picture is often sadly realized now. mixed wine—(Cf. ch. 9. 2; Isaiah 5. 11.) 31. when . . . red—the colour denoting greater strength (cf. Genesis 49. 11; Deuteronomy 32. 14). giveth . . . cup—lit., gives its eye, i. e., sparkles. moveth . . . aright—perhaps its foaming is meant. 32. The acute miseries resulting from drunkenness contrasted with the temptations. 33, 34. The moral effects: it inflames passion (Genesis 19. 31, 35), lays open the heart, produces insensibility to the greatest dangers, and debars from reformation, under the severest sufferings. 35. awake—i. e., from drunkenness (Genesis 9. 24). This is the language rather of acts than of the tongue.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Ver 1-31. 1, 2. (Cf. ch. 23. 3, 17; Psalm 37. 1.) studleth—meditateth. talk . . . mischief—their expressed purposes are to do evil. 3, 4. (Cf. ch. 14. 1; Isaiah 54. 14.) house—including the family. by knowledge . . . riches—(Ch. 8. 18; 21. 20.) 5, 6. The general statement (Ecclesiastes 9. 16, 18) is specially illustrated (cf. ch. 21. 22; Psalm 144. 1). 7. (Cf. ch. 14. 16.) in the gate—(Cf. ch. 22. 22.) 8. So called even if he falls to do evil. 9. Same thought varied. 10. Lit., "If thou fail in the day of straits (adversity), strait (or small) is thy strength," which is then truly tested. 11, 12. Neglect of known duty is sin (James 4. 17). ready [lit., bowing down] to be slain—i. e., unjustly. God's retributive justice cannot be avoided by professed ignorance. 13, 14. As delicious food whets the appetite, so should the rewards of wisdom excite us to seek it. reward—lit., after part, the proper result (cf. ch. 23. 18; Psalm 37. 37, 38). 15, 16. The plots of the wicked against the good, though partially, shall not be fully successful (Psalm 37. 24); while the wicked, falling under penal evil, find no help. seven times—often, or many (ch. 6. 16, 31; 9. 1). 17, 18. Yet let none rejoice over the fate of evil-doers, lest God punish their wrong spirit by relieving the sufferer (cf. ch. 17. 5; Job 31. 29). 19, 20. (Psalm 37. 1, 33; 18. 23.) candle—or, prosperity, it shall come to an end (ch. 13. 9; 20. 20). 21, 22. A warning against implety and resistance to lawful rule (Romans 13. 1-7; 1 Peter 2. 17). meddle . . . change—(Cf. Margin), lit., mingle yourself, avoid the society of restless persons. their calamity, &c.—either what God and the king inflict, or what changers and their company suffer; better the first. 23. These . . . wise—lit., are of the wise, as authors (cf. "Psalms of David," Hebrew). These are the verses following, to ch. 25. to have respect—lit., to discern faces, show partiality, 24, 25, of which an example is justifying the wicked, to which is opposed, rebuking him, which has a blessing. 26. Kiss his lips—love and obey, do homage (Psalm 2. 12; Song of Solomon 8. 1). right answer—lit., plain (ch. 8. 9) words, opposed to deceptive, or obscure. 27. Prepare in the field—i. e., Secure, by diligence, a proper support, and then build; provide necessities, then comforts, to which a house rather pertained, in a mild climate, permitting the use of tents. 28. Do not speak even truth needlessly against any, and never falsehood. 29. Especially avoid retaliation (Matthew 5. 43-45; Romans 12. 17). 30, 31. A striking picture of the effects of sloth. 32-34. From the folly of the slug-gard learn wisdom (ch. 6. 10, 11).

CHAPTER XXV.

Ver. 1-28. 1. The character of these proverbs sustains the title (cf. Introduction). also—refers to the former part of the book. copied out—lit., transferred, i. e., from some other book to this; not given from memory. 2. God's unsearchableness impresses us with awe (cf. Isaiah 45. 15; Romans 11. 33). But kings, being finite, should confer with wise counsellors; 3. Ye wisely keeping state secrets, which to common men are as inaccessible heights and depths. 4, 5. As separating impurities from ore leaves pure silver, so taking from a king wicked counsellors leaves a wise and beneficent government. before—or, in presence of, as courtiers stood about a king. 6, 7. Do not intrude into the presence of the king, for the elevation of the humble is honourable, but the humbling of the proud disgraceful (Luke 14. 8-10). 8. (Cf. ch. 3. 30.) lest . . . shame—lest you do what you ought not, when shamed by defeat, or "lest thou art shut out from doing any thing." 9, 10. (Cf. Matthew 5. 25; Margin.) secret—i. e., of your opponent, for his disadvantage, and so you be disgraced, not having discussed your difficulties with him. 11. a word fitly—lit., quickly, as wheels roll, just in time. The comparison "as apples . . . silver" gives a like sense. apples, &c.—either real apples of golden colour, in a silver network basket, or imitations on silver embroidery. 12. Those who desire to know, and do rightly, most highly esteem good counsel (ch. 9. 9; 15. 31). The listening ear is better than one hung with gold. 13. Snow from mountains was used to cool drinks; so refreshing is a faithful messenger (ch. 13. 17). 14. clouds—lit., vapours (Jeremiah 10. 13), clouds only in appearance. a false gift—promised, but not given. 15. Gentleness and kindness overcome the most powerful and obstinate. long forbearing—or, slowness to anger (ch. 14. 29; 15. 18). 16, 17. A comparison, as a surfeit of honey produces physical disgust, so your company, however agreeable in moderation, may, if excessive, lead your friend to hate you. 18. A false witness is as destructive to reputation, as such weapons to the body (ch. 24. 28). beareth . . . witness—lit., answereth questions, as before a judge, against his neighbour. 19. Treachery annoys as well as deceives. 20. Not only is the incongruity of songs (i. e., joyful) and sadness meant, but an accession of sadness, by want of sympathy, is implied. 21, 22. (Cf. Matthew 5. 41; Romans 12. 20.) As metals are melted by heaping coals upon them, so is the heart softened by kindness. 22. Better, "As the north wind bringeth forth (Psalm 90. 2) or produces rain, so does a concealed or slandering tongue produce anger." 24. (Cf. ch. 21. 9, 19). 25. (Cf. v. 13.) good news—i. e., of some loved interest or absent friend, the more grateful as coming from afar. 26. From troubled fountains and corrupt springs no healthy water is to be had, so when the righteous are oppressed by the wicked, their power for good is lessened or destroyed. 27. Satire surfeits (v. 16), so men who are self-glorious find shame. is not glory—not is supplied from the first clause, or is grievous, in which sense a similar word is used (ch. 27. 2). 28. Such are exposed to the incursions of evil thoughts and successful temptations.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Ver. 1-28. 1. The incongruities of nature illustrate also those of the moral world. The fool's unworthiness is also implied (ch. 17. 7; 19. 10). 2. Though not obvious to us, the bird—lit., sparrow—and swallow—have an object in their motions, so penal evil falls on none without a reason. 3. The rod is as much needed by fools and as well suited to them, as whips and bridles are for beasts. 4, 5. Answer not—i. e., approvingly by like folly. Answer—by reproof. 6. A fool falls by folly as surely as if he were maimed. drinketh damage—i. e., gets it abundantly (Job 15. 16; 34. 7). 7. leg. . . equal—or, "take away the legs," or the legs . . . are weak. In any case the idea is that they are the occasion of an awkwardness, such as the fool shows in using a parable or proverb (cf. Introduction; ch. 17. 7). 8. A stone, bound in a sling, is useless, so honour, conferred on a fool, is thrown away. 9. As vexatious and unmanageable as a thorn in a drunkard's hand is a parable to a fool. He will be as apt to misuse it as to use it rightly. 10. Various versions of this are proposed (cf. Margin). Better perhaps—"Much He Injures (or lit., wounds) all who reward," &c., i. e., society is injured by encouraging evil men. transgressors—may be rendered vagrants. The word God is improperly supplied. 11. returneth . . . folly—Though disgusting to others, the fool delights in his folly. 12. The self-conceited are taught with more difficulty than the stupid. 13. (Cf. ch. 22. 13.) 14. (Cf. ch. 6. 10; 24. 33). He moves but does not leave his place. 15. (Cf. ch. 19. 24.) 16. The thoughtless being ignorant of their ignorance are conceited. 17. meddleth—as ch. 20. 19; 24. 21; as either holding a dog by the ears or letting him go involves danger, so success in another man's strife or failure involves a useless risk of reputation, does no good, and may do us harm. 18, 19. Such are reckless of results. 20, 21. The tale-bearers foster (ch. 16. 28), and the contentious excite strife. 22. (Cf. ch. 13. 8.) 23. Warm professions can no more give value to insincerity than silver coating to rude earthen ware. 24. dissembleth—though an unusual sense of the word (cf. Margin), is allowable, and better suits the context, which sets forth hypocrisy. 25. Sentiment of v. 24 carried out. seven . . . heart—i. e., very many (cf. ch. 24. 16). 26, 27. Deceit will at last be exposed, and the wicked by their own arts often bring on retribution (cf. ch. 12. 13; Psalm 17. 16; 9. 17, &c.). 28. Men hate those they injure. lying tongue—lips for the persons (cf. ch. 4. 24; Psalm 12. 3).

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 1-27. 1. Do not confide implicitly in your plans (ch. 16. 9; 19. 21; James 4. 13-15). 2. Avoid self-praise. 3. The literal sense of heavy, applied to material subjects, illustrates its figurative, grievous, applied to moral. a fool's wrath—is unreasonable and excessive. 4. envy—or, jealousy (cf. Margin); ch. 6. 34), is more unappeasable than the simpler bad passions. 5, 6. love—not manifested in acts is useless; and even, if its exhibition by rebukes wounds us, such love is preferable to the frequent (cf. Margin), and hence deceitful, kisses of an enemy. 7. The luxury of wealth confers less happiness than the healthy appetite of labour. 8. Such are not only out of place, but out of duty and in danger. 9. rejoice the heart—the organ of perceiving what pleases the senses. svectness . . . counsel—or, wise counsel is also pleasing. 10. Adhere to tried friends. The ties of blood may be less reliable than those of genuine friendship. 11. The wisdom of children both reflects credit on parents and contributes to their aid in difficulties. 12, 13. (Cf. ch. 20. 16; 22. 3.) 14. Excessive zeal in praising raises suspicions of selfishness. 15. (Cf. ch. 19. 13.) very . . . day—lit., a day of showers. 16. hideth—or, restrains (i. e., tries to do it), is as fruitless an effort, as that of holding the wind. the ointment . . . right hand—the organ of power (Psalm 17. 7; 18. 35). His right hand endeavours to repress perfume, but vainly. Some prefer: "His right hand comes on oil, i. e., cannot take hold." Such a woman cannot be tamed. 17. a man sharpeneth . . . friend—i. e., conversation promotes intelligence, which the face exhibits. 18. Diligence secures a reward, even for the humble servant. 19. We may see our characters in the developed tempers of others. 20. Men's cupidity is as insatiable as the grave. 21. Praise tests character. a man to his praise—according to his praise, as he bears it. Thus vain men seek it, weak men are inflated by it, wise men disregard it, &c. 22. The obstinate wickedness of such is incurable by the heaviest inflictions. 23, 24. flocks—constituted the staple of wealth. It is only by care and diligence that the most solid possessions can be perpetuated (ch. 23. 5). 25-27. The fact that providential arrangements furnish the means of competence to those who properly use them is another motive to diligence (cf. Psalm 65 9-13). household—lit., house, the family (Acts 16. 15; 1 Corinthians 1. 16). The hay appeareth—lit., Grass appeareth (Job 40. 15; Psalm 104. 14).

AN EASTERN WELL.

EASTERN LETTER-CARRIER.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 1-28. A bad conscience makes men timid; the righteous are alone truly bold (ch. 14. 26; Psalm 27. 1). 2. Anarchy producing contending rulers shortens the reign of each. but by a man . . . prolonged—or, "by a man of understanding—i. e., a good ruler—he who knows or regards the right, i. e., a good citizen, shall prolong (his days)." Good rulers are a blessing to the people. Bad government as a punishment for evil is contrasted with good as blessing to the good. 3. A poor man . . . &c.—Such, in power, exact more severely, and so leave subjects bare. 4. They that forsake . . . wicked—Wrong-doers encourage one another. 5. (Cf. John 7. 17.) Ignorance of moral truth is due to unwillingness to know it. 6. (Cf. ch. 10. 6.) Riches cannot compensate for sin, nor the want of them affect integrity. 7. (Cf. ch. 17. 25.) riotous men—or, gluttons (ch. 23. 20, 21). 8. usury . . . unjust gain—(cf. Margin), the two terms, meaning nearly the same, may denote excessive interest. God's providence directs the proper use of wealth. 9. (Cf. ch. 15. 8; 21. 27.) hearing—i. e., obeying. God requires sincere worshippers (Psalm 66. 18, John 4. 24). 10. (Cf. ch. 26. 27.) 11. A poor but wise man can discover (and expose) the rich and self-conceited. 12. great glory—or, cause for it to a people, for the righteous rejoice in good, and righteousness exalts a nation (ch. 14. 34). a man . . . hidden—i. e., the good retire, or all kinds try to escape a wicked rule. 13. (Cf. Psalm 32. 3-5.) Concealment of sin delivers none from God's wrath, but He shows mercy to the humble penitent (Psalm 51. 4). 14. Fearth—i. e., God, and so repents. hardeneth his heart—makes himself insensible to sin, and so will not repent (ch. 14. 16; 29. 1). 15. The rapacity and cruelty of such beasts well represent some wicked men (cf. Psalm 7. 2; 17. 12). 16. The prince . . . understanding—i. e., He does not perceive that oppression jeopardis his success. Covetousness often produces oppression, hence the contrast. 17. doeth violence . . . blood, &c.—or, that is oppressed by the blood of life (Genesis 9. 6), which he has taken—pit—to or even to the pit, the grave or destruction (ch. 1. 12; Job 33. 18-24; Psalm 143. 7). stay him—sustain or deliver him. 18. (Cf. ch. 10. 9; 17. 20.) Double dealing is eventually fatal. 19. (Cf. ch. 10. 4; 20. 4.) vain persons—idle, useless drones, implying that they are also wicked (ch. 12. 11; Psalm 26. 14). 20. maketh haste . . . rich—implying deceit or fraud (ch. 20. 21), and so opposed to faithful or reliable. 21. respect of persons—(ch. 24. 23.) Such are led to evil by the slightest motive. 22. (Cf. v. 20.) evil eye—in the general sense of ch. 23. 6, here more specific for covetousness (cf. ch. 22. 9; Matthew 20. 15). poverty . . . him—by God's providence. 23. (Cf. ch. 9. 8, 9; 27. 5.) Those benefited by reproof will love their monitors. 24. (Cf. Matthew 15. 4-6.) Such, though helms, are virtually thieves, to be ranked with highwaymen. 25. of a proud heart—lit., or puffed up of soul—i. e., self-confident, and hence overbearing and litigious. made fat—or, prosperous (ch. 11. 25; 16. 20). 26. (Cf. ch. 3. 6-8.) walketh wisely—i. e., trusting in God (ch. 22. 17-19). 27.

(Cf. ch. 11. 24-26.) hideth his eyes—as the face (Psalm 27 9; 69. 17), denotes inattention. 28. The elevation of the wicked to power drives men to seek refuge from tyranny (cf. v. 12; ch. 11. 10; Psalm 12. 8).

CHAPTER XXIX.

Ver. 1-27. 1. hardeneth . . . neck—obstinately refuses counsel (2 Kings 17. 14; Nehemiah 9. 16). destroyed—lit., shivered or utterly broken to pieces. without remedy—lit., without healing or repairing. 2. (Cf. ch. 11. 10; 23. 28.) in authority—(Cf. Margin), increased in power. 3. (Cf. ch. 4. 6, 7; 10. 1, &c.) 4. by judgment—i. e., righteous decisions, opposed to those procured by gifts (ch. cf. 28. 21), by which good government is perverted. land—for nation. 5. (Cf. ch. 26. 28.) spreadeth . . . feet—by misleading him as to his real character, the flatterer brings him to evil, prepared by himself or others. 6. In [or, By] the transgression—he is brought into difficulty (ch. 12. 13), but the righteous go on prospering, and so sing or rejoice. 7. considereth—lit., knows, as Psalm 1. 6. the cause—i. e., in courts of justice (cf. v. 14). The voluntary neglect of it by the wicked (ch. 23. 27) occasions oppression. 8. Scornful men—Those who contemptuously disregard God's law. bring—(Cf. Margin), kindle strife. turn away [i. e., abate] wrath. 9. contendeth—i. e., in law. whether . . . laugh—The fool, whether angry or good-humoured, is unsettled, or referring the words to the wise man, the sense is, that all his efforts, severe or gentle, are unavailing to pacify the fool. 10. bloodthirsty—(Cf. Margin), murderers (Psalm 5. 6; 26. 9). hate, &c.—(Ch. 1. 11; Genesis 3. 4.) seek . . . soul—i. e., to preserve it. 11. (Cf. ch. 12. 16; 16. 32.) mind—or spirit, for anger or any ill passion which the righteous restrain. 12. His servants imitate him. 13. (Cf. ch. 22. 2.) deceitful man—lit., man of vexations, an exactor. the Lord . . . their eyes—sustains their lives (1 Samuel 14. 27; Psalm 13. 3), i. e., Both depend on Him, and He will do justice. 14. (Cf. ch. 20. 28; 25. 5.) Such is the character of the King of kings (Psalm 72. 4, 12). 15. (Cf. ch. 13. 24; 23. 13.) 16. (Cf. v. 2, 12; Psalm 12. 1-8.) shall see . . . fall—and triumph in it (Psalm 37. 34-38; 58. 10, 11). 17. (Cf. v. 3, 15; ch. 19. 18.) give thee rest—peace and quiet (cf. v. 9). 18. no vision—instruction in God's truth, which was by prophets, through visions (1 Samuel 3. 1). people perish—(Cf. Margin), are deprived of moral restraints. keepeth the law—has, and observes, instruction (ch. 14. 11, 34; Psalm 19. 11). 19. A servant—who lacks good principle, corrected—or discovered. will not answer—i. e., obey. 20. (Cf. ch. 21. 5.) hasty in . . . words—implying self-conceit (ch. 26. 12). 21. become his son—assume the place and privileges of one. 22. (Cf. ch. 15. 18.) Such are delighted by discord and violence. 23. (Cf. ch. 16. 18; 18. 12.) honour . . . spirit—or, such shall lay hold on honour (ch. 11. 16). 24. hateth . . . soul—(Cf. ch. 8. 36.) heareth cursing—(Leviticus 5. 1), risks the punishment, rather than reveal truth. 25. The fear . . . snare—involves men in difficulty (cf. v. 6). shall be safe—(Cf. Margin; ch. 18. 10.) 26. (Cf. Margin; Psalm 27. 8.) God alone will and can do exact justice. 27. (Cf. ch. 3. 32.) On last clause of v. 16; Psalm 37. 12.

CHAPTER XXX.

Ver. 1-33. 1. This is the title of this chapter (cf. Introduction). the prophecy—lit., the burden (cf. Isaiah 13. 1; Zechariah 9. 1), used for any Divine instruction; not necessarily a prediction, which was only a kind of prophecy (1 Chronicles 15. 27, a song). Prophets were inspired men, who spoke for God to man, or man to God (Genesis 20. 7; Exodus 7. 14, 15, 16). Such, also, were the New Testament prophets. In a general sense, Gad, Nathan and others were such, who were Divine teachers, though we do not learn they ever predicted. the man spake—lit., the saying of the man; an expression used to denote any solemn and important announcement (cf. 2 Samuel 23. 1; Psalm 36. 1; 110. 1; Isaiah 1. 24, &c.). Ithiel and Ucal were perhaps pupils. 2-4. brutish—stupid, a strong term to denote his lowly self-estimation; or he may speak of such as his natural condition, as contrasted with God's all-seeing comprehensive knowledge and almighty power. The questions of the last clause emphatically deny the attributes mentioned to be those of any creature, thus impressively strengthening the implied reference of the former to God (cf. Deuteronomy 30, 12-14; Isaiah 40, 12; Ephesians 4, 8). 5. (Cf. Psalm 12, 6; 119, 140.) 6. Add . . . words—Implying that his sole reliance was on God's all-sufficient teaching. reprove [convict] thee—and so the falsehood will appear. 7-9. A prayer for exemption from wickedness, and the extremes of poverty and riches, the two things mentioned. Contentment is implied as desired. vanity—all sorts of sinful acts (Job 11, 11; Isaiah 5, 18). be full . . . deny—i. e., puffed up by the pride of prosperity. take the name . . . vain—this is not (Hebrew) the form (cf. Exodus 20, 7), but take rather denotes laying violent hold on any thing, i. e., lest I assail God's name or attributes, as justice, mercy, &c., which the poor are tempted to do. 10. Accuse not—Slander not (Psalm 10, 7). curse . . . guilty—lest, however lowly, he be exasperated to turn on thee, and your guilt be made to appear. 11-14. Four kinds of hateful persons—(1) graceless children, (2) hypocrites, (3) the proud, (4) cruel oppressors (cf. on v. 14, Psalm 14, 4; 52, 2)—are now illustrated, (1) v. 15, 16, the insatiability of prodigal children and their fate; v. 17, (2) hypocrisy, or the concealment of real character; v. 18-20, (3 and 4) various examples of pride and oppression. 15, 16. horse-leech—supposed by some to be the vampire (a fabulous creature), as being literally insatiable; but the other subjects mentioned must be taken as this, comparatively insatiable. The use of a fabulous creature agreeably to popular notions is not inconsistent with inspiration (cf. Isaiah 14, 31). There are three . . . yea, four—(Cf. ch. 6, 16.) 17. The eye—For the person, with reference to the use of the organ to express mockery and contempt, and also as that by which punishment is received. the ravens . . . eagles . . . eat—either as dying unnaturally, or being left unburied, or both. 18-20. Hypocrisy is illustrated by four examples of the concealment of all methods or traces of action, and a pertinent example of double dealing in actual vice is added, i. e., the adulterous woman. she catch . . . mouth—i. e., she hides the evidences of her shame, and professes innocence. 21-23. Pride and cruelty, the undue exaltation of those unfit to hold power produce those vices which disquiet society (cf. ch. 19, 10; 23, 3). heir . . . mistress—i. e., takes her place as a wife (Genesis 16, 4). 24-31. These verses provide two classes of apt illustrations of various aspects of the moral world, which the reader is left to apply. By the first, diligence and providence are commended; the success of these insignificant animals being due to their instinctive sagacity and activity, rather than strength. conies—mountain mice, or rabbits. spider—tolerated, even in palaces, to destroy flies. take . . . hands—or, uses with activity the limbs provided for taking prey. The other class provides similes for whatever is majestic or comely, uniting efficiency with gracefulness. 32. As none can hope, successfully, to resist such a king, suppress even the thought of an attempt. lay . . . hand upon thy mouth—lay is well supplied (Judges 13, 19; Job 29, 9; 40, 4). 33. i. e., strife—or other ills, as surely arise from devising evil as natural effects from natural causes.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Ver. 1-31. 1. Of the title of this, the 6th part of the book, cf. Introduction. prophecy—as ch. 30, 1. 2. What, my son?—i. e., What shall I say? repetitions denote earnestness. son . . . womb—as our phrase, "my own son," a term of special affection. son . . . vows—as one dedicated to God; so the word Lemuel may mean. 3-9. Succinct but solemn warnings against vices to which kings are peculiarly tempted, as carnal pleasures and oppressive and unrighteous government are used to sustain sensual indulgence. 3. strength—mental and bodily resources for health and comfort. thy ways—or course of life. to that . . . kings—lit., to the destroying of kings, avoid destructive pleasures (cf. ch. 5, 9; 7, 22, 27; Hosea 4, 11). 4, 5. Stimulants enfeeble reason, and pervert the heart, and do not suit rulers, who need clear and steady minds, and well-governed affections (cf. ch. 20, 1; 22, 29). pervert . . . afflicted—they give unrighteous decisions against the poor. 6, 7. The proper use of such drinks is to restore tone to feeble bodies and depressed minds (cf. Psalm 104, 15). 8, 9. Open . . . cause—Plead for those who cannot plead for themselves, as the orphan, stranger, &c. (cf. Psalm 72, 12; Isaiah 1, 17). appointed to destruction—who are otherwise ruined by their oppressors (cf. ch. 29, 14, 16). 10-31. This exquisite picture of a truly lovely wife is conceived and drawn in accordance with the customs of Eastern nations, but its moral teachings suit all climes. In Hebrew the verses begin with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet in order (cf. Introduction to Poetical Books). 10. Who . . . woman?—The question implies that such are rare, though not entirely wanting (cf. ch. 18, 22; 19, 14). virtuous—lit., of strength, i. e., moral courage (cf. ch. 12, 4; Ruth 3, 11). her price, &c.—(cf. ch. 3, 15.) 11. heart . . . trust in her—he relies on her prudence and skill. no need of spoil—does not lack profit or gain, especially, that obtained by the risk of war. 12. do . . . good—contribute good to him. 13, 14. Ancient women of rank thus wrought with their hands, and such, indeed, were the customs of Western women a few centuries since. In the East also, the fabrics were articles of merchandise. 15. She diligently attends to expending as well as gathering wealth; 16., and hence has means to purchase property. 17, 18. To energy she adds a watchfulness in bargains, and a protracted and painful industry. The last clause may figuratively denote that her prosperity (cf. ch. 24, 20) is not short-lived. 19. No work, however mean, if honest, is disdained. 20. Industry enables her to be charitable. 21. scarlet—or, purple, by reason of the dyes used, the best fabrics, as a matter of taste also, the colour suits cold. 22. coverings of tapestry—or, coverlets, i. e., for beds. silk [or, linen (cf. Exodus 26, 1; 27, 9)] and purple—i. e., the most costly goods. 23. In the gates—(cf. ch. 22, 22). His domestic comfort promotes his advancement in public dignity. 24. fine linen—or, linen shirts, or the material for them. girdles—were often costly and highly valued (2 Samuel 18, 11). delivereth—or, giveth as a present or to sell. 25. Strength and honour—or, Strong and beautiful, is her clothing; or, figuratively, for moral character, vigorous and honourable. shall rejoice . . . come in confidence of certain maintenance. 26. Her conversation is wise and gentle. 27. (Cf. 1 Timothy 5, 14; Titus 2, 5.) She adds to her example a wise management of those under her control. 28. She is honoured by those who best know her. 29. The words are those of her husband, praising her. virtuously—(Cf. v. 10.) 30. Favour—or, Grace of personal manner. beauty—of face, or form (cf. ch. 11, 22). True piety alone commands permanent respect and affection (1 Peter 3, 3). 31. The result of her labours is her best eulogy.

Nothing can add to the simple beauty of this admirable portrait. On the measure of its realization in the daughters of our own day rest untold results, in the domestic, and, therefore, the civil and religious, welfare of the people.

ECCLESIASTES; OR THE PREACHER,

THE GREEK TITLE IN THE LXX.

INTRODUCTION.

THE Hebrew title is Koheleth, which the speaker in it applies to himself (ch. 1. 12), "I, Koheleth, was king over Israel." It means an Assembler or Convener of a meeting and a Preacher to such a meeting. The feminine form of the Hebrew noun, and its construction once (ch. 7. 27) with a feminine verb, show that it not only signifies Solomon, the Preacher to assemblies (in which case it is construed with the verb or noun masculine), but also Divine Wisdom (feminine in Hebrew) speaking by the mouth of the inspired king. In six cases out of seven it is construed with the masculine. Solomon was endowed with inspired wisdom (1 Kings 3. 5-14; 6. 11, 12; 9. 1, &c.; 11. 9-11), specially fitting him for the task. The Orientals delight in such meetings for grave discourse. Thus the Arabs formerly had an assembly yearly, at Ocaah, for hearing and reciting poems. Cf. "Masters of assemblies" (note ch. 12. 11, also 12. 9). "The Preacher taught the people knowledge," probably viva voce; 1 Kings 4. 34; 10. 2, 8, 24; 2 Chronicles 9. 1, 7, 23, plainly refer to a somewhat public divan met for literary discussion. So "spake," thrice repeated (1 Kings 4. 32, 33), refers not to written compositions, but to addresses spoken in assemblies convened for the purpose. The Holy Ghost, no doubt, signifies also by the term that Solomon's doctrine is intended for the "great congregation," the Church of all places and ages (Psalm 22. 25; 49. 2-4).

Solomon was plainly the author (ch. 1. 12, 16; 2. 15; 12. 9). That the Rabbins attribute it to Isalah or Hezekiah is explicable by supposing that one or the other inserted it in the canon. The difference of its style, as compared with Proverbs and Song of Solomon, is due to the difference of subjects, and the different period of his life in which each was written; the Song, in the fervour of his first love to God; Proverbs, about the same time, or somewhat later; but Ecclesiastes in late old age, as the seal and testimony of repentance of his apostasy in the intervening period: Psalm 89. 30, 33 proves his penitence. The substitution of the title Koheleth for Solomon (that is, peace), may imply that, having troubled Israel, meantime he forfeited his name of peace (1 Kings 11. 14, 23); but now, having repented, he wishes to be henceforth a Preacher of righteousness. The alleged foreign expressions in the Hebrew may have been easily imported, through the great intercourse there was with other nations during his long reign. Moreover, supposed Chaldaisms may be fragments preserved from the common tongue of which Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic, were offshoots.

THE SCOPE of Ecclesiastes is to show the vanity of all mere human pursuits, when made the chief end, as contrasted with the real blessedness of true wisdom, i. e., religion. The immortality of the soul is dwelt on incidentally, as subsidiary to the main scope. Moses' law took this truth for granted, but drew its sanctions of rewards and punishments in accordance with the theocracy, which was under a special providence of God as the temporal King of Israel, from the present life, rather than the future. But after that Israel chose an earthly king, God withdrew, in part, his extraordinary providence, so that under Solomon, temporal rewards did not invariably follow virtue, and punishments vice (cf. ch. 2. 16; 3. 19; 4. 1; 5. 8; 7. 15; 8. 14; 9. 2, 11). Hence the need arises to show that these anomalies will be rectified hereafter, and this is the grand "conclusion," therefore, of the "whole" book, that, seeing there is a coming judgment, and seeing that present goods do not satisfy the soul, "man's whole duty is to fear God and keep his commandments" (ch. 12. 13, 14), and meanwhile, to use, in joyful and serene sobriety, and not abuse the present life (ch. 3. 12, 13).

It is objected that sensual epicurism seems to be inculcated (ch. 3. 12, 13, 22, &c.); but it is a contented, thankful enjoyment of God's present gifts that is taught, as opposed to a murmuring, anxious, avaricious spirit, as is proved by ch. 5. 18, cf. with 11-15, not making them the chief end of life; not the joy of levity and folly; a misunderstanding which he guards against in ch. 7. 2-6; 11. 9; 12. 1. Again, ch. 7. 16; 9. 2-10, might seem to teach fatalism and skepticism. But these are words put in the mouth of an objector; or rather, were the language of Solomon himself during his apostasy, finding an echo in the heart of every sensualist, who wishes to be an unbeliever, and, who, therefore, sees difficulties enough in the world around wherewith to prop up his wilful unbelief. The answer is given (ch. 7. 17, 13; 9. 11, &c.; 11. 1, 6; 12. 13). Even if these passages be taken as words of Solomon, they are to be understood as forbidding a self-made "righteousness," which tries to constrain God to grant salvation to imaginary good works and external strictness with which it wearies itself; also, that speculation which tries to fathom all God's inscrutable counsels (ch. 8. 17), and that carelessness about the future forbidden in Matthew 6. 25.

THE CHIEF GOOD is that, the possession of which makes us happy, to be sought as the end, for its own sake; whereas, all other things are but means towards it. Philosophers, who made it the great subject of inquiry, restricted it to the present life, treating the eternal as unreal, and only useful to awe the multitude with. But Solomon shows the vanity of all human things (so-called philosophy included) to satisfy the soul, and that heavenly wisdom alone is the chief good. He had taught so when young (Proverbs 1. 20; 8. 1, &c.); so also, in Song of Solomon, he had spiritualized the subject in an allegory; and now, after having long personally tried the manifold ways in which the worldly seek to reach happiness, he gives the fruit of his experience in old age.

It is divided into two parts—chs. 1.-6. 10 showing the vanity of earthly things; ch. 6. 10 to ch. 12., the excellence of heavenly wisdom. Deviations from strict logical methods occur in these divisions, but in the main they are observed. The deviations make it the less stiff and artificial, and the more suited to all capacities. It is in poetry; the hemistichal division is mostly observed, but occasionally not so. The choice of epithets, imagery, inverted order of words, ellipses, parallelism, or, in its absence, similarity of diction, mark versification.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-18. INTRODUCTION. 1. The Preacher—and Convener of assemblies for the purpose. See my Preface. "Koheleth" in Hebrew, a symbolical name for Solomon, and of Heavenly Wisdom speaking through and identified with him. Verse 12 shows that "king of Jerusalem" is in apposition, not with "David," but "Preacher." of Jerusalem—rather, in Jerusalem, for it was merely his metropolis, not his whole kingdom. 2. The theme proposed of the first part of his discourse. Vanity of vanities—Hebraism for the most utter vanity. So "holy of holies" (Exodus 26.); "servant of servants" (Genesis 9. 25). The repetition increases the force. all—Hebrew, "the all;" all without exception, viz., earthly things. vanity—not in themselves, for God maketh nothing in vain (1 Timothy 4. 4, 5), but vain when put in the place of God and made the end, instead of the means (Psalm 39. 5, 6; 62. 9; Matthew 6. 33); vain, also, because of the "vanity" to which they are "subjected" by the fall (Romans 8. 20). 3. What profit . . . labour—i. e., "What profit" as to the chief good (Matthew 16. 26). Labour is profitable in its proper place (Genesis 2. 15; 3. 19; Proverbs 14. 23). under the sun—i. e., in this life, as opposed to the future world. The phrase often recurs, but only in Ecclesiastes. 4. earth . . . for ever—(Psalm 104. 5.) While the earth remains the same, the generations of men are ever changing; what lasting profit, then, can there be from the toils of one whose sojourn on earth, as an individual, is so brief? The "for ever" is comparative, not absolute (Psalm 102. 26). 5. (Psalm 19. 5, 6.) Panting is the Hebrew for "hasteth;" metaphor, from a runner (Psalm 19. 5, "a strong man") in a "race." It applies rather to the rising sun, which seems laboriously to mount up to the meridian, than to the setting sun; the accents too favour MAURER, "And (that too, returning) to his place, where panting he riseth." 6. according to his circuits—i. e., it returns afresh to its former circuits, however many be its previous veerings about. The north and south winds are the two prevailing winds in Palestine and Egypt. 7. By subterraneous cavities, and by evaporation forming rain-clouds, the fountains and rivers are supplied from the sea, into which they then flow back. The connection is: Individual men are continually changing, whilst the succession of the race continues; just as the sun, wind, and rivers are ever shifting about, whilst the cycle in which they move is invulnerable; they return to the point whence they set out. Hence in man, as in these objects of nature which are his analogue, with all the seeming changes "there is no new thing" (v. 9). 8. MAURER translates, "All words are wearied out," i. e., are inadequate, as also, "man cannot express" all the things in the world which undergo this ceaseless, changeless cycle of vicissitudes: "The eye is not satisfied with seeing them," &c. But it is plainly a return to the idea (v. 3) as to man's "labour," which is only wearisome and profitless; "no new" good can accrue from it (v. 9); for as the sun; &c., so man's laborious works move in a changeless cycle. The "eye" and "ear" are two of the taskmasters for which man toils. But these are never "satisfied" (ch. 6. 7; Proverbs 27. 20). Nor can they be so hereafter, for there will be nothing "new." Not so the chief good, Jesus Christ (John 4. 13, 14; Revelation 21. 5). 9. Rather, "no new thing at all;" as Numbers 11. 6. This is not meant in a general sense; but there is no new source of happiness (the subject in question) which can be devised; the same round of petty pleasures, cares, business, study, wars, &c., being repeated over and over again. [HOLDEN.] 10. old time—Hebrew, ages. which was—The Hebrew plural cannot be joined to the verb singular. Therefore translate, "It hath been in the ages before; certainly it hath been before us." [HOLDEN.] Or, as MAURER, "That which has been (done) before us (in our presence, 1 Chronicles 16. 33), has been (done) already in the old times." 11. The reason why some things are thought "new," which are not really so, is the imperfect record that exists of preceding ages among their successors. those that . . . come after—i. e., those that live still later than the "things, rather the persons or 'generations,' v. 4, with which this verse is connected, the six intermediate verses being merely illustrations of v. 4 [WEISS], that are to come" (ch. 2. 16; 9. 5). 12. Resumption of v. 1, the intermediate verses being the introductory statement of his thesis. Therefore, "the Preacher" (Kohelah) is repeated. was king—instead of "am," because he is about to give the results of his past experience during his long reign. in Jerusalem—specified, as opposed to David, who reigned both in Hebron and Jerusalem; whereas Solomon reigned only in Jerusalem. "King of Israel in Jerusalem," implies that he reigned over Israel and Judah combined; whereas David, at Hebron, reigned only over Judah, and not, until he was settled in Jerusalem, over both Israel and Judah. 13. this sore travail—viz., that of "searching out all things done under heaven." Not human wisdom in general, which comes afterwards (ch. 2. 12, &c.), but laborious inquiries into, and speculations about, the works of men, ex. gr., political science. As man is doomed to get his bread, so his knowledge, by the sweat of his brow (Genesis 3. 19). [GILL.] exercised—i. e., disciplined; lit., "that they may thereby chastise or humble themselves." 14. The reason is here given why investigation into man's "works" is only "sore travail" (v. 13), viz., because all man's ways are vain (v. 18) and cannot be mended (v. 15). vexation of [a preying upon the] spirit—MAURER translates, "the pursuit of wind," as ch. 5. 16; Hosea 12. 1, "Ephraim feedeth on wind." But old versions support the English Version. 15. Investigation (v. 13) into human ways is vain labour, for they are hopelessly "crooked" and "cannot be made straight" by it (ch. 7. 13). God, the chief good, alone can do this (Isaiah 40. 4; 45. 2). wanting—(Daniel 5. 27). numbered—so as to make a complete number; so equivalent to supplied. [MAURER.] Or, rather, man's state is utterly wanting; and that which is wholly defective cannot be numbered or calculated. The investigator thinks he can draw up, in accurate numbers, statistics of man's wants; but these, including the defects in the investigator's labour, are not partial, but total. 16. commended with . . . heart—(Genesis 24. 45.) come to great estate—Rather, "I have magnified and gotten" (lit., added, increased), &c. all . . . before me in Jerusalem—viz., the priests, judges, and two kings that preceded Solomon. His wisdom exceeded that of all before Jesus Christ, the antitypical Kohelah, or "Gatherer of men," (Luke 13. 34), and "Wisdom" incarnate (Matthew 11. 19; 12. 42). had . . . experience—lit., had seen (Jeremiah 2. 31). Contrast with this glorying in worldly wisdom Jeremiah 9. 23, 24. 17. wisdom . . . madness—i. e., their effects, the works of human wisdom and folly respectively. "Madness," lit., vaunting extravagance; ch. 2. 12; 7. 25, &c., support English Version rather than DABHE, "splendid matters." "Folly" is read by English Version with some MSS., instead of the present Hebrew text, "prudence." If Hebrew be retained, understand "prudence," falsely so called (1 Timothy 6. 20), "craft" (Daniel 8. 25). 18. wisdom . . . knowledge—not in general; for wisdom, &c., are most excellent in their place; but speculative knowledge of man's ways (v. 13, 17), which, the farther it goes, gives one the more pain to find how "crooked" and "wanting" they are (v. 15; ch. 12. 12).

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-26. He next tries pleasure and luxury, retaining, however, his worldly "wisdom" (ch. 3. 9), but all proves "vanity" in respect to the chief good. 1. I said . . . heart—(Luke 12. 19.) thee—my heart, I will test whether thou canst find that solid good in pleasure which was not in "worldly wisdom." But this also proves to be "vanity" (Isaiah 50. 11). 2. laughter—including prosperity, and joy in general (Job 8. 21). mad—i. e., when made the chief good; it is harmless in its proper place. What doeth it?—Of what avail is it in giving solid good? (ch. 7. 6; Proverbs 14. 13). 3-11. Illustration more at large of v. 1, 2. 3. I sought—I resolved, after search into many plans. give myself unto—lit., to draw my flesh (body) to wine (including all banquetings). Image from a captive drawn after a chariot in triumph (Romans 6. 16, 19; 1 Corinthians 12. 2); or, one "allured" (2 Peter 2. 18, 19). yet acquainting . . . wisdom—lit., "and my heart (still) was behaving, or guiding itself, with wisdom. [GEBENIUS.] MAURER translates, "was weary of (worldly) wisdom." But the end of v. 9 confirms English Version. folly—viz., pleasures of the flesh, termed "mad," v. 2. all the days, &c.—(See Margin and ch. 6. 12; Job 15. 20.) 4. (1 Kings 7. 1-8; 9. 1, 19; 10. 18, &c.) vineyards—(Song of Solomon 8. 11.) 5. gardens—Hebrew, paradises, a foreign word; Sanscrit, "a place enclosed with a wall;" Armenian and Arabic, "a pleasure-ground with flowers and shrubs near the king's house, or castle." An earthly paradise can never make up for the want of the heavenly (Revelation 2, 7). 6. pools—artificial, for irrigating the soil (Genesis 2, 10; Nehemiah 2, 14; Isaiah 1, 30). Three such reservoirs are still found, called Solomon's cisterns, a mile and a half from Jerusalem. wood that bringeth forth—rather, "the grove that flourisheth with trees." [LOWTH.] born in my house—these were esteemed more trustworthy servants than those bought (Genesis 14, 14; 15, 2, 3; 17, 12, 13, 27; Jeremiah 2, 14), called sons of one's handmaid (Exodus 23, 12; cf. Genesis 12, 16; Job 1, 3). 8. (1 Kings 10, 27; 2 Chronicles 1, 15; 9, 20). peculiar treasure of kings and . . . provinces—contributed by them, as tributary to him (1 Kings 4, 21, 24); a poor substitute for the wisdom whose "gain is better than fine gold" (Proverbs 3, 14, 15). slingers—so David (2 Samuel 19, 35). musical instruments . . . of all sorts—introduced at banquets (Isaiah 5, 12; Amos 6, 5, 6); rather, a princess and princesses, from an Arable root. One regular wife, or queen (Esther 1, 9); Pharaoh's daughter (1 Kings 3, 1); other secondary wives, "princesses," distinct from the "concubines" (1 Kings 11, 3; Psalm 45, 10; Song of Solomon 6, 8). [WEISS; GESENIUS.] Had these been omitted, the enumeration would be incomplete. 9. great—opulent (Genesis 24, 35; Job 1, 3; see 1 Kings 10, 23). remained—(v. 3). 10. my labour—in procuring pleasures. this—evanescent "joy" was my only "portion out of all my labour" (ch. 3, 22; 5, 18; 9, 9; 1 Kings 10, 5). 11. But all these I felt were only "vanity," and of no "profit" as to the chief good. "Wisdom" (worldly common sense, sagacity), which still "remained with me" (v. 9), showed me that these could not give solid happiness. 12. He had tried (worldly) wisdom (ch. 1, 12-18) and folly (foolish pleasure) (v. 1-11); he now compares them (v. 12), and finds that whilst (worldly) wisdom excelleth folly (v. 13, 14), yet the one event, death, befalls both (v. 14-16), and that thus the wealth acquired by the wise man's "labour" may descend to a "fool" that hath not laboured (v. 18, 19, 21); therefore all his labour is vanity (v. 22, 23). what can the man do . . . already done—(Ch. 1, 9.) Parenthetical. A future investigator can strike nothing out "new," so as to draw a different conclusion from what I draw by comparing "wisdom and madness." HOLDEN, with less ellipsis, translates, "What, O man, shall come after the king?" &c. Better, GROTIUS, "What man can come after (compete with) the king in the things which are done?" None ever can have the same means of testing what all earthly things can do towards satisfying the soul; namely, worldly wisdom, science, riches, power, longevity, all combined. 13, 14. (Proverbs 17, 24.) The worldly "wise" man has good sense in managing his affairs, skill and taste in building and planting, and keeps within safe and respectable bounds in pleasure, whilst the "fool" is wanting in these respects ("darkness," equivalent to fatal error, blind infatuation), yet one event, death, happeneth to both (Job 21, 26). 15. why was I—so anxious to become, &c. (2 Chronicles 1, 10). Then—Since such is the case, this—viz., pursuit of (worldly) wisdom, it can never fill the place of the true wisdom (Job 23, 23; Jeremiah 8, 9). 16. remembrance—a great aim of the worldly (Genesis 11, 4). The righteous alone attain it (Psalm 112, 6; Proverbs 10, 7). for ever—no perpetual memorial. that which now is—MAURER, "In the days to come all things shall be now long ago forgotten." 17. Disappointed in one experiment after another, he is weary of life. The backslider ought to have rather reasoned as the prodigal (Hosea 2, 6, 7; Luke 15, 17, 18). grievous unto me—(Job 10, 1). 18, 19. One hope alone was left to the disappointed worldling, the perpetuation of his name and riches, laboriously gathered, through his successor. For selfishness is mostly at the root of worldly parents' alleged providence for their children. But now the remembrance of how he himself, the piously-reared child of David, had disregarded his father's dying charge (1 Chronicles 23, 9), suggested the sad misgivings as to what Rehoboam, his son by an idolatrous Ammonitess, Naamah, should prove to be; a foreboding too fully realized (1 Kings 12; 14, 21-31). 20. I gave up as desperate all hope of solid fruit from my labour. 21. Suppose "there is a man," &c. equity—rather, "with success," as the Hebrew is rendered (ch. 11, 6), "prosper," though Margin gives "right." [HOLDEN and MAURER.] evil—not in itself, for this is the ordinary course of things, but "evil," as regards the chief good, that one should have toiled so fruitlessly. 23. Same sentiment as v. 21, interrogatively. 23. The only fruit he has is, not only sorrows in his days, but all his days are sorrows, and his travail (not only has griefs connected with it, but is itself) grief. 24. English Version gives a seemingly Epicurean sense, contrary to the general scope. The Hebrew, lit., is, "It is not good for man that he should eat," &c., "and should make his soul see good" (or "show his soul, i. e., himself, happy"), &c. [WEISS.] According to HOLDEN and WEISS, ch. 3, 12, 22 differ from this verse in the text and meaning; here he means, "It is not good that a man should feast himself, and falsely make as though his soul were happy;" he thus refers to a false pretending of happiness acquired by and for one's self; in ch. 3, 12, 22, and 5, 18, 19, to real seeing, or finding pleasure when God gives it. There it is said to be good for a man to enjoy with satisfaction and thankfulness the blessings which God gives; here it is said not to be good to take an unreal pleasure to one's self by feasting, &c. This also I saw—I perceived by experience that good (real pleasure) is not to be taken at will, but comes only from the hand of God [WEISS] (Psalm 4, 6; Isaiah 57, 19-21). Or as HOLDEN, "It is the appointment from the hand of God, that the sensualist has no solid satisfaction" (good). 25. hasten—after indulgences (Proverbs 7, 23; 19, 2), eagerly pursue such enjoyments. None can compete with me in this. If I, then, with all my opportunities of enjoyment, failed utterly to obtain solid pleasure of my own making, apart from God, who else can? God mercifully spares His children the sad experiment which Solomon made, by denying them the goods which they often desire. He gives them the fruits of Solomon's experience, without their paying the dear price at which Solomon bought it. 26. True, literally, in the Jewish theocracy; and in some measure in all ages (Job, 27, 16, 17; Proverbs 13, 22; 28, 8). Though the retribution be not so visible and immediate now as then, it is no less real. Happiness even here is more truly the portion of the godly (Psalm 84, 11; Matthew 5, 5; Mark 10, 29, 30; Romans 8, 23; 1 Timothy 4, 8). that he [the sinner] may give—i. e., unconsciously and in spite of himself. The godly Solomon had satisfaction in his riches and wisdom, when God gave them (2 Chronicles 1). The backsliding Solomon had no happiness when he sought it in them apart from God; and the riches which he heaped up became the prey of Shishak (2 Chronicles 12).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-22. Earthly pursuits are no doubt lawful in their proper time and order (v. 1-8), but unprofitable when out of time and place, as, for instance, when pursued as the solid and chief good (v. 9, 10); whereas God makes everything beautiful in its season, which man obscurely comprehends (v. 11). God allows man to enjoy moderately and virtuously His earthly gifts (v. 12, 13). What consoles us amidst the instability of earthly blessings is, God's counsels are immutable (v. 14). 1. Man has his appointed cycle of seasons and vicissitudes, as the sun, wind, and water (ch. 1, 5-7). purpose—as there is a fixed "season" in God's "purposes" (ex. gr., He has fixed the "time" when man is "to be born," and "to die," v. 2), so there is a lawful "time" for man to carry out his "purposes" and inclinations. God does not condemn, but approves of, the "use" of earthly blessings (v. 12); it is the "abuse" that He condemns, the making them the chief end (1 Corinthians 7, 31). The earth, without human desires, love, taste, joy, sorrow, would be a dreary waste, without water; but, on the other hand, the misplacing and excess of them, as of a flood, need control. Reason and revelation are given to control them. 2. time to die—(Psalm 81, 15; Hebrews 9, 27). plant—A man can no more reverse the times and order of "planting," and of "digging up," and transplanting, than he can alter the times fixed for his "birth" and "death." To try to "plant" out of season is vanity, however good in season; so to make earthly things the chief end is vanity, however good they be in order and season. GILL takes it, not so well, fig., (Jeremiah 13. 7, 9; Amos 9. 15; Matthew 15. 13). 3. time to kill—viz., judicially, criminals; or, in wars of self-defence; not in malice. Out of this time and order, killing is murder. to heal—God has his times for “healing” (lit., Isaiah 38. 5, 21; fig., Deuteronomy 32. 39; Hosea 6. 1; spiritually, Psalm 147. 3; Isaiah 57. 19). To heal spiritually, before the sinner feels his wound, would be out of time, and so injurious. time to break down—cities, as Jerusalem, by Nebuchadnezzar. build up—as Jerusalem, in the time of Zerubbabel; spiritually (Amos 9. 11), “the set time” (Psalm 102. 13-16). 4. mourn—viz., for the dead (Genesis 23. 2). dance—as David before the ark (2 Samuel 6. 12-14; Psalm 30. 11); spiritually (Matthew 9. 15; Luke 6. 21; 15. 25). The Pharisees, by requiring sadness out of time, erred seriously. 5. cast away stones—as out of a garden or vineyard (Isaiah 5. 2). gather—for building, fig., the Gentiles, once cast-away stones, were in due time made parts of the spiritual building (Ephesians 2. 19, 20), and children of Abraham (Matthew 3. 9); so the restored Jews hereafter (Psalm 102. 13, 14; Zechariah 9. 16). refrain . . . embracing—(Joel 2. 16; 1 Corinthians 7. 5, 6.) 6. time to get—ex. gr., to gain honestly a livelihood (Ephesians 4. 28). lose—when God wills losses to us, then is our time to be content. keep—not to give to the idle beggar (2 Thessalonians 3. 10). cast away—in charity (Proverbs 11. 24); or to part with the dearest object, rather than the soul (Mark 9. 43). To be careful is right in its place, but not when it comes between us and Jesus Christ (Luke 10. 40-42). 7. rend—garments, in mourning (Joel 2. 13). Fig., nations, as Israel from Judah, already foretold, in Solomon’s time (1 Kings 11. 30, 31), to be “sewed” together hereafter (Ezekiel 37. 15, 22). silence—(Amos 5. 13), in a national calamity, or that of a friend (Job 2. 13); also not to murmur under God’s visitation (Leviticus 10. 3; Psalm 39. 1, 2, 9). 8. hate—ex. gr., sin, lusts (Luke 14. 26); i. e., to love God so much more as to seem in comparison to hate “father or mother,” when coming between us and God. time of war . . . peace—(Luke 14. 31). 9. But these earthly pursuits, whilst lawful in their season, are “unprofitable” when made by man, what God never intended them to be, the chief good. Solomon had tried to create an artificial forced joy, at times when he ought rather to have been serious; the result, therefore, of his labour to be happy, out of God’s order, was disappointment. “A time to plant” (v. 2), refers to his planting (ch. 2. 5); “laugh” (v. 4), to ch. 2. 1, 2, “his mirth,” “laughter;” “build up,” “gather stones” (v. 3, 5), to his “building” (ch. 2. 4); “embrace,” “love,” to his “princess” (note, ch. 2. 8); “get” (perhaps also “gather,” v. 5, 6), to his “gathering” (ch. 2. 8). All these were of no “profit,” because not in God’s time and order of bestowing happiness. 10. (Ch. 1. 13). 11. his time—i. e., in its proper season (Psalm 1. 3), opposed to worldlings putting earthly pursuits out of their proper time and place (note v. 9). set the world in their heart—given them capacities to understand the world of nature as reflecting God’s wisdom in its beautiful order and times (Romans 1. 19, 20). “Everything” answers to “world,” in the parallelism. so that—i. e., but in such a manner that man only sees a portion, not the whole “from beginning to end” (ch. 8. 17; Job 26. 14; Romans 11. 33; Revelation 15. 4). PARKHURST, for “world,” translates, “Yet He hath put obscurity in the midst of them,” lit., a secret; so man’s mental dimness of sight as to the full mystery of God’s works. So HOLDEN and WEISS. This incapacity for “finding out” (comprehending) God’s work is chiefly the fruit of the fall. The worldling ever since, not knowing God’s time and order, labours in vain, because out of time and place. 12. in them—in God’s works (v. 11), as far as relates to man’s duty. Man cannot fully comprehend them, but he ought joyfully to receive (“rejoice in”) God’s gifts, and “do good” with them to himself and to others. This is never out of season (Galatians 6. 9, 10). Not sensual joy and self-indulgence (Philippians 4. 4; James 4. 16, 17). 13. Lit., “And also as to every man who eats,” &c., “this is the gift of God” (v. 22; ch. 5. 18). When received as God’s gifts, and to God’s glory, the good things of life are enjoyed in their due time and order (Acts 2. 46; 1 Corinthians 10. 31; 1 Timothy 4. 3, 4). 14. (1 Samuel 3. 12; 2 Samuel 23. 5; Psalm 80. 34; Matthew 24. 35; James 1. 17.) for ever—as opposed to man’s perishing labours (ch. 2. 15-18). any thing taken from it—opposed to man’s “crooked and wanting” works (ch. 1. 15; 7. 13). The event of man’s labours depends wholly on God’s immutable purpose. Man’s part, therefore, is to do and enjoy every earthly thing in its proper season (v. 12, 13), not setting aside God’s order, but observing deep reverence towards God; for the mysteriousness and unchangeableness of God’s purposes are designed to lead “man to fear before Hlm.” Man knows not the event of each act, otherwise he would think himself independent of God. 15. Resumption of ch. 1. 9. Whatever changes there be, the succession of events is ordered by God’s “everlasting” laws (v. 14), and returns in a fixed cycle. requireth that . . . past—after many changes, God’s law requires the return of the same cycle of events, as in the past, lit., that which is driven on. LXX. and Syriac translate, “God requireth (i. e., avengeth) the persecuted man;” a transition to v. 16, 17. The parallel clauses of the verse support English Version. 16. Here a difficulty is suggested. If God “requires” events to move in their perpetual cycle, why are the wicked allowed to deal unrighteously in the place where injustice ought least of all to be, viz., “the place of judgment” (Jeremiah 12. 1)? 17. Solution of it. There is a coming judgment in which God will vindicate His righteous ways. The sinner’s “time” of his unrighteous “work” is short. God also has His “time” and “work” of judgment; and, meanwhile, is overruling, for good at last, what seems now dark. Man cannot now “find out” the plan of God’s ways (v. 11; Psalm 97. 2). If judgment instantly followed every sin, there would be no scope for free-will, faith, and perseverance of saints in spite of difficulties. The previous darkness will make the light at last the more glorious. there—(Job 3. 17-19) in eternity, in the presence of the Divine Judge, opposed to the “there,” in the human place of judgment (v. 16); so “from thence” (Genesis 49. 24). 18. estate—the estate of fallen man is so ordered (these wrongs are permitted), that God might “manifest,” i. e., thereby prove them, and that they might themselves see their mortal frailty, like that of the beasts. sons of men—rather, sons of Adam, a phrase used for fallen men. The toleration of injustice until the judgment is designed to “manifest” men’s characters in their fallen state, to see whether the oppressed will bear themselves aright amidst their wrongs, knowing that the time is short, and there is a coming judgment. The oppressed share in death, but the comparison to “beasts” applies especially to the ungodly oppressors (Psalm 49. 12, 20); they too need to be “manifested” (proved), whether, considering that they must soon die as the “beasts,” and fearing the judgment to come, they will repent (Daniel 4. 27). 19. Lit., “For the sons of men (Adam) are a mere chance, as also the beast is a mere chance.” These words can only be the sentiments of the skeptical oppressors. God’s delay in judgment gives scope for the “manifestation” of their infidelity (ch. 8. 11; Psalm 55. 19; 2 Peter 3. 3, 4). They are “brute beasts,” morally (v. 18; Jude 10); and they end by maintaining that man, physically, has no pre-eminence over the beast, both alike being “fortuitous.” Probably this was the language of Solomon himself in his apostasy. He answers it in v. 21. If v. 19, 20, be his words, they express only that as regards liability to death, excluding the future judgment, as the skeptic oppressors do, man is on a level with the beast. Life is “vanity,” if regarded independently of religion. But v. 21 points out the vast difference between them in respect to the future destiny; also (v. 17) beasts have no “judgment” to come. breath—vitality. 21. Who knoweth—Not doubt of the destination of man’s spirit (ch. 12. 7); but “how few, by reason of the outward mortality to which man is as liable as the beast, and which is the ground of the skeptic’s argument, comprehend the wide difference between man and the beast” (Isaiah 53. 1). The Hebrew expresses the difference strongly,

"The spirit of man that ascends, it belongeth to on high; but the spirit of the beast that descends, it belongeth to below, even to the earth." Their destinations and proper element differ utterly. [WEISS.] 22. (Cf. v. 12; ch. 5. 13.) Inculcating a thankful enjoyment of God's gifts, and a cheerful discharge of man's duties, founded on fear of God; not as the sensualist (ch. 11. 9); not as the anxious money-seeker (ch. 2. 23; 5. 10-17). his portion—in the present life. If it were made his main portion, it would be "vanity" (ch. 2. 1; Luke 16. 25). for who, &c.—our ignorance as to the future, which is God's "time" (v. 11), should lead us to use the present time in the best sense, and leave the future to His infinite wisdom (Matthew 6. 20, 25, 31-34).

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-16. 1. returned—viz., to the thought set forth (ch. 3. 16; Job 35. 9). power—MAURER, not so well, "violence." no comforter—twice said to express continued suffering without any to give comfort (Isalah 53. 7). 2. A profane sentiment if severed from its connection; but just in its bearing on Solomon's scope. If religion were not taken into account (ch. 3. 17, 19), to die as soon as possible would be desirable, so as not to suffer or witness "oppressions;" and still more so, not to be born at all (ch. 7. 1). Job (3. 13; 21. 7), David (Psalm 73. 3, &c.), Jeremiah (12. 1), Habakkuk (1. 13), all passed through the same perplexity, until they went into the sanctuary, and looked beyond the present to the "judgment" (Psalm 73. 17; Habakkuk 2. 20; 3. 17, 18). Then they saw the need of delay, before completely punishing the wicked, to give space for repentance, or else for accumulation of wrath (Romans 2. 15); and before completely rewarding the godly, to give room for faith and perseverance in tribulation (Psalm 92. 7-12). Earnests, however, are often even now given, by partial judgments, of the future, complete one, to assure us, in spite of difficulties, that God governs the earth. 3. seen—nor experienced. 4. right—rather (as ch. 2. 21, note), prosperous. Prosperity, which men so much covet, is the very source of provoking oppression (v. 1) and "envy," so far is it from constituting the chief good. 5. Still the "fool" (the wicked oppressor) is not to be envied even in this life, who "folds his hands together" in idleness (Proverbs 6. 10; 24. 33), living on the means he wrongfully wrests from others; for such a one "eateth his own flesh," i. e., is a self-tormentor, never satisfied, his spirit preying on itself (Isalah 9. 20; 49. 26). 6. Hebrew, "One open hand (palm) full of quietness, than both closed hands full of travail." "Quietness" (mental tranquility flowing from honest labour), opposed to "eating one's own flesh" (v. 5), also opposed to anxious labour to gain (v. 8; Proverbs 15. 16, 17; 16. 8). 7. A vanity described in v. 8. 8. not a second—no partner. child—"son or brother," put for any heir (Deuteronomy 25. 5-10). eye—(Ch. 1. 8.) The miser would not be able to give an account of his infatuation. 9. Two—opposed to "one" (v. 8). Ties of union, marriage, friendship, religious communion, are better than the selfish solitariness of the miser (Genesis 2. 18). reward—advantage accrues from their efforts being conjoined. TALMAN says, "A man without a companion is like a left hand without the right." 10. if they fall—if the one or other fall, as may happen to both, viz., into any distress of body, mind, or soul. 11. (1 Kings 1. 1.) The image is taken from man and wife, but applies universally to the warm sympathy derived from social ties. So Christian ties (Luke 24. 32; Acts 28. 15). 12. one—enemy. threefold cord—proverbial for a combination of many—ex. gr., husband, wife, and children (Proverbs 11. 14); so Christians (Luke 10. 1; Colossians 2. 2, 19). Untwist the cord, and the separate threads are easily "broken." 13. The "threefold cord" of social ties suggests the subject of civil government. In this case too, he concludes that kingly power confers no lasting happiness. The "wise" child, though a supposed case of Solomon, answers, in the event foreseen by the Holy Ghost, to Jeroboam, then a poor but valiant youth, once a "servant" of Solomon, and (1 Kings 11. 26-40) appointed by God through the prophet Ahijah to be heir of the kingdom of the ten tribes about to be rent from Rehoboam. The "old and foolish king" answers to Solomon himself, who had lost his wisdom, when, in defiance of two warnings of God (1 Kings 3. 14; 9. 2-9), he forsook God. will no more be admonished—knows not yet how to take warning (see Margin). God had by Ahijah already intimated the judgment coming on Solomon (1 Kings 11. 11-13). 14. out of prison—Solomon uses this phrase of a supposed case, ex. gr., Joseph raised from a dungeon to be lord of Egypt. His words are at the same time so framed by the Holy Ghost that they answer virtually to Jeroboam, who fled to escape a "prison" and death from Solomon, to Shishak of Egypt (1 Kings 11. 40). This unconscious presaging of his own doom, and that of Rehoboam, constitutes the irony. David's elevation from poverty and exile, under Saul (which may have been before Solomon's mind), had so far their counterpart in that of Jeroboam. whereas . . . becometh poor—rather, "though he (the youth) was born poor in his kingdom" (in the land where afterwards he was to reign). 15. "I considered all the living," the present generation, in relation to ("with") the "second youth" (the legitimate successor of the "old king," as opposed to the "poor youth," the one first spoken of, about to be raised from poverty to a throne), i. e., Rehoboam. in his stead—the old king's. 16. Notwithstanding their now worshipping the rising a sun, the heir-apparent, I reflected that "there were no bounds (no stability (2 Samuel 15. 6; 20. 1), no check on the love of innovation) of all that have been before them," i. e., the past generation; so "also they that come after," i. e., the next generation, "shall not rejoice in him," viz., Rehoboam. The parallel, "shall not rejoice," fixes the sense of "no bounds," no permanent adherence, though now men rejoice in him.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-20. 1. From vanity connected with kings, he passes to vanities (v. 7) which may be fallen into in serving the King of kings, even by those who, convinced of the vanity of the creature, wish to worship the Creator. Keep thy foot—In going to worship, go with considerate, circumspect, reverent feeling. The allusion is to the taking off the shoes, or sandals, in entering a temple (Exodus 3. 5; Joshua 5. 15, which passages perhaps gave rise to the custom). WEISS needlessly reads, "Keep thy feast days" (Exodus 23. 14, 17; the three great feasts). hear—rather, "To be ready (to draw nigh with the desire) to hear (obey) is a better sacrifice than the offering of fools." [HOLDEN.] (Vulgate; Syriac.) (Psalm 51. 16, 17; Proverbs 21. 3; Jeremiah 6. 20; 7. 21-23; 14. 12; Amos 5. 21-24.) The warning is against mere ceremonial self-righteousness, as in ch. 7. 12. Obedience is the spirit of the law's requirements (Deuteronomy 10. 12). Solomon sorrowfully looks back on his own neglect of this (cf. 1 Kings 8. 63 with 11. 4, 6). Positive precepts of God must be kept, but will not stand instead of obedience to His moral precepts. The last provided no sacrifice for wilful sin (Numbers 15. 30, 31; Hebrews 10. 26-29). 2. rash—opposed to the considerate reverence ("keep thy foot," v. 1). This verse illustrates v. 1, as to prayer in the house of God ("before God," Isaiah 1. 12); so v. 4-6, as to vows. The remedy to such vanities is stated (v. 6), "Fear thou God. God is in heaven—Therefore He ought to be approached with carefully-weighted words, by thee, a frail creature of earth. 3. As much "business," engrossing the mind, gives birth to incoherent "dreams," so many words, uttered inconsiderately in prayer, give birth to and betray "a fool's speech" (ch. 10. 14). [HOLDEN and WEISS.] But v. 7 implies that the "dream" is not a comparison, but the vain thoughts of the fool (sinner, Psalm 73. 20), arising from multiplicity of (worldly) "business." His "dream" is, that God hears him for his much speaking (Matthew 6. 7), independently of the frame of mind. [English Version and MAURER.] "Fool's voice" answers to "dream" in the parallel; it comes by the many "words" flowing from the fool's "dream." 4. Hasty words in prayer (v. 2, 3) suggests the subject of hasty vows. A vow should not be hastily made (Judges 11. 35; 1 Samuel 14. 24). When made, it must be kept (Psalm 76. 11), even as God keeps His word to us (Exodus 12. 41, 51; Joshua 21. 45). 5. (Deuteronomy 23. 21, 23.) G. thy flesh—vow not with "thy mouth" a vow (ex. gr., fasting), which the lusts of thy flesh (body, Margin, ch. 2. 3) may tempt thee to break (Proverbs 20. 25). angel—the "messenger" of God (Job 33. 23); minister (Revelation 1. 20); i. e., the priest (Malachi 2. 7) "before" whom a breach of a vow was to be confessed (Leviticus 5. 4, 5). We, Christians, in our vows (ex. gr., at baptism, the Lord's Supper, &c.) vow in the presence of Jesus Christ, "the angel of the covenant" (Malachi 3. 1), and of ministering angels as witnesses (1 Corinthians 11. 10; 1 Timothy 5. 21). Extenuate not any breach of them as a slight error. 7. (Note v. 3.) God's service, which ought to be our chief good, becomes by "dreams" (foolish fancies as of God's requirements of us in worship, and random "words," positive "vanity." The remedy is, whatever fools may do, "Fear thou God" (ch. 12. 13). 8. As in ch. 3. 16, so here the difficulty suggests itself. If God is so exact in even punishing hasty words (v. 1-6), why does He allow gross injustice? In the remote "provinces," the "poor" often had to put themselves for protection from the inroads of Philistines, &c., under chieftains, who oppressed them even in Solomon's reign (1 Kings 12. 4). the matter—lit., the pleasure, or purpose (Isaiah 53. 10). Marvel not at this dispensation of God's will, as if He had abandoned the world. Nay, there is coming a capital judgment at last, and an earnest of it in partial punishments of sinners meanwhile. higher than the highest—(Daniel 7. 18.) regardeth—(2 Chronicles 16. 9.) there be higher—plural, i. e., the three persons of the Godhead, or else, "regardeth (not only the 'highest' kings, than whom He 'is higher,' but even the petty tyrants of the provinces, viz.) the high ones who are above them" (the poor). [WEISS.] 9. "The profit (produce) of the earth is (ordained for) (the common good of) all: even the king himself is served by (the fruits of) the field" (2 Chronicles 26. 10). Therefore the common Lord of all, high and low, will punish at last those who rob the "poor" of their share in it (Proverbs 22. 22, 23; Amos 8. 4-7). 10. Not only will God punish at last, but meanwhile the oppressive gainers of "silver" find no solid "satisfaction" in it. shall not be satisfied—so the oppressor "eateth his own flesh" (ch. 4. 1, 5, note). with increase—is not satisfied with the gain that he makes. 11. they . . . that eat them—the rich man's dependants (Psalm 23. 5). 12. Another argument against anxiety to gain riches. "Sleep . . . sweet" answers to "quietness" (ch. 4. 6); "not suffer . . . sleep," to " vexation of spirit." Fears for his wealth, and an overloaded stomach without "labouring" (cf. ch. 4. 5), will not suffer the rich oppressor to sleep. 13, 14. Proofs of God's judgments even in this world (Proverbs 11. 81). The rich oppressor's wealth provokes enemies, robbers, &c. Then, after having kept it for an expected son, he loses it beforehand by misfortune ("by evil travail"), and the son is born to be heir of poverty. Ch. 2. 19, 23 gives another aspect of the same subject. 16. Even supposing that he loses not his wealth before death, then i. e., at least he must go stripped of it all (Psalm 49. 17). laboured for . . . wind—(Hosea 12. 1; 1 Corinthians 9. 26). 17. eateth—appropriately put for "liveth" in general, as connected with v. 11, 12, 18. darkness—opposed to "light (joy) of countenance" (ch. 8. 1; Proverbs 16. 15). wrath—fretfulness, lit., "His sorrow is much, and his infirmity (of body) and wrath." 18. Returns to the sentiment (ch. 3. 12, 13, 22), translate, "Behold the good which I have seen, and which is becoming" (in a man). which God giveth—viz., both the good of his labour and his life. his portion—legitimately. It is God's gift that makes it so when regarded as such. Such a one will use, not abuse, earthly things (1 Corinthians 7. 31). Opposed to the anxious life of the covetous (v. 10, 17). 19. As v. 18 refers to the "labouring" man (v. 12), so v. 19 to the "rich" man, who gets wealth not by "oppression" (v. 8), but by "God's gift." He is distinguished also from the "rich" man (ch. 6. 2) in having received by God's gift not only "wealth," but also "power to eat thereof," which that one has not. "To take his portion" limits him to the lawful use of wealth, not keeping back from God His portion while enjoying his own.

20. He will not remember much (looking back with disappointment, as the ungodly do (ch. 2. 11) on) the days of his life. answereth . . . in the joy—God answers his prayers in giving him "power" to enjoy his blessings. GESSENIUS and Vulgate translate, "For God (so) occupies him with joy," &c., that he thinks not much of the shortness and sorrows of life. HOLDEN, "Though God gives not much (as to real enjoyment), yet he remembers (with thankfulness) the days; for (he knows) God exercises him by the joy," &c. (tries him by prosperity), so Margin, but English Version is simplest.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-12. 1. common—or else more lit., great upon man, falls heavily upon man. 2. for his soul—i. e., his enjoyment. God giveth him not power to eat—this distinguishes him from the "rich" man in ch. 5. 19. "God hath given" distinguishes him also from the man who got his wealth by "oppression" (ch. 5. 8, 10). stranger—those not akin, nay, even hostile to him (Jeremiah 51. 51; Lamentations 5. 2; Hosea 7. 9). He seems to have it in his "power" to do as he will with his wealth, but an unseen power gives him up to his own avarice: God wills that he should toil for "a stranger" (ch. 2. 26), who has found favour in God's sight. 3. Even if a man (of this character) have very many (equivalent to "a hundred," 2 Kings 10. 1) children, and not have a "stranger" as his heir (v. 2), and live long ("days of years" express the brevity of life at its best, Genesis 47. 9), yet enjoy no real "good" in life, and lie unhonoured, without "burial," at death (2 Kings 9. 26, 35), the embryo is better than he. In the East to be without burial is the greatest degradation. "Better the fruit that drops from the tree before it is ripe than that left to hang on till rotten." [HENRY.] 4. he—rather it, "the untimely birth." So "its" not "his name." with vanity—to no purpose; a type of the driftless existence of him who makes riches the chief good. darkness—of the abortive; a type of the unhonoured death and dark future beyond the grave of the avaricious. 5. this—yet "it has more rest than" the toiling, gloomy miser. 6. If the miser's length of "life" be thought to raise him above the abortive, Solomon answers, long life, without enjoying real good, is but lengthened misery, and riches cannot exempt him from going whither "all go." He is fit neither for life, nor death, nor eternity. 7. man—rather, "the man," viz., the miser (v. 3-6). For not all men labour for the mouth, i. e., for selfish gratification. appetite—Hebrew, the soul. The insatiability of the desire prevents that which is the only end proposed in toils, viz., self-gratification; "the man" thus gets no "good" out of his wealth (v. 3). 8. For—However. [MAURER.] The "for" means (in contrast to the insatiability of the miser), For what else is the advantage which the wise man hath above the fool? What (advantage, i. e., superiority, above him who knows not how to walk upright) hath the poor who knoweth to walk before the living? i. e., to use and enjoy life aright (ch. 5. 18, 19), a cheerful, thankful, godly "walk" (Psalm 116. 9). 9. Answer to the question in v. 8. This is the advantage: "Better is the sight of the eyes (the wise man's godly enjoyment of present seen blessings) than (the fool's) wandering, lit., walking (Psalm 73. 9), of the desire," i. e., vague, insatiable desires for what he has not (v. 7; Hebrews 13. 5). this—restless wandering of desire, and not enjoying contentedly the present (1 Timothy 6. 6, 8).

10. Part II. here begins. Since man's toils are vain, what is the chief good? (v. 12). The answer is contained in the rest of the book. "That which hath been (man's various circumstances) is named already (not only has existed (ch. 1. 9; 3. 15), but has received its just name, 'vanity,' long ago), and it is known that it (vanity) is man" (Hebrew, Adam, equivalent to man "of red dust," as his Creator appropriately named him from his frailty). neither may he contend, &c.—(Romans 9. 20.) 11. "Seeing" that man cannot escape from the "vanity," which by God's "mighty" will is inherent in earthly things, and cannot call in question God's wisdom in these dispen-nations (equivalent to "contend," &c.) "what is man the better" of these vain things as regards the chief good? None whatever. 12. For who knoweth, &c.—The ungodly know not what is really "good" during life, nor "what shall be after them," i. e., what will be the event of their undertakings (ch. 3. 22; 8. 7). The godly might be tempted to "contend with God" (v. 10) as to His dispensations; but they cannot fully know the wise purposes served by them now and hereafter. Their sufferings from the oppressors are more really good for them than cloudless prosperity; sinners are being allowed to fill up their measure of guilt. Retribution in part vindicates God's ways even now. The judgment shall make all clear. In ch. 7. he states what is good, in answer to this verse.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-29. 1. (See note, ch. 6. 12.) name—character; a godly mind and life; not mere reputation with man, but what a man is in the eyes of God, with whom the name and reality are one thing (Isaiah 9. 6). This alone is "good," whilst all else is "vanity" when made the chief end. ointment—used lavishly at costly banquets, and peculiarly refreshing in the sultry East. The Hebrew for name and for ointment, have a happy paronomasia, Sheem, Shemen. "Ointment" is fragrant only in the place where the person is whose head and garment are scented, and only for a time. The "name" given by God to His child (Revelation 3. 12) is for ever and in all lands. So in the case of the woman who received an everlasting name from Jesus Christ, in reward for her precious ointment (Isaiah 58. 5; Mark 14. 3-9). Jesus Christ Himself hath such a name, as the Messiah, equivalent to Anointed (Song of Solomon 1. 3). and the day of [his] death, &c.—not a general censure upon God for creating man; but, connected with the previous clause, death is to him, who hath a godly name, "better" than the day of his birth; "far better," as Philippians 1. 23 hath it. 2. Proving that it is not a sensual enjoyment of earthly goods which is meant in ch. 3. 13; 5. 18. A thankful use of these is right, but frequent feasting Solomon had found dangerous to piety in his own case. So Job's fear (ch. 1. 4, 5). The house of feasting often shuts out thoughts of God and eternity. The sight of the dead in the "house of mourning" causes "the living" to think of their own "end." 3. Sorrow—Such as arises from serious thoughts of eternity. laughter—reckless mirth (ch. 2. 2). by the sadness . . . better—(Psalm 126. 5, 6; 2 Corinthians 4. 17; Hebrews 12. 10, 11). MAURER translates, "In sadness of countenance there is (may be) a good (cheerful) heart." So Hebrew, for "good," equivalent to cheerful (ch. 11. 9); but the parallel clause supports English Version. 5. (Psalm 141. 4, 5). Godly reproof offends the flesh, but benefits the spirit. Fools' songs in the house of mirth please the flesh, but injure the soul. 6. The "crackling" answers to the loud merriment of fools. It is the very fire consuming them which produces the seeming merry noise (Joel 2. 5). Their light soon goes out in the black darkness. There is a paronomasia in the Hebrew, Sirim (thorns), Sir (pot). The wicked are often compared to "thorns" (2 Samuel 23. 6; Nahum 1. 10). Dried cow-dung was the common fuel in Palestine; its slowness in burning makes the quickness of a fire of thorns the more graphic, as an image of the sudden end of fools (Psalm 118. 12). 7. oppression—recurring to the idea (ch. 3. 16; 5. 8). Its connection with v. 4-6 is, the sight of "oppression" perpetrated by "fools" might tempt the "wise" to call in question God's dispensations, and imitate the folly (equivalent to "madness") described (v. 5. 6). WEISS, for "oppression," translates, "distraction," produced by merriment. But ch. 5. 8 favours English Version. a gift—i. e., the sight of bribery in "places of judgment" (ch. 3. 16) might cause the wise to lose their wisdom (equivalent to "heart,") (Job 12. 6; 21. 8, 7; 24. 1, &c.). This suits the parallelism better than "a heart of gifts;" a benevolent heart, as WEISS. 8. connected with v. 7. Let the "wise" wait for "the end," and the "oppressions" which now (in "the beginning") perplex their faith, will be found by God's working to be overruled to their good.

"Tribulation worketh patience" (Romans 5. 3), which is infinitely better than "the proud spirit" that prosperity might have generated in them, as it has in fools (Psalm 73. 2, 3, 12-14, 17-26; James 5. 11). 9. angry—Impatient at adversity befalling thee, as Job was (ch. 5. 2; Proverbs 12. 16). 10. Do not call in question God's ways in making thy former days better than thy present, as Job did (ch. 29. 2-3). The very putting of the question argues that heavenly "wisdom" (Margin) is not as much as it ought made the chief good with thee. 11. Rather, "Wisdom, as compared with an inheritance, is good," i. e., is as good as an inheritance; "yea, better (lit., and a profit) to them that see the sun" (i. e., the living, ch. 11. 7; Job 3. 16; Psalm 49. 19). 12. Lit., (To be) in (i. e., under) the shadow (Isaiah 30. 2) of wisdom (is the same as to be) in (under) the shadow of money; wisdom no less shields one from the ills of life than money does. is, that—rather, "the excellency of the knowledge of wisdom giveth life," i. e., life in the highest sense, here and hereafter (Proverbs 3. 18; John 17. 3; 2 Peter 1. 3). Wisdom (religion) cannot be lost as money can. It shields one in adversity, as well as prosperity; money, only in prosperity. The question in v. 10 implies a want of it. 13. Consider as to God's work, that it is impossible to alter His dispensations; for who can, &c. straight . . . crooked—man cannot amend what God will be "wanting" and "adverse" (ch. 1. 15; Job 12. 14). 14. consider—resumed from v. 13. "Consider," i. e., regard it as "the work of God;" for "God has made (Hebrew, for 'set') this (adversity) also as well as the other" (prosperity). "Adversity" is one of the things which "God has made crooked," and which man cannot "make straight." He ought therefore to be "patient" (v. 8). after him—equivalent to "that man may not find anything (to blame) after God" (i. e., after "considering God's work," v. 13). Vulgate and Syriac, "against Him" (cf. v. 10; Romans 3. 4). 15. An objection entertained by Solomon "in the days of his vanity" (apostasy) (ch. 8. 14; Job 21. 7). just . . . perisheth—(1 Kings 21. 13.) Temporal not eternal death (John 10. 28). But see note v. 16; "just" is probably a self-justiciary. wicked . . . prolongeth—see the antidote to the abuse of this statement in ch. 8. 12. 16. HOLDEN makes v. 16 the scoffing inference of the objector, and v. 17 the answer of Solomon, now repentant. So (1 Corinthians 15. 32) the skeptic's objection; (v. 33) the answer. However, "Be not righteous over much," may be taken as Solomon's words, forbidding a self-made righteousness of outward performances, which would wrest salvation from God, instead of receiving it as the gift of His grace. It is a fanatical, pharisaical righteousness, separated from God; for the "fear of God" is in antithesis to it (v. 18; ch. 5. 3, 7; Matthew 6. 1-7; 9. 14; 23. 23, 24; Romans 10. 3; 1 Timothy 4. 3). over wise—(Job 11. 12; Romans 12. 3, 16), presumptuously self-sufficient, as if acquainted with the whole of Divine truth. destroy thyself—expose thyself to needless persecution, austerities and the wrath of God; hence to an untimely death. "Destroy thyself" answers to "perisheth" (v. 15), "righteous over much," to "a just man." Therefore in v. 15 it is self-justiciary, not a truly righteous man, that is meant. 17. over much wicked—so worded, to answer to "righteous over much." For if not taken thus, it would seem to imply that we may be wicked a little. "Wicked" refers to "wicked man" (v. 15); "die before thy time," to "prolongeth his life," antithetically. There may be a wicked man spared to "live long," owing to his avoiding gross excesses (v. 15). Solomon says, therefore, Be not so foolish (answering antithetically to "over wise," v. 16), as to run to such excess of riot, that God will be provoked to cut off prematurely thy day of grace (Romans 2. 5). The precept is addressed to a sinner. Beware of aggravating thy sin, so as to make thy case desperate. It refers to the days of Solomon's "vanity" (apostasy, v. 15), when only such a precept would be applicable. By LITOTES it includes, "Be not wicked at all." 18. this . . . this—the two opposite excesses (v. 16, 17), fanatical, self-wise righteousness, and presumptuous, foolhardy wickedness. he that feareth God shall come forth of them all—shall escape all such extremes (Proverbs 3. 7). 19. Hebrew, "The wisdom," i. e., the true wisdom, religion (2 Timothy 3. 15). than ten mighty—i. e., able and valiant generals (v. 12; ch. 9. 13-18; Proverbs 21. 22; 24. 5). These "watchmen wake in vain, except the Lord keep the city" (Psalm 127. 1). 20. Referring to v. 16. Be not self-righteous, seek not to make thyself "just" before God by a superabundance of self-imposed performances; "for true 'wisdom,' or 'righteousness,' shows that there is not a just man," &c. 21. As therefore thou being far from perfectly "just" thyself, hast much to be forgiven by God, do not take too strict account, as the self-righteous do (v. 16; Luke 18. 9, 11), and thereby shorten their lives (v. 15, 16), of words spoken against thee by others, ex. gr., thy servant; Thou art their "fellow-servant" before God (Matthew 18. 32-35). 22. (1 Kings 2. 44.) 23. All this—Resuming the "all" in v. 15; v. 15-22 is therefore the fruit of his dearly-bought experience in the days of his "vanity." I will be wise—I tried to "be wise," independently of God. But true wisdom was then "far from him," in spite of his human wisdom, which he retained by God's gift. So "over wise" (v. 16). 24. That . . . far off . . . deep—True wisdom is so when sought independently of "fear of God" (v. 18; Deuteronomy 30. 12, 13; Job 11. 7, 8; 28. 12-20 28; Psalm 64. 6; Romans 10. 6, 7). 25. Lit., I turned myself and mine heart to. A phrase peculiar to Ecclesiastes, and appropriate to the penitent turning back to commune with his heart on his past life. wickedness of folly—he is now a step further on the path of penitence than ch. 1. 17; 2. 12, where "folly" is put without "wickedness" prefixed. reason—rather, the right estimation of things. HOLDEN translates, also "foolishness (i. e., sinful folly, answering to 'wickedness' in the parallel) of madness" (i. e., of man's mad pursuits). 26. "I find" that, of all my sinful follies, none has been so ruinous a snare in seducing me from God as idolatrous women (1 Kings 11. 3, 4; Proverbs 5. 3, 4; 22. 14). As "God's favour is better than life," she who seduces from God is "more bitter than death," whose pleaseth God—as Joseph (Genesis 39. 2, 3, 9). It is God's grace alone that keeps any from falling. 37. this—viz., what follows in v. 28. counting one by one—by comparing one thing with another. [HOLDEN and MAURER.] account—a right estimate. But v. 28 more favours GESENIUS. "Considering women one by one." 28. Rather, referring to his past experience, "Which my soul sought further, but I found not." one man—i. e., worthy of the name, "man," "upright;" not more than one in a thousand of my courtiers (Job 33. 23; Psalm 12. 1). Jesus Christ alone of men fully realizes the perfect ideal of "man." "Chiefest among ten thousand" (Song of Solomon 5. 10). No perfect "woman" has ever existed, not even the Virgin Mary. Solomon, in the word "thousand," alludes to his three hundred wives and seven hundred concubines. Among these it was not likely that he should find the fidelity which one true wife pays to one husband. Connected with v. 26, not an unqualified condemnation of the sex, as Proverbs 12. 4; 31. 10, &c., prove. 29. The "only" way of accounting for the scarcity of even comparatively upright men and women is that, whereas God made man upright, they (men) have, &c. The only account to be "found" of the origin of evil, the great mystery of theology, is that given in Holy Writ (Genesis 2. 3). Among man's "inventions" was the one especially referred to in v. 26, the bitter fruits of which Solomon experienced, the breaking of God's primeval marriage law, joining one man to one woman (Matthew 19. 4, 5, 6). "Man" is singular, viz., Adam; "they," plural, Adam, Eve, and their posterity.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-17. 1. Praise of true wisdom continued (ch. 7. 11, &c.). "Who" is to be accounted "equal to the wise man?" "Who (like him) knoweth the interpretation" of God's providences (ex. gr., ch. 7. 8, 13, 14), and God's word (ex. gr., ch. 7. 29, Note; Proverbs 1. 6): face to shine—(Ch. 7. 14; Acts 6. 15.) A sunny countenance, the reflection of a tranquil conscience and serene mind. Communion with God gives it (Exodus 34. 29, 30). boldness—austerity. changed—into a benign expression by true wisdom (religion) (James 3. 17). MAURER translates, "The shining (brightness) of his face" doubled," arguing that the Hebrew noun for "boldness" is never used in a bad sense (Proverbs 4. 18). Or as MARGIN, strength (ch. 7. 19; Isaiah 40. 31; 2 Corinthians 3. 18). But the adjective is used in a bad sense (Deuteronomy 28. 50). 2. the king's—Jehovah, peculiarly the king of Israel in the theocracy; v. 3, 4, prove it is not the earthly king who is meant. the oath of God—the covenant which God made with Abraham and renewed with David; Solomon remembered Psalm 89. 35, "I have sworn," &c. (v. 36), and the penalties if David's children should forsake it (v. 30-32); inflicted on Solomon himself; yet God not "utterly" forsaking him (v. 33, 34). 3. hasty—rather, "Be not terror-struck so as to go out of His sight." Slavishly "terror-struck" is characteristic of the sinner's feeling toward God; he vainly tries to flee out of His sight (Psalm 139. 7); opposed to the "shining face" of filial confidence (v. 1; John 8. 33-36; Romans 8. 2; 1 John 4. 18). stand not—persist not. for he doeth—God inflicts what punishment He pleases on persisting sinners (Job 23. 13; Psalm 115. 3). True of none save God. 4. God's very "word" is "power." So the gospel word (Romans 1. 16; Hebrews 4. 12). who may say, &c. —(Job 9. 12; 33. 13; Isaiah 45. 9; Daniel 4. 35.) Scripture does not ascribe such arbitrary power to earthly kings. 5. feel—experience. time—the neglect of the right "times" causes much of the sinful folly of the spiritually unwise (3. 1-11). judgment—the right manner. [HOLDEN.] But as God's future "judgment" is connected with the "time for every purpose" in ch. 3. 17, so it is here. The punishment of persisting sinners (v. 3) suggests it. The wise man realizes the fact, that as there is a fit "time" for every purpose, so for the "judgment." This thought cheers him in adversity (ch. 7. 14; 8. 1). therefore the misery, &c.—because the foolish sinner does not think of the right "times" and the "judgment." 7. he—the sinner, by neglecting times (ex. gr., "the accepted time, and the day of salvation, 2 Corinthians 6. 2), is taken by surprise by the judgment (ch. 3. 22; 6. 12; 9. 12). The godly wise observe the due times of things (ch. 3. 1), and so, looking for the judgment, are not taken by surprise, though not knowing the precise "when" (1 Thessalonians 5. 2-4); they "know the time" to all saving purposes (Romans 13. 11). 8. spirit—breath of life (ch. 3. 19), as the words following require. Not "wind," as WEISS thinks (Proverbs 30. 4). This verse naturally follows the subject of "times" and "judgment" (v. 6, 7). discharge—alluding to the liability to military service of all above twenty years old (Numbers 1. 3), yet many were exempted (Deuteronomy 20. 5-8). But in that war (death) there is no exemption. those . . . given to—ill., the master of it. Wickedness can get money for the sinner, but cannot deliver him from the death temporal and eternal, which is its penalty (Isaiah 28. 15, 18). 9. his own hurt—the tyrannical ruler "hurts" not merely his subjects, but himself; so Rehoboam (1 Kings 12.); but the "time" of "hurt" chiefly refers to eternal ruin, incurred by "wickedness," at "the day of death" (v. 8), and the "time" of "judgment" (v. 6; Proverbs 8. 36). 10. the wicked—viz., rulers (v. 9). buried—with funeral pomp by man, though little meriting it (Jeremiah 22. 19); but this only formed the more awful contrast to their death temporal and eternal inflicted by God (Luke 16. 22, 23). come and gone from the place of the holy—went to and came from the place of judicature, where they sat as God's representatives (Psalm 82. 1-6), with pomp. [HOLDEN.] WEISS translates, "Buried and gone (utterly), even from the holy place they departed." As Joab, by Solomon's command, was sent to the grave from the "holy place" in the temple, which was not a sanctuary to murderers (Exodus 21. 14; 1 Kings 2. 28, 31). The use of the very word "bury" there makes this view likely; still "who had come and gone" may be retained. Joab came to the altar, but had to go from it; so the "wicked rulers" (v. 9) (including high priests) came to, and went from, the temple, on occasions of solemn worship, but did not thereby escape their doom. forgotten—(Proverbs 10. 7.) 11. The reason why the wicked persevere in sin: God's delay in judgment (Matthew 24. 48-51; 2 Peter 3. 8, 9). "They see not the smoke of the pit, therefore they dread not the fire,"

[SOUTH.] (Psalm 55. 19.) Joab's escape from the punishment of his murder of Abner, so far from "leading him to repentance," as it ought (Romans 2. 4), led him to the additional murder of Amasa. 12. He says this, lest the slumber should abuse the statement (ch. 7. 15), "A wicked man prolongeth his life." before him—lit., at His presence; reverently serve Him, realizing His continual presence. 13. neither shall he prolong—not a contradiction to v. 12. The "prolonging" of his days there is only seeming, not real. Taking into account his eternal existence, his present days, however seemingly long, are really short. God's delay (v. 11) exists only in man's short-sighted view. It gives scope to the sinner to repent, or else to fill up his full measure of guilt; and so, in either case, tends to the final vindication of God's ways. It gives exercise to the faith, patience, and perseverance of saints. shadow—(ch. 6. 12; Job 8. 9). 14. An objection is here started (entertained by Solomon in his apostasy), as in ch. 3. 16; 7. 15, to the truth of retributive justice, from the fact of the just and the wicked not now receiving always according to their respective deserts; a caviil, which would seem the more weighty to men living under the Mosaic covenant of temporal sanctions. The objector adds, as Solomon had said, that the worldling's pursuits are "vanity" (v. 10), "I say (not 'said') this also is vanity. Then I commend mirth," &c. [HOLDEN.] V. 14, 15 may, however, be explained as teaching a cheerful, thankful use of God's gifts "under the sun," i. e., not making them the chief good, as sensualists do, which ch. 2. 2; 7. 2, forbid; but in "the fear of God," as ch. 3. 12; 5. 18; 7. 18; 9. 7, opposed to the abstinence of the self-righteous ascetic (ch. 7. 16), and of the miser (ch. 5. 17). 15. no better thing, &c.—viz., for the "just" man, whose chief good is religion, not for the worldly. abide—Hebrew, adhere; not for ever, but it is the only sure good to be enjoyed from earthly labours (equivalent to "of his labour the days of his life.") Still, the language resembles the skeptical precept (1 Corinthians 15. 32), introduced only to be refuted; and "abide" is too strong language, perhaps, for a religious man to apply to "eating" and "mirth." 16. Reply to v. 14, 15. When I applied myself to observe man's toils after happiness (some of them so incessant as not to allow sufficient time for "sleep"), then (v. 17, the apodosis) I saw that man cannot find out (the reason of) God's inscrutable dealings with the "just" and with the "wicked" here (v. 14; ch. 3. 11; Job 5. 9; Romans 11. 33); his duty is to acquiesce in them as good, because they are God's, though he sees not all the reasons for them (Psalm 73. 16). It is enough to know "the righteous are in God's hand" (ch. 9. 1). "Over wise" (ch. 7. 16), i. e., Speculations above what is written are vain.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-18. 1. declare—rather, explore; the result of my exploring is this, that "the righteous, &c., are in the hand of God. No man knoweth either the love or hatred (of God to them) by all that is before them," i. e., by what is outwardly seen in His present dealings (ch. 8. 14, 17). However, from the sense of the same words, in v. 6, "love and hatred" seem to be the feelings of the wicked towards the righteous, whereby they caused to the latter comfort or sorrow. Translate, "Even the love and hatred" (exhibited towards the righteous, are in God's hand) (Psalm 76. 10; Proverbs 16. 7). "No man knoweth all that is before them." 2. All things . . . alike—not universally; but as to death. V. 2-10 are made by HOLDEN the objection of a skeptical sensualist. However, they may be explained as Solomon's language. He repeats the sentiment already implied in ch. 2. 14; 3. 20; 8. 14. one event—not eternally; but death is common to all. good—morally. clean—ceremonially. sacrificeth—allike to Josiah who sacrificed to God, and to Ahab who made sacrifice to Him cease. swareth—rashly and falsely. 3. Translate, "There is an evil above all (evils) that are done," &c., viz., that not only "there is one event to all," but "also the heart of the sons of men" makes this fact a reason for "madly" persisting in "evil while they live, and after that," &c., sin is "madness." the dead—(Proverbs 2. 18;

9. 13.) 4. For—rather Nevertheless. English Version rightly reads as the Margin, Hebrew, "that is joined," instead of the text, "who is to be chosen?" hope—not of mere temporal good (Job 14. 7); but of yet repenting and being saved. dog—metaphor for the vilest persons (1 Samuel 24. 14). lion—the noblest of animals (Proverbs 30. 30). better—as to hope of salvation; the noblest who die unconverted have no hope; the vilest, so long as they have life, have hope. 5. know that they shall die—and may thereby be led "so to number their days, that they may apply their hearts to wisdom" (ch. 7. 1-4; Psalm 90. 12). dead know not anything—i. e., so far as their bodily senses and worldly affairs are concerned (Job 14. 21; Isaiah 63. 16); also, they know no door of repentance open to them, such as is to all on earth. neither . . . reward—no advantage from their worldly labours (ch. 2. 18-22; 4. 9). memory—not of the righteous (Psalm 112. 6; Malachi 3. 16), but the wicked, who with all the pains to perpetuate their names (Psalm 49. 11) are soon "forgotten" (ch. 8. 10). 6. love, and . . . hatred, &c.—(referring to v. 1, where see the note). Not that these cease in a future world absolutely (Ezekiel 32. 27; Revelation 22. 11); but as the end of this verse shows, relatively to persons and things in this world. Man's love and hatred can no longer be exercised for good or evil in the same way as here; but the fruits of them remain. What he is found at death he remains for ever. "Envy," too, marks the wicked as referred to, since it was therewith that they assailed the righteous (v. 1, note). portion—their "portion" was "in this life" (Psalm 17. 14), that they now "cannot have any more." 7. Addressed to the "righteous wise," spoken of in v. 1. Being "in the hand of God," who now accepteth "thy works" in His service, as He has previously accepted thy person (Genesis 4. 4), thou mayest "eat, &c., with a cheerful (not sensually 'merry') heart" (ch. 3. 13; 5. 18; Acts 2. 46). 8. white—in token of joy (Isaiah 61. 3). Solomon was clad in white (JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 8. 7, 3); hence his attire is compared to the "lilies" (Matthew 6. 29), typical of the spotless righteousness of Jesus Christ, which the redeemed shall wear (Revelation 3. 18; 7. 14). ointment—(Psalm 23. 5), opposed to a gloomy exterior (2 Samuel 14. 2; Psalm 45. 7; Matthew 6. 17); typical, also (ch. 7. 1; Song of Solomon 1. 9). 9. wife . . . loveth—godly and true love, opposed to the "snares" of the "thousand" concubines (ch. 7. 28, 29), "among" whom Solomon could not find the true love which joins one man to one woman (Proverbs 5. 15, 18, 19; 18. 22; 19. 14). 10. "Whatsoever," viz., in the service of God. This and last verse plainly is the language of Solomon, not of a skeptic, as Holden would explain it. hand, &c.—(Margin, Leviticus 12. 8; Margin, 1 Samuel 10. 7.) thy might—diligence (Deuteronomy 6. 5; Margin, Jeremiah 48. 10). no work . . . in the grave—(John 9. 4; Revelation 14. 13.) "The soul's play-day is Satan's work-day; the idler the man the busier the tempter." [SOUTH.] 11. This verse qualifies the sentiment, v. 7-9. Earthly "enjoyments," however lawful in their place (ch. 3. 1), are to give way when any work to be done for God requires it. Reverting to the sentiment (ch. 8. 17), we ought, therefore, not only to work God's work "with might" (v. 10), but also with the feeling that the event is wholly "in God's hand" (v. 1). race . . . not to the swift—(2 Samuel 18. 23); spiritually (Zephaniah 3. 19; Romans 9. 16). nor . . . battle to . . . strong—(1 Samuel 17. 47; 2 Chronicles 14. 9, 11, 15; Psalm 33. 16). bread—livelihood. favour—of the great. chance—seemingly, really Providence. But as man cannot "find it out" (ch. 3. 11), he needs "with all might" to use opportunities. Duties are ours; events, God's. 12. his time—viz., of death (ch. 7. 15; Isaiah 13. 22). Hence the danger of delay in doing the work of God, as one knows not when his opportunity will end (v. 10). evil net—fatal to them. The unexpected suddenness of the capture is the point of comparison. So the second coming of Jesus Christ, "as a snare" (Luke 21. 35). evil time—as an "evil net," fatal to them. 13. Rather, "I have seen wisdom of this kind also," i. e., exhibited in the way which is described in what follows. [MAURER.] 14, 15. (2 Samuel 20. 16-22.) bulwarks—military works of besiegers. 15. poor—as to the temporal advantages of true wisdom, though it often saves others. It receives little reward from the world, which admires none save the rich and great. no man remembered—(Genesis 40, 23.) 16. Resuming the sentiment (ch. 7, 19; Proverbs 21, 22; 24, 5). poor man's wisdom is despised—not the poor man mentioned in v. 15; for his wisdom could not have saved the city, had "his words not been heard;" but poor men in general. So Paul (Acts 27, 11). 17. Though generally the poor wise man is not heard (v. 16), yet "the words of wise men, when heard in quiet (when calmly given heed to, as in v. 15), are more serviceable than," &c. ruleth—as the "great king" (v. 14). Solomon reverts to "the rulers to their own hurt" (ch. 8, 9). 18. one sinner, &c.—(Joshua 7, 1, 11, 12.) Though wisdom excels folly (v. 16; ch. 7, 19), yet a "little folly (equivalent to sin) can destroy much good," both in himself (ch. 10, 1; James 2, 10) and in others. "Wisdom" must, from the antithesis to "sinner," mean religion. Thus typically, the "little city" may be applied to the Church (Luke 12, 32; Hebrews 12, 22); the great king to Satan (John 12, 31); the despised poor wise man, Jesus Christ (Isaiah 53, 2, 3; Mark 6, 3; 2 Corinthians 8, 9; Ephesians 1, 7, 8; Colossians 2, 3).

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-20. 1. Following up ch. 9, 18. him that is in reputation—ex. gr., David (2 Samuel 12, 14); Solomon (1 Kings 11.); Jehoshaphat (2 Chronicles 18.; 19, 2); Josiah (2 Chronicles 35, 22). The more delicate the perfume, the more easily spoiled is the ointment. Common oil is not so liable to injury. So the higher a man's religious character is, the more hurt is caused by a sinful folly in him. Bad savour is endurable in oil, but not in what professes to be, and is compounded by the perfumer ("apothecary") for, fragrance. "Flies" answer to "a little folly" (sin), appropriately, being small (1 Corinthians 5, 6); also, "Beelzebub" means prince of flies. "Ointment" answers to "reputation" (ch. 7, 1; Genesis 34, 30). The verbs are singular, the noun plural, implying that each of the flies causes the stinking savour. 2. (Ch. 2, 14.) right—the right hand is more expert than the left. The godly wise is more on his guard than the foolish sinner, though at times he slip. Better a diamond with a flaw, than a pebble without one. 3. by the way—in his ordinary course; in his simplest acts (Proverbs 6, 12-14). That he "saith," virtually, "that he" himself, &c. [LXX.] But Vulgate, "He thinks that every one (else whom he meets) is a fool." 4. spirit—anger. yielding pacifieth—(Proverbs 15, 1.) This explains "leave not thy place;" do not in a resisting spirit withdraw from thy post of duty (ch. 8, 3). 5. as—rather, "by reason of an error." [MAURER and HOLDEN.] 6. rich—not in mere wealth, but in wisdom, as the antithesis to "folly" (for "foolish men") shows. So Hebrew, rich, equivalent to "liberal," in a good sense (Isaiah 32, 5). Mordecai and Haman (Esther 3, 1, 2; 6, 6-11). 7. servants upon horses—the worthless exalted to dignity (Jeremiah 17, 25); and vice versa (2 Samuel 15, 30). 8. The fatal results to kings of such an unwise policy; the wrong done to others recoils on themselves (ch. 8, 9); they fall into the pit which they dug for others (Esther 7, 10; Psalm 7, 15; Proverbs 26, 27). Breaking through the wise fences of their throne, they suffer unexpectedly themselves; as when one is stung by a serpent lurking in the stones of his neighbour's garden wall (Psalm 80, 12), which he maliciously pulls down (Amos 5, 19). 9. removeth stones—viz., of an ancient building. [WEISS.] His neighbour's landmarks. [HOLDEN.] Cuts out from the quarry. [MAURER.] endangered—by the splinters, or by the head of the hatchet, flying back on himself. Pithy aphorisms are common in the East. The sense is: Violations of true wisdom recoil on the perpetrators. 10. iron . . . blunt—in "cleaving wood" (v. 9), answering to the "fool set in dignity" (v. 6), who wants sharpness. More force has then to be used in both cases; but force without judgment "endangers" one's self. Translate, "If one hath blunted his iron." [MAURER.] The preference of rash to judicious counsellors, which entailed the pushing of matters by force, proved to be the "hurt" of Rehoboam (1 Kings 12).

wisdom is profitable to direct—to a prosperous issue. Instead of forcing matters by main "strength" to one's own hurt (ch. 9, 16, 18). 11. A "serpent will bite" if "enchantment" is not used; "and a babbling calumniator is no better." Therefore, as one may escape a serpent by charms (Psalm 58, 4, 5), so one may escape the sting of a calumniator by discretion (v. 12). [HOLDEN.] Thus, "without enchantment" answers to "not whet the edge" (v. 10), both expressing, figuratively, want of judgment. MAURER translates, "There is no gain to the enchanter" (Margin, "master of the tongue") from his enchantments, because the serpent bites before he can use them; hence the need of continual caution. Ver. 8-10, caution in acting; v. 11 and following verses, caution in speaking. 12. gracious—thereby he takes precaution against sudden injury (v. 11). swallow up himself—(Proverbs 10, 8, 14, 21, 32; 12, 13; 15, 22; 22, 11.) 13. Illustrating the folly and injuriousness of the fool's words; last clause of v. 12. 14. full of words—(ch. 5, 2.) a man cannot tell what shall be—(ch. 3, 22; 6, 12; 8, 7; 11, 2; Proverbs 27, 1.) If man, universally (including the wise man), cannot foresee the future, much less can the fool; his "many words" are therefore futile. 15. labour . . . wearieth—(Isaiah 55, 2; Habakkuk 2, 13.) knoweth not how to go to the city—proverb for ignorance of the most ordinary matters (v. 3); spiritually, the heavenly city (Psalm 107, 7; Matthew 7, 13, 14). MAURER connects v. 15 with the following verses. The labour (vexation) caused by the foolish (injurious) princes, v. 4-7 harasses him who "knows not how to go to the city," to ingratiate himself with them there. English Version is simpler. 16. a child—given to pleasures; behaves with childish levity. Not in years; for a nation may be happy under a young prince, as Josiah. eat in the morning—the usual time for dispensing justice in the East (Jeremiah 21, 12); here, given to feasting (Isaiah 5, 11; Acts 2, 15). 17. son of nobles—not merely in blood, but in virtue, the true nobility (Song of Solomon 7, 1; Isaiah 32, 5, 8). in due season—(ch. 3, 1), not until duty has first been attended to. for strength—to refresh the body, not for revelry (included in "drunkenness"). 18. building—lit., the joining of the rafters, viz., the kingdom (v. 16; Isaiah 3, 6; Amos 9, 11). hands—(ch. 4, 5; Proverbs 6, 10.) drop-peth—by neglect to repair the roof in time, the rain gets through. 19. Referring to v. 18. Instead of repairing the breaches in the commonwealth (equivalent to "building"), the princes "make a feast for laughter (v. 16), and wine maketh their life glad (Psalm 104, 15), and (but) money supplieth (answereth their wishes by supplying) all things," i. e., they take bribes to support their extravagance; and hence arise the wrongs that are perpetrated (v. 5, 6; ch. 3, 16; Isaiah 1, 23; 5, 23). MAURER takes "all things" of the wrongs to which princes are instigated by "money;" ex. gr., the heavy taxes, which were the occasion of Rehoboam losing ten tribes (1 Kings 12, 4, &c.). 20. thought—lit., consciousness. rich—the great. The language, as applied to earthly princes knowing the "thought," is figurative. But it literally holds good of the King of Kings (Psalm 139.), whose consciousness of every evil thought we should ever realize. bed-chamber—the most secret place (2 Kings 6, 12). bird of the air, &c.—proverbial (cf. Habakkuk 2, 11; Luke 19, 40); in a way as marvellous and rapid, as if birds or some winged messenger carried to the king information of the curse so uttered. In the East superhuman sagacity was attributed to birds (see my note, Job 28, 21; hence the proverb).

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-10. 1. Ver. 2 shows that charity is here incanted. bread—bread-corn. As in the Lord's prayer, all things needful for the body and soul. Solomon reverts to the sentiment (ch. 9, 10). waters—image from the custom of sowing seed by casting it from boats into the overflowing waters of the Nile, or in any marshy ground. When the waters receded, the grain in the alluvial soil sprang up (Isaiah 32, 20). "Waters" express multitudes, so v. 2; Revelation 17, 15; also the seemingly hopeless character of the recipients of the charity; but it shall prove at last to have been not thrown away (Isalah 40. 4). 2. portion—of thy bread. seven—the perfect number. eight—even to more than seven, i. e., to many (so "waters," v. 1), nay, even to very many in need (Job 5. 19; Micah 5. 5). evil—the day may be near, when you will need the help of those whom you have bound to you by kindnesses (Luke 16. 9). The very argument which covetous men use against liberality, viz., that bad times may come, the wise man uses for it. 3. clouds—answering to "evil" (v. 2), meaning, When the times of evil are fully ripe, evil must come; and speculations about it before hand, so as to prevent one sowing seed of liberality, are vain (v. 4). tree—once that the storm uproots it, it lies either northward or southward, according as it fell. So man's character is unchangeable, whether for hell or heaven, once that death overtakes him (Revelation 22. 11, 14, 15). Now is his time for liberality, before the evil days come (ch. 12. 1). 4. Therefore sow thy charity in faith, without hesitancy or speculation as to results, because they may not seem promising (ch. 9. 10). So in v. 1, man is told to "cast his bread-corn" on the seemingly unpromising "waters" (Psalm 126. 5, 6). The farmer would get on badly, who, instead of sowing and reaping, spent his time in watching the wind and clouds. 5. spirit—how the soul animates the body! Thus the transition to the formation of the body "in the womb" is more natural, than if with MAURER we translate it "wind" (ch. 1. 6; John 3. 8). bones . . . grow—(Job 10. 8, 9; Psalm 139. 15, 16.) knowest not the works of God—(Ch. 3. 11; 8. 17; 9. 12.) 6. morning . . . evening—early and late; when young and when old; in sunshine and under clouds. seed—of godly works (Hosea 10. 12; 2 Corinthians 9. 10; Galatians 6, 7). prosper—(Isalah 55. 10, 11.) both . . . alike—both the unpromising and the promising sowing may bear good fruit in others: certainly they shall to the faithful sower. 7. light—of life (ch. 7. 11; Psalm 49. 19). Life is enjoyable, especially to the godly. 8. But whilst man thankfully enjoys life, "let him remember" it will not last for ever. The "many days of darkness," i. e., the unseen world (Job 10. 21, 22; Psalm 88. 12), also days of "evil" in this world (v. 2) are coming; therefore sow the good seed whilst life and good days last, which are not too long for accomplishing life's duties. All that cometh—i. e., All that followeth in the evil and dark days is vain, as far as work for God is concerned (ch. 9. 10). 9. Rejoice—Not advice, but warning. So 1 Kings 22. 15, is Irony; if thou dost rejoice (carnally, ch. 2. 2; 7. 2, not moderately, as ch. 5. 18), &c., then "know that . . . God will bring thee into judgment" (ch. 3. 17; 12. 14). youth . . . youth—distinct Hebrew words, adolescence or boyhood (before v. 13), and full-grown youth. It marks the gradual progress in self-indulgence, to which the young especially are prone; they see the roses, but do not discover the thorns, until pierced by them. Religion will cost self-denial, but the woe of it infinitely more (Luke 14. 28). 10. sorrow—i. e., the lusts that end in "sorrow," opposed to "rejoice," and "heart cheer thee" (v. 9); Margin, "anger," i. e., all "ways of thine heart;" "remove," &c., is thus opposed to "walk in," &c. (v. 9). flesh—the bodily organ by which the sensual thoughts of the "heart" are embodied in acts. childhood—rather, boyhood; the same Hebrew word as the first, "youth" in v. 9. A motive for self-restraint; the time is coming when the vigour of youth on which thou rellest, will seem vain, except in so far as it has been given to God (ch. 12. 1). youth—lit., the dawn of thy days.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-14. 1. As ch. 11. 9, 10 showed what youths are to shun, so this verse shows what they are to follow. Creator—"Remember" that thou art not thine own, but God's property; for He has created thee (Psalm 100. 3). Therefore serve Him with thy "all" (Mark 12. 30), and with thy best days, not with the dregs of them (Proverbs 8. 17; 22. 6; Jeremiah 3. 4; Lamentations 3. 27). The Hebrew is Creators, plural, implying the plurality of persons, as in Genesis 1. 26; so Hebrew, Makers (Isalah 54. 5). while . . . not—i. e., before that (Proverbs 8. 26) the evil days come, viz., calamity and old age, when one can no longer serve God, as in youth (ch. 11. 2, 8). no pleasure—of a sensual kind (2 Samuel 19. 35; Psalm 90. 10). Pleasure in God continues to the godly old (Isalah 46. 4). 2. Illustrating "the evil days" (Jeremiah 13. 16). "Light," "sun," &c., express prosperity; "darkness," pain and calamity (Isalah 13. 10; 30. 26). clouds . . . after . . . rain—after rain sunshine (comfort) might be looked for, but only a brief glimpse of it is given, and the gloomy clouds (pains) return. 3. keepers of the house—viz., the hands and arms which protected the body, as guards do a palace (Genesis 49. 21; Job 4. 19; 2 Corinthians 5. 1), are now palsied. strong men . . . bow—(Judges 16. 25, 30.) Like supporting pillars, the feet and knees (Song of Solomon 5. 15); the strongest members (Psalm 147. 10). grinders—the molar teeth. cease—are idle, those that look out of the windows—the eyes; the powers of vision, looking out from beneath the eyelids, which open and shut like the casement of a window. 4. doors—the lips, which are closely shut together as doors, by old men in eating; for, if they did not do so, the food would drop out (Job 41. 14; Psalm 141. 3; Micah 7. 5). in the streets—i. e., toward the street, "the outer doors." [MAURER and WEISS.] sound of . . . grinding—the teeth being almost gone, and the lips "shut" in eating, the sound of mastication is scarcely heard, the bird—the cock. In the East all mostly rise with the dawn. But the old are glad to rise from their sleepless couch, or painful slumbers still earlier, viz., when the cock crows, before dawn (Job 7. 4). [HOLDEN.] The least noise awakens them. [WEISS.] daughters of music—the organs that produce and that enjoy music; the voice and ear. 5. that which is high—the old are afraid of ascending a hill. fears . . . in the way—even on the level highway they are full of fears of falling, &c. almond . . . flourish—in the East the hair is mostly dark. The white head of the old among the dark-haired is like an almond tree, with its white blossoms, among the dark trees around. [HOLDEN.] The almond tree flowers on a leafless stock in winter (answering to old age, in which all the powers are dormant), whilst the other trees are flowerless. GÆSENIUS takes the Hebrew for flourishes from a different root, casts off; when the old man loses his gray hairs, as the almond tree casts its white flowers. grasshopper—the dry, shrivelled, old man, his backbone sticking out, his knees projecting forwards, his arms backwards, his head down, and the apophyses enlarged, is like that insect. Hence arose the fable, that Tithonus in very old age was changed into a grasshopper. [PARKHURST.] "The locust raises itself to fly;" the old man about to leave the body is like a locust when it is assuming its winged form, and is about to fly. [MAURER.] a burden—viz., to himself. desire shall fail—satisfaction shall be abolished. For desire, Vulgate has "the caper tree," provocative of lust; not so well. long home—(Job 16. 22; 17. 13.) mourners—(Jeremiah 9. 17-20), hired for the occasion (Matthew 9. 23). 6. A double image to represent death, as v. 1-5, old age. (1.) A lamp of frail material, but gilded over, often in the East hung from roofs by a cord of silk and silver interwoven; as the lamp is dashed down and broken, when the cord breaks, so man at death; the golden bowl of the lamp answers to the skull, which, from the vital preciousness of its contents, may be called "golden;" "the silver cord" is the spinal marrow, which is white and precious as silver, and is attached to the brain. (2.) A fountain, from which water is drawn by a pitcher let down by a rope wound round a wheel; as, when the pitcher and wheel are broken, water can no more be drawn, so life ceases when the vital energies are gone. The "fountain" may mean the right ventricle of the heart; the "cistern," the left; the pitcher, the veins; the wheel, the aorta, or great artery. [SMITH.] The circulation of the blood, whether known or not to Solomon, seems to be implied in the language put by the Holy Ghost into his mouth. This gloomy picture of old age applies to those who have not "remembered their Creator in youth." They have none of the consolations of God, which they might have obtained in youth; it is now too late to seek them. A good old age is a blessing to the godly (Genesis 15. 15; Job 5. 26; Proverbs 16. 31; 20. 29). 7. dust—the dust-formed body. spirit—surviving the body; implying its immortality (ch. 3. 11). 8-12. A summary of the first part. 13, 14. A summary of the second. Vanity, &c.—Resumption of the sentiment with which the book began (ch. 1. 2; 1 John 2. 17). 9. gave good heed—lit., he weighed. The "teaching the people" seems to have been oral; the "proverbs," in writing. There must then have been auditories assembled to hear the inspired wisdom of the Preacher. See the explanation of "Kohēleth" in the Introduction and ch. 1. (1 Kings 4. 34). that which is written, &c.—rather (he sought) "to write down uprightly (or 'aright') words of truth." [HOLDEN and WEISS.] "Acceptable" means an agreeable style; "uprightly . . . truth," correct sentiment. 11. goads—piercing deeply into the mind (Acts 2. 37; 9. 5; Hebrew 4. 12); evidently inspired words, as the end of the verse proves. fastened—rather, on account of the Hebrew genders, (The words) "are fastened (in the memory) like nails." [HOLDEN.] masters of assemblies—rather, "the masters of collections (i. e., collectors of inspired sayings, Proverbs 25. 1), are given ('have published them as proceeding' [HOLDEN]) from one Shepherd," viz., the Spirit of Jesus Christ [WEISS] (Ezekiel 37. 24). However, the mention of "goads" favours the English Version,

"masters of assemblies," viz., under-shepherds, inspired by the Chief Shepherd (1 Peter 5. 2-4). SCHMIDT translates, "The masters of assemblies are fastened (made sure) as nails," so Isalah 22. 23. 12. (Note, ch. 1. 18.) many books—of mere human composition, opposed to "by these;" these inspired writings are the only sure source of "admonition." (over much) study—in mere human books, wears the body, without solidly profiting the soul. 13. The grand inference of the whole book. Fear God—The antidote to following creature-idols, and "vanities," whether self-righteousness (ch. 7. 16, 18), or wicked oppression and other evils (ch. 8. 12, 13), or mad mirth (ch. 2. 2; 7. 2-5), or self-mortifying avarice (ch. 8. 13, 17), or youth spent without God (ch. 11. 9; 12. 1). this is the whole duty of man—lit., this is the whole man, the full ideal of man, as originally contemplated, realized wholly by Jesus Christ alone; and, through Him, by saints now in part, hereafter perfectly (1 John 3. 22-24; Revelation 22. 14). 14. The future judgment is the test of what is "vanity," what solid, as regards the chief good, the grand subject of the book.

SONG OF SOLOMON.

INTRODUCTION.

THE Song of Solomon, called in the Vulgate and LXX., "The Song of songs," from the opening words. This title denotes its superior excellence, according to the Hebrew idiom; so holy of holies, equivalent to most holy (Exodus 29. 37); the heaven of heavens, equivalent to the highest heavens (Deuteronomy 10. 14). It is one of the five volumes (megillot) placed immediately after the Pentateuch in MSS. of the Jewish Scriptures. It is also fourth of the Hagiographa ("Cetubim," writings), or the third division of the Old Testament, the other two being the Law and the Prophets. The Jewish enumeration of the Cetubim is Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra (including Nehemiah), and Chronicles. Its canonicity is certain; it is found in all Hebrew MSS. of Scripture; also in the Greek LXX.; in the catalogues of Melito, bishop of Sardis, A. D. 170 (EUSEBIUS, H. E. iv. 26), and of others of the ancient Church.

Origen and Jerome tell us that the Jews forbade it to be read by any until he was thirty years old. It certainly needs a degree of spiritual maturity to enter aright into the holy mystery of love which it allegorically sets forth. To such as have attained this maturity, of whatever age they be, the Song of songs is one of the most edifying of the sacred writings. Rosenmuller justly says, The sudden transitions of the bride from the court to the grove are inexplicable, on the supposition that it describes merely human love. Had it been the latter, it would have been positively objectionable, and never would have been inserted in the holy canon. The allusion to "Pharaoh's chariots" (ch. 1. 9) has been made a ground for conjecturing that the love of Solomon and Pharaoh's daughter is the subject of the Song. But this passage alludes to a remarkable event in the history of the Old Testament Church, the deliverance from the hosts and chariots of Pharaoh at the Red Sea. (See, however, note there.) The other allusions are quite opposed to the notion; the bride is represented at times as a shepherdess (ch. 1. 7), "an abomination to the Egyptians" (Genesis 46. 34); so also ch. 1. 6; 3. 4; 4. 8; 5. 7 are at variance with it. The Christian fathers, Origen and Theodoret, compared the teaching of Solomon to a ladder with three steps; Ecclesiastes, natural (the nature of sensible things, vain); Proverbs, moral; Canticles, mystical (figuring the union of Christ and the Church). The Jews compared Proverbs to the outer court of Solomon's temple, Ecclesiastes to the holy place, and Canticles to the holy of holies. Understood allegorically, the Song is cleared of all difficulty. "Shulamith" (ch. 6. 13), the bride, is thus an appropriate name, Daughter of Peace being the feminine of Solomon, equivalent to the Prince of Peace. She by turns is a vinedresser, shepherdess, midnight inquirer, and prince's consort and daughter, and He a suppliant drenched with night-dews, and a king in His palace, in harmony with the various relations of the Church and Christ. As Ecclesiastes sets forth the vanity of love of the creature, Canticles sets forth the fullness of the love which joins believers and the Saviour. The entire economy of salvation, says Harris, aims at restoring to the world the lost spirit of love. God is love, and Christ is the embodiment of the love of God. As the other books of Scripture present severally their own aspects of Divine truth, so Canticles furnishes the believer with language of holy love, wherewith his heart can commune with his Lord; and portrays the intensity of Christ's love to him; the affection of love was created in man to be a transcript of the Divine love, and the Song clothes the latter in words; were it not for this, we should be at a loss for language, having the Divine warrant, wherewith to express, without presumption, the fervour of the love between Christ and us. The image of a bride, a bridegroom, and a marriage, to represent this spiritual union, has the sanction of Scripture throughout; nay, the spiritual union was the original fact in the mind of God, of which marriage is the transcript (Isalah 54. 5; 62. 5; Jeremiah 3. 1, &c.; Ezekiel 16. and 23.; Matthew 9. 15; 22. 2; 25. 1, &c.; John 3. 29; 2 Corinthians 11. 2; Ephesians 5. 23-32, where Paul does not go from the marriage relation to the union of Christ and the Church as if the former were the first; but comes down from the latter as the first and best recognized fact on which the relation of marriage is based; Revelation 19. 7; 21. 2; 22. 17). Above all, the Song seems to correspond to, and form a trilogy with, the 45th and 72d Psalms, which contain the same imagery; just as Psalms 37, answers to Proverbs, and Psalms 39, and 73, to Job. Love to Christ is the strongest, as it is the purest, of human passions, and therefore needs the strongest language to express it: to the pure in heart the phraseology, drawn from the rich imagery of Oriental poetry, will not only appear not indelicate or exaggerated, but even below the reality. A single emblem is a type; the actual rites, incidents, and persons of the Old Testament were appointed types of truths afterwards to be revealed. But the allegory is a continued metaphor, in which the circumstances are palpably often purely imagery, whilst the thing signified is altogether real. The clew to the meaning of the Song is not to be looked for in the allegory itself, but in other parts of Scripture. "It lies in the casket of revelation an exquisite gem, engraved with emblematical characters, with nothing literal thereon to break the consistency of their beauty." [BURROWS.] This accounts for the name of God not occurring in it. Whereas in the parable the writer narrates, in the allegory he never does so. The Song throughout consists of immediate addresses either of Christ to the soul, or of the soul to Christ. "The experimental knowledge of Christ's loveliness and the believer's love is the best commentary on the whole of this allegorical Song." [LEIGHTON.] Like the curiously wrought Oriental lamps, which do not reveal the beauty of their transparent emblems until lighted up within, so the types and allegories of Scripture, "the lantern to our path," need the inner light of the Holy Spirit of Jesus to reveal their significance. The details of the allegory are not to be too minutely pressed. In the Song, with an Oriental profusion of imagery, numbers of lovely, sensible objects are aggregated not strictly congruous, but portraying jointly by their very diversity the thousand various and seemingly opposite beauties which meet together in Christ.

The unity of subject throughout, and the recurrence of the same expressions (ch. 2, 6, 7; 3, 5; 8, 3, 4; 2, 16; 6, 3; 7, 10; 3, 6; 6, 10; 8, 5), prove the unity of the poem, in opposition to those who make it consist of a number of separate erotic songs. The sudden transitions, ex. gr., from the midnight knocking at a humble cottage to a glorious description of the King, accord with the alternations in the believer's experience. However various the divisions assigned be, most commentators have observed four breaks (whatever more they have imagined), followed by four abrupt beginnings (ch. 2, 7; 3, 5; 5, 1; 8, 4). Thus there result five parts, all alike ending in full repose and refreshment. We read (1 Kings 4, 32) that Solomon's songs were "a thousand and five." The odd number five added over the complete thousand makes it not unlikely that the "five" refers to the Song of songs, consisting of five parts.

It answers to the idyllic poetry of other nations. The Jews explain it of the union of Jehovah and ancient Israel; the allusions to the temple and the wilderness accord with this; some Christians of Christ and the Church; others of Christ and the individual believer. All these are true; for the Church is one in all ages, the ancient typifying the modern Church, and its history answering to that of each individual soul in life. Jesus "sees all, as if that all were one, loves one, as if that one were all." "The time suited the manner of this revelation; because types and allegories belonged to the old dispensation, which reached its ripeness under Solomon, when the temple was built. [MOODY STUART.] "The daughter of Zion at that time was openly married to Jehovah;" for it is thenceforth that the prophets, in reproving Israel's subsequent sin, speak of it as a breach of her marriage covenant. The songs heretofore sung by her were the preparatory hymns of her childhood; "the last and crowning 'Song of songs' was prepared for the now mature maiden against the day of her marriage to the King of kings." [ORIGEN.] Solomon was peculiarly fitted to clothe this holy mystery with the lovely natural imagery with which the Song abounds; for "he spake of trees, from the cedar in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall" (1 Kings 4, 33). A higher qualification was his knowledge of the eternal Wisdom or Word of God (Proverbs 8), the heavenly bridegroom. David, his father, had prepared the way, in Psalm 45, and 72; the son perfected the allegory. It seems to have been written in early life, long before his declension; for after it a song of holy gladness would hardly be appropriate. It was the song of his first love, in the kindness of his youthful espousals to Jehovah. Like other inspired books, its sense is not to be restricted to that local and temporary one in which the writer may have understood it; it extends to all ages, and shadows forth everlasting truth (1 Peter 1, 11, 12; 2 Peter 1, 20, 21).

"Oh that I knew how all thy lights combine, and the configurations of their glorie, Seeing not only how each verse doth shine, but all the constellations of the storie."—HERBERT.

Three notes of time occur. [MOODY STUART.] (1.) The Jewish Church speaks of the Gentile Church (ch. 8, 8) towards the end; (2.) Christ speaks to the apostles (ch. 5, 1) in the middle; (3.) The Church speaks of the coming of Christ (ch. 1, 2) at the beginning. Thus we have, in direct order, Christ about to come, and the cry for the advent; Christ finishing his work on earth, and the last supper; Christ ascended, and the call of the Gentiles. In another aspect we have: (1.) In the individual soul the longing for the manifestation of Christ to it, and the various alternations in its experience (ch. 1, 2, 4; 2, 8; 3, 1, 4, 6, 7) of His manifestation; (2.) The abundant enjoyment of His sensible consolations, which is soon withdrawn through the bride's carelessness (ch. 5, 1-3, &c.), and her longings after Him, and reconciliation (ch. 5, 8-16; 6, 3, &c.; 7, 1, &c.); (3.) Effects of Christ's manifestation on the believer, viz., assurance, labours of love, anxiety for the salvation of the impenitent, eagerness for the Lord's second coming (ch. 7, 10, 12; 8, 8-10, 14).

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-17. CANTICLE I.—THE BRIDE SEARCHING FOR AND FINDING THE KING. Ch. 1, 2; 2, 7. 1. Song of songs—The most excellent of all songs, Hebrew idiom (Exodus 29, 37; Deuteronomy 10, 14). A foretaste on earth of the "new song" to be sung in glory (Revelation 5, 9; 14, 3; 15, 2-4). Solomon's—"King of Israel," or "Jerusalem," is not added, as in the opening of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, not because Solomon had not yet ascended the throne [MOODY STUART], but because his personality is hid under that of Christ, the true Solomon (equivalent to Prince of Peace). The earthly Solomon is not introduced, which would break the consistency of the allegory. Though the bride bears the chief part, the Song throughout is not hers, but that of her "Solomon." He animates her. He and she, the Head and the members, form but one Christ. [ADELAIDE NEWTON.] Aaron prefigured Him as priest; Moses, as prophet; David, as a suffering king; Solomon, as the triumphant prince of peace. The camp in the wilderness represents the Church in the world; the peaceful reign of Solomon, after all enemies had been subdued, represents the Church in heaven, of which joy the Song gives a foretaste. 2. him—abruptly. She names him not, as is natural to one whose heart is full of some much-desired friend: so Mary Magdalene at the sepulchre (John 20, 15), as if every one must know whom she means, the One chief object of her desire (Psalm 73, 25; Matthew 13, 44-46; Philippians 3, 7, 8). kiss—the token of peace from the Prince of Peace (Luke 15, 20); "our Peace" (Psalm 85, 10; Colossians 1, 21; Ephesians 2, 14). of his mouth—marking the tenderest affection. For a king to permit his hands, or even garment, to be kissed, was counted a great honour; but that he should himself kiss another with his mouth is the greatest honour. God had in times past spoken by the mouth of His prophets, who had declared the Church's betrothal; the bride now longs for contact with the mouth of the Bridegroom Himself (Job 23, 12; Luke 4, 22; Hebrews 1, 1, 2). True of the Church before the first advent, longing for "the hope of Israel," "the desire of all nations;" also the awakened soul longing for the kiss of reconciliation; and further, the kiss that is the token of the marriage contract (Hosea 2, 19, 20), and of friendship (1 Samuel 20, 41; John 14, 21; 15, 15). thy love—Hebrew, loves, viz., tokens of love, loving blandishments. wine—which makes glad "the heavy heart" of one ready to perish, so that he "remembers his misery no more" (Proverbs 31, 6, 7). So, in a "better" sense, Christ's love (Habakkuk 3, 17, 18). He gives the same praise to the bride's love, with the emphatic addition, "How much" (ch. 4, 10). Wine was created by His first miracle (John 2), and was the pledge given of his love at the last supper. The spiritual wine is His blood and His spirit, the "new" and better wine of the kingdom (Matthew 26, 29), which we can never drink to "excess," as the other (Ephesians 5, 18; cf. Psalm 23, 5; Isaiah 55, 1). 3. Rather, "As regards the savour of thy ointments, it is good." [MAURER.] In ch. 4, 10, 11, the Bridegroom reciprocates the praise of the bride in the same terms. thy name—Christ's character and office as the "Anointed" (Isaiah 9, 6; 61, 1), as "the savour of ointments" is the graces that surround His person (Psalm 45, 7, 8). Ecclesiastes 7, 1, in its fullest sense, applies to Him. The holy anointing oil of the high priest, which it was death for any one else to make (so Acts 4, 12), implies the exclusive preclusiveness of Messiah's name (Exodus 30, 23-23, 31-33; so Mary brake the box of precious ointment over Him, appropriately, Mark 14, 5, the broken box typifying His body, which, when broken, diffused all grace): compounded of various spices, &c. (Colossians 1, 19; 2, 9); of sweet odour (Ephesians 5, 2). poured—(Isaiah 53, 12; Romans 5, 5) therefore—because of the manifestation of God's character in Christ (1 John 4, 9, 19). So the penitent woman (Luke 7, 37, 38, 47). virgins—the pure in heart (2 Corinthians 11, 2; Revelation 14, 4). The same Hebrew is translated, "thy hidden ones" (Psalm 83, 3). The "ointment" of the Spirit "poured forth" produces the "love of Christ" (Romans 5, 5). 4. (1.) The cry of ancient Israel for Messiah, ex. gr., Simeon, Anna, &c. (2.) The cry of an awakened soul for the drawing of the Spirit, after it has got a glimpse of Christ's loveliness and its own helplessness. Draw me—The Father draws (John 6, 44). The Son draws (Jeremiah 31, 3; Hosea 11, 4; John 12, 32). "Draw" here, and "Tell" (v. 7), reverently qualify the word "kiss" (v. 2). me, we—no believer desires to go to heaven alone. We are converted as individuals; we follow Christ as joined in a communion of saints (John 1, 41, 45). Individuality and community meet in the bride. run—her earnestness kindles as she prays (Isaiah 40, 31; Psalm 119, 32, 60). after thee—not before (John 10, 4). King . . . brought me into—(Psalm 45, 14, 15; John 10, 16.) He is the anointed Priest (v. 3); King (v. 4). chambers—her prayer is answered even beyond her desires. Not only is she permitted to run after Him, but is brought into the inmost pavilion, where Eastern kings admitted none but the most intimate friends (Esther 4, 11; 5, 2; Psalm 27, 5). The erection of the temple of Solomon was the first bringing of the bride into permanent, instead of migratory chambers of the King. Christ's body on earth was the next (John 2, 21), whereby believers are brought within the veil (Ephesians 2, 6; Hebrews 10, 19, 20). Entrance into the closet for prayer is the first step. The earnest of the future bringing into heaven (John 14, 3). His chambers are the bride's also (Isaiah 26, 20). There are various chambers, plural (John 14, 2). be glad and rejoice—inward and outward rejoicing. in thee—(Isaiah 61, 10; Philippians 4, 1, 4). Not in our spiritual frames (Psalm 30, 6, 7). remember—rather, commemorate with praises (Isaiah 63, 7). The mere remembrance of spiritual joys is better than the present enjoyment of carnal ones (Psalm 4, 6, 7). upright—rather, uprightly, sincerely (Psalm 58, 1; Romans 12, 9); so Nathaniel (John 1, 47); Peter (John 21, 17); or deservedly. [MAURER.] 5. blackness—viz., "as the tents of Kedar," equivalent to blackness (Psalm 120, 5). She draws the image from the black goatskins with which the Scenite Arabs ("Kedar" was in Arabia Petraea) cover their tents (contrasted with the splendid state tent in which the King was awaiting His bride according to Eastern custom); typifying the darkness of man's natural state. To feel this, and yet also feel one's self in Jesus Christ "comely as the curtains of Solomon," marks the believer (Romans 7, 18, &c.; 8, 1); 1 Timothy 1, 15, "I am ehlef;" so she says not merely, "I was," but "I am;" still black in herself, but comely through His comeliness put upon her (Ezekiel 16, 14). curtains—first, the hangings and veil in the temple of Solomon (Ezekiel 16, 10); then, also, the "fine linen which is the righteousness of saints" (Revelation 19, 8), the white wedding garment provided by Jesus Christ (Isaiah 61, 10; Matthew 22, 11; 1 Corinthians 1, 30; Colossians 1, 28; 2, 10; Revelation 7, 14). Historically, the dark tents of Kedar represent the Gentile Church (Isaiah 60, 3-7, &c.). As the vineyard at the close is transferred from the Jews, who had not kept their own, to the Gentiles, so the Gentiles are introduced at the commencement of the Song; for they were among the earliest inquirers after Jesus Christ (Matthew 2); the wise men from the East (Arabia, or Kedar). daughters of Jerusalem—professors, not the bride, or "the virgins," yet not enemies; invited to gospel blessings (ch. 3, 10, 11); so near to Jesus Christ as not to be unlikely to find Him (ch. 5, 8); desirous to seek Him with her (ch. 6, 1; cf. ch. 6, 13; 7, 1, 5, 8). In ch. 7, 8, 9, the bride's Beloved becomes their Beloved; not, however, of all of them (ch. 8, 4; cf. Luke 23, 27, 28). 6. She feels as if her blackness was so great as to be gazed at by all. mother's children—(Matthew 10, 36.) She is to forget "her own people and her father's house," i. e., the worldly connections of her unregenerate state (Psalm 45, 10); they had maltreated her (Luke 15, 15, 16). Children of the same mother, but not the same father [MAURER] (John 8, 41-44). They made her a common keeper of vineyards, whereby the sun looked upon, i. e., burnt her; thus she did "not keep her own" vineyard, i. e., fair beauty. So the world, and the soul (Matthew 16, 26; Luke 9, 25). The believer has to watch against the same danger (1 Corinthians 9, 27). So he will be able, instead of the self-reproach here, to say as ch. 8, 12. 7. my soul loveth—more intense than "the virgins" and "the upright love thee" (v. 3, 4; Matthew 22, 37). To carry out the design of the allegory, the royal encampment is here represented as moving from place to place, in search of green pastures, under the Shepherd King (Psalm 23). The bride, having first enjoyed communion with him in the pavilion, is willing to follow Him into labours and dangers; arising from all absorbing love (Luke 14, 26); this distinguishes her from the formalist (John 10, 27; Revelation 14, 4). feedest—tendest thy flock (Isaiah 40, 11; Hebrews 13, 20; 1 Peter 2, 25; 5, 4; Revelation 7, 17.) No single type expresses all the office of Jesus Christ, hence arises the variety of diverse images used to portray the manifold aspects of Him: these would be quite incongruous, if the Song referred to the earthly Solomon. Her intercourse with Him is peculiar. She hears His voice, and addresses none but Himself. Yet it is through a veil; she sees Him not (Job 23, 8, 9). If we would be fed, we must follow the Shepherd through the whole breadth of His word, and not stay on onespot alone. makest . . . to rest—distinct from "feedest;" periods of rest are vouchsafed after labour (Isaiah 4, 6; 49, 10; Ezekiel 34, 13-15). Communion in private must go along with public following of Him. turneth aside—rather, one veiled, i. e., as a harlot, not His true bride (Genesis 38, 15) [GESENIUS]; or as a mourner (2 Samuel 15, 30) [WEISS]; or as one unknown. [MAURER.] All equally estrangement from the Bridegroom. She feels estranged even among Christ's true servants, answering to "thy companions" (Luke 22, 28), so long as she has not Himself present. The opposite spirit to 1 Corinthians 3, 4. 8. If—She ought to have known (John 14, 8, 9). The confession of her ignorance and blackness (v. 5) leads Him to call her "fairest" (Matthew 12, 20). Her jealousy of letting even "His companions" take the place of Himself (v. 7) led her too far. He directs her to follow them, 24 they follow Him (1 Corinthians 11. 1; Hebrews 6. 10, 12); to use ordinances and the ministry; where they are He is (Jeremiah 6. 16; Matthew 18. 19, 20; Hebrews 10. 25). Indulging in isolation is not the way to find Him. It was thus, literally, that Zipporah found her bridegroom (Exodus 2. 16). The bride unhesitatingly asks the watchmen afterwards (ch. 3. 3). kids—(John 21. 15.) Christ is to be found in active ministrations, as well as in prayer (Proverbs 11. 25). shepherds' tents—ministers in the sanctuary (Psalm 84. 1). 9. horses in Pharaoh's chariots—celebrated for beauty, swiftness, and ardour, at the Red Sea (Exodus 14. 15). These qualities, which seem to belong to the ungodly, really belong to the saints. [MOODY STUART.] The allusion may be to the horses brought at a high price by Solomon out of Egypt (2 Chronicles 1. 16, 17). So the bride is redeemed out of spiritual Egypt by the true Solomon, at an infinite price (Isaiah 51. 1; 1 Peter 1. 18, 19). But the deliverance from Pharaoh at the Red Sea accords with the allusion to the tabernacle (ch. 1. 5; 3. 6, 7); it rightly is put at the beginning of the Church's call. The ardour and beauty of the bride are the point of comparison; (v. 4) "run;" (v. 5) "comely." Also, like Pharaoh's horses, she forms a great company (Revelation 19. 7, 14). As Jesus Christ is both Shepherd and Conqueror, so believers are not only His sheep, but also, as a Church militant now, His chariots and horses (ch. 6. 4). 10. rows of jewels—(Ezekiel 16. 11, 12, 13.) OLEARIUS says, Persian ladies wear two or three rows of pearls round the head, beginning on the forehead and descending down to the cheeks and under the chin, so that their faces seem to be set in pearls (Ezekiel 16. 11). The comparison to the horses (v. 9) implies the vital energy of the bride; this verse, her superadded graces (Proverbs 1. 9; 4. 9; 1 Timothy 2. 9; 2 Peter 1. 5). 11. We—The Trinity implied by the Holy Ghost, whether it was so by the writer of the Song or not (Genesis 1. 26; Proverbs 8. 30; 30. 4). "The Jews acknowledged God as king, and Messiah as king, in interpreting the Song, but did not know that these two are one." [LEIGHTON.] make—not merely give (Ephesians 2. 10). borders of gold, with studs [i. e., spots] of silver—Jesus Christ delights to give more "to him that hath" (Matthew 25. 29). He crowns His own work in us (Isaiah 26. 12). The "borders" here are equivalent to "rows" (v. 10); but here, the King seems to give the finish to her attire, by adding a crown (borders, or circles) of gold studded with silver spots, as Esther 2. 17. Both the royal and nuptial crown, or chaplet. The Hebrew for "spouse" (ch. 4. 8) is a crowned one (Ezekiel 16. 12; Revelation 2. 10). The crown is given at once upon conversion, in title, but in sensible possession afterwards (2 Timothy 4. 8). 12. While—It is the presence of the Sun of Righteousness that draws out the believer's odours of grace. It was the sight of Him at table that caused the two women to bring forth their ointments for Him (Luke 7. 37, 38; John 12. 3; 2 Corinthians 2. 15). Historically fulfilled (Matthew 2. 11); spiritually (Revelations 3. 20); and in church worship (Matthew 18. 20); and at the Lord's Supper especially, for here public communion with Him at table amidst His friends is spoken of, as v. 4 refers to private communion (1 Corinthians 10. 16, 21); typically (Exodus 21. 9-11); the future perfect fulfilment (Luke 22. 30; Revelation 19. 9). The allegory supposes the King to have stopped in His movements and to be seated with His friends on the divan. What grace that a table should be prepared for us, whilst still militant (Psalm 23. 5)! myspikenard—not boasting, but owning the Lord's grace to and in her. The spikenard is a lowly herb, the emblem of humility. She rejoices that He is well pleased with her graces, His own work (Philippians 4. 18). 13. bundle of myrrh—abundant preciousness (Greek) (1 Peter 2. 7). Even a little myrrh was costly; much more a bundle (Colossians 2. 9). BURROWS takes it of a scent-box filled with liquid myrrh; the liquid obtained by incision gave the tree its chief value. her—rather, it; it is the myrrh that lies in the bosom, as the eluster of camphire is in the vineyards (v. 11). all night—an undivided heart (Ephesians 3. 17; contrast Jeremiah 4. 14; Ezekiel 16. 15, 30). Yet on account of the everlasting covenant, God restores the adulteress (Ezekiel 16. 60, 62; Hosea 2. 2, &c.). The night is the whole present dispensation till the everlasting day dawns (Romans 13. 12). Also, lit., night (Psalm 119. 147, 148), the night of affliction (Psalm 42. 8). 14. cluster—Jesus Christ is one, yet manifold in His graces. camphire—or, cypress. The hennah is meant, whose odorous flowers grow in clusters, of a colour white and yellow softly blended; its bark is dark, the foliage light green. Women deck their persons with them. The loveliness of Jesus Christ, vineyards—appropriate in respect to Him who is "the vine." The spikenard was for the banquet (v. 12); the myrrh was in her bosom continually (v. 13); the camphire is in the midst of natural beauties, which, though lovely, are eclipsed by the one cluster Jesus Christ pre-eminent above them all. En-gedi—In South Palestine, near the Dead Sea (Joshua 15. 62; Ezekiel 47. 10), famed for aromatic shrubs. 15. fair—He discerns beauty in her, who had said, "I am black" (v. 5), because of the everlasting covenant (Psalm 45. 11; Isaiah 62. 5; Ephesians 1. 4, 5) doves' eyes—large and beautiful in the doves of Syria The prominent features of her beauty (Matthew 10. 16) gentleness, innocence, and constant love, emblem of the Holy Ghost, who changes us to His own likeness (Genesis 3. 10, 11; Matthew 3. 16). The opposite kind of eyes (Psalm 101. 5; Matthew 20. 15; 2 Peter 2. 14). 16. Reply of the Bride. She presumes to call Him beloved, because He called her so first. Thou callest me "fair;" if I am so it is not in myself, it is all from thee (Psalm 90. 17); but Thou art fair in thyself (Psalm 45. 2). pleasant—(Proverbs 3. 17) towards thy friends (2 Samuel 1. 26). bed . . . green—the couch of green grass on which the King and His bride sit to "rest at noon." Thus her prayer in v. 7 is here granted; a green oasis in the desert, always found near waters in the East (Psalm 23. 2; Isaiah 41. 17-19). The scene is a kiosk, or summer-house. Historically, the literal resting of the Babe of Bethlehem and his parents on the green grass provided for cattle (Luke 2). In this verse there is an incidental allusion, in v. 15, to the offering (Luke 2. 24). So the "cedar and fir" ceiling refers to the temple (1 Kings 5. 6-10; 6. 15-18); type of the heavenly temple (Revelation 21. 22). 17. our house—see note, v. 16; but primarily, the kiosk (Isaiah 11. 10), "His rest." Cedar is pleasing to the eye and smell, hard, and never eaten by worms. fir—rather, cypress, which is hard, durable, and fragrant, of a reddish hue. [GENESIUS, WEISS, and MAURER.] Contrasted with the shifting "tents" (v. 5), His house is "our house" (Psalm 92. 13; Ephesians 2. 19; Hebrews 3. 6). Perfect oneness of Him and the bride (John 14. 20; 17. 21). There is the shelter of a princely roof from the sun (Psalm 121. 6), without the confinement of walls, and amidst rural beauties. The carved ceiling represents the wondrous excellencies of His Divine nature.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-17. 1. rose—if applied to Jesus Christ, it, with the white lily (lowly, 2 Corinthians 8. 9), answers to "white and ruddy" (ch. 5. 10). But it is rather the meadowsaffron; the Hebrew means radically a plant with a pungent bulb, inapplicable to the rose. So Syriac. It is of a white and violet colour. [MAURER, GESENIUS, and WEISS.] The bride thus speaks of herself as lowly though lovely, in contrast with the lordly "apple" or citron tree, the bridegroom (v. 3); so the "lily" is applied to her (v. 2). Sharon—(Isaiah 35. 1, 2). In North Palestine, between Mount Tabor and Lake Tiberias (1 Chronicles 5. 16). LXX. and Vulgate translate it "a plain;" though they err in this, the Hebrew Bible not elsewhere favouring it, yet the parallelism to valleys shows that, in the proper name Sharon, there is here a tacit reference to its meaning of lowliness. Beauty, delicacy, and lowliness, are to be in her, as they were in Him (Matthew 11. 29). 3. Jesus Christ to the Bride (Matthew 10. 16; John 15. 19; 1 John 5. 19). Thorns, equivalent to the wicked (2 Samuel 23. 6; Psalm 57. 4). daughters—of men, not of God; not "the virgins." "If thou art the lily of Jesus Christ, take heed lest by impatience, rash judgments, and pride, thou thyself become a thorn." [LUTHER.] 3. Her reply. apple—generic term; including the golden citron, pomegranate, and orange apple (Proverbs 25. 11). He combines the shadow and fragrance of the cltron with the sweetness of the orange and pomegranate fruit. The foliage is perpetual; throughout the year a succession of blossoms, fruit, and perfume (James 1. 17). among the sons—parallel to “among the daughters” (v. 2). He alone is ever fruitful among the fruitless wild trees (Psalm 89. 6; Hebrews 1. 9). I sat . . . with delight—lit., I eagerly desired and sat (Psalm 94. 19; Mark 6. 31; Ephesians 2. 6; 1 Peter 1. 8). shadow—(Psalm 121. 5; Isaiah 4. 6; 25. 4; 32. 2.) Jesus Christ interposes the shadow of His cross between the blazing rays of justice and us sinners. fruit—faith plucks it (Proverbs 3. 18). Man lost the tree of life (Genesis 3). Jesus Christ regained it for him; he eats it partly now (Psalm 119. 103; John 6. 55, 57; 1 Peter 2. 3), fully hereafter (Revelation 2. 7; 22. 2, 14); not earned by the sweat of his brow, or by his righteousness (Romans 10). Contrast the worldling's fruit (Deuteronomy 32. 32; Luke 15. 16). 4. Historically fulfilled in the joy of Simeon and Anna in the temple, over the infant Saviour (Luke 2.), and that of Mary too (cf. Luke 1. 53); typified (Exodus 24. 9-11). Spiritually, the bride or beloved is led (v. 4) first into the King's chambers, thence is drawn after Him in answer to her prayer; is next received on a grassy couch under a cedar kiosk; and at last in a “banqueting hall,” such as, Josephus says, Solomon had in his palace, “wherein all the vessels were of gold” (Antiquities, 8. 5, 2). The transition is from holy retirement to public ordinances, church-worship, and the Lord's Supper (Psalm 36. 8). The bride, as the queen of Sheba, is given “all her desire” (1 Kings 10. 13; Psalm 63. 5; Ephesians 3. 8, 16-21; Philippians 4. 19); type of the heavenly feast hereafter (Isaiah 25. 6, 9). his banner . . . love—After having rescued us from the enemy, our victorious captain (Hebrews 2. 10) seats us at the banquet under a banner inscribed with His name, “love” (1 John 4. 8). His love conquered us to Himself; this banner rallies round us the forces of Omnipotence, as our protection; it marks to what country we belong, heaven, the abode of love, and in what we most glory, the cross of Jesus Christ, through which we triumph (Romans 8. 37; 1 Corinthians 15. 57; Revelation 3. 21). Cf. with “over me” (Deuteronomy 33. 27), “underneath are the everlasting arms.” 5. flagons—MAURER prefers translating, “dried raisin cakes;” from the Hebrew root fire, viz., dried by heat. But the “house of wine” (Margin, v. 4) favours “flagons;” the “new wine” of the kingdom, the Spirit of Jesus Christ. apples—from the tree (v. 3), so sweet to her, the promises of God. sick of love—the highest degree of sensible enjoyment that can be attained here. It may be at an early or late stage of experience. Paul (2 Corinthians 12. 7). In the last sickness of J. Welch, he was overheard saying, “Lord, hold thine hand, it is enough; thy servant is a clay vessel, and can hold no more.” [FLEMING, Fulf. Script.] In most cases this intensity of joy is reserved for the heavenly banquet. Historically, Israel had it, when the Lord's glory filled the tabernacle, and afterwards the temple, so that the priests could not stand to minister; so in the Christian Church, on Pentecost. The bride addresses Christ mainly, though in her rapture she uses the plural, “Stay (ye) me,” speaking generally. So far from asking the withdrawal of the manifestations which had overpowered her, she asks for more: so “fainteth for” (Psalm 84. 2); also Peter, on the mount of transfiguration (Luke 9. 33), “Let us make, &c., not knowing what he said.” 6. The “stay” she prayed for (v. 5) is granted (Deuteronomy 33. 12, 27; Psalm 87. 24; Isaiah 41. 16). None can pluck from that embrace (John 10. 28-30). His hand keeps us from falling (Matthew 14. 30, 31), to it we may commit ourselves (Psalm 31. 5). The “left” is the inferior hand, by which the Lord less signally manifests His love, than by the right; the secret hand of ordinary providence, as distinguished from that of manifested grace (the “right.”) They really go together, though sometimes they seem divided; here both are felt at once. THEODORET takes the left hand, equivalent to judgment and wrath; the right, equivalent to honour and love. The hand of justice no longer is lifted to smite, but is under the head of the believer to support (Isaiah 42. 21), the hand of Jesus Christ pierced by justice or our sin supports us. The charge not to disturb the beloved occurs thrice; but the sentiment here, “His left hand,” &c., nowhere else fully; which accords with the intensity of joy (v. 5) found nowhere else; in ch. 8. 3, it is only conditional, “should embrace,” not “doth.” 7. Not an oath “by the roes;” but a solemn charge, to act as cautiously as the hunter would with the wild roes, which are proverbially timorous; he must advance with breathless circumspection, if he is to take them; so he who would not lose Jesus Christ and His Spirit, which is easily grieved and withdrawn, must be tender of conscience and watchful (Ezekiel 16. 43; Ephesians 4. 30; 5. 15; 1 Thessalonians 5. 19). In Margin, title of Psalm 22., Jesus Christ is called the “Hind of the morning,” hunted to death by the dogs (cf. v. 8, 9, where He is represented as bounding on the hills, Psalm 18. 33). Here He is resting, but with a repose easily broken (Zephaniah 3. 17). It is thought a gross rudeness in the East to awaken one sleeping, especially a person of rank. my love—in Hebrew, Feminine for Masculine, the abstract for concrete, Jesus Christ being the embodiment of love itself (ch. 3. 5; 8. 7), where, as here, the context requires it to be applied to Him, not her. She too is “love” (ch. 7. 6), for His love calls forth her love. Presumption in the convert is as grieving to the Spirit as despair. The lovingness and pleasantness of the hind and roe (Proverbs 5. 19) is included in this image of Jesus Christ.

CANTICLE II.—Ch. 2. 8; 3. 5.—JOHN THE BAPTIST'S MINISTRY. 8. voice—an exclamation of joyful surprise, evidently after a long silence. The restlessness of sin and fickleness in her had disturbed His rest with her, which she had professed not to wish disturbed “till He should please.” He left her, but in sovereign grace unexpectedly heralds His return. She awakes, and at once recognizes His voice (1 Samuel 3. 9, 10; John 10. 4); her sleep is not so sinfully deep as in ch. 5. 2. leaping—bounding, as the roe does, over the roughest obstacles (2 Samuel 2. 18; 1 Chronicles 12. 8); as the father of the prodigal “had compassion and ran” (Luke 15. 20). upon the hills—as the sunbeams glancing from hill to hill. So Margin, title of Jesus Christ (Psalm 22.), “Hind of the morning” (type of His resurrection). Historically, the coming of the kingdom of heaven (the gospel dispensation), announced by John Baptist, is meant; it primarily is the garden or vineyard; the bride is called so in a secondary sense. “The voice” of Jesus Christ is indirect, through “the friend of the bridegroom” (John 3. 29), John the Baptist. Personally, He is silent during John's ministration, who awoke the long slumbering Church with the cry, “Every hill shall be made low,” in the spirit of Elias, on the “rent mountains” (1 Kings 19. 11; cf. Isaiah 52. 7). Jesus Christ is implied as coming with intense desire (Luke 22. 15; Hebrews 10. 7), disregarding the mountain hindrances raised by man's sin. 9. he standeth—after having bounded over the intervening space like a roe. He often stands near when our unbelief hides Him from us (Genesis 28. 16; Revelation 3. 14-20). His usual way; long promised and expected; sudden at last; so, in visiting the second temple (Malachi 3. 1); so at Pentecost (Acts 2. 1, 2); so in visiting an individual soul, Zaccheus (Luke 19. 5, 6; John 3. 8); and so, at the second coming (Matthew 24. 48, 50; 2 Peter 3. 4, 10). So it shall be at His second coming (1 Thessalonians 5. 2, 3). wall—over the cope of which He is first seen; next, He looks through (not forth; for He is outside) at the windows, glancing suddenly and stealthily (not as English Version, “showing Himself”) through the lattice. The prophecies, types, &c., were lattice glimpses of Him to the Old Testament Church, in spite of the wall of separation which sin had raised (John 8. 56); clearer glimpses were given by John Baptist, but not unclouded (John 1. 26). The legal wall of partition was not to be removed until His death (Ephesians 2. 14, 15; Hebrews 10. 20). Even now, He is only seen by faith, through the windows of His Word and the lattice of ordinances and sacraments (Luke 24. 35; John 14. 21); not full vision (1 Corinthians 13. 12); an incentive to our looking for His second coming (Isaiah 33. 17; Titus 2. 13). 10, 11. Loving reassurance given by Jesus Christ to the bride, lest she should think that He had ceased to love her, on account of her unfaithfulness, which had occasioned His temporary withdrawal. He allures her to brighter than worldly joys (Micah 2. 10). Not only does the saint wish to depart, to be with Him, but He still more desires to have the saint with Him above (John 17. 24). Historically, the vineyard or garden of the King, here first introduced, is "the kingdom of heaven preached" by John Baptist, before whom "the Law and the prophets were" (Luke 16. 16). 11. the winter—the law of the covenant of works (Matthew 4. 16). rain is over—(Hebrews 12. 18-24; 1 John 2. 8). Then first the Gentile Church is called "beloved, which was not beloved" (Romans 9. 25). So "the winter" of estrangement and sin is "past" to the believer (Isaiah 44. 22; Jeremiah 50. 20; 2 Corinthians 5. 17; Ephesians 2. 1). The rising "Sun of righteousness" dispels the "rain" (2 Samuel 23. 4; Psalm 136. 5; Malachi 4. 2). The winter in Palestine is past by April, but all the showers were not over till May. The time described here is that which comes directly after these last showers of winter. In the highest sense, the coming resurrection and deliverance of the earth from the past curse is here implied (Romans 8. 19; Revelation 21. 4; 22. 3). No more "clouds" shall then "return after the rain" (Ecclesiastes 12. 2; Revelation 4. 3; cf. Genesis 9. 13-17; "the rainbow round the throne" is the "token" of this. 12. flowers—tokens of anger past, and of grace come. "The summoned bride is welcome," say some fathers, "to weave from them garlands of beauty, wherewith she may adorn herself to meet the King." Historically, the flowers, &c., only give promise; the fruit is not ripe yet; suitable to the preaching of John Baptist, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," not yet fully come. the time of . . . singing—the rejoicing at the advent of Jesus Christ. GREGORY NYSSENUS refers the voice of the turtle dove to John Baptist. It with the olive branch announced to Noah that "the rain was over and gone" (Genesis 8. 11). So John Baptist, spiritually. Its plaintive "voice" answers to his preaching of repentance (Jeremiah 8. 6, 7). Vulgate and LXX. translate, "The time of pruning," viz., spring (John 15. 2). The mention of the "turtle's" cooling better accords with our text. The turtle is migratory (Jeremiah 8. 7), and "comes" early in May; emblem of love, and so of the Holy Ghost. Love, too, shall be the keynote of the "new song" hereafter (Isaiah 35. 10; Revelation 1. 5; 14. 3; 19. 6). In the individual believer now, joy and love are here set forth in their earlier manifestations (Mark 4. 28). 13. putteth forth—rather, ripens, lit., makes red. [MAURER.] The unripe figs, which grow in winter, begin to ripen in early spring, and in June are fully matured. [WEISS.] vines with the tender grape—rather, "the vines in flower," lit., a flower, in apposition with "vines." [MAURER.] The vine flowers were so sweet, that they were often put, when dried, into new wine to give it flavour. Applicable to the first manifestations of Jesus Christ, "the true Vine," both to the Church and to individuals; as to Nathanael under the fig tree (John 1. 48). Arise, &c.—His call, described by the bride, ends as it began (v. 10); it is a consistent whole; "love" from first to last (Isaiah 52. 1, 2; 2 Corinthians 6. 17, 18). "Come," in the close of Revelation 22. 17, as at His earlier manifestation (Matthew 11. 28). 14. dove—here expressing endearment (Psalm 74. 19). Doves are noted for constant attachment; emblems, also, in their soft, plaintive note, of softened penitents (Isaiah 59. 11; Ezekiel 7. 16); other points of likeness are their beauty; "their wings covered with silver and gold" (Psalm 68. 13), typifying the change in the converted; the dovelike spirit, breathed into the saint by the Holy Ghost, whose emblem is the dove; the messages of peace from God to sinful men, as Noah's dove, with the olive branch (Genesis 8.), intimated that the flood of wrath was past; timidity, fleeing with fear from sin and self to the cleft Rock of Ages (Margin, Isaiah 26. 4; Hosea 11. 11); gregarious, flocking together to the kingdom of Jesus Christ (Isaiah 60. 8); harmless simplicity (Matthew 10. 16). clefs—the refuge of doves from storm and heat (Jeremiah 48. 28; see Jeremiah 49. 16). GESIENUS translates the Hebrew from a different root, "the refugees." But see, for "clefs," Exodus 33. 18-23. It is only when we are in Christ Jesus that our "voice is sweet" (in prayer, ch. 4. 3, 11;

Matthew 10. 20; Galatians 4. 6, because it is His voice in us; also in speaking of Him, Malachi 3. 16); and our countenance comely" (Exodus 34. 29; Psalm 27. 5; 71. 3; Isaiah 33. 16; 2 Corinthians 3. 18). stairs—(Ezekiel 38. 20.) Margin, a steep rock, broken into stairs or terraces. It is in "secret places" and rugged scenes that Jesus Christ woos the soul from the world to Himself (Micah 2. 10; 7. 14). So Jacob amidst the stones of Bethel (Genesis 28. 11-19); Moses at Horeb (Exodus 3.); so Elijah (1 Kings 19. 9-13); Jesus Christ with the three disciples on a "high mountain apart," at the transfiguration (Matthew 17. 1); John in Patmos (Revelation 1). "Of the eight beatitudes, five have an afflicted condition for their subject. As long as the waters are on the earth, we dwell in the ark; but when the land is dry, the dove itself will be tempted to wander." [JEREMY TAYLOR.] Jesus Christ does not invite her to leave the rock, but in it (Himself), yet in holy freedom to lay aside the timorous spirit, look up boldly as accepted in Him, pray, praise and confess Him (in contrast to her shrinking from being looked at, ch. 1. 6), (Ephesians 6. 19; Hebrews 13. 15; 1 John 4. 18); still, though trembling, the voice and countenance of the soul in Jesus Christ are pleasant to Him. The Church found no cleft in the Sinaitic legal rock, though good in itself, wherein to hide; but in Jesus Christ stricken by God for us, as the rock smitten by Moses (Numbers 20. 11), there is a hiding-place (Isaiah 32. 2). She praised His "voice" (v. 8. 10); it is thus that her voice also, though tremulous, is "sweet" to Him here. 15. Transition to the vineyard, often formed in "stairs" (v. 14), or terraces, in which, amidst the vine leaves, foxes hid. foxes—generic term, including jackals. They eat only grapes, not the vine flowers; but they need to be driven out in time before the grape is ripe. She had failed in watchfulness before (ch. 1. 6), now when converted, she is the more jealous of subtle sins (Psalm 139. 23). In spiritual winter certain evils are frozen up, as well as good; in the spring of revivals these start up unperceived, crafty, false teachers, spiritual pride, uncharitableness, &c. (Psalm 19. 12; Matthew 13. 26; Luke 8. 14; 2 Timothy 2. 17; Hebrews 12. 15). "Little" sins are parents of the greatest (Ecclesiastes 10. 1; 1 Corinthians 5. 6). Historically, John the Baptist spared not the foxlike Herod (Luke 13. 32), who gave vinelike promise of fruit at first (Mark 6. 20), at the cost of his life; nor the viper-Sadducees, &c.; nor the varied subtle forms of sin (Luke 3. 7-14). 16. mine . . . his—rather, "is for me . . . for Him" (Hosea 3. 3), where, as here, there is the assurance of indissoluble union, in spite of temporary absence. Next verse, entreating Him to return, shows that He has gone, perhaps through her want of guarding against the "little sins" (v. 15). The order of the clauses is reversed in ch. 6. 3, when she is riper in faith; there she rests more on her being His; here, on His being hers; and no doubt her sense of love to Him is a pledge that she is His (John 14. 21, 23; 1 Corinthians 8. 3); this is her consolation in His withdrawal now. I am his—by creation (Psalm 100. 3), by redemption (John 17. 10; Romans 14. 8; 1 Corinthians 6. 19). feedeth—as a "roe," or gazelle (v. 17); instinct is sure to lead him back to his feeding-ground, where the lilies abound. So Jesus Christ, though now withdrawn, the bride feels sure will return to His favourite resting-place (ch. 7. 10; Psalm 132. 14). So hereafter (Revelation 21. 3). Psalm 45., title, terms his lovely bride's "lilies" [HENGSTENBERG] pure and white, though among thorns (v. 2). 17. Night is the image of the present world (Romans 13. 12). "Behold men as if dwelling in a subterranean cavern." [PLATO Republic, vii. 1.] Until—i. e., Before that, &c. break—rather, breathe, referring to the refreshing breeze of dawn in the East; or to the air of life, which distinguishes morning from the deathlike stillness of night. MAURER takes this verse of the approach of night, when the breeze arises after the heat of day (cf. Margin, Genesis 3. 8, with Genesis 18. 1), and the "shadows" are lost in night (Psalm 102. 11); thus our life will be the day; death, the night (John 9. 4). The English Version better accords with (ch. 3. 1). "By night" (Romans 13. 12). turn—to me. Bether—Mountains of Bithron, separated from the rest of Israel by Jordan (2 Samuel 2. 29), not far from Bethabara, where

John baptized and Jesus was first manifested. Rather, as Margin, of divisions, and LXX., mountains intersected with deep gaps, hard to pass over, separating the bride and Jesus Christ. In ch. 8. 14 the mountains are of spices, on which the roe feeds, not of separation; for at His first coming He had to overpass the gulf made by sin between Him and us (Zechariah 4. 6, 7); in His second, He will only have to come down from the fragrant hill above to take home his prepared bride. Historically, in the ministry of John Baptist, Christ's call to the bride was not, as later (ch. 4. 8), "Come with me," but "Come away," viz., to meet me (v. 2, 10, 13). Sitting in darkness (Matthew 4. 16), she "waited" and "looked" eagerly for Him, the "great light" (Luke 1. 79; 2. 25, 38); at His rising, the shadows of the law (Colossians 2. 16, 17; Hebrews 10. 1) were to "flee away." So we wait for the second coming, when means of grace, so precious now, shall be superseded by the Sun of righteousness (1 Corinthians 13. 10, 12; Revelation 21. 22, 23). The Word is our light until then (2 Peter 1. 19).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-11. 1. By night—lit., "By nights." Continuation of the longing for the dawn of the Messiah (ch. 2. 17; Psalm 130. 6; Malachi 4. 2). The spiritual desertion here (ch. 2. 17; 3. 5) is not due to indifference, as in ch. 5. 2-8. "As nights and dews are better for flowers than a continual sun, so Christ's absence (at times) giveth sap to humility, and putteth an edge on hunger, and furnisheth a fair field to faith to put forth itself." [RUTHERFORD.] Contrast ch. 1. 13; Psalm 30. 6, 7. on . . . bed—the secret of her failure (Isaiah 64. 7; Jeremiah 20. 13; Amos 6. 1, 4; Hosea 7. 14). loveth—no want of sincerity, but of diligence, which she now makes up for by leaving her bed to seek Him (Psalm 22. 2; 63. 8; Isaiah 26. 9; John 20. 17). Four times (v. 1-4) she calls Jesus Christ, "Him whom my soul loveth," designating Him as absent; language of desire: "He loved me," would be language of present fruition (Revelation 1. 5). In questioning the watchmen (v. 3), she does not even name Him, so full is her heart of Him. Having found Him at dawn (for throughout He is the morning), she charges the daughters not to abridge by intrusion the period of His stay. Cf. as to the thoughtful seeking for Jesus Christ in the time of John Baptist, in vain at first, but presently after successful (Luke 3. 15-22; John 1. 19-34). found him not—Oh, for such honest dealings with ourselves (Proverbs 25. 14; Jude 12)! 2. Wholly awake for God (Luke 14. 13-20; Ephesians 5. 14). "An honest resolution is often to (the doing of) duty, like a needle that draws the thread after it," [DURHAM.] Not a mere wish, that counts not the cost—to leave her easy bed, and wander in the dark night seeking Him (Proverbs 13. 4; Matthew 21. 30; Luke 14. 27-33). the city—Jerusalem, lit. (Matthew 3. 5; John 1. 19), and spiritually, the Church here (Hebrews 12. 22), in glory (Revelation 21. 2). broad ways—open spaces at the gates of Eastern cities, where the public assembled for business. So, the assemblies of worshippers (ch. 8. 2, 3; Proverbs 1. 20-23; Hebrews 10. 25). She had in her first awakening shrunk from them, seeking Jesus Christ alone; but she was desired to seek the footsteps of the flock (ch. 1. 8), so now in her second trial she goes forth to them of herself. "The more the soul grows in grace, and the less it leans on ordinances, the more it prizes and profits by them" [MOODY STUART] (Psalm 73. 16, 17). found him not—nothing short of Jesus Christ can satisfy her (Job 23. 8-10; Psalm 63. 1, 2). 3. watchmen—ministers (Isaiah 62. 6; Jeremiah 6. 17; Ezekiel 3. 17; Hebrews 13. 17), fit persons to consult (Isaiah 21. 11; Malachi 2. 7). found me—the general ministry of the word "finds" individually souls in quest of Jesus Christ (Genesis 24. 27, end of v.; Acts 16. 14); whereas formalists remain unaffected. 4. Jesus Christ is generally "found" near the watchmen and means of grace; but they are not Himself, the star that points to Bethlehem is not the Sun that has risen there; she hastens past the guide-posts to the goal. [MOODY STUART.] Not even angels could satisfy Mary, instead of Jesus Christ (John 20. 11-16). found him—(Isaiah 45. 19; Hosea 6. 1-3; Matthew 13. 44-46.) held him, &c.—willing to be held; not willing, if not held (Genesis 32. 26; Matthew 23. 9; Luke 24. 23, 29; Revelation 3. 11). "As a little weeping child will hold its mother fast, not because it is stronger than she, but because her bowels constrain her not to leave it; so Jesus Christ yearning over the believer cannot go, because He will not." [DURHAM.] In ch. 1. 4 it is He who leads the bride into His chambers; here it is she who leads Him into her mother's. There are times when the grace of Jesus Christ seems to draw us to Him; and others, when we with strong cries draw Him to us and ours. In the East one large apartment often serves for the whole family; so the bride here speaks of her mother's apartment and her own together. The mention of the "mother" excludes impropriety, and imparts the idea of heavenly love, pure as a sister's, whilst ardent as a bride's; hence the frequent title, "my sister—spouse." Our mother after the Spirit, is the Church, the new Jerusalem (John 3. 5-8; Galatians 4. 19, 26); for her we ought to pray continually (Ephesians 3. 14-19), also for the national Jerusalem (Isaiah 62. 6, 7; Romans 10. 1), also for the human family, which is our mother and kindred after the flesh; these our mother's children have evil treated us (ch. 1. 6), but, like our Father, we are to return good for evil (Matthew 5. 44, 45), and so bring Jesus Christ home to them (1 Peter 2. 12). 5. So ch. 2. 7; but there it was for the non-interruption of her own fellowship with Jesus Christ that she was anxious; here it is for the not grieving of the Holy Ghost, on the part of the daughters of Jerusalem. Jealously avoid levity, heedlessness, and offences which would mar the gracious work begun in others (Matthew 18. 7; Acts 2. 42, 43; Ephesians 4. 30).

CANTICLE III.—Ch. 3. 6-5. 1.—THE BRIDEGROOM WITH THE BRIDE. Historically, the ministry of Jesus Christ on earth. 6. New scene (v. 6-11). The friends of the Bridegroom see a cortege approach. His palanquin and guard. cometh out—rather, up from; the wilderness was lower than Jerusalem. [MAURER.] pillars of smoke—from the perfumes burned around Him and His bride. Image from Israel and the tabernacle (answering to "bed," v. 7) marching through the desert with the pillar of smoke by day, and fire by night (Exodus 14. 20), and the pillars of smoke ascending from the altars of incense and of atonement; so Jesus Christ's righteousness, atonement, and ever-living intercession. Balaam, the last representative of patriarchy, was required to curse the Jewish Church, just as it afterwards would not succumb to Christianity without a struggle (Numbers 22. 41), but he had to bless in language like that here (Numbers 24. 5, 6). Angels too joyfully ask the same question, when Jesus Christ with the tabernacle of His body (answering to His bed, v. 7; John 1. 14, "dwelt," [GREEK] tabernacled, John 2. 21) ascends into heaven (Psalm 24. 8-10), also when they see His glorious bride with Him (Psalm 68. 18; Revelation 7. 13-17). Encouragement to her; amidst the darkest trials (v. 1), she is still on the road to glory (v. 11) in a palanquin "paved with love" (v. 10); she is now in soul spiritually "coming," exhalting the sweet graces, faith, love, joy, peace, prayer, and praise; (the fire is lighted within, the "smoke" is seen without, Acts 4. 13); it is in the desert of trial (v. 1-3) she gets them; (she is the "merchant" buying from Jesus Christ without money or price, Isaiah 55. 1; Revelation 3. 18); just as myrrh and frankincense are got, not in Egypt, but in the Arabian sands and the mountains of Palestine. Hereafter she shall "come" (v. 6, 11) in a glorified body too (Philippians 3. 21). Historically, Jesus Christ returning from the wilderness, full of the Holy Ghost (Luke 4. 1, 14). The same, "Who is this," &c. (Isaiah 63. 1, 5). 7. In v. 6 the wilderness character of the Church is portrayed; in v. 7, 8, its militant aspect. In v. 9, 10, Jesus Christ is seen dwelling in believers, who are His "chariot" and "body." In v. 11, the consummation in glory. bed—palanquin. His body, lit., guarded by a definite number of angels, threescore, or sixty (Matthew 26. 53), from the wilderness (Matthew 4. 1, 11), and continually (Luke 2. 13; 22. 43; Acts 1. 10, 11); just as 600,000 of Israel guarded the Lord's tabernacle (Numbers 2. 17-32), one for every 10,000. In contrast to the "bed of sloth" (v. 1), valiant—(Joshua 5. 18, 14.) Angels guarding His tomb used like words (Mark 16. 6). of Israel—true subjects, not mercenaries. 8. hold—not actually grasping them, but having them girt on the thigh ready for use, like their Lord (Psalm 45. 3). So believers too are guarded by angels (Psalm 91. 11; Hebrews 1. 14), and they themselves need “every man” (Nehemiah 4. 18) to be armed (Psalm 144. 1, 2; 2 Corinthians 10. 4; Ephesians 6. 12, 17; 1 Timothy 6. 12), and “expert” (2 Corinthians 2. 11). because of fear in the night—Arab marauders often turn a wedding into mourning by a night attack. So the bridal procession of saints in the night of this wilderness is the chief object of Satan’s assault. 9. chariot—more elaborately made than the “bed” or traveling litter (v. 7), from a Hebrew root, to elaborate. [EVALD.] So the temple of “cedar of Lebanon,” as compared with the temporary tabernacle of shittim wood (2 Samuel 7. 2, 6, 7; 1 Kings 5. 14; 6. 15-18), Jesus Christ’s body is the antitype, “made” by the Father for Him (1 Corinthians 1. 30; Hebrews 10. 5), the wood answering to His human nature, the gold, His Divine; the two being but one Christ. 10. pillars—supporting the canopy at the four corners; curtains at the side protect the person within from the sun. Pillars with silver sockets supported the veil that enclosed the holy of holies; emblem of Jesus Christ’s strength (1 Kings 7. 21), Margin, “silver,” emblem of His purity (Psalm 12. 6); so the saints hereafter (Revelation 3. 12). bottom—rather, the back for resting or reclining on (Vulgate and LXX). [MAURER.] So the floor and mercy-seat, the resting-place of God (Psalm 132. 14) in the temple, was gold (1 Kings 6. 30). covering—rather, seat, as in Leviticus 15. 9. Hereafter the saints shall share His seat (Revelation 3. 21). purple—the veil of the holiest, partly purple, and the purple robe put on Jesus Christ, accord with English Version, “covering.” “Purple” (including scarlet and crimson) is the emblem of royalty, and of His blood; typified by the pass-over lamb’s blood, and the wine when the twelve sat or reclined at the Lord’s table. paved—tessellated, like mosaic pavement, with the various acts and promises of love of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (Zephaniah 3. 17; 1 John 4. 8, 16), in contrast with the tables of stone in the “midst” of the ark, covered with writings of stern command (cf. John 19. 13); this is all grace and love to believers, who answer to “the daughters of Jerusalem” (John 1. 17.) The exterior silver and gold, cedar, purple, and guards, may deter, but when the bride enters within, she rests on a pavement of love. 11. go forth—(Matthew 25. 6). daughters of Zion—spirits of saints, and angels (Isaiah 61. 10; Zechariah 9. 9). crown—nuptial (Ezekiel 16. 8-12), (the Hebrews wore costly crowns or chaplets at weddings), and kingly (Psalm 2. 6; Revelation 19. 12). The crown of thorns was once His nuptial chaplet, His blood the wedding wine-cup (John 19. 5). “His mother,” that so crowned Him, is the human race, for He is “the Son of man,” not merely the son of Mary. The same mother reconciled to Him (Matthew 12. 50), as the Church, travails in birth for souls, which she presents to Him as a crown (Philippians 4. 1; Revelations 4. 10). Not being ashamed to call the children brethren (Hebrews 2. 11-14), He calls their mother His mother (Psalm 22. 9; Romans 8. 29; Revelation 12. 1, 2). behold—(2 Thessalonians 1. 10). day of his espousals—chiefly the final marriage, when the number of the elect is complete (Revelation 6. 11). gladness—(Psalm 45. 15; Isaiah 62. 5; Revelation 19. 7). MOODY STUART observes as to this Canticle (ch. 3. 6-5. 1), the centre of the Book, these peculiarities: (1.) The bridegroom takes the chief part, whereas elsewhere the bride is the chief speaker; (2.) Elsewhere He is either “King” or “Solomon;” here He is twice called “King Solomon.” The bride is six times here called the “spouse;” never so before or after; also “sister” four times, and, except in the first verse of the next Canticle, nowhere else; (3.) He and she are never separate; no absence, no complaint, which abound elsewhere, are in this Canticle.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-16. 1. Contrast with the bride’s state by nature (Isaiah 1. 6) her state, by grace (v. 1-7), “perfect through His comeliness put upon her” (Ezekiel 16. 14; John 15. 3). The praise of Jesus Christ, unlike that of the world, hurts not, but edifies; as His, not ours, is the glory (John 5. 44; Revelation 4. 10, 11). Seven features of beauty are specified (v. 1-5) (“lips” and “speech” are but one feature, v. 3), the number for perfection. To each of these is attached a comparison from nature: the resemblances consist not so much in outward likeness, as in the combined sensations of delight produced by contemplating these natural objects. doves—the large melting eye of the Syrian dove appears especially beautiful amidst the foliage of its native groves: so the bride’s “eyes within her locks” (Luke 7. 44). MAURER for “locks,” has “veil;” but locks suit the connection better: so the Hebrew is translated (Isaiah 47. 2). The dove was the only bird counted “clean” for sacrifice. Once the heart was “the cage of every unclean and hateful bird.” Grace makes the change. eyes—(Matthew 6. 22; Ephesians 1. 18; contrast Matthew 5. 28; Ephesians 4. 18; 1 John 2. 16.) Chaste and guileless (Matthew 10. 16, Margin; John 1. 47.) John Baptist, historically, was the “turtle dove” (ch. 2. 12), with eye directed to the coming Bridegroom: his Nazarite unshorn hair answers to “locks” (John 1. 29, 36). hair . . . goats—the hair of goats in the East is fine like silk. As long hair is her glory, and marks her subjection to man (1 Corinthians 11. 6-15), so the Nazarite’s hair marked his subjection and separation unto God. (Cf. Judges 16. 17, with 2 Corinthians 6. 17; Titus 2. 14; 1 Peter 2. 9.) Jesus Christ cares for the minutest concerns of His saints (Matthew 10. 30). appear from—lit., “that lie down from,” lying along the hillside, they seem to hang from it: a picture of the bride’s hanging tresses. Gilead—beyond Jordan: there stood “the heap of witness” (Genesis 31. 48). 2. even shorn—the Hebrew is translated (1 Kings 6. 25), “of one size;” so the point of comparison to teeth is their symmetry of form; as in “come up from the washing,” the spotless whiteness: and in “twins,” the exact correspondence of the upper and under teeth: and in “none barren,” none wanting, none without its fellow. Faith is the tooth with which we eat the living bread (John 6. 35, 51). Contrast the teeth of sinners (Psalm 57. 4; Proverbs 30. 14); also their end (Psalm 3. 7; Matthew 25. 30). Faith leads the flock to the washing (Zechariah 13. 1; 1 Corinthians 6. 11; Titus 3. 5). none . . . barren—(2 Peter 1. 8.) He who is begotten of God begets instrumentally other sons of God. 3. thread—like a delicate fillet. Not thick and white as the leper’s lips (type of sin), which were therefore to be “covered,” as “unclean” (Leviticus 13. 45). scarlet—the blood of Jesus Christ (Isaiah 6. 5-9) cleanses the leprosy, and unseals the lips (Isaiah 57. 19; Hosea 14. 2; Hebrews 13. 15). Rahab’s scarlet thread was a type of it (Joshua 2. 18). speech—not a separate feature from the lips (Zephaniah 3. 9; Colossians 4. 6). Contrast “uncircumcised lips” (Exodus 6. 12). MAURER and BURROWES translate, “thy mouth.” temples—rather, the upper part of the cheek next the temples: the seat of shamefacedness; so, “within thy locks,” no display (1 Corinthians 11. 5, 6, 15). Mark of true penitence (Ezra 9. 6; Ezekiel 16. 63). Contrast Jeremiah 3. 3; Ezekiel 3. 7. pomegranate—when cut, it displays in rows seeds pellucid, like crystal, tinged with red. Her modesty is not on the surface, but within, which Jesus Christ can see into. 4. neck—stately: in beautiful contrast to the blushing temples (v. 3); not “stiff” (Isaiah 48. 4; Acts 7. 5), as that of unbroken nature; nor “stretched forth” wantonly (Isaiah 3. 16); nor burdened with the legal yoke (Lamentations 1. 14; Acts 15. 10); but erect in gospel freedom (Isaiah 52. 2). tower of David—probably on Zion. He was a man of war, preparatory to the reign of Solomon, the king of peace. So warfare in the case of Jesus Christ and His saints precedes the coming rest. Each soul won from Satan by Him is a trophy gracing the bride (Luke 11. 22), (each hangs on Him, Isaiah 22. 23, 24); also each victory of her faith. As shields adorn a temple’s walls (Ezekiel 27. 11), so necklaces hang on the bride’s neck (Judges 5. 30; 1 Kings 10. 16). 5. breasts—the bust is left open in Eastern dress. The breast-plate of the high priest was made of “two” pieces, folded one on the other, in which were the Urim and Thummim (lights and per- fection). "Faith and love" are the double breast-plate (1 Thessalonians 5. 8), answering to "hearing the word" and "keeping it," in a similar connection with breasts (Luke 12. 27, 28). roes—He reciprocates her praise (ch. 2. 9). Emblem of love and satisfaction (Proverbs 5. 19). feed—(Psalm 23. 2.) among the lilies—shrinking from thorns of strife, worldliness, and ungodliness (2 Samuel 23. 6; Matthew 13. 7). Roes feed among, not on the lilies: where these grow, there is moisture producing green pasturage. The lilies represent her white dress (Psalm 45. 14; Revelation 19. 8). 6. Historically, the hill of frankincense is Calvary, where, "through the eternal Spirit He offered Himself;" the mountain of myrrh is His embalmment (John 19. 39) till the resurrection "day-break." The 3d Canticle occupies the one cloudless day of His presence on earth, beginning from the night (ch. 2. 17) and ending with the night of His departure (ch. 4. 6). His promise is almost exactly in the words of her prayer (ch. 2. 17), (the same Holy Ghost breathing in Jesus Christ and His praying people), with the difference that she then looked for His visible coming. He now tells her that when He shall have gone from sight, He still is to be met with spiritually in prayer (Psalm 68. 16; Matthew 28. 20), until the everlasting day break, when we shall see face to face (1 Corinthians 13. 10, 12). 7. Assurance that He is going from her in love, not in displeasure (John 16. 6, 7). all fair—still stronger than ch. 1. 15; v. 1. no spot—our privilege (Ephesians 5. 27; Colossians 2. 10); our duty (2 Corinthians 6. 17; Jude 23; James 1. 27). 8. Invitation to her to leave the border mountains (the highest worldly elevation) between the hostile lands north of Palestine and the Promised Land (Psalm 45. 10; Philippians 3. 13). Amama—South of Anti-Libanus; the river Abana, or Amana, was near Damascus (2 Kings 5. 12). Shenir—The whole mountain was called Hermon; the part held by the Sidonians was called Strion; the part held by the Amorites, Shenir (Deuteronomy 3. 9). Infested by the devouring lion and the stealthy and swift leopard (Psalm 76. 4; Ephesians 6. 11; 1 Peter 5. 8). Contrasted with the mountain of myrrh, &c. (v. 6; Isaiah 2. 2); the good land (Isaiah 35. 9). with me—twice repeated emphatically. The presence of Jesus (Christ makes up for the absence of all besides (Luke 13. 29, 30; 2 Corinthians 6. 10). Moses was permitted to see Canaan from Pisgah; Peter, James, and John had a foretaste of glory on the mount of transfiguration. 9. sister . . . spouse—this title is here first used, as He is soon about to institute the Supper, the pledge of the nuptial union. By the term "sister," carnal ideas are excluded; the ardour of a spouse's love is combined with the purity of a sister's (Isaiah 54. 5; cf. Mark 3. 35). one—even one look is enough to secure His love (Zechariah 12. 10; Luke 23. 40-43). Not merely the Church collectively, but each one member of it (Matthew 18. 10, 14; Luke 15. 7, 24, 32). chain—necklace (Isaiah 62. 3; Malachi 3. 17), answering to the "shields" hanging in the tower of David (v. 4). Cf. the "ornament" (1 Peter 3. 4); "chains" (Proverbs 1. 9; 3. 22). 10. love—Hebrew, loves; manifold tokens of thy love. much better—answering to her "better" (ch. 1. 2), but with increased force. An Amœbean pastoral character pervades the Song, like the classic Amœbean idylls and eclogues. wine—the love of His saints is a more reviving cordial to Him than wine; ex. gr., at the feast in Simon's house (Luke 7. 36, 47; John 4. 32; cf. Zechariah 10. 7). smell of . . . ointments than all spices—answering to her praise (ch. 1. 3) with increased force. Fragrant, as being fruits of His Spirit in us (Galatians 5. 22). 11. drop—always ready to fall, being full of honey, though not always (Proverbs 10. 19) actually dropping (ch. 5. 13; Deuteronomy 32. 2; Matthew 12. 34). honey-comb—(Proverbs 5. 3; 16. 24). under thy tongue—not always on, but under, the tongue, ready to fall (Psalm 55. 21). Contrast her former state (Psalm 140. 3; Romans 3. 13). "Honey and milk" were the glory of the good land. The change is illustrated in the penitent thief. Contrast Matthew 27. 44 with Luke 23. 39, &c. It was lit. with "one" eye, a sidelong glance of love "better than wine," that he refreshed Jesus Christ (v. 9, 10). "To-day shalt thou be with me (cf. v. 8) in Paradise" (v. 12), is the only joyous sentence of His seven utterances on the cross. smell of . . . garments—which are often perfumed in the East (Psalm 45. 8). The perfume comes from Him on us (Psalm 133. 2). We draw nigh to God in the perfumed garment of our elder brother (Genesis 27. 27; see Jude 23). Lebanon—abounding in odoriferous trees (Hosea 14. 5-7). 12. The Hebrew has no "is." Here she is distinct from the garden (ch. 5. 1), yet identified with it (v. 16) as being one with Him in His sufferings. Historically the Paradise, into which the soul of Jesus Christ entered at death; and the tomb of Joseph, in which His body was laid amidst "myrrh," &c. (v. 6), situated in a nicely-kept garden (cf. "gardener," John 20. 15); "sealed" with a stone (Matthew 27. 66); in which it remembers "wells" in the East (Genesis 29. 3, 8). It was in a garden of light Adam fell; in a garden of darkness, Gethsemane, and chiefly that of the tomb, the second Adam retrieved us. Spiritually the garden is the gospel kingdom of heaven. Here all is ripe; previously (ch. 2. 13) it was "the tender grape." The garden is His, though he calls the plants hers (v. 13) by his gift (Isaiah 61. 3, end). spring . . . fountain—Jesus Christ (John 4. 10) sealed, whilst He was in the sealed tomb; it poured forth its full tide on Pentecost (John 7. 37-39). Still He is a sealed fountain until the Holy Ghost open it to one (1 Corinthians 12. 3). The Church also is "a garden enclosed" (Psalm 4. 3; Isaiah 5. 1, &c.). Contrast Psalm 80. 9-12. So "a spring" (Isaiah 27. 3; 58. 11); "sealed" (Ephesians 4. 30; 2 Timothy 2. 19). As wives in the East are secluded from public gaze, so believers (Psalm 83. 3; Colossians 3. 3). Contrast the open streams which "pass away" (Job 6. 15-18; 2 Peter 2. 17). 13. orchard—Hebrew, a paradise, i. e., a pleasure-ground and orchard. Not only flowers, but fruit trees (John 15. 8; Philippians 1. 11). camphire—not camphor (ch. 1. 14), hennah, or cypress blooms. 14. calamus—"sweet cane" (Exodus 30. 23; Jeremiah 6. 20). myrrh and aloes—Ointments are associated with His death, as well as with feasts (John 12. 7). The bride's ministry of "myrrh and aloes" is recorded (John 19. 39). 15. of—this pleasure-ground is not dependent on mere reservoirs; it has a fountain sufficient to water many "gardens" (plural). living—(Jeremiah 17. 8; John 4. 13, 14; 7. 38, 39). from Lebanon—Though the fountain is lowly, the source is lofty; fed by the perpetual snows of Lebanon, refreshingly cool (Jeremiah 18. 14), fertilizing the gardens of Damascus. It springs upon earth; its source is heaven. It is now not "sealed," but open "streams" (Revelation 22. 17). 16. Awake—lit., arise. All besides is ready; one thing alone is wanted—the breath of God. This follows rightly after His death (ch. 6. 12; Acts 2). It is His call to the Spirit to come (John 14. 16); in John 3. 8, compared to "the wind;" quickening (John 6. 63; Ezekiel 27. 9). Saints offer the same prayer (Psalm 85. 6; Habakkuk 3. 2). The north wind "awakes," or arises strongly, viz., the Holy Ghost as a reprover (John 16. 8-11); the south wind "comes" gently, viz., the Holy Ghost as the comforter (John 14. 16). The west wind brings rain from the sea (1 Kings 18. 44, 45; Luke 12. 54). The east wind is tempestuous (Job 27. 21; Isaiah 27. 8) and withering (Genesis 41. 23). These, therefore, are not wanted; but first the north wind clearing the air (Job 37. 22; Proverbs 25. 23), and then the warm south wind (v. 17); so the Holy Ghost first clearing away mists of gloom, error, unbelief, sin, which intercept the light of Jesus Christ, then infusing spiritual warmth (2 Corinthians 4. 6), causing the graces to exhale their odour. Let my beloved, &c.—The bride's reply. The fruit was now at length ripe; the last passover, which He had so desired, is come (Luke 22. 7, 15, 16, 18), the only case in which He took charge of the preparations. his—answering to Jesus Christ's "my." She owns that the garden is His, and the fruits in her, which she does not in false humility deny (Psalm 66. 16; Acts 21. 19; 1 Corinthians 15. 10) are His (John 15. 8; Philippians 1. 11).

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-16. 1. Answer to her prayer (Isaiah 65. 24; Revelation 3. 20). am come—already (ch. 4. 16); "come" (Genesis 28. 16). sister . . . spouse—As Adam's was created of his flesh, out of his opened side, there being none on earth on a level with him, so the bride out of the pierced Saviour (Ephesians 5. 30-32). have gathered . . . myrrh—His course was already complete; the myrrh, &c. (Matthew 2. 11; 26. 7-12; John 19. 39), emblems of the indwelling of the anointing Holy Ghost, were already gathered. spice—lit., balsam. have eaten—answering to her "eat" (ch. 4. 16). honey-comb—distinguished here from liquid "honey" dropping from trees. The last supper, here set forth, is one of espousal, a pledge of the future marriage (ch. 8. 14; Revelation 19. 9). Feasts often took place in gardens. In the absence of sugar, then unknown, honey was more widely used than with us. His eating honey with milk indicates His true, yet spotless, human nature from infancy (Isaiah 7. 15); and after His resurrection (Luke 24. 42). my wine—(John 18. 11)—a cup of wrath to Him, of mercy to us, whereby God's word and promises become to us "milk" (Psalm 19. 10; 1 Peter 2. 2). "My" answers to "His" (ch. 4. 16). The "myrrh (emblem, by its bitterness, of repentance), honey, milk (incipient faith), wine" (strong faith), in reference to believers, imply that He accepts all their graces, however various in degree. eat—He desires to make us partakers in His joy (Isaiah 55. 1, 2; John 6. 53-57; 1 John 1. 3). drink abundantly—so as to be filled (Ephesians 5. 18; as Haggai 1. 6). friends—(John 15. 15).

CANTICLE IV.—Ch. 5. 2, 8. 5.—FROM THE AGONY OF GETHSEMANE TO THE CONVERSION OF SAMARIA. 2. Sudden change of scene from evening to midnight, from a betrothal feast to cold repulse. He has gone from the feast alone; night is come; He knocks at the door of His espoused; she hears, but in sloth does not shake off half-conscious drowsiness, viz., the disciples' torpor (Matthew 26. 40-43), "the spirit willing, the flesh weak" (cf. Romans 7.; Galatians 5). Not total sleep. The lamp was burning beside the slumbering wise virgin, but wanted trimming (Matthew 25. 5-7). It is His voice that rouses her (Jonah 1. 6; Ephesians 5. 14; Revelation 3. 20). Instead of bitter reproaches, He addresses her by the most endearing titles, "my sister, my love," &c. Cf. His thought of Peter after the denial (Mark 16. 7). dew—which falls heavily in summer nights in the East (see Luke 9. 58). drops of the night—(Psalm 22. 2; Luke 22. 44.) His death is not expressed, as unsuitable to the allegory, a song of love and joy; v. 4 refers to the scene in the judgment hall of Caiaphas, when Jesus Christ employed the cock-crowing and look of love to awaken Peter's sleeping conscience, so that his "bowels were moved" (Luke 22. 61, 62); v. 5, 6, the disciples with "myrrh," &c. (Luke 24. 1, 5), seeking Jesus Christ in the tomb, but finding Him not, for He has withdrawn Himself" (John 7. 34; 13. 33); v. 7, the trials by watchmen extend through the whole night of His withdrawal from Gethsemane to the resurrection; they took off the "veil" of Peter's disguise; also, lit., the linen cloth from the young man (Mark 14. 51); v. 8, the sympathy of friends (Luke 23. 27). undefiled—not polluted by spiritual adultery (Revelation 14. 4; James 4. 4). 3. Trivial excuses (Luke 14. 18). coat—rather, the inmost vest, next the skin, taken off before going to bed. washed . . . feet—before going to rest, for they had been soiled, from the Eastern custom of wearing sandals, not shoes. Sloth (Luke 11. 7) and despondency (Deuteronomy 7. 17-19). 4. A key in the East is usually a piece of wood with pegs in it corresponding to small holes in a wooden bolt within, and is put through a hole in the door, and thus draws the bolt. So Jesus Christ "puts forth His hand (viz., His Spirit, Ezekiel 3. 14, by Hebrew, from, so in ch. 2. 9) the hole;" in "chastening" (Psalm 33. 2; Revelation 3. 14-22, singularly similar to this passage), and other unexpected ways letting Himself in (Luke 22. 61, 62). bowels . . . moved for him—It is His which are first troubled for us, and which cause ours to be troubled for Him (Jeremiah 31. 20; Hosea 11. 8). 5. dropped with myrrh—The best proof a bride could give her lover of welcome was to anoint herself (the back of the hands especially, as being the coolest part of the body) profusely with the best perfumes (Exodus 30. 23; Esther 2. 12; Proverbs 7. 17); "sweet-smelling" is in the Hebrew rather,

"spontaneously exuding" from the tree, and therefore the best. She designed also to anoint Him, whose "head was filled with the drops of night" (Luke 24. 1). The myrrh typifies bitter repentance, the fruit of the Spirit's unction (2 Corinthians 1. 21, 22). handles of the lock—sins which closed the heart against Him. 6. withdrawn—He knocked, when she was sleeping; for to have left her then would have ended in the death sleep; He withdraws now that she is roused, as she needs correction (Jeremiah 2. 17, 19), and can appreciate and safely bear it now, which she could not then. "The strong He'll strongly try" (1 Corinthians 10. 13). when he spake—rather, because of His speaking; at the remembrance of His tender words (Job 29. 2, 3; Psalm 27. 13; 142. 7), or, till He should speak. no answer—(Job 23. 3-9; 30. 20; 31. 29; Lamentations 3. 41.) Weak faith receives immediate comfort (Luke 8. 44, 47, 48); strong faith is tried with delay (Matthew 15. 22, 23). 7. watchmen—historically, the Jewish priests, &c. (see note on v. 2); spiritually, ministers (Isaiah 62. 6; Hebrews 13. 17), faithful in "smiting" (Psalm 141. 5), but (as she leaves them, v. 8) too harsh; or, perhaps, unfaithful; disliking her zeal wherewith she sought Jesus Christ, first, with spiritual prayer, "opening" her heart to Him, and then in charitable works "about the city;" miscalling it fanaticism (Isaiah 66. 5), and taking away her veil (the greatest indignity to an Eastern lady), as though she were positively immodest. She had before sought Him by night in the streets, under strong affection (ch. 3. 2-4), and so without rebuff from "the watchmen," found Him immediately; but now after sinful neglect, she encounters pain and delay. God forgives believers, but it is a serious thing to draw on His forgiveness; so the growing reserve of God towards Israel observable in Judges, as His people repeat their demands on His grace. 8. She turns from the unsympathizing watchmen to humbler persons, not yet themselves knowing Him, but in the way towards it. Historically, His secret friends in the night of His withdrawal (Luke 23. 27, 28). Inquirers may find ("if ye find") Jesus Christ before she who has grieved His Spirit finds Him again. tell—in prayer (James 5. 16). sick of love—from an opposite cause (ch. 2. 5) than through excess of delight at His presence; now excess of pain at His absence. 9. Her own beauty (Ezekiel 16. 14), and love-sickness for Him, elicit now their inquiry (Matthew 5. 16); heretofore "other lords besides Him had dominion over them;" thus they had seen "no beauty in Him" (Isaiah 26. 13; 53. 2). 10. (1 Peter 3. 15). white and ruddy—health and beauty. So David (equivalent to beloved), His forefather after the flesh, and type (1 Samuel 17. 42). "The Lamb" is at once His nuptial and sacrificial name (1 Peter 1. 19; Revelation 19. 7), characterized by white and red; white, His spotless manhood (Revelation 1. 14). The Hebrew for white is properly illuminated by the sun, "white as the light" (cf. Matthew 17. 2); red, in His blood-dyed garment as slain (Isaiah 63. 1-3; Revelation 5. 6; 19. 13). Angels are white, not red; the blood of martyrs does not enter heaven, His alone is seen there. chiefest—lit., a standard-bearer; i. e., as conspicuous above all others, as a standard-bearer is among hosts (Psalm 45. 7; 89. 6; Isaiah 11. 10; 55. 4; Hebrews 2. 10; cf. 2 Samuel 18. 3; Job 33. 23; Philippians 2. 9-11; Revelation 1. 5). The chief of sinners needs the "chiefest" of Saviours. 11. head . . . gold—the Godhead of Jesus Christ, as distinguished from His heel, i. e., His manhood, which was "bruised" by Satan; both together being one Christ (1 Corinthians 11. 3). Also His sovereignty, as Nebuchadnezzar the supreme king was "the head of gold" (Daniel 2. 32-33; Colossians 1. 18), the highest creature, compared with Him, is brass, iron, and clay. "Preciousness" (Greek, 1 Peter 2. 7). bushy—curled, token of Headship. In contrast with her flowing locks (ch. 4. 1), the token of her subjection to Him (Psalm 8. 4-8; 1 Corinthians 11. 3, 6-15). The Hebrew is (pendulous as) the branches of a palm, which, when in leaf, resemble waving plumes of feathers. black—implying youth; no "gray hairs" (Psalm 102. 27; 110. 3, 4; Hosea 7. 9). Jesus Christ was crucified in the prime of vigour and manliness. In heaven, on the other hand, His hair is "white." He being the Ancient of days (Daniel 7. 9). These contrasts often concur in Him (v. 10), "white and ruddy;" here the "raven" (v. 12), the "dove," as both with Noah in the ark (Genesis 8.); emblems of judgment and mercy. 12, as the eyes of doves—rather, as doves (Psalm 68. 13); bathing in "the rivers;" so combining in their "silver" feathers the whiteness of milk with the sparkling brightness of the water trickling over them (Matthew 3. 16). The "milk" may allude to the white around the pupil of the eye. The "waters" refer to the eye as the fountain of tears of sympathy (Ezekiel 16. 5, 6; Luke 19. 41). Vivacity, purity, and love, are the three features typified. fitly set—as a gem in a ring; as the precious stones in the high priest's breastplate. Rather, translate as Vulgate (the doves), sitting at the fulness of the stream; by the full stream; or as MAURER (the eyes) set in fulness, not sunk in their sockets (Revelation 5. 6), ("seven," expressing full perfection), (Zechariah 3. 9; 4. 10). 13, cheeks—the seat of beauty, according to the Hebrew meaning. [GESENIUS.] Yet men smote and spat on them (Isaiah 50. 6). bed—full, like the raised surface of the garden bed; fragrant with ointments, as beds with aromatic plants [lit., balsam]. sweet flowers—rather, "terraces of aromatic herbs"—"high-raised parterres of sweet plants," in parallelism to "bed," which comes from a Hebrew root, meaning cleavation. lips—(Psalm 45. 2; John 7. 46.) lilies—red lilies. Soft and gentle (1 Peter 2. 22, 23). How different lips were man's (Psalm 22. 7)! dropping . . . myrrh—viz., His lips, just as the sweet dew-drops which hang in the calix of the lily. 14, rings set with . . . beryl—Hebrew, Tarshish, so called from the city. The ancient chrysolite, gold in colour (LXX.), our topaz, one of the stones on the high priest's breastplate, also in the foundation of New Jerusalem (Revelation 21.; also Daniel 10. 6). "Are as," is plainly to be supplied, see in v. 13 a similar ellipsis; not as MOODY STUART: "have gold rings." The hands bent in are compared to beautiful rings, in which beryl is set, as the nails are in the fingers. BURROWES explains the rings as cylinders used as signets, such as are found in Nineveh, and which resemble fingers. A ring is the token of sonship (Luke 15. 22). A slave was not allowed to wear a gold ring. He imparts His sonship and freedom to us (Galatians 4. 7); also of authority (Genesis 41. 42; cf. John 6. 27). He seals us in the name of God with His signet (Revelation 7. 2-4), cf. below, ch. 8. 6, where she desires to be herself a signet-ring on His arms; so "graven on the palms," &c., i. e., on the signet-ring in His hand (Isaiah 49. 16; contrast Haggai 2. 23, with Jeremiah 22. 24). belly—BURROWES and MOODY STUART translate "body." NEWTON, as it is elsewhere, "bowels;" viz., His compassion (Psalm 22. 14; Isaiah 63. 15; Jeremiah 31. 20; Hosea 11. 8). bright—lit., elaborately wrought, so as to shine, so His "prepared" body (Hebrews 10. 5); the "ivory palace" of the king (Psalm 45. 8); spotless, pure, so the bride's "neck is as a tower of ivory" (ch. 7. 4). sapphires—spangling in the girdle round Him (Daniel 10. 5). "To the pure all things are pure." As in statuary to the artist the partly undraped figure is suggestive only of beauty, free from indelicacy, so to the saint the personal excellencies of Jesus Christ, typified under the ideal of the noblest human form. As, however, the bride and bridegroom are in public, the usual robes on the person, richly ornamented, are presupposed (Isaiah 11. 5). Sapphires indicate His heavenly nature (so John 3. 13, "is in heaven"), even in His humiliation, overlaying or cast "over" His ivory human body (Exodus 24. 10). Sky-blue in colour, the height and depth of the love of Jesus Christ (Ephesians 3. 18). 15, pillars—strength and steadfastness. Contrast man's "legs" (Ecclesiastes 12. 3). Allusion to the temple (1 Kings 5. 8, 9; 7. 21), the "cedars" of "Lebanon" (Psalm 147. 10). Jesus Christ's "legs" were not broken on the cross, though the thieves' were; on them rests the weight of our salvation (Psalm 75. 3). sockets of gold—His sandals, answering to the bases of the pillars; "set up from everlasting" (Proverbs 8. 22, 23). From the head (v. 11) to the feet, "of fine gold." He was tried in the fire and found without alloy. countenance—rather, His aspect, including both mien and stature (cf. Margin, 2 Samuel 23. 21 with 1 Chronicles 11. 23). From the several parts, she proceeds to the general effect of the whole person of Jesus Christ. Lebanon—so called from its white limestone rocks. excellent—lit., choice, i. e., fair and tall as the cedars on Lebanon (Ezekiel 31. 3, &c.). Majesty is the prominent thought (Psalm 21. 5). Also the cedars' duration (Hebrews 1. 11); greenness (Luke 23. 31), and refuge afforded by it (Ezekiel 17. 22, 23). 16, Lit., "His palate is sweetness, yea, all over loveliness," i. e., He is the essence of these qualities. "Mouth;" so ch. 1. 2, not the same as "lips" (v. 13), His breath (Isaiah 11. 4; John 20. 22). "All over," all the beauties scattered among creatures are transcendently concentrated in Him (Colossians 1. 19; 2. 9). my beloved—for I love Him. My friend—for He loves me (Proverbs 18. 24). Holy boasting (Psalm 34. 2; 1 Corinthians 1. 31).

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-13. 1. Historically, at Jesus Christ's crucifixion and burial, Joseph of Arimathea, and Nicodemus, and others, joined with His professed disciples. By speaking of Jesus Christ, the bride does good not only to her own soul, but to others (note, ch. 1. 4; Malachi 3. 16; Matthew 5. 14-16). Cf. the hypocritical use of similar words (Matthew 2. 8). 2, gone down—Jerusalem was on a hill (answering to its moral elevation), and the gardens were at a little distance in the valleys below. beds of spices—(balsam) which He Himself calls the "mountain of myrrh," &c. (ch. 4. 6), and again (ch. 8. 14), the resting-place of His body amidst spices, and of His soul in paradise, and now in heaven, where He stands as High Priest for ever. Nowhere else in the Song is there mention of mountains of spices. feed in . . . gardens—i. e., in the churches, though He may have withdrawn for a time from the individual believer: she implies an invitation to the daughters of Jerusalem to enter His spiritual Church, and become lilies, made white by His blood. He is gathering some lilies now to plant on earth, others to transplant to heaven (ch. 5. 1; Genesis 5. 24; Mark 4. 28, 29; Acts 7. 60). 3. In speaking of Jesus Christ to others, she regains her own assurance. Lit., "I am for my beloved . . . for me." Reverse order from ch. 2. 16. She now, after the season of darkness, grounds her convictions on His love towards her, more than on hers towards Him (Deuteronomy 33. 3). There, it was the young believer concluding that she was His, from the sensible assurance that He was hers. Tirzah—meaning pleasant (Hebrews 13. 21); "well-pleasing" (Matthew 5. 14); the royal city of one of the old Canaanite kings (Joshua 12. 24); and after the revolt of Israel, the royal city of its kings, before Omri founded Samaria (1 Kings 16. 8, 15). No ground for assigning a later date than the time of Solomon to the Song, as Tirzah was even in his time the capital of the north (Israel), as Jerusalem was of the south (Judah). Jerusalem—residence of the kings of Judah, as Tirzah, of Israel (Psalm 48. 1, &c.; 122. 1-3; 125. 1, 2). Loveliness, security, unity, and loyalty; also the union of Israel and Judah in the Church (Isaiah 11. 13; Jeremiah 3. 18; Ezekiel 37. 16, 17, 22; cf. Hebrews 12. 22; Revelation 21. 2, 12). terrible—awe-inspiring. Not only armed as a city on the defensive, but as an army on the offensive. banners—(Note, ch. 5. 10; Psalm 60. 4); Jehovah-nissi (2 Corinthians 10. 4). 5. (Ch. 4. 9; Genesis 32. 28; Exodus 32. 9-14; Hosea 12. 4). This is the way "the army" (v. 4) "overcomes" not only enemies, but Jesus Christ Himself, with eyes fixed on Him (Psalm 25. 15; Matthew 11. 12). Historically, v. 3, 4, 5, represent the restoration of Jesus Christ to His Church at the resurrection; His sending her forth as an army, with new powers (Mark 16. 15-18, 20); His rehearsing the same instructions (cf. v. 6, note) as when with them (Luke 24. 44). overcome—lit., have taken me by storm. 6. Not vain repetition of ch. 4. 1, 2. The use of the same words shows his love unchanged after her temporary unfaithfulness (Malachi 3. 6). 8, threescore—indefinite number, as ch. 3. 7. Not queens, &c., of Solomon, but witnesses of the espousals, rulers of the earth contrasted with the saints, who, though many, are but "one" bride (Isaiah 52. 15; Luke 22. 25, 26; John 17. 21; 1 Corinthians 10. 17). The one bride is contrasted with the many-wives whom

Eastern kings had in violation of the marriage law (1 Kings 11, 1-3). 9. Hollow professors, like half wives, have no part in the one bride. only one of her mothers—viz., "Jerusalem above" (Galatians 4, 26). The "little sister" (ch. 8, 8) is not inconsistent with her being "the only one;" for that sister is one with herself (John 10, 16). choice—(Ephesians 1, 4; 2 Thessalonians 2, 13.) As she exalted Him above all others (ch. 5, 10), so He now her daughters . . . blessed her—(Isalah 8, 18; 61, 9; Ezekiel 16, 14; 2 Thessalonians 1, 10.) So at her appearance after Pentecost (Acts 4, 13; 6, 15; 24, 25; 28, 28). 10. The words expressing the admiration of the daughters. Historically (Acts 5, 21-39), as the morning—as yet she is not come to the fulness of her light (Proverbs 4, 18). moon—shining in the night, by light borrowed from the sun; so the bride, in the darkness of this world, reflects the light of the Sun of righteousness (2 Corinthians 3, 18). sun—her light of justification is perfect, for it is His (2 Corinthians 5, 21; 1 John 4, 17). The moon has less light, and has only one half illuminated; so the bride's sanctification is as yet imperfect. Her future glory (Matthew 13, 43). army—(v. 4.) The climax requires this to be applied to the starry and angelic hosts, from which God is called Lord of Sabaoth. Her final glory (Genesis 15, 5; Daniel 12, 3; Revelation 12, 1). The Church Patriarchal, "the morning;" Levitical, "the moon;" Evangelical, "the sun;" Triumphant, "the bannered army" (Revelation 19, 14). 11. The bride's words; for she everywhere is the narrator, and often soliloquizes, which He never does. The first garden (ch. 2, 11-13) was that of spring, full of flowers and grapes not yet ripe; the second, autumn, with spices (which are always connected with the person of Jesus Christ), and nothing unripe (ch. 4, 13, &c.). The third here, of "nuts," from the previous autumn; the end of winter, and verge of spring; the Church in the upper room (Acts 1, 13, &c.), when one dispensation was just closed, the other not yet begun; the hard shell of the old needing to be broken, and its inner sweet kernel extracted [ORIGEN] (Luke 21, 27, 32); waiting for the Holy Ghost to usher in spiritual spring. The walnut is meant, with a bitter outer husk, a hard shell, and sweet kernel. So the Word is distasteful to the careless; when awakened, the sinner finds the letter hard, until the Holy Ghost reveals the sweet inner spirit. fruits of the valley—MAURER translates, "the blooming products of the river," i. e., the plants growing on the margin of the river flowing through the garden. She goes to watch the first sproutings of the various plants. 12. Sudden outpourings of the Spirit on Pentecost (Acts 2), whilst the Church was using the means (answering to "the garden," v. 11; John 3, 8). Ammi-nadib—supposed to be one proverbial for swift driving. Similarly (ch. 1, 9). Rather, my willing people (Psalm 110, 3). A willing chariot bore a "willing people;" or Nadib is the Prince, Jesus Christ (Psalm 68, 17). She is borne in a moment into His presence (Ephesians 2, 6). 13. Entreaty of the daughters of Jerusalem to her, in her chariot-like flight from them (cf. 2 Kings 2, 12; 2 Samuel 19, 14). Shulamite—new name applied to her now first. Feminine of Solomon, Prince of Peace; His bride, daughter of peace, accepting and proclaiming it (Isalah 52, 7; John 14, 27; Romans 5, 1; Ephesians 2, 17). Historically, this name answers to the time when, not without a Divine design in it, the young Church met in Solomon's porch (Acts 3, 11; 5, 12). The entreaty, "Return, O Shulamite," answers to the people's desire to keep Peter and John, after the lame man was healed, when they were about to enter the temple. Their reply attributing the glory not to themselves, but to Jesus Christ, answers to the bride's reply here, "What will ye see" in me? "As it were," &c. She accepts the name Shulamite, as truly describing her. But adds, that though "one" (v. 9), she is nevertheless "two." Her glories are her Lord's, beaming through her (Ephesians 5, 31, 32). The two armies are the family of Jesus Christ in heaven, and that on earth, joined and one with Him; the one militant, the other triumphant. Or Jesus Christ and His ministering angels are one army, the Church the other, both being one (John 17, 21, 22). Allusion is made to Mahanaim (meaning two hosts), the scene of Jacob's victorious conflict by prayer (Genesis 32, 2, 9, 22-30). Though she is peace, yet she has warfare here, between flesh and spirit within and foes without; her strength, as Jacob's at Mahanaim, is Jesus Christ and His host enlisted on her side by prayer; whence she obtains those graces which raise the admiration of the daughters of Jerusalem.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-13. thy feet—rather, thy goings (Psalm 17, 5). Evident allusion to Isalah 52, 7: "How beautiful . . . are the feet of him . . . that publisheth peace" (Shulamite, ch. 6, 13). shoes—sandals are richly jewelled in the East (Luke 15, 22; Ephesians 6, 15). She is evidently "on the mountains," whither she was wafted (ch. 6, 12), above the daughters of Jerusalem, who therefore portray her feet first. daughter—of God the Father, with whom Jesus Christ is one (Matthew 5, 9), "children of (the) God" (of peace), equivalent to Shulamite (Psalm 45, 10-15; 2 Corinthians 6, 18), as well as bride of Jesus Christ. "Prince's," therefore princely herself, freely giving the word of life to others, not sparing her "feet," as in ch. 5, 3; Exodus 12, 11. To act on the offensive is defensive to ourselves. joints—rather, the rounding; the full graceful curve of the hips in the female figure; like the rounding of a necklace (as the Hebrew for "jewels" means). Cf. with the English Version, Ephesians 4, 13-16; Colossians 2, 19. Or, applying it to the girdle binding together the robes round the hips (Ephesians 6, 14.) cunning workman—(Psalm 139, 14-16; Ephesians 2, 10, 22; 5, 29, 30, 32.) 2. navel—rather, girdle-clasp, called from the part of the person underneath. The "shoes" (v. 1) prove that dress is throughout presupposed on all parts where it is usually worn. She is "a bride adorned for her husband;" the "uncomely parts," being most adorned (1 Corinthians 12, 23). The girdle-clasp was adorned with red rubies resembling the "round goblet" (crater or mixer) of spice-mixed wine (not "liquor," ch. 8, 2; Isalah 5, 22). The wine of the "New Testament in His blood" (Luke 22, 20). The spiritual exhilaration by it was mistaken for that caused by new wine (Acts 2, 13-17; Ephesians 5, 18). belly—i. e., the vesture on it. As in Psalms 45, 13, 14, gold and needlework compose the bride's attire, so golden-coloured "wheat" and white "lilies" here. The ripe grain, in token of harvest joy, used to be decorated with lilies; so the accumulated spiritual food (John 6, 35; 12, 24), free from chaff, not fenced with thorns, but made attractive by lilies (believers, ch. 2, 2; Acts 2, 46, 47; 5, 13, 14, in common partaking of it). Associated with the exhilarating wine-cup (Zechariah 9, 17), as here. 3. The daughters of Jerusalem describe her in the same terms as Jesus Christ in ch. 4, 5. The testimonies of heaven and earth coincide. twins—faith and love. 4. tower of ivory—in ch. 4, 4, Jesus Christ saith, "a tower of David bullded for an armoury." Strength and conquest are the main thought in His description; here, beauty and polished whiteness; contrast ch. 1. 5. fish-pools—seen by BURCKHARDT, clear (Revelation 22, 1), deep, quiet, and full (1 Corinthians 2, 10, 15). Heshbon—east of Jordan, residence of the Amorite king, Sihon (Numbers 21, 25, &c.), afterwards held by Gad. Bath-rabbim—Daughter of a multitude; a crowded thoroughfare. Her eyes (ch. 4, 1) are called by Jesus Christ, "doves' eyes," waiting on Him. But here, looked on by the daughters of Jerusalem, they are compared to a placid lake. She is calm even amidst the crowd (Proverbs 8, 2; John 16, 33). nose—or, face. tower of Lebanon—a border fortress, watching the hostile Damascus. Towards Jesus Christ her face was full of holy shame (ch. 4, 1, 3, notes); towards spiritual foes, like a watchtower (Habakkuk 2, 1; Mark 13, 37; Acts 4, 13), elevated, so that she looks not up from earth to heaven, but down from heaven to earth. If we retain "nose," discernment of spiritual fragrance is meant. 5. upon thee—the head-dress ("upon" her). Carmel—signifying a well-cultivated field (Isalah 35, 2). In ch. 5, 15 He is compared to majestic Lebanon; she here, to fruitful Carmel. Her head-dress, or crown (2 Timothy 4, 8; 1 Peter 5, 4). Also the souls won by her (1 Thessalonians 2, 19, 20), a token of her fruitfulness. purple—royalty (Revelation 1. 6). As applied to hair, it expresses the glossy splendour of black hair (lit., pendulous hair) so much admired in the East (ch. 4. 1). Whilst the King compares her hair to the flowing hair of goats (the token of her subjection), the daughters of Jerusalem compare it to royal purple galleries—(so ch. 1. 17. Margin; Revelation 21. 3.) But MAURER translates here, “flowing ringlets;” with these, as with thongs (so LEE, from the Arabic, translates it) “the King is held” bound (ch. 6. 5; Proverbs 6. 25). Her purple crown of martyrdom especially captivated the King, appearing from His galleries (Acts 7. 55. 56). As Samson’s strength was in his locks (Judges 16. 17). Here first the daughters see the King themselves. 6. Nearer advance of the daughters to the Church (Acts 2. 47; 5. 13, end). Love to her is the first token of love to Him (1 John 5. 1, end). delights—fascinating charms to them and to the King (v. 5; Isaiah 62. 4. Hephzi-bah). Hereafter, too (Zephaniah 3. 17; Malachi 3. 12; Revelation 21. 9). 7. palm tree—(Psalm 92. 12.) The sure sign of water near (Exodus 15. 27; John 7. 38). clusters—not of dates, as MOODY STUART thinks. The parallelism (v. 8), “clusters of the vine,” shows it is here clusters of grapes. Vines were often trained (termed “wedded”) on other trees. 8. The daughters are no longer content to admire, but resolve to lay hold of her fruits, high though these be. The palm stem is bare for a great height, and has its crown of fruit-laden boughs at the summit. It is the symbol of triumphant joy (John 12. 13); so hereafter (Revelation 7. 9). breasts—(Isaiah 66. 11.) the vine—Jesus Christ (Hosea 14. 7, end; John 15. 1). nose—i. e., breath; the Holy Ghost breathed into her nostrils by Him, whose “mouth is most sweet” (ch. 5. 16). apples—citrons, off the tree to which He is likened (ch. 2. 3). 9. roof of thy mouth—thy voice (Proverbs 15. 23). best wine—the new vine of the gospel kingdom (Mark 14. 25), poured out at Pentecost (Acts 2. 4, 13, 17). for my beloved—(Ch. 4. 10.) Here first the daughters call Him theirs, and become one with the bride. The steps successively are (ch. 1. 5) where they misjudge her (ch. 3. 11); ch. 5. 8, where the possibility of their finding Him, before she regained Him, is expressed; ch. 5. 9 (ch. 6. 1; 7. 6, 9), (John 4. 42.) causing . . . asleep to speak—(Isaiah 35. 6; Mark 5. 19, 20; Acts 2. 47; Ephesians 5. 14.) Jesus Christ’s first miracle turned water into “good wine kept until now” (John 2.); just as the gospel revives those asleep and dying under the law (Proverbs 31. 6; Romans 7. 9, 10, 24, 25; 8. 1). 10. Words of the daughters of Jerusalem and the bride, now united into one (Acts 4. 32). They are mentioned again distinctly (ch. 8. 4), as fresh converts were being added from among inquirers, and these needed to be charged not to grieve the Spirit. his desire is toward me—strong assurance. He so desires us, as to give us sense of His desire toward us (Psalm 139. 17, 18; Luke 22. 15; Galatians 2. 20; 1 John 4. 16). 11. field—the country. “The tender grape (MAURER translates, flowers) and vines” occurred before (ch. 2. 13). But here she prepares for Him all kinds of fruit old and new; also, she anticipates, in going forth to seek them, communion with Him in “loves.” “Early” implies immediate earnestness. “The villages,” imply distance from Jerusalem. At Stephen’s death the disciples were scattered from it through Judea and Samaria, preaching the word (Acts 8). Jesus Christ was with them, confirming the word with miracles. They gathered the old fruits, of which Jesus Christ had sown the seed (John 4.), as well as new fruits. lodge—forsaking home for Jesus Christ’s sake (Matthew 19. 29). 12. (Mark 1. 35; John 9. 4; Galatians 6. 10.) Assurance fosters diligence, not indolence. 13. mandrakes—Hebrew, dudaim, from a root meaning to love; love-apples, supposed to exhilarate the spirits and excite love. Only here and Genesis 30. 14-16. Atropa mandragora of Linnæus; its leaves like lettuce, but dark green, flowers purple, root forked, fruit of the size of an apple, ruddy and sweet-smelling, gathered in wheat-harvest, i. e., in May. (Mariti, ii, 195.) gates—the entrance to the kiosk or summer-house. Love “lays up” the best of everything for the person beloved (1 Corinthians 10. 31; Philippians 3. 8; 1 Peter 4. 11), thereby really, though unconsciously, laying up for itself (1 Timothy 6. 18, 19).

Ver. 1-14. 1. He had been a brother already. Why, then, this prayer here? It refers to the time after His resurrection, when the previous outward intimacy with Him was no longer allowed, but it was implied it should be renewed at the second coming (John 20. 17); for this the Church here prays; meanwhile she enjoys inward spiritual communion with Him. The last who ever “kissed” Jesus Christ on earth was the traitor Judas. The bride’s return with the King to her mother’s house answers to Acts 8. 25, after the mission to Samaria. The rest spoken of (v. 4) answers to Acts 9. 31. that sucked . . . mother—a brother born of the same mother; the closest tie. 2. Her desire to bring Him into her home circle (John 1. 41). who would instruct me—rather, “thou wouldst instruct me,” viz., how I might best please thee (Isaiah 11. 2. 3; 50. 4; Luke 12. 12; John 14. 26; 16. 13). spiced wine—seasoned with aromatic perfumes. Jesus Christ ought to have our choicest gifts. Spices are never introduced in the song in His absence; therefore the time of His return from “the mountain of spices” (v. 14) is contemplated. The cup of betrothal was given by Him at the last supper; the cup of marriage shall be presented by her at His return (Matthew 26. 29). Till then the believer often cannot feel towards, or speak of, Him, as he would wish. 3. 4. The “left and right hand,” &c., occurred only once actually (ch. 2. 6), and here optatively. Only at His first manifestation did the Church palpably embrace Him; at His second coming there shall be again sensible communion with Him. The rest in v. 4, which is a spiritual realization of the wish in v. 3 (1 Peter 1. 8), and the charge not to disturb it, close the 1st, 2d, and 4th canticles; not the 3d, as the bridegroom there takes charge Himself; nor the 5th, as, if repose formed its close, we might mistake the present state for our rest. The broken, longing close, like that of the whole Bible (Revelation 22. 20), reminds us we are to be waiting for a Saviour to come. On “daughters of Jerusalem,” see note, ch. 7. 10.

CANTICLE V.—Ch. 8. 5-14.—FROM THE CALL OF THE GEN- TILES TO THE CLOSE OF REVELATION. 5. Who is this—Words of the daughters of Jerusalem, i. e., the churches of Judea; referring to Paul, on his return from Arabia (“the wilderness”), whither he had gone after conversion (Galatians 1. 15-24). I raised thee . . . she . . . bare thee—(Acts 26. 14-16.) The first words of Jesus Christ to the bride since her going to the garden of nuts (ch. 6. 9, 10); so His appearance to Paul is the only one since His ascension; v. 13 is not an address of Him as visible; her reply implies He is not visible (1 Corinthians 15. 8). Spiritually, she was found in the moral wilderness (Ezekiel 16. 5, Hosea 13. 5); but now she is “coming up from” it (Jeremiah 2. 2; Hosea 2. 14), especially in the last stage of her journey, her conscious weakness casting itself the more wholly on Jesus Christ (2 Corinthians 12. 9). “Raised” (Ephesians 2. 1-7). Found ruined under the forbidden tree (Genesis 3.); restored under the shadow of Jesus Christ crucified, “the green tree” (Luke 23. 31), fruit-“bearing” by the cross (Isaiah 53. 11; John 12. 24). Born again by the Holy Ghost” “there” (Ezekiel 16. 3-6). In this verse, her dependence, in the similar verse, ch. 3. 6, &c., His omnipotence to support her, are brought out (Deuteronomy 33. 26). 6. Implying approaching absence of the Bridegroom. seal—having her name and likeness engraven on it. His Holy Priesthood also in heaven (Exodus 28. 6-12, 15-30; Hebrews 4. 14); “his heart” there answering to “thine heart” here, and “two shoulders” to “arm.” (Cf. Jeremiah 22. 24, with Hagai 2. 23.) By the Holy Ghost (Ephesians 1. 13, 14). As in v. 5, she was “leaning” on Him, i. e., her arm on His arm, her head on His bosom; so she prays now that before they part, her impression may be engraven both on His heart and His arm, answering to His love and His power (Psalm 77. 15; see Genesis 33. 18; Isaiah 62. 3). love is strong as death—(Acts 21. 13; Romans 8. 35-39; Revelation 12. 11.) This their love unto death flows from His (John 10. 15; 15. 13). jealousy . . . the grave—Zealous love, jealous of all that would come between the soul and Jesus Christ (1 Kings 19. 10; Psalm 106. 30, 31, Luke 9. 60; 14. 26; 1 Corinthians 16. 22). cruel—rather, unyielding, hard; as the grave will not let go those whom it once holds (John 10. 28). a most vehement flame—lit., the fire-flame of Jehovah (Psalm 80. 16; Isaiah 6. 6). Nowhere else is God's name found in the Song. The zeal that burnt in Jesus Christ (Psalm 69. 9; Luke 12. 49, 50) kindled in His followers (Acts 2. 3; Romans 15. 30; Philippians 2. 17). 7. waters—in contrast with the “coals of fire” (v. 6; 1 Kings 18. 33-38). Persecutions (Acts 8. 1) cannot quench love (Hebrews 10. 31; Revelation 12. 15, 16). Our many provocations have not quenched His love (Romans 8. 33-39). if . . . give all the substance . . . contemned—nothing short of Jesus Christ Himself, not even heaven without Him, can satisfy the saint (Philippians 3. 8). Satan offers the world, as to Jesus Christ (Matthew 4. 8), so to the saint, in vain (1 John 2. 15-17; 5. 4). Nothing but our love in turn can satisfy Him (1 Corinthians 13. 1-3). 8. The Gentile Church (Ezekiel 16. 43). “We,” i. e., the Hebrew Church, which heretofore admitted Gentiles to communion, only by becoming Judaic proselytes. Now first idolatrous Gentiles are admitted directly (Acts 11. 17-26). Generally, the saint’s anxiety for other souls (Mark 5. 19; John 4. 28, 29). no breasts—neither faith nor love as yet (note, ch. 4. 5), which “come by hearing” of Him who first loved us. Not yet fit to be His bride, and mother of a spiritual offspring. what shall we do—the chief question in the early Church at the first council (Acts 15). How shall “the elder brother” treat the “younger,” already received by the Father (Luke 15. 25-32)? Generally (2 Samuel 15. 15; John 9. 4; Acts 9. 6; Galatians 6. 10). in the day . . . spoken for—i. e., when she shall be sought in marriage (Judges 14. 7), viz., by Jesus Christ, the heavenly bridegroom. 9. wall . . . door—the very terms employed as to the Gentile question (Acts 14. 27; Ephesians 2. 14). If she be a wall in Zion, founded on Jesus Christ (1 Corinthians 3. 11), we will not “withstand God” (Acts 11. 17; 15. 8-11). But if so, we must not “build” (Acts 15. 14-17) on her “wood, hay, stubble” (1 Corinthians 3. 12), i. e., Jewish rites, &c., but “a palace of silver,” i. e., all the highest privileges of church communion (Galatians 2. 11-18; Ephesians 2. 11-22). Image from the splendid turrets “built” on the “walls” of Jerusalem, and flanking the “door,” or gateway. The Gentile Church is the “door,” the type of catholic accessibility (1 Corinthians 16. 9); but it must be not a mere thoroughfare, but furnished with a wooden framework, so as not merely to admit, but also to safely enclose: cedar is fragrant, beautiful, and enduring. 10. The Gentile Church’s joy at its free admission to gospel privileges (Acts 15. 30, 31). She is one wall in the spiritual temple of the Holy Ghost, the Hebrew Church is the other; Jesus Christ, the common foundation, joins them (Ephesians 2. 11-22). breasts . . . towers—alluding to the silver palace, which the bridal virgins proposed to build on her (v. 9). “Breasts” of consolation (Isaiah 66. 11); faith and love (1 Thessalonians 5. 8); opposed to her previous state, “no breasts” (v. 8; 2 Thessalonians 1. 3). Thus Ezekiel 16. 46, 61 was fulfilled, both Samaria and the Gentiles being joined to the Jewish gospel Church. favour—rather, peace. The Gentile Church too is become the Shulamite (ch. 6. 13), or peace-enjoying bride of Solomon, i. e., Jesus Christ, the Prince of Peace (Romans 5. 1; Ephesians 2. 14). Reject not those whom God accepts (Numbers 11. 28; Luke 9. 49; Acts 15. 8, 9). Rather, superadd to such every aid and privilege (v. 9). 11. The joint-Church speaks of Jesus Christ’s vineyard. Transference of it from the Jews, who rendered not the fruits, as is implied by the silence respecting any, to the Gentiles (Matthew 21. 33-43). Baal-hamon—equivalent to the owner of a multitude; so Israel in Solomon’s days (1 Kings 4. 20); so Isaiah 5. 1, “a very fruitful hill!” abounding in privileges, as in numbers. thousand pieces—viz., silverings, or shekels. The vineyard had 1000 vines probably; a vine at a silvering (Isaiah 7. 23), referring to this passage. 12. “mine” by grant of the true Solomon. Not merely “let out to keepers,” as in the Jewish dispensation of works, but “mine” by grace. This is “before me,” i. e., in my power. [MAURER.] But though no longer under constraint of “keeping” the law as a mere letter and covenant of works, love to Jesus Christ will constrain her the more freely to render all to Solomon (Romans 8. 2-4; 1 Corinthians 6. 20; Galatians 5. 13; 1 Peter 2. 16), after having paid what justice and His will require should be paid to others (1 Corinthians 7. 29-31; 9. 14). “Before me” may also mean “I will never lose sight of it” (contrast ch. 1. 6). [MOODY STUART.] She will not keep it for herself, though so freely given to her, but for His use and glory (Luke 19. 13; Romans 6. 15; 14. 7-9; 1 Corinthians 12. 7). Or the “two hundred” may mean a double tithe (two-tenths of the whole paid back by Jesus Christ, as the reward of grace for our surrender of all (the thousand) to Him (Galatians 6. 7; Hebrews 6. 10); then she and “those that keep” are the same. [ADELAIDE NEWTON.] But Jesus Christ pays back not merely two tenths, but His all for our all (1 Corinthians 3. 21-23). 13. Jesus Christ’s address to her; now no longer visibly present. Once she “had not kept” her vineyard (ch. 1. 6); now she “dwells” in it, not as its owner, but its superintendent under Jesus Christ, with vine-dressers (“companions”), ex. gr., Paul, &c. (Acts 15. 25, 26), under her (v. 11, 12); these ought to obey her when she obeys Jesus Christ. Her voice in prayer and praise is to be heard continually by Jesus Christ, if her voice before men is to be effective (ch. 2. 14, end; Acts 6. 4; 13. 2, 3). 14. (See note, ch. 2. 17.) As she began with longing for His first coming (ch. 1. 2), so she ends with praying for His second coming (Psalm 130. 6; Philippians 3. 20, 21; Revelation 22. 20). MOODY STUART makes the roe upon spices to be the musk-deer. As there are four gardens, so four mountains, which form not mere images, as Gilead, Carmel, &c., but part of the structure of the Song. (1.) Bether, or division (ch. 2. 17), God’s justice dividing us from God; (2.) Those “of leopards” (ch. 4. 8), sin, the world and Satan; (3.) That “of myrrh and aloes” (ch. 4. 6, 14), the sepulchre of Calvary; (4.) Those “of spices,” here answering to “the hill of frankincense” (ch. 4. 6), where His soul was for the three days of His death, and heaven, where He is a High Priest now, offering incense for us on the fragrant mountain of His own finished work (Hebrews 4. 14; 7. 25; Revelation 8. 3, 4); thus He surmounts the other three mountains, God’s justice, our sin, death. The mountain of spices is as much greater than our sins, as heaven is higher than earth (Psalm 103. 11). The abrupt, unsatisfied close with the yearning prayer for His visible coming shows that the marriage is future, and that to wait eagerly for it is our true attitude (1 Corinthians 1. 7; 1 Thessalonians 1. 10; Titus 2. 13; 2 Peter 3. 12).

THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET

ISAIAH.

INTRODUCTION.

ISAIAH, son of Amoz (not Amos); contemporary of Jonah, Amos, Hosea, in Israel, but younger than they; and of Micah, in Judah. His call to a higher degree of the prophetic office (ch. 6.) is assigned to the last year of Uzziah, i. e., 754 B. C. The chapters 1.-5. belong to the closing years of that reign; not, as some think, to Jotham’s reign; in the reign of the latter he seems to have exercised his office only orally, and not to have left any record of his prophecies, because they were not intended for all ages. Chs. 1-5, and 6, are all that was designed for the Church universal of the prophecies of the first twenty years of his office. New historical epochs, such as occurred in the reigns of Ahaz and Hezekiah, when the affairs of Israel became interwoven with those of the Asiatic empires, are marked by prophetic writings. The prophets had now to interpret the judgments of the Lord, so as to make the people conscious of His punitive justice, as also of His mercy. Chs. 7-10, 4 belong to the reign of Ahaz. Chs. 36-39, are historical, reaching to the fifteenth year of Hezekiah; probably chs. 10-12, and all from ch. 13, to 26, inclusive, belong to the same reign; the historical section being appended to facilitate the right understanding of these prophecies; thus we have Isaiah's office extending from about 760 to 713 B.C., forty-seven years. Tradition (Talmud) represents him as having been sawn asunder by Manasseh with a wooden saw, for having said that he had seen Jehovah (Exodus 33, 20; 2 Kings 21, 16; Hebrews 11, 37). 2 Chronicles 32, 32 seems to imply that Isalah survived Hezekiah; but "first and last" is not added, as in 2 Chronicles 26, 22, which makes it possible that his history of Hezekiah was only carried up to a certain point. The second part, chs. 40-66, containing complaints of gross idolatry, needs not to be restricted to Manasseh's reign, but is applicable to previous reigns. At the accession of Manasseh he would be eighty-four, and if he prophesied for eight years afterwards, he must have endured martyrdom at ninety-two; so Hosea prophesied for sixty years. And Eastern tradition reports that he lived to one hundred and twenty. The conclusive argument against the tradition is that, according to the inscription, all Isaiah's prophecies are included in the time from Uzziah to Hezekiah; and the internal evidence accords with this.

His WIFE is called the prophetess, i. e., endowed, as Miriam, with a prophetic gift.

His CHILDREN were considered by him as not belonging merely to himself; in their names, Shear-jashub, "the remnant shall return," and Maher-shalal-hash-baz, "speeding to the spoil, he hasteth to the prey," the two chief points of his prophecies are intimated to the people, the judgments of the Lord on the people and the world, and yet His mercy to the elect.

His GARMENT of sackcloth (ch. 20, 2), too, was a silent preaching by fact; he appears as the embodiment of that repentance which he taught.

His HISTORICAL WORKS.—History, as written by the prophets, is retroverted prophecy. As the past and future alike proceed from the essence of God, an inspired insight into the past implies an insight into the future, and vice versa. Hence most of the Old Testament histories are written by prophets, and are classed with their writings; the Chronicles being not so classed, cannot have been written by them, but are taken from historical monographs of theirs; e. g., Isaiah's life of Uzziah, 2 Chronicles 26, 22; also of Hezekiah, 2 Chronicles 32, 32; of these latter all that was important for all ages has been preserved to us, whilst the rest, which was local and temporary, has been lost.

The INSCRIPTION (ch. 1, 1) applies to the whole book, and implies that Isaiah is the author of the second part (chs. 40-66), as well as of the first. Nor do the words, "concerning Judah and Jerusalem," oppose the idea that the inscription applies to the whole; for whatever he says against other nations, he says on account of their relation to Judah. So the inscription of Amos, "concerning Israel," though several prophecies follow against foreign nations. EWALD maintains that chs. 40-66, though spurious, were subjoined to the previous portion, in order to preserve the former. But it is untrue that the first portion is unconnected with those chapters. The former ends with the Babylonian exile (ch. 39, 6), the latter begins with the coming redemption from it. The portion, chs. 40-46, has no heading of its own, a proof that it is closely connected with what precedes, and falls under the general heading in ch. 1, 1. JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 11, 1, sec. 1, 2, says that Cyrus was induced by the prophecies of Isaiah (ch. 44, 28; 45, 1, 13) to aid the Jews in returning and rebuilding the temple. Ezra I. confirms this; Cyrus in his edict there plainly refers to the prophecies in the second portion, which assign the kingdoms to him from Jehovah, and the duty of rebuilding the temple. Probably he took from them his historical name Cyrus (Cresh). Moreover, subsequent prophets imitate this second portion, which EWALD assigns to later times; e. g., cf. Jeremiah 50, 51 with Isaiah's predictions against Babylon. "The Holy One of Israel," occurring but three times elsewhere in the Old Testament, is a favourite expression in the second, as in the first portion of Isaiah: it expresses God's covenant faithfulness in fulfilling the promises therein: Jeremiah borrows the expression from him. Also Ecclesiasticus 48, 22-25 ("comforted"), quotes ch. 40, 1 as Isaiah's. Luke 4, 17 quotes ch. 61, 1, 2 as Isaiah's, and as read as such by Jesus Christ in the synagogue.

The DEFINITENESS of the prophecies is striking: as in the second portion of Isaiah, so in Micah 4, 8-10, the Babylonian exile, and the deliverance from it, are foretold 150 years before any hostilities had arisen between Babylon and Judah. On the other hand, all the prophets who foretell the Assyrian invasion coincide in stating, that Judah should be delivered from it, not by Egyptian aid, but directly by the Lord. Again Jeremiah, in the height of the Chaldean prosperity, foretold its conquest by the Medes, who should enter Babylon through the dry bed of the Euphrates on a night of general revelry. No human calculation could have discovered these facts. EICHORN terms these prophecies "veiled historical descriptions," recognizing in spite of himself that they are more than general poetical fancies. Isaiah 53, was certainly written ages before the Messiah, yet it minutely portrays His sufferings: these cannot be Jewish inventions, for the Jews looked for a reigning, not a suffering Messiah.

Rationalists are so far right that THE PROPHECIES ARE ON A GENERAL BASIS whereby they are distinguished from soothsaying. They rest on the essential idea of God. The prophets, penetrated by this inner knowledge of His character, became conscious of the eternal laws by which the world is governed: that sin is man's ruin, and must be followed by judgment, but that God's covenant mercy to His elect is unchangeable. Without prophetism, the elect remnant would have decreased, and even God's judgments would have missed their end, by not being recognized as such: they would have been unmeaning, isolated facts. Babylon was in Isaiah's days under Assyria; it had tried a revolt unsuccessfully: but the elements of its subsequent success and greatness were then existing. The Holy Ghost enlightened his natural powers to discern this its rise; and his spiritual faculties, to foresee its fall, the sure consequence, in God's eternal law, of the pride which Pagan success generates—and also Judah's restoration, as the covenant people, with whom God, according to His essential character, would not be wrath for ever. True conversion is the prophet's grand remedy against all evils; in this alone consists his politics. Rebuke, threatening, and promise regularly succeed one another. The idea at the basis of all is in ch. 26, 7-9; Leviticus 10, 3; Amos 3, 2.

THE USE OF THE PRESENT AND PRETERITE in prophecy is no proof that the author is later than Isaiah. For seers view the future as present, and indicate what is ideally past, not really past; seeing things in the light of God, who "calls the things that are not as though they were." Moreover, as in looking from a height on a landscape, hills seem close together which are really wide apart, so, in events foretold, the order, succession, and grouping are presented, but the intervals of time are overlooked. The time, however, is sometimes marked (Jeremiah 25. 12; Daniel 9. 26). Thus the deliverance from Babylon, and that effected by Messiah, are in rapid transition grouped together by THE LAW OF PROPHETIC SUGGESTION; yet no prophet so confounds the two as to make Messiah the leader of Israel from Babylon. To the prophet there was probably no double sense; but to his spiritual eye the two events, though distinct, lay so near, and were so analogous, that he could not separate them in description without unfaithfulness to the picture presented before him. The more remote and antitypical event, however, viz., Messiah's coming, is that to which he always hastens, and which he describes with far more minuteness than he does the nearer type; e. g., Cyrus (cf. ch. 45. 1 with 53). In some cases he takes his stand in the midst of events between (e. g.) the humiliation of Jesus Christ, which he views as past, and His glorification, as yet to come, using the future tense as to the latter (cf. ch. 53. 4-9 with 10-12). Marks of the time of events are given sparingly in the prophets: yet, as to Messiah, definitely enough to create the general expectation of Him at the time that He was in fact born.

The CHALDEISMS alleged against the genuineness of the second portion of Isaiah, are found more in the first and undoubted portion. They occur in all the Old Testament, especially in the poetical parts, which prefer unusual expressions, and are due to the fact that the patriarchs were surrounded by Chaldee-speaking people; and in Isaiah's time a few Chaldee words had crept in from abroad.

His SYMBOLS are few and simple, and his poetical images correct; in the prophets, during and after the exile, the reverse holds good; Haggai and Malachi are not exceptions; for, though void of bold images, their style, unlike Isaiah's, rises little above prose: a clear proof that our Isaiah was long before the exile.

Of VISIONS, strictly so called, he has but one, that in ch. 6.: ever it is more simple than those in later prophets. But he often gives SIGNS, i. e., a present fact as pledge of the more distant future; God condescending to the feebleness of man (ch. 7. 14; 37. 30; 38. 7).

The VARIETIES IN HIS STYLE do not prove spuriousness, but that he varied his style with his subject. The second portion is not so much addressed to his contemporaries, as to the future people of the Lord, the elect remnant, purified by the previous judgments. Hence its tenderness of style, and frequent repetitions (ch. 40. 1); for comforting exhortation uses many words; so also the many epithets added to the name of God, intended as stays whereon faith may rest for comfort, so as not to despair. In both portions alike there are peculiarities characteristic of Isaiah; e. g., "to be called" equivalent to to be: the repetition of the same words, instead of synonyms, in the parallel members of verses; the interspersing of his prophecies with hymns; "the remnant of olive trees," &c., for the remnant of people who have escaped God's judgments. Also cf. ch. 65. 25 with 11. 6.

The CHRONOLOGICAL ARRANGEMENT favours the opinion, that Isaiah himself collected his prophecies into the volume; not Hezekiah's men, as the Talmud guesses from Proverbs 25. 1. All the portions, the dates of which can be ascertained, stand in the right place, except a few instances, where prophecies of similar contents are placed together: with the termination of the Assyrian invasion (chs. 36.-39.) terminated the public life of Isaiah. The second part is his prophetic legacy to the small band of the faithful, analogous to the last speeches of Moses and of Jesus Christ to His chosen disciples.

THE EXPECTATION OF MESSIAH is so strong in Isaiah, that Jerome ad Paulinum calls his book not a prophecy, but the gospel: "He is not so much a prophet as an evangelist." Messiah was already shadowed forth in Genesis 49. 10, as the Shiloh or tranquillizer; also Psalms 2., 45., 72., 110. Isaiah brings it out more definitely; and, whereas they dwell on His kingly office, Isaiah develops most His priestly and prophetic office; Psalm 110. also had set forth His priesthood, but His kingly rather than, as Isaiah, His suffering priesthood. The latter is especially dwelt on in the second part, addressed to the faithful elect; whereas the first part, addressed to the whole people, dwells on Messiah's glory, the antidote to the fears which then filled the people, and the assurance that the kingdom of God, then represented by Judah, would not be overwhelmed by the surrounding nations.

HIS STYLE (HENGSTENBERG, Christol. 1) is simple and sublime; in imagery, intermediate between the poverty of Jeremiah and the exuberance of Ezekiel. He shows his command of it in varying it to suit his subject.

THE FORM is mostly that of Hebrew poetical parallelism, with, however, a freedom unshackled by undue restrictions.

JUDAH, the less apostate people, rather than Israel, was the subject of his prophecies: his residence was mostly at Jerusalem. On his praises, see Ecclesiasticus 48. 22-25. Christ and the apostles quote no prophet so frequently.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-31. 1. THE GENERAL TITLE OR PROGRAMME applying to the entire book: this discountenances the Talmud tradition, that he was sawn asunder by Manasseh. Isaiah—equivalent to "The Lord shall save;" significant of the subject of his prophecies. On "vision," see 1 Samuel 9. 9; Numbers 12. 6; and my Introduction. Judah and Jerusalem—Other nations also are the subjects of his prophecies; but only in their relation to the Jews (chs. 13.-23.); so also the ten tribes of Israel are introduced only in the same relation (chs. 7.-9). Jerusalem is particularly specified, being the site of the temple, and the centre of the theocracy, and the future throne of Messiah (Psalm 48. 2, 3, 9; Jeremiah 3. 17). Jesus Christ is the "Lion of the tribe of Judah" (Revelation 5. 5). Uzziah—called also Azariah (2 Kings 14. 21; 2 Chronicles 26). The Old Testament prophecies spiritually interpret the histories, as the New Testament Epistles interpret the Gospels and Acts. Study them together, to see their spiritual relations. Isaiah prophesied for only a few years before Uzziah's death; but his prophecies of that period (chs. 1.-6.) apply to Jotham's reign also, in which he probably wrote none; for ch. 7. enters immediately on Ahaz's reign, after Uzziah in ch. 6.; the prophecies under Hezekiah follow next. 2. The very words of Moses (Deuteronomy 32.); this implies that the law was the charter and basis of all prophecy (ch. 8. 20). Lord—Jehovah; in Hebrew, the self-existing and promise-fulfilling, unchangeable One. The Jews never pronounced this holy name, but substituted Adonai. The English Version, LORD in capitals, marks the Hebrew Jehovah, though Lord is rather equivalent to Adonai than Jehovah. children—(Exodus 4. 22.) rebelled—as sons (Deuteronomy 21. 18) and as subjects, God being king in the theocracy (ch. 63. 10). "Brought up," lit., elevated, viz., to peculiar privileges (Jeremiah 2. 6-8; Romans 9. 4, 5). 3. (Jeremiah 8. 7.) crib—the stall where it is fed (Proverbs 14. 4). Spiritually the word and ordinances. Israel—The whole nation, Judah as well as Israel, in the restricted sense. God regards His covenant people in their designed unity. not know—viz., his Owner, as the parallelism requires; i. e., not recognize Him as such (Exodus 19. 5, equivalent to "my people," John 1. 10, 11). consider—attend to his Master (ch. 41. 8), notwithstanding the spiritual food which He provides (answering to crib in the parallel clause). 4. people—the peculiar designation of God's elect nation (Hosea 1. 10), that they should be "laden with iniquity" is therefore the more monstrous.

Sin is a load (Psalm 38, 4; Matthew 11, 28). seed—another appellation of God's elect (Genesis 12, 7; Jeremiah 2, 21), designed to be a "holy seed" (ch. 6, 13), but, awful to say, "evil-doers!" children—by adoption (Hosea 11, 1), yet "evil-doers;" not only so, but "corrupters" of others (Genesis 6, 12); the climax. So "nation—people—seed—children." provoked—lit., despised, viz., so as to provoke (Proverbs 1, 30, 31). Holy One of Israel—The peculiar heinousness of their sin, that it was against their God (Amos 3, 2). gone . . . backward—lit., estranged (Psalm 58, 3). 5. Why—rather, as Vulgate, On what part. Image from a body covered all over with marks of blows (Psalm 38, 3). There is no part in which you have not been smitten. head . . . sick, &c.—not referring, as it is commonly quoted, to their sins, but to the universality of their punishment. However, sin, the moral disease of the head or intellect, and the heart, is doubtless made its own punishment (Proverbs 1, 31; Jeremiah 2, 19; Hosea 8, 11). "Sick," lit., is in a state of sickness [GESENIUS]; "Has passed into sickness." [MAURER.] 6. From the lowest to the highest of the people; "the ancient and honourable, the head; the prophet that teacheth lies, the tail." See Isaiah 9, 13-16. He first states their wretched condition, obvious to all (v. 6-9); and then, not previously, their irreligious state, the cause of it. wounds—judicially inflicted (Hosea 5, 13). mollified . . . ointment—the art of medicine in the East consists chiefly in external applications (Luke 10, 34; James 5, 14). 7. Judah had not in Uzziah's reign recovered from the ravages of the Syrians in Joash's reign (2 Chronicles 24, 24), and of Israel in Amaziah's reign (2 Chronicles 25, 13, 23, &c.). Compare Isaiah's contemporary (Amos 4, 6-11), where, as here (v. 9, 10), Israel is compared to "Sodom and Gomorrah," because of the judgments on it by "fire." in your presence—before your eyes: without your being able to prevent them. desolate, &c.—lit., there is desolation, such as one might look for from foreign invaders. 8. daughter of Zion—The city (Psalm 9, 14) Jerusalem and its inhabitants (2 Kings 19, 21); daughter, feminine, singular being used as a neuter collective noun, equivalent to sons (see below Margin, ch. 12, 6). [MAURER.] Metropolis or mother-city is the corresponding term. The idea of youthful beauty is included in daughter. left—as a remnant escaping the general destruction. cottage—a hut, made to give temporary shelter to the care-taker of the vineyard. lodge—not permanent. besieged—rather, as "left," and v. 9 require, preserved, viz., from the desolation all round. [MAURER.] 9. Jehovah of Sabaoth, i. e., God of the angelic and starry hosts (Psalm 59, 5; 147, 4; 148, 2). The latter were objects of idolatry, called hence Sabaism (2 Kings 17, 16). God is above even them (1 Chronicles 16, 26). "The groves" were symbols of these starry hosts; it was their worship of Sabaoth, instead of the Lord of Sabaoth, which had caused the present desolation (2 Chronicles 24, 18). It needed no less a power than His, to preserve even a "remnant." Descending grace for the elect's sake, since He has no need of us, seeing that He has countless hosts to serve Him. 10. Sodom—spiritually (Genesis 19.; Jeremiah 23, 14; Ezekiel 16, 46; Revelation 11, 8). 11. God does not here absolutely disparage sacrifice, which is as old and universal as sin (Genesis 3, 21; 4, 4), and sin is almost as old as the world; but sacrifice, unaccompanied with obedience of heart and life (1 Samuel 15, 22; Psalm 50, 9-13; 51, 16-19; Hosea 6, 6). Positive precepts are only means; moral obedience is the end. A foreshadowing of the gospel, when the One real sacrifice was to supersede all the shadowy ones, and "bring in everlasting righteousness" (Psalm 40, 6, 7; Daniel 9, 24-27; Hebrews 10, 1-14). full—to satiety; weary of burnt offerings—burnt whole, except the blood, which was sprinkled about the altar. fat—not to be eaten by man, but burnt on the altar (Leviticus 3, 4, 5, 11, 17). 12. appear before me—in the temple where the Shechinah, resting on the ark, was the symbol of God's presence (Exodus 23, 15; Psalm 42, 2). who hath required this—as if you were doing God a service by such hypocritical offerings (Job 35, 7). God did require it (Exodus 23, 17), but not in this spirit (Micah 6, 6, 7). courts—areas, in which the worshippers were. None but priests entered the temple itself. 13. oblations—unbloody; "meat (old English sense, not flesh) offerings," i. e., of flour, fruits, oil, &c. (Leviticus 2, 1-13). Hebrew, "mincha." incense—put upon the sacrifices, and burnt on the altar of incense. Type of prayer (Psalm 141, 2; Revelation 8, 3). new moons—observed as festivals (Numbers 10, 10; 28, 11, 14) with sacrifices and blowing of silver trumpets. sabbaths—both the seventh day and the beginning and closing days of the great feasts (Leviticus 23, 24-39). away with—bear. MAURER translates, "I cannot bear iniquity and the solemn meeting," i. e., the meeting associated with iniquity—lit., the closing days of the feasts; so the great days (Leviticus 23, 36; John 7, 37). 14. appointed—the sabbath, passover, pentecost, day of atonement, and feast of tabernacles [HENGSTENBERG]; they alone were fixed to certain times of the year. weary—(Ch. 43, 24.) 15. (Psalm 66, 18; Proverbs 28, 9; Lamentations 3, 43, 44.) spread . . . hands—in prayer (1 Kings 8, 22). Hebrew, "Bloods," for all heinous sins, persecution of God's servants especially (Matthew 23, 35). It was the vocation of the prophets to dispel the delusion, so contrary to the law itself (Deuteronomy 10, 16), that outward ritualism would satisfy God. 16. God saith to the sinner, "Wash you," &c., that he, finding his inability to "make" himself "clean," may cry to God, "Wash me, cleanse me (Psalm 51, 2, 7, 10). before mine eyes—not mere outward reformation before man's eyes, who cannot, as God, see into the heart (Jeremiah 32, 19). 17. seek judgment—justice, as magistrates, instead of seeking bribes (Jeremiah 22, 3, 16). judge—vindicate (Psalm 68, 5; James 1, 27). 18. God deigns to argue the case with us, that all may see the just, nay, loving principle of His dealings with men (ch. 43, 26). scarlet—the colour of Jesus Christ's robe when bearing our "sins" (Matthew 27, 28). So Rahab's thread (Joshua 2, 18; cf. Leviticus 14, 4). The rabbins say, that when the lot used to be taken, a scarlet fillet was bound on the scapegoat's head, and after the high priest had confessed his and the people's sins over it, the fillet became white; the miracle ceased, according to them, forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, i. e., exactly when Jesus Christ was crucified; a remarkable admission of adversaries. Hebrew for "scarlet" radically means double-dyed; so the deep-fixed permanency of sin in the heart, which no mere tears can wash away. snow—(Psalm 51, 7) Repentance is presupposed, before sin can be made white as snow (v. 19, 20); it too is God's gift (Jeremiah 31, 18, end; Lamentations 5, 21; Acts 5, 31). red—refers to "blood" (v. 15). as wool—restored to its original undyed whiteness. This verse shows that the old fathers did not look only for transitory promises (Article VII., BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER). For sins of ignorance, and such like, alone had trespass offerings appointed for them; greater guilt therefore needed a greater sacrifice, for, "without shedding of blood there was no remission;" but none such was appointed, and yet forgiveness was promised and expected; therefore spiritual Jews must have looked for the One Mediator of both Old Testament and New Testament, though dimly understood. 19, 20. Temporal blessings in "the land of their possession" were prominent in the Old Testament promises, as suited to the childhood of the Church (Exodus 3, 17). New Testament spiritual promises derive their imagery from the former (Matthew 5, 5). Lord hath spoken it—Isaiah's prophecies rest on the law (Leviticus 26, 33). God alters not His word (Numbers 23, 19). 21. faithful—as a wife (ch. 54, 5; 62, 5; Hosea 2, 19, 20). harlot—(Ezekiel 16, 28-35.) righteousness lodged—(2 Peter 3, 13.) murderers—murderous oppressors, as the antithesis requires (Note v. 15; 1 John 3, 15). 22. Thy princes and people are degenerate in solid worth, equivalent to "silver" (Jeremiah 6, 28, 30; Ezekiel 22, 18, 19), and in their use of the living Word, equivalent to "wine" (Song of Solomon 7, 9). mixed—lit., circumcised. So the Arabic to murder wine, equivalent to dilute it. 23. companions of thieves—by connivance (Proverbs 29, 24). gifts—(Ezekiel 22, 12.) A nation's corruption begins with its rulers. 24. Lord . . . Lord—Adonai, JEHOVAH. mighty One of Israel—mighty to take vengeance, as before, to save. Ah—Indignation. ease me—my long-tried patience will find relief in at last punishing the guilty

(Ezekiel 5. 13). God's language condescends to human conceptions. 25. turn . . . hand—not in wrath, but in grace (Zechariah 13. 7), "upon thee," as v. 26, 27 show; contrasted with the enemies, of whom He will avenge Himself (v. 24), purely—lit., as alkali purifies. dross . . . tin—not thy sins, but the sinful persons (Jeremiah 6. 29); "enemies" (v. 24); degenerate princes (Note v. 24), intermingled with the elect "remnant" of grace. tin—Hebrew, bedil, here the alloy of lead, tin, &c., separated by smelting from the silver. The pious Bishop Bedell took his motto from this. 26. As the degeneracy had shown itself most in the magistrates (v. 17-23), so, at the "restoration," these shall be such as the theocracy "at the first" had contemplated, viz., after the Babylonish restoration in part and typically, but fully and antipically under Messiah (ch. 32. 1; 52. 8; Jeremiah 33. 7; Matthew 19. 28). faithful—no longer "an harlot." 27. redeemed—temporarily, civilly, and morally; type of the spiritual redemption by the price of Jesus Christ's blood (1 Peter 1. 18, 19), the foundation of "judgment" and "righteousness," and so of paradise. The judgment and righteousness are God's first (ch. 42. 21; Romans 3. 26); so they become man's when "converted" (Romans 8. 3, 4); typified in the display of God's "justice," then exhibited in delivering His covenant people, whereby justice or "righteousness" was produced in them. converts—so MAURER. But Margin, "they that return of her," viz., the remnant that return from captivity. However, as Isaiah had not yet expressly foretold the Babylonian captivity, the English Version is better. 28. destruction—lit., breaking into shivers (Revelation 2. 27). The prophets hasten forward to the final extinction of the ungodly (Psalm 37. 20; Revelation 19. 20; 20. 15); of which antecedent judgments are types. 29. ashamed—(Romans 6. 21.) oaks—others translate the terebinth or turpentine tree. Groves were dedicated to idols. Our Druids took their name from the Greek for oaks. A sacred tree is often found in Assyrian sculpture; symbol of the starry hosts, Saba. gardens—planted enclosures for idolatry; the counterpart of the garden of Eden. 30. oak—ye shall be like the "oaks," the object of your "desire" (v. 29). People become like the gods they worship; they never rise above their level (Psalm 135. 18). So men's sins become their own scourges (Jeremiah 2. 9). The leaf of the idol oak fades by a law of necessary consequence, having no living sap or "water" from God. So "garden" answers to "gardens" (v. 29). 31. strong—powerful rulers (Amos 2. 9), maker of it—rather, his work. He shall be at once the fuel, "tow," and the cause of the fire, by kindling the first "spark." 1oth—the wicked ruler, and "his work," which "is as a spark."

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-22. 1. The inscription. The word—The revelation. 2. Same as Micah 4. As Micah prophesied in Jotham's reign, and Isaiah in Uzziah's, Micah rests on Isaiah, whom he confirms: not vice versa. HENGSTENBERG on slight grounds makes Micah 4. the original. last days—i. e., Messiah's: especially the days yet to come, to which all prophecy hastens, when "the house of the God of Jacob," viz., at Jerusalem, shall be the centre to which the converted nations shall flock together (Matthew 13. 32; Luke 2. 31, 32; Acts 1. 6, 7); where "the kingdom" of Israel is regarded as certain and the time alone uncertain (Psalm 68. 15, 16; 72. 8, 11). mountain of the Lord's house . . . in top, &c.—the temple on Mount Moriah: type of the gospel, beginning at Jerusalem, and, like an object set on the highest hill, made so conspicuous that all nations are attracted to it. flow—as a broad stream (ch. 66. 12). 3. If the curse foretold against Israel has been literally fulfilled, so shall the promised blessing be literal. We Gentiles must not, whilst giving them the curse, deny them their peculiar blessing by spiritualizing it. The Holy Ghost shall be poured out for a general conversion then (Jeremiah 50. 5; Zechariah 8. 21, 23; Joel 2. 28). from Jerusalem—(Luke 24. 47) an earnest of the future relations of Jerusalem to Christendom (Romans 11. 12, 15). 4. judge—as a sovereign umpire, settling all controversies (cf. ch. 11. 4). LOWTH translates work, conviction. plough- shares—in the East resembling a short sword (ch. 9. 6, 7; Zechariah 9. 10). 5. The connection is: As Israel's high destiny is to be a blessing to all nations (Genesis 12. 3), let Israel's children walk worthy of it (Ephesians 5. 8). 6. Therefore—rather, For: reasons why there is the more need of the exhortation in v. 5. thou—transition to Jehovah: such rapid transitions are natural, when the mind is full of a subject. replenished—rather, filled, viz., with the superstitions of the East, Syria, and Chaldea. soothsayers—forbidden (Deuteronomy 18. 10-14). Philistines—south-west of Palestine: antithesis to "the east." please themselves—rather, join hands with, i. e., enter into alliances matrimonial and national: forbidden (Exodus 23. 32; Nehemiah 13. 23, &c.). 7. gold—forbidden to be heaped together (Deuteronomy 17. 17). Solomon disobeyed (1 Kings 10. 21, 27). horses . . . chariots—forbidden (Deuteronomy 17. 16). But Solomon disobeyed (1 Kings 20. 26). Horses could be used effectively for war in the plains of Egypt; not so in the hilly Judea. God designed there should be as wide as possible a distinction between Israel and the Egyptians. He would have His people wholly dependent on Him, rather than on the ordinary means of warfare (Psalm 20. 7). Also horses were connected with idolatry (2 Kings 23. 11); hence his objection: so the transition to "idols" (v. 8) is natural. 8. (Hosea 8. 4) Not so much public idolatry, which was not sanctioned in Uzziah's and Jotham's reign, but (see 2 Kings 15. 4, 5) as private. 9. mean—in rank: not morally base; opposed to "the great man." The former is in Hebrew, Adam, the latter, ish. boweth—viz., to idols. All ranks were idolaters. forgive . . . not—a threat expressed by an imperative. Isaiah so identifies himself with God's will, that he prays for that which he knows God purposes. So Revelation 18. 6. 10. Poetical form of expressing that, such were their sins, they would be obliged by God's judgments to seek a hiding-place from his wrath (Revelation 6. 15, 16). dust—equivalent to "caves of the earth," or dust (v. 19). for fear, &c.—lit., from the face of the terror of the Lord. 11. lofty looks—lit., eyes of pride (Psalm 18. 27). humbled—by calamities. God will so vindicate His honour "in that day" of judgments, that none else "shall be exalted" (Zechariah 14. 9). 12. Man has had many days: "the day of the Lord" shall come at last, beginning with judgment, a never-ending day in which God shall be "all in all" (1 Corinthians 15. 28; 2 Peter 3. 10). every—not merely person, as English Version explains it, but every thing on which the nation prided itself. 13. cedars . . . oaks—image for haughty nobles and princes (Amos 2. 9; Zechariah 11. 1, 2; cf. Revelation 19. 18-21). Bashan—East of Jordan, north of the river Jabbok, famous for fine oaks, pasture, and cattle. Perhaps in "oaks" there is reference to their idolatry (ch. 1. 29). 14. high . . . hills—referring to the "high places" on which sacrifices were unlawfully offered, even in Uzziah's (equivalent to Azariah) reign (2 Kings 15. 4). Also, places of strength, fastnesses in which they trusted, rather than in God; so 15. tower . . . wall—towers were often made on the walls of cities. fenced—strongly fortified. 16. Tarshish—Tartessus in South-west Spain, at the mouth of the Guadalquivir, near Gibraltar: it includes the adjoining region: a Phœnician colony; hence its connection with Palestine and the Bible (2 Chronicles 9. 21); the name was also used in a wide sense for the farthest west, as our West Indies (ch. 66. 19; Psalm 48. 7; 72. 10). "Ships of Tarshish" became a phrase for richly-laden and far-voyaging vessels. So our "East Indiamen." The judgment shall be on all that minister to man's luxury (cf. Revelation 18. 17-19). pictures—ordered to be destroyed (Numbers 33. 52). Still to be seen on the walls of Nineveh's palaces. It is remarkable that whereas all other ancient civilized nations, Egypt, Assyria, Greece, Rome, have left monuments in the fine arts, Judea, whilst rising immeasurably above them in the possession of "the living oracles," has left none of the former. The fine arts, as in modern Rome, were so often associated with polytheism, that God required his people in this, as in other respects, to be separated from the nations (Deuteronomy 4. 15-18). But Vulgate translation is perhaps better, "All that are beautiful to the sight;" not only paintings, but all luxuriant ornaments. One comprehensive word for all that goes before (cf. Revelation 18, 12, 14, 16). 17. Repeated from v. 11, for emphatic confirmation. 18. idols—lit., vain things, nothings (1 Corinthians 8, 4). Fulfilled to the letter. Before the Babylonian captivity the Jews were most prone to idolatry; in no instance, ever since. For the future fulfilment, see Zechariah 13, 2; Revelation 13, 15; 19, 20). 19. The fulfilment answers exactly to the threat (v. 10). they—the idol-worshippers. caves—abounding in Judea, a hilly country; hiding-places in times of alarm (1 Samuel 13, 6). shake . . . earth—and the heavens also (Hebrews 12, 26). Figure for severe and universal judgments. 20. moles—others translate mice. The sense is, under ground, in darkness. bats—unclean birds (Leviticus 11, 19), living amidst tenanted ruins (Revelation 11, 13). 22. The high ones (v. 11, 13) on whom the people trust, shall be "brought low" (ch. 3, 2); therefore "cease from" depending on them, instead of on the Lord (Psalm 146, 3-5).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-26. 1. For—continuation of ch. 2, 22. LORD of hosts—Therefore able to do as He says. doth—present for future, so certain is the accomplishment. stay . . . staff—the same Hebrew word, the one masculine, the other feminine, an Arabic idiom for all kinds of support. What a change from the previous luxuries (ch. 2, 7)! Fulfilled in the siege by Nebuchadnezzar and afterwards by Titus (Jeremiah 37, 21; 38, 9). 2. Fulfilled (2 Kings 24, 14). prudent—the Hebrew often means a soothsayer (Deuteronomy 18, 10-14); thus it will mean, the diviners, on whom they rely, shall in that day fail. It is found in a good sense (Proverbs 16, 10), from which passage the Jews interpret it a king; "without" whom Israel long has been (Hosea 3, 4). ancient—old and experienced (1 Kings 12, 6-8). 3. captain of fifty—not only captains of thousands, and centuries of a hundred, but even semi-centurions of fifty, shall fail. honourable—lit., of dignified aspect. cunning—skilful. The mechanic's business will come to a standstill in the siege, and subsequent desolation of the state; artisans are no mean "stay" among a nation's safeguards. eloquent orator—rather, as Vulgate, skilled in whispering, i. e., incantation (Psalm 58, 5). See ch. 8, 19 below; and note on "prudent" (v. 2) above. 4. children—in ability for governing; antithesis to the "ancient" (see v. 12; Ecclesiastes 10, 16). babes—in warlike might; antithesis to "the mighty" and "man of war." 5. The anarchy resulting under such imbecile rulers (v. 4); unjust exactions mutually; the forms of respect violated (Leviticus 19, 32). base—low-born. Compare the marks of "the last days" (2 Timothy 3, 2). 6. Such will be the want of men of wealth and ability, that they will "take hold of" (ch. 4, 1) the first man whom they meet, having any property, to make him "ruler." brother—one having no better hereditary claim to be ruler than the "man" supplicating him. Thou hast clothing—which none of us has. Changes of raiment are wealth in the East (2 Kings 5, 5). ruin—let our ruined affairs be committed to thee to retrieve. 7. swear—lit., lift up, viz., his hand; the gesture used in solemn attestation. Or, his voice, i. e., answer; so Vulgate. healer—of the body politic, incurably diseased (ch. 1, 6). neither . . . clothing—so as to relieve the people and maintain a ruler's dignity. A nation's state must be bad indeed, when none among men, naturally ambitious, is willing to accept office. 8. Reason given by the prophet, why all shrink from the government. eyes of his glory—to provoke His "glorious" Majesty before His "eyes" (cf. ch. 49, 5; Habakkuk 1, 13). The Syriac and LOWTH, by a slight change of the Hebrew, translate "the cloud of His glory," the Shechinah. 9. show—The Hebrew means, "that which may be known by their countenances." [GESENIUS and WEISS.] But MAURER translates, "Their respect for person;" so Syriac and Chaldee. But the parallel word "declare" favours the other view. KIMCHI, from the Arabic, translates, their hardness (Job 19, 3, Margin), or impudence of countenance (Jeremiah 3, 3). They have lost not only the substance of virtue, but its colour. witness—lit., corresponds to them; their look answers to their inner character (Hosea 5, 5). declare—(Jude 13.) "Foaming out their own shame;" so far from making it a secret "glorying" in it (Philippians 3, 19). unto themselves—Cf. "in themselves" (Proverbs 1, 31; 8, 36; Jeremiah 2, 19; Romans 1, 27). 10. The faithlessness of many is no proof that all are faithless. Though nothing but croaking of frogs is heard on the surface of the pool, we are not to infer there are no fish beneath. [BENGE.] (See ch. 1, 19, 20). fruit of doings—(Proverbs 1, 31) in a good sense (Galatians 6, 8; Revelation 22, 14). Not salvation by works, but by fruit-bearing faith (ch. 45, 24; Jeremiah 23, 6). GESENIUS and WEISS translate, Declare as to the righteous that, &c. MAURER, "Say that the righteous is blessed." 11. ill—antithesis to "well" (v. 10); emphatic ellipsis of the words italicized. "Ill!" hands—his conduct; hands being the instrument of acts (Ecclesiastes 8, 12, 13). 12. (See v. 4.) oppressors—lit., exactors, i. e., exacting princes (ch. 60, 17). They who ought to be protectors are exactors; as unqualified for rule as "children," as effeminate as "women." Perhaps it is also implied, that they were under the influence of their harem, the women of their court. lead—Hebrew, call thee blessed; viz., the false prophets, who flatter the people with promises of safety in sin; as the political "rulers" are meant in the first clause. way of thy paths—(Jeremiah 6, 16.) The right way set forth in the law. "Destroy"—Hebrew, Swallow up, i. e., cause so utterly to disappear that not a vestige of it is left. 13. standeth up—no longer sitting in silence. plead—indignant against a wicked people (ch. 66, 16; Ezekiel 20, 85). 14. ancients—hence they are spoken of as "taken away" (v. 1, 2). vineyard—the Jewish theocracy (ch. 5, 1-7; Psalm 80, 9-13). eaten up—burnt; viz., by "oppressive exactions" (v. 12). Type of the crowning guilt of the husbandmen in the days of Jesus Christ (Matthew 21, 34-41). spoil . . . houses—(Matthew 23, 14.) 15. What right have ye to beat, &c. (Psalm 94, 5; Micah 3, 2, 3). grind—by exactions, so as to leave them nothing. faces—persons; with the additional idea of it being openly and palpably done. "Presence," equivalent to (Hebrew) face. 16. Luxury had become great in Uzziah's prosperous reign (2 Chronicles 26, 5). stretched forth—proudly elevated (Psalm 75, 5). wanton—rather, making the eyes to glance about, viz., wantonly (Proverbs 6, 13). [MAURER.] But LOWTH, "falsely setting off the eyes with paint." Women's eyelids in the East are often coloured with stibium, or powder of lead (note, Job 42, 14; Jeremiah 4, 30, Margin). mincing—tripping with short steps. tinkling—with their ankle-rings on both feet, joined by small chains, which sound as they walk, and compel them to take short steps; sometimes little bells were attached (v. 18, 20). 17. smite with a scab—lit., make bald, viz., by disease. discover—cause them to suffer the greatest indignity that can befall female captives, viz. to be stripped naked, and have their persons exposed (ch. 47, 3; cf. with ch. 20, 4). 18. bravery—the finery. tinkling—(See v. 16.) cauls—network for the head. Or else, from an Arabic root, little suns, answering to the "tires" or neck-ornaments, "like the moon" (Judges 8, 21). The chumarah or crescent is also worn in front of the head-dress in West Asia. 19. chains—rather, pendants, hanging about the neck, and dropping on the breast. mufflers—veils covering the face, with apertures for the eyes, close above and loosely flowing below. The word radically means tremulous, referring to the changing effect of the spangles on the veil. 20. bonnets—turbans. ornaments of . . . legs—the short stepping-chains from one foot to another, to give a measured gait; attached to the "tinkling ornaments" (v. 16). headbands—lit., girdles. tablets—rather, houses of the breath, i. e., smelling-boxes. [Vulgate.] earrings—rather, amulets suspended from the neck or ears, with magic formulae inscribed; the root means to whisper or conjure. 21. nose jewels—the cartilage between the nostrils was bored to receive them; they usually hung from the left nostril. 22. Here begin entire articles of apparel. Those before were single ornaments. changeable—from a root, to put off; not worn commonly; put on and off on special occasions. So dress-clothes (Zechariah 3, 4). mantles—fuller tunics with sleeves, worn over the common one, reaching down to the feet. wimples—i. e., mufflers, or hoods. In Ruth 3, 15, veils; perhaps here, a broad cloak, or shawl, thrown over the head and body. crisping pins—rather, money bags (2 Kings 5, 23). 23. glasses—mirrors of polished metal (Exodus 38, 8). But LXX., a transparent, gauzelike, garment, hood—mitres, or diadems (ch. 62, 3; Zechariah 3, 5). veils—large enough to cover the head and person. Distinct from the smaller veils (“mufflers”) above (Genesis 24, 65). Token of woman's subjection (1 Corinthians 11, 10). 24. stink—arising from ulcers (Zechariah 14, 12). girdle—to gird up the loose Eastern garments, when the person walked. rent—LXX., better, a rope, an emblem of poverty; the poor have nothing else to gird up their clothes with. well-set hair—(1 Peter 3, 3, 4). balddness—(v. 17). stomacher—a broad plaited girdle. sackcloth—(2 Samuel 3, 31.) burning—a sunburnt countenance, owing to their hoods and veils being stripped off, whilst they had to work as captives under a scorching sun (Song of Solomon 1, 6). 25. Thy men—of Jerusalem. 26. gates—The place of concourse personified is represented mourning for the loss of those multitudes which once frequented it. desolate. . . sit upon . . . ground—the very figure under which Judea was represented on medals after the destruction by Titus; a female sitting under a palm tree in a posture of grief; the motto, Judea capta (Job 2, 13; Lamentations 2, 10, where, as here primarily, the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar is alluded to).

ORNAMENTS WORN BY LADIES.

DRESS OF EGYPTIAN HIGH-PRIEST.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-6. 1. that day—the calamitous period described last chapter. seven—indefinite number among the Jews. So many men would be slain, that there would be very many more women than men; e. g., seven women, contrary to their natural bashfulness, would sue to (equivalent to “take hold of,” ch. 3, 6) one man to marry them. eat . . . own bread—foregoing the privileges, which the law (Exodus 21, 10) gives to wives, when a man has more than one. reproach—of being unwedded and childless; especially felt among the Jews, who were looking for “the seed of the woman,” Jesus Christ, described in v. 2; ch. 54, 1, 4; Luke 1, 25. 2. In contrast to those on whom vengeance falls, there is a manifestation of Jesus Christ to the “escaped of Israel” in His characteristic attributes, beauty and glory, typified in Aaron's garments (Exodus 28, 2). Their sanctification is promised as the fruit of their being “written” in the book of life by sovereign love (v. 3); the means of it are the “spirit of judgment” and that of “burning” (v. 4). Their “defence” by the special presence of Jesus Christ is promised (v. 5, 6). branch—the sprout of JEHOVAH. Messiah (Jeremiah 23, 5; 33, 15; Zechariah 3, 8; 6, 12; Luke 1, 78, Margin). The parallel clause does not, as MAURER objects, oppose this; for “fruit of the earth” answers to “branch;” He shall not be a dry, but a fruit-bearing branch (ch. 27, 6; Ezekiel 34, 23-27.) He is “of the earth” in His birth and death, whilst He is also “of the Lord” (Jehovah) (John 12, 24). His name, “the Branch,” chiefly regards His descent from David, when the family was low and reduced (Luke 2, 4, 7, 24); a sprout with more than David's glory, springing as from a decayed tree (ch. 11, 1; 53, 2; Revelation 22, 16). excellent—(Hebrews 1, 4; 8, 6.) comely—(Song of Solomon, 5, 15, 16; Ezekiel 16, 14.) escaped of Israel—the elect remnant (Romans 11, 5); (1.) In the return from Babylon; (2.) In the escape from Jerusalem's destruction under Titus; (3.) in the still future assault on Jerusalem, and deliverance of “the third part;” events mutually analogous, like concentric circles (Zechariah 12, 2-10; 13, 8, 9, &c.; 14, 2; Ezekiel 39, 23-29; Joel 3, 3. left in Zion—equivalent to the “escaped of Israel” (v. 2). shall be called—shall be (ch. 9, 6). holy—(Ch. 52, 1; 60, 21; Revelation 21, 27.) written—in the book of life, antitypically (Philippians 4, 3; Revelation 3, 5; 17, 8). Primarily, in the register kept of Israel's families and tribes. living—not “blotted out” from the registry, as dead; but written there as among the “escaped of Israel” (Daniel 12, 1; Ezekiel 13, 9). To the elect of Israel, rather than the saved in general, the special reference is here (Joel 3, 17). 4. When—i. e., After. washed—(Zechariah 13, 1.) filth—moral (ch. 1, 21-25). daughters of Zion—same as in ch. 3, 16. purged—purified by judgments; destroying the ungodly, correcting and refining the godly. blood—(ch. 1, 15.) spirit—whatever God does in the universe, He does by His Spirit, “without the hand” of man (Job 34, 20; Psalm 104, 30). Here He is represented using His power as Judge. burning—(Matthew 3, 11, 12). The same Holy Ghost, who sanctifies believers by the fire of affliction (Malachi 3, 2, 3), dooms unbelievers to the fire of perdition (1 Corinthians 3, 13-15). 5. create—the “new creation” needs as much God's creative omnipotence, as the material creation (2 Corinthians 4, 6; Ephesians 2, 10). So it shall be in the case of the Holy Jerusalem to come (ch. 55, 17, 18). upon—the pillar of cloud stood over the tabernacle, as symbol of God's favour and presence (Exodus 13, 21, 22; Psalm 91, 1). Both on individual families (“every dwelling”) and on the general sacred “assemblies” (Leviticus 23, 2). The “cloud” became a “fire” by night, in order to be seen by the Lord's people. upon all the glory—“upon the glorious whole;” viz., the Lord's people and sanctuary. [MAURER.] May it not mean, “Upon whatever the glory (the Shechinah spoken of in the previous clause) shall rest, there shall be a defence.” The symbol of His presence shall ensure also safety. So it was to Israel against the Egyptians at the Red Sea (Exodus 14, 19, 20). So it shall be to literal Jerusalem hereafter (Zechariah 2, 5). Also to the Church, the spiritual “Zion” (ch. 32, 18; 33, 15-17; Hebrews 12, 22). tabernacle—Christ's body (John 1, 14). “The Word tabernacled (Greek for ‘dwelt’) among us” (John 2, 21; Hebrews 8, 2). It is a “shadow from the heat” and “refuge from the storm” of Divine wrath against man's sins (ch. 25, 4). Heat and storms are violent in the East; so that a portable tent is a needful part of a traveller's outfit. Such shall be God's wrath hereafter, from which the “escaped of Israel” shall be sheltered by Jesus Christ (ch. 26, 20, 21; 32, 2). covert—answering to “defence” (v. 5). The Hebrew for defence in v. 5, is “covering;” the lid of the ark or mercy-seat was named from the same Hebrew word, caphar; the propitiator; for it, being sprinkled with blood by the high priest once a year, on the day of atonement, covered the people typically from wrath. Jesus Christ is the true Mercy-seat, on whom the Shechinah rested, the propitiator, or atonement, beneath whom the law is kept, as it was literally within the ark, and man is covered from the storm. The redeemed Israel shall also be, by union with Him, a tabernacle for God's glory, which, unlike that in the wilderness, shall not be taken down (ch. 38, 20).

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-30. PARABLE OF JEHOVAH'S VINEYARD. A new prophecy; entire in itself. Probably delivered about the same time as chs. 2 and 3, in Uzziah's reign. Cf. v. 15, 16 with ch. 2, 17; and v. 1 with ch. 3, 14. However, the close of the chapter alludes generally to the still distant invasion of Assyrians in a later reign (cf. v. 26 with ch. 7, 18; and v. 25 with ch. 9, 12). When the time drew nigh, according to the ordinary prophetic usage, he handles the details more particularly (chs. 7., 8.); viz., the calamities caused by the Syro-Israelitish invasion, and subsequently by the Assyrians whom Ahaz had invited to his help. 1. to—rather, concerning [GESENIUS], for, i. e., in the person of my beloved, as His representative. [VITRINGA.] Isalah gives a hint of the distinction and yet unity of the Divine Persons (cf. He with I, v. 2, 3). of my beloved—inspired by Him. Or else, a tender song. [CASTALIO.] By a slight change of reading, a song of His love. [HUBIGANT.] “The Beloved” is Jehovah, the Second Person, the “Angel” of God the Father, not in His character as incarnate Messiah, but as God of the Jews (Exodus 23, 20, 21; 32, 34; 33, 14). vineyard—(Ch. 3, 14; Psalm 80, 8, &c.) The Jewish covenant-people, separated from the nations for His glory, as the object of His peculiar care (Matthew 20, 1; 21, 33). Jesus Christ in the “vineyard” of the New Testament Church is the same as the Old Testament Angel of the Jewish covenant. fruitful hill—lit., a horn (peak, as the Swiss shreckhorn) of the son of oil; poetically, for very fruitful, Suggestive of isolation, security, and a sunny aspect. Isaiah alludes plainly to the Song of Solomon (Song of Solomon 6, 3; 8, 11, 12), in the words "His vineyard" and "my Beloved" (cf. ch. 26, 20; 61, 10, with Song of Solomon 1, 4; 4, 10). The translation from "Branch" (ch. 3, 2) to "vineyard" here is not unnatural. 2. fenced—rather, digged and trenched the ground to prepare it for planting the vines. [MAURER.] choicest vine—Hebrew, sorek; called still in Morocco, serki; the grapes had scarcely perceptible stones; the Persian kishmish or bedana, i. e., without seed (Genesis 49, 11). tower—to watch the vineyard against the deprivations of man or beast, and for the use of the owner (Matthew 21, 33). winepress—including the winefat; both hewn, for coolness, out of the rocky undersoil of the vineyard. wild grapes—the Hebrew—expresses offensive putrefaction, answering to the corrupt state of the Jews. Fetid fruit of the wild vine [MAURER], instead of "choicest" grapes. Of the poisonous monk's hood. [GESENIUS.] The Arabs call the fruit of the night-shade "wolf-grapes" (Deuteronomy 32, 32, 33; 2 Kings 4, 39-41). Jerome tries to specify the details of the parable; the "fence," angels; the "stones gathered but," idols; the "tower," the temple "in the midst" of Judea; the "winepress," the altar. 3. And now, &c.—Appeal of God to themselves, as in ch. 1, 18; Micah 6, 3. So Jesus Christ, in Matthew 21, 40, 41, alluding in the very form of expression to this, makes them pass sentence on themselves. God condemns sinners "out of their own mouth" (Deuteronomy 32, 6; Job 15, 6; Luke 19, 22; Romans 3, 4). 4. God has done all that could be done for the salvation of sinners, consistently with his justice and goodness. The God of nature is, as it were, amazed at the unnatural fruit of so well cared a vineyard. 5. go to—i. e., attend to me. hedge . . . wall—it had both; a proof of the care of the owner. But now it shall be trodden down by wild beasts (enemies) (Psalm 80, 12, 13). 6. I will . . . command—The parable is partly dropped, and Jehovah, as in v. 7, is implied to be the Owner: for He alone, not an ordinary husbandman (Matthew 21, 43; Luke 17, 22), could give such a "command." no rain—antipically, the heaven-sent teachings of the prophets (Amos 8, 11). Not accomplished in the Babylonish captivity; for Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Haggai, and Zechariah, prophesied during or after it. But in gospel times. 7. Isaiah here applies the parable. It is no mere human owner, nor a literal vineyard that is meant; "For," &c. vineyard of the Lord—His only one (Exodus 19, 5; Amos 3, 2). pleasant—"the plant of his delight;" just as the husbandman was at pains to select the sorek, or "choicest vine" (v. 2); so God's election of the Jews. judgment—justice. The play upon words is striking in the Hebrew, "He looked for mishpat, but beheld mishpat (bloodshed); for tsedaqua, but beheld tsedaqua (the cry that attends anarchy, covetousness, and dissipation, v. 8, 11, 12; compare the cry of the rabble by which justice was overborne in the case of Jesus Christ, Matthew 27, 23, 24). 8-23. SIX DISTINCT WOES AGAINST CRIMES. 8. (Leviticus 25, 13; Micah 2, 2.) The jubilee restoration of possession was intended as a guard against avarice. till there be no place—left for any one else. that they may be—rather, and ye be, the earth—the land. 9. In mine ears . . . the Lord—viz., has revealed it, as in ch. 22, 14. desolate—lit., a desolation, viz., on account of the national sins. great and fair—houses. 10. acres—lit., yokes; as such as one yoke of oxen could plough in a day. one—only. bath—of wine; seven and a half gallons. homer . . . ephah—eight bushels of seed would yield only three pecks of produce (Ezekiel 45, 11). The ephah and bath, one-tenth of an homer. 11. Second woe; against intemperance. early—when it was regarded especially shameful to drink (Acts 2, 15; 1 Thessalonians 5, 7). Banquets for revelry began earlier than usual (Ecclesiastes 10, 16, 17). strong drink—Hebrew, sichar, implying intoxication. continue—drinking all day till evening. 12. Music was common at ancient feasts (ch. 24, 8, 9; Amos 6, 5, 6). viol—an instrument with twelve strings (Josephus, Antiquities 8, 10). tabret—Hebrew, toph, from the use of which in drowning the cries of children sacrificed to Moloch, Tophet received its name. Arabic, duf. A kettle drum, or tambourine. pipe—flute or flageolet; from a Hebrew root to bore through; or else, to dance (cf. Job 21, 11-15). regard not . . . Lord—a frequent effect of feasting (Job 1, 5; Psalm 23, 5). work . . . operation—in punishing the guilty (v. 19; ch. 10, 12). 13. are gone—the prophet sees the future as if it were before his eyes. no knowledge—because of their foolish recklessness (v. 12; ch. 1, 3; Hosea 4, 6; Luke 19, 44). furnished—awful contrast to their luxurious feasts (v. 11, 12). multitude—plebeians in contradistinction to the "honourable men," or nobles. thirst—(Psalm 107, 4, 5.) Contrast to their drinking (v. 11). In their deportation and exile, they shall hunger and thirst. 14. hell—the grave; Hebrew, sheol; Greek, hades; the unseen world of spirits. Not here, the place of torment. Poetically, it is represented as enlarging itself immensely, in order to receive the countless hosts of Jews, which should perish (Numbers 16, 30). their—i. e., of the Jewish people. he that rejoiceth—the drunken reveller in Jerusalem. 15. (Cf. ch. 2, 9, 11, 17.) All ranks, "mean" and "mighty" alike; so "honourable" and "multitude" (v. 13). 16. God shall be "exalted" in man's view, because of His manifestation of His "justice" in punishing the guilty. sanctified—regarded as holy by reason of His "righteous" dealings. 17. after their manner—lit., according to their own word, i. e., at will. Otherwise, as in their own pasture [GESENIUS]; so the Hebrew in Micah 2, 12. The lands of the Scenite (tent-dwellers, Jeremiah 35, 7). Arab shepherds in the neighbourhood shall roam at large, the whole of Judea being so desolate as to become a vast pasturage. waste . . . fat ones—the deserted lands of the rich (Psalm 22, 29, "fat"), then gone into captivity, "strangers," i. e., nomad tribes shall make their flocks to feed on. [MAURER.] Figuratively, "the lambs" are the pious, "the fat ones" the impious. So tender disciples of Jesus Christ (1 John 21, 15) are called "lambs;" being meek, harmless, poor, and persecuted. Cf. Ezekiel 30, 18, where the fallings are the rich and great (1 Corinthians 1, 26, 27). The "strangers" are in this view the "other sheep not of" the Jewish "fold" (John 10, 16), the Gentiles whom Jesus Christ shall "bring" to be partakers of the rich privileges (Romans 11, 17) which the Jews ("fat ones," Ezekiel 34, 16) fell from. Thus "after their (own) manner" will express that the Christian Church should worship God in freedom, released from legal bondage (John 4, 23; Galatians 5, 1). 18. (Third) Woe—against obstinate perseverance in sin, as if they wished to provoke Divine judgments. iniquity—guilt, incurring punishment. [MAURER.] ords . . . cart rope—Rabbins say, "An evil inclination is at first like a fine hair-string, but the finishing like a cart-rope." The antithesis is between the slender ords of sophistry, like the spider's web (ch. 59, 5; Job 8, 14), with which one sin draws on another, until they at last bind themselves with great guilt as with a cart-rope. They strain every nerve in sin. vanity—wickedness. sin—substantive, not a verb; they draw on themselves "sin" and its penalty recklessly. 19. work—vengeance (v. 12). Language of defiance to God. So Lamech's boast of impunity (Genesis 4, 23, 24; cf. Jeremiah 17, 15; 2 Peter 3, 3, 4). counsel—God's threatened purpose to punish. 20. Fourth woe against those who confound the distinctions of right and wrong (cf. Romans 1, 28), "reprobate," Greek, undiscriminating; the moral perception darkened. bitter . . . sweet—sin is bitter (Jeremiah 2, 19; 4, 18; Acts 8, 23; Romans 3, 14; Hebrews 12, 15); though it seem sweet for a time (Proverbs 9, 17, 18). Religion is sweet (Psalm 119, 103). 21. Fifth woe against those who were so "wise in their own eyes" as to think they knew better than the prophet, and who therefore rejected his warnings (ch. 29, 14, 15). 22, 23. Sixth woe against corrupt judges, who, "mighty" in drinking "wine" (a boast still not uncommon), if not in defending their country, obtain the means of self-indulgence by taking bribes ("reward"). The two verses are closely joined. [MAURER.] mingle strong drink—not with water, but spices to make it intoxicating (Proverbs 9, 2, 5; Song of Solomon 8, 2). take away . . . righteousness—set aside the just claims of those having a righteous cause. 24. Lil., tongue of fire eateth (Acts 2, 3). flame consumeth . . . chaff—rather, withered grass falleth before the flame (Matthew 3, 12). root . . . blossom—entire decay; both the hidden source and outward manifestations of prosperity, perishing (Job 18, 16; Malachi 4, 1). cast away . . . law—in its spirit, whilst retaining the letter. 25. anger . . . kindled—(2 Kings 22, 13, 17.) hills . . . tremble—this probably fixes the date of this chapter, as it refers to the earthquake in the days of Uzziah (Amos 1, 1; Zechariah 14, 5). The earth trembled as if conscious of the presence of God (Jeremiah 4, 24; Habakkuk 3, 6). torn—rather, were as dung (Psalm 83, 10). For all this, &c.—This burden of the prophet's strains, with dirge-like monotony, is repeated at ch. 9, 12, 17, 21; 10, 4). With all the past calamities, still heavier judgments are impending; which he specifies in the rest of the chapter (Leviticus 23, 14, &c.). 26. lift . . . ensign—to call together the hostile nations to execute His judgments on Judea (ch. 10, 5-7; 45, 1). But for mercy to it, in ch. 11, 12; 18, 3. hiss—(Ch. 7, 18.) Bees were drawn out of their hives by the sound of a flute, or by hissing, or whistling (Zechariah 10, 8). God will collect the nations round Judea like bees (Deuteronomy 1, 44; Psalm 118, 12). end of the earth—the widely-distant subject races of which the Assyrian army was made up (ch. 22, 6). The ulterior fulfillment took place in the siege under the Roman Titus. Cf. "end of the earth" (Deuteronomy 28, 49, &c.). So the pronoun is singular in the Hebrew, for "them," "their," "whose" (him, his, &c.), v. 26, 27, 28, 29; referring to some particular nation and person. [HORSLEY.] 27. weary—with long marches (Deuteronomy 25, 18). none . . . slumber—requiring no rest. girdle—with which the ancient loose robes used to be girded for action. Ever ready for march or battle. nor latchet . . . broken—the soles were attached to the feet, not by upper leather as with us, but by straps. So securely clad that not even a strap of their sandals gives way, so as to impede their march. 28. bent—ready for battle. hoofs . . . flint—The ancients did not shoe their horses: hence the value of hard hoofs for long marches. wheels—of their chariots. The Assyrian army abounded in cavalry and chariots (ch. 22, 6, 7; 34, 8). 29. roaring—their battle-cry. 30. sorrow, and the light is darkened—otherwise, distress and light (i. e., hope and fear) alternately succeed (as usually occurs in an unsettled state of things), and darkness arises in, &c. [MAURER.] heavens—lit., clouds, i. e., its sky is rather "clouds" than sky. Otherwise from a different Hebrew root, in its destruction or ruins. HORSLEY takes "sea . . . look unto the land" as a new image taken from mariners in a coasting vessel (such as all ancient vessels were), looking for the nearest land, which the darkness of the storm conceals, so that darkness and distress alone may be said to be visible.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-13. VISION OF JEHOVAH IN HIS TEMPLE. Isaiah is outside, near the altar in front of the temple. The doors are supposed to open, and the veil hiding the Holy of Holies to be withdrawn, unfolding to his view a vision of God represented as an Eastern monarch, attended by seraphim as His ministers of state (1 Kings 22, 19), and with a robe and flowing train (a badge of dignity in the East), which filled the temple. This assertion that he had seen God was, according to tradition (not sanctioned by ch. 1, 1; see Introduction), the pretext for sawing him asunder in Manasseh's reign (Hebrews 11, 37). Visions often occur in the other prophets; in Isaiah there is only this one, and it marked by characteristic clearness and simplicity. In . . . year . . . Uzziah died—Either literal death, or civil when he ceased as a leper to exercise his functions as king. [CHALDEE.] (2 Chronicles 26, 19-21.) 754 B. C. [CALMET.] 758. [COMMON CHRONOLOGY.] This is not the first beginning of Isaiah's prophecies, but his inauguration to a higher degree of the prophetic office: v. 9, &c., implies the tone of one who had already experience of the people's obstinacy. Lord—here Adonai; Jehovah in v. 5; Jesus Christ is meant as speaking in v. 10, according to John 12, 41. Isaiah could only have "seen" the Son, not the Divine essence (John 1, 18). The words in v. 10 are attributed by St. Paul (Acts 28, 25, 26) to the Holy Ghost. Thus the Trinity in unity is implied; as also by the thrice

"Holy" (v. 3). Isalah mentions the robes, temple, and seraphim, but not the form of God Himself. Whatever it was, it was different from the usual Shechinah: that was on the mercy-seat, this on a throne; that a cloud and fire, of this no form is specified: over that were the cherubim, over this the seraphim; that had no clothing, this had a flowing robe and train. 2. stood—not necessarily the posture of standing; rather, were in attendance on Him [MAURER], hovering on expanded wings. the—not in the Hebrew. seraphim—nowhere else applied to God's attendant angels: but to the fiery flying (not winged, but rapidly-moving) serpents, which bit the Israelites (Numbers 21, 6), called so from the poisonous inflammation caused by their bites. Seraph is to burn; implying the burning zeal, dazzling brightness (2 Kings 2, 11; 6, 17; Ezekiel 1, 13; Matthew 28, 3) and serpent-like rapidity of the seraphim in God's service. Perhaps Satan's form as a serpent (Nachash) in his appearance to man has some connection with his original form as a seraph of light. The head of the serpent was the symbol of wisdom in Egypt (cf. Numbers 21, 8; 2 Kings 18, 4). The seraphim, with six wings and one face, can hardly be identified with the cherubim, which had four wings (in the temple only two) and four faces (Ezekiel 1, 5-12). (But cf. Revelation 4, 8.) The "face" and "feet" imply a human form; something of a serpentine form (perhaps a basilisk's head, as in the temples of Thebes) may have been mixed with it; so the cherub was compounded of various animal forms. However, seraph may come from a root meaning princely, applied in Daniel 10, 13 to Michael [MAURER]; just as cherub comes from a root (changing m into b), meaning noble. twain—two wings alone of the six were kept ready for instant flight in God's service; two veiled their faces as unworthy to look on the holy God, or pry into his secret counsels which they fulfilled (Exodus 3, 6; Job 4, 18; 15, 15), two covered their feet, or rather the whole of the lower parts of their persons—a practice usual in the presence of Eastern monarchs, in token of reverence (cf. Ezekiel 1, 11, their bodies). Man's service a fortiori consists in reverent waiting on, still more than in active service for God. 3. (Revelation 4, 8.) The Trinity is implied (see note on "Lord," v. 1). God's holiness is the key-note of Isaiah's whole prophecies. whole earth—the Hebrew more emphatically, the fulness of the whole earth is His glory (Psalm 24, 1; 72, 19). 4. posts of . . . door—rather, foundations of the thresholds. house—temple. smoke—the Shechinah cloud (1 Kings 8, 10; Ezekiel 10, 4). 5. undone—(Exodus 33, 20.) The same effect was produced on others by the presence of God (Judges 6, 22; 13, 22; Job 42, 5, 6; Luke 5, 8; Revelation 1, 17). lips—appropriate to the context which describes the praises of the lips, sung in alternate responses (Exodus 15, 20, 21; v. 3) by the seraphim; also appropriate to the office of speaking as the prophet of God, about to be committed to Isaiah (v. 9). seen—not strictly Jehovah Himself (John 1, 18; 1 Timothy 6, 16), but the symbol of his presence. Lord—Hebrew, JEHOVAH. 6. unto me—The seraph had been in the temple, Isaiah outside of it. live coal—lit., a hot stone, used, as in some countries in our days, to roast meat with, ex. gr., the meat of the sacrifices; fire was a symbol of purification, as it takes the dross out of metals (Malachi 3, 2, 3). the altar—of burnt offering, in the court of the priests before the temple. The fire on it was at first kindled by God (Leviticus 9, 24), and was kept continually burning. 7. mouth . . . lips—(Cf. note v. 5.) The mouth was touched because it was the part to be used by the prophet when inaugurated. So "tongues of fire" rested on the disciples (Acts 2, 3, 4) when they were being set apart to speaking in various languages of Jesus. iniquity—conscious unworthiness of acting as God's messenger. purged—lit., covered, i. e., expiated, not by any physical effect of fire to cleanse from sin, but in relation to the altar-sacrifices, of which Messiah, who here commissions Isaiah, was in His death to be the antitype: it is implied hereby that it is only by sacrifice sin can be pardoned. 8. I . . . us—The change of number indicates the Trinity (cf. Genesis 1, 26; 11, 7). Though not a sure argument for the doctrine, for the plural may indicate merely majesty, it accords with that truth proved elsewhere. Whom . . . who—Implying that few would be willing to bear the self-denial which the delivering of such an unwelcome message to the Jews would require on the part of the messenger (cf. 1 Chronicles 29. 5). Here am I—prompt zeal, now that he has been specially qualified for it (v. 7; cf. 1 Samuel 3, 10, 11; Acts 9. 6). 9. Hear . . . indeed—Hebrew, In hearing hear, i. e., Though ye hear the prophet's warnings again and again, ye are doomed, because of your perverse will (John 7. 17), not to understand. Light enough is given in revelation to guide those sincerely seeking to know, in order that they may do, God's will; darkness enough is left to confound the wilfully blind (ch. 43. 8). So in Jesus' use of parables (Matthew 13. 14). see . . . indeed—rather, "though ye see again and again," yet, &c. 10. Make . . . fat—(Psalm 119. 70.) "Render them the more hardened by thy warnings." [MAURER.] This effect is the fruit, not of the truth in itself, but of the corrupt state of their hearts, to which God here judiciously gives them over (ch. 63. 17). GESENIUS takes the imperatives as futures. "Proclaim truths, the result of which proclamation will be their becoming the more hardened" (Romans 1. 23; Ephesians 4. 18); but this does not so well as the former set forth God as designedly giving up sinners to judicial hardening (Romans 11. 8; 2 Thessalonians 2. 11). In the first member of the sentence, the order is, the heart, ears, eyes; in the latter, the reverse order, the eyes, ears, heart. It is from the heart that corruption flows into the ears and eyes (Mark 7. 21, 22); but through the eyes and ears healing reaches the heart (Romans 10. 17). [BENGEL.] (Jeremiah 5. 21; Ezekiel 12. 2; Zechariah 7. 11; Acts 7. 57; 2 Timothy 4. 4.) In Matthew 13. 15, the words are quoted in the indicative, is waxed gross (so the LXX.), not the imperative, make fat; God's word as to the future is as certain as if it were already fulfilled. To see with one's eyes will not convince a will that is opposed to the truth (cf. John 11. 45, 46; 12. 10, 11). "One must love Divine things in order to understand them." [PASCAL.] be healed—of their spiritual malady, sin (ch. 1. 6; Psalm 103. 3; Jeremiah 17. 14). 11. how long—will this wretched condition of the nation being hardened to its destruction continue? until—(ch. 5. 9)—fulfilled primarily at the Babylonish captivity, and more fully at the dispersion under the Roman Titus. 12. (2 Kings 25. 21.) forsaking—abandonment of dwellings by their inhabitants (Jeremiah 4. 20). 13. and it shall return, and . . . be eaten—Rather, but it shall be again given over to be consumed: if even a tenth survive the first destruction, it shall be destroyed by a second (ch. 5. 25; Ezekiel 5. 1-5, 12). [MAURER and HORSLEY.] In English Version, "return" refers to the poor remnant left in the land at the Babylonish captivity (2 Kings 24. 14; 25. 12), which afterwards fled to Egypt in fear (2 Kings 25. 26), and subsequently returned thence along with others who had fled to Moab and Edom (Jeremiah 40. 11, 12); and suffered under further Divine judgments. teal—Rather, terebinth or turpentine tree (ch. 1. 29). substance . . . when . . . cast . . . leaves—Rather, "As a terebinth or oak in which, when they are cast down (not 'cast their leaves,' Job 14. 7), the trunk or stock remains, so the holy seed (Ezra 9. 2) shall be the stock of that land." The seeds of vitality still exist in both the land and the scattered people of Judea, waiting for the returning spring of God's favour (Romans 11. 5, 23-29). According to Isaiah, not all Israel, but the elect remnant alone, is destined to salvation. God shows unchangeable severity towards sin, but covenant faithfulness in preserving a remnant, and to it Isaiah bequeaths the prophetic legacy of the second part of his book (ch. 40.-66).

CHAPTER VII.

Chapters 7., 8., and 9. 1-7. PREDICTION OF THE ILL SUCCESS OF THE SYRO-ISRAELITISH INVASION OF JUDAH—AHAZ'S ALLIANCE WITH ASSYRIA, AND ITS FATAL RESULTS TO JUDEA—YET THE CERTAINTY OF FINAL PRESERVATION AND OF THE COMING OF MESSIAH. In the Assyrian inscriptions the name of Rezin, king of Damascus, is found among the tributaries of Tiglath-pileser, of whose reign the annals of seventeen years have been deciphered. For the historical facts in this chapter, cf. 2 Kings 15. 37-16. 9. Rezin of Syria and Pekah of Israel, as confederates, advanced against Jerusalem. In the first campaign (2 Chronicles 28.) they "smote Ahaz with a great slaughter." Their object was probably to unite the three kingdoms against Assyria; Egypt seems to have favoured the plan, so as to interpose these confederate kingdoms between her own frontier and Assyria (cf. v. 18, "Egypt;") and 2 Kings 17. 4, Hoshea's league with Egypt). Rezin and Pekah may have perceived Ahaz's inclination towards Assyria rather than towards their own confederacy; this and the old feud between Israel and Judah (1 Kings 12. 16) occasioned their invasion of Judah. Ahaz, at the second inroad of his enemies (cf. 2 Chronicles 28., and 2 Kings 15. 37, with ch. 16. 5), smarting under his former defeat, applied to Tiglath-pileser, in spite of Isaiah's warning in this chapter, that he should rather rely on God; that king accordingly attacked Damascus, and slew Rezin (2 Kings 9.); and probably it was at the same time that he carried away part of Israel captive (2 Kings 15. 20), unless there were two assaults on Pekah—that in 2 Kings 15. 29, the earlier, and that in which Tiglath helped Ahaz subsequent. [G. V. SMITH.] Ahaz was saved at the sacrifice of Judah's independence, and the payment of a large tribute, which continued till the overthrow of Sennacherib under Hezekiah (ch. 37.; 2 Kings 16. 8, 17, 18; 2 Chronicles 28. 20). Ahaz's reign began about 741 B. C., and Pekah was slain in 738. [WINER.] 1. Ahaz—In the first years of his reign the design of the two kings against Judah was carried out, which was formed in Jotham's reign (2 Kings 15. 37). Syria—Hebrew, Aram (Genesis 10. 22, 23), originally the whole region between the Euphrates, and Mediterranean, including As-syria, of which Syria is an abbreviation; here the region round Damascus, and along Mount Libanus. Jerusalem—an actual siege of it took place, but was foiled (2 Kings 16. 5). 2. Is confederate with—rather, is encamped upon the territory of Ephraim [MAURER]; or better, as Rezin was encamped against Jerusalem, "is supported by" [LOWTH] Ephraim, whose land lay between Syria and Judah. The mention of "David" alludes, in sad contrast with the present, to the time when David made Syria subject to him (2 Samuel 8. 6). Ephraim—the ten tribes. as . . . trees of . . . wood—a simultaneous agitation. 3. Go forth—out of the city, to the place where Ahaz was superintending the works for defence, and the cutting off of the water supply from the enemy, and securing it to the city. So ch. 22. 9; 2 Chronicles 32. 4. Shear-jeshub—i. e., A remnant shall return (ch. 6. 13). His very name (cf. v. 14; ch. 8. 3) was a standing memorial to Ahaz and the Jews that the nation should not, notwithstanding the general calamity (v. 17-25; ch. 8. 6-8), be utterly destroyed (ch. 10. 21, 22). conduit—an aqueduct from the pool or reservoir for the supply of the city. At the foot of Zion was Fount Siloah (ch. 8. 6; Nehemiah 3. 15; John 9. 7), called also Gihon, on the west of Jerusalem (2 Chronicles 32. 30). Two pools were supplied from it, the Upper, or Old (ch. 22. 11), or King's (Nehemiah 2. 14), and the Lower (ch. 22. 9), which received the superfluous waters of the upper. The upper pool is still to be seen, about seven hundred yards from the Jaffa gate. The highway leading to the fullers' field, which was in a position near water for the purposes of washing, previous to drying and bleaching, the cloth, was probably alongside the aqueduct. 4. Take heed, &c.—i. e., See that thou be quiet (not seeking Assyrian aid in a fit of panic). tails—mere ends of firebrands, almost consumed themselves (about soon to fall before the Assyrians, v. 8), therefore harmless. smoking—as about to go out; not blazing. son of Remaliah—Pekah, an usurper (2 Kings 15. 25). The Easterns express contempt by designating one, not by his own name, but by his father's, especially when the father is but little known (1 Samuel 20. 27, 31). 6. vex—rather, throw into consternation. [GESENIUS.] make a breach—rather, cleave it asunder. Their scheme was to divide a large portion of the territory between themselves, and set up a vassal-king of their own over the rest. son of Tabeal—unknown; a Syrian-sounding name, perhaps favoured by a party in Jerusalem (en.

8. 6, 9, 12). 7. (Ch. 8. 10; Proverbs 21. 30.) 8. head—i. e., in both Syria and Israel the capital shall remain as it is; they shall not conquer Judah, but each shall possess only his own dominions, threescore and five . . . not a people—as these words break the symmetry of the parallelism in this verse, either they ought to be placed after “Remanah’s son,” in v. 9, or else they refer to some older prophecy of Isaiah, or of Amos (as the Jewish writers represent), parenthetically; to which, in v. 8, the words “If ye will not believe . . . not be established,” correspond in parallelism. One deportation of Israel happened within one or two years from this time, under Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 15. 29). Another in the reign of Hoshea, under Shalmaneser (2 Kings 17. 1-6), was about twenty years after. But the final one which utterly “broke” up Israel so as to be “not a people,” accompanied by a colonization of Samaria with foreigners, was under Esar-haddon, who carried away Manasseh, king of Judah, also, in the twenty-second year of his reign, sixty-five years from the utterance of this prophecy (cf. Ezra 4. 2, 3, 10, with 2 Kings 17. 24; 2 Chronicles 33. 11). [USHER.] The event, though so far off, was enough to assure the people of Judah that as God, the Head of the theocracy, would ultimately interpose to destroy the enemies of His people, so they might rely on Him now. 9. believe, . . . be established—There is a paronomasia, or play on the words, in the Hebrew, “if ye will not confide, ye shall not abide.” Ahaz brought distress on himself by distrust in the Lord, and trust in Assyria. 11. Ask thee—since thou dost not credit the prophet’s words, sign—a miraculous token to assure thee that God will fulfil His promise of saving Jerusalem (ch. 37. 30; 38. 7, 8). “Signs,” facts then present or near at hand as pledges for the more distant future, are frequent in Isaiah. Ask . . . in . . . depth—lit., Make deep, ask it, i. e., Go to the depth of the earth or of Hades [Vulgate and Lowth], or, Mount high for it (lit., Make high). So in Matthew 16. 1. Signs in heaven are contrasted with the signs on earth and below it (raising the dead) which Jesus Christ had wrought (cf. Romans 10. 6, 7). He offers Ahaz the widest limits within which to make his choice. 12. neither . . . tempt—hypocritical pretext of keeping the law (Deuteronomy 6. 16); “tempt,” i. e., put God to the proof, as in Matthew 4. 7, by seeking His miraculous interposition without warrant. But here there was the warrant of the prophet of God; to have asked a sign, when thus offered, would not have been a tempting of God. Ahaz’s true reason for declining was his resolve not to do God’s will, but to negotiate with Assyria, and persevere in his idolatry (2 Kings 16. 7, 8, 3, 4, 10). Men often excuse their distrust in God, and trust in their own devices, by professed reverence for God. Ahaz may have fancied that though Jehovah was the God of Judea and could work a sign there, that was no proof that the local god of Syria might not be more powerful. Such was the common heathen notion (ch. 10. 10, 11; 36. 18-20). 13. Is it a small thing?—Is it not enough for you (Numbers 16. 9)? The allusion to “David” is in order to contrast his trust in God with his degenerate descendant Ahaz’s distrust. weary—try the patience of. men—prophets. Isaiah as yet had given no outward proof that he was from God; but now God has offered a sign, which Ahaz publicly rejects. The sin is therefore now not merely against “men,” but openly against “God.” Isaiah’s manner therefore changes from mildness to bold reproof. 14. himself—since thou wilt not ask a sign, nay, rejectest the offer of one. you—for the sake of the house of believing “David” (God remembering His everlasting covenant with David), not for unbelieving Ahaz’s sake. behold—arresting attention to the extraordinary prophecy. virgin—from a root, to lie hid, virgins being closely kept from men’s gaze in their parents’ custody in the East. The Hebrew, and LXX. here, and Greek (Matthew 1. 23), have the article, the virgin, some definite one known to the speaker and his hearers; primarily, the woman, then a virgin, about immediately to become the second wife, and bear a child, whose attainment of the age of discrimination (about three years) should be preceded by the deliverance of Judah from its two invaders; its fullest significance is realized in “the woman” (Genesis 3. 15), whose seed should bruise the serpent’s head and deliver captive man (Jeremiah 31. 22; Micah 5. 3). Language is selected such as, whilst partially applicable to the immediate event, receives its fullest, most appropriate, and exhaustive accomplishment in Messianic events. The New Testament application of such prophecies is not a strained “accommodation;” rather the temporary fulfilment of an adaptation of the far-reaching prophecy to the present passing event, which foreshadows typically the great central end of prophecy, Jesus Christ (Revelation 19. 10). Evidently the wording is such as to apply more fully to Jesus Christ than to the prophet’s son; “virgin” applies, in its simplest sense, to the Virgin Mary, rather than to the prophetess who ceased to be a virgin when she “conceived;” “Immanuel,” God with us (John 1. 14; Revelation 21. 3), cannot in a strict sense apply to Isaiah’s son, but only to Him who is presently called expressly (ch. 9. 6), “the Child, the Son, Wonderful (cf. ch. 8. 18), the mighty God.” Local and temporary features (as v. 15, 16) are added in every type; otherwise it would be no type, but the thing itself. There are resemblances to the great Antitype sufficient to be recognized by those who seek them; dissimilarities enough to confound those who do not desire to discover them. call—i. e., she shall, or as Margin, thou, O Virgin, shalt call; mothers often named their children (Genesis 4. 1, 25; 19. 37; 29. 32). In Matthew 1. 23 the expression is strikingly changed into, “They shall call;” when the prophecy received its full accomplishment, no longer is the name Immanuel restricted to the prophetess’ view of His character, as in its partial fulfilment in her son; all shall then call (i. e., not literally), or regard Him as peculiarly and most fully characterized by the descriptive name, “Immanuel” (1 Timothy 3. 16; Colossians 2. 9). name—not mere appellation, which neither Isaiah’s son nor Jesus Christ bore literally; but what describes His manifested attributes; His character (so ch. 9. 6). The name in its proper destination was not arbitrary, but characteristic of the individual; sin destroyed the faculty of perceiving the internal being; hence the severance now between the name and the character; in the case of Jesus Christ and many in Scripture, the Holy Ghost has supplied this want. [OLSHAUSEN.] 15. Butter—rather, Curdled milk, the acid of which is grateful in the heat of the East (Job 20. 17). honey—abundant in Palestine (Judges 14. 8; 1 Samuel 14. 25; Matthew 3. 4). Physicians directed that the first food given to a child should be honey, the next milk. [BARNAB. Ep.] HORSLEY takes this as implying the real humanity of the Immanuel Jesus Christ, about to be fed as other infants (Luke 2. 52). Ver. 22 shows that besides the fitness of milk and honey for children, a state of distress of the inhabitants is also implied, when, by reason of the invaders, milk and honey, things produced spontaneously, shall be the only abundant articles of food. [MAURER.] that He may know—rather, until He shall know. evil . . . choose . . . good—at about three years of age moral consciousness begins (cf. ch. 8. 4; Deuteronomy 1. 39; Jonah 4. 11). 16. For—the deliverance implied in the name “Immanuel,” and the cessation of distress as to food (v. 14, 15), shall last only till the child grows to know good and evil; for, &c. the land that . . . abhorrest . . . forsaken of . . . kings—rather, desolate shall be the land, before whose two kings thou art alarmed. [HENGSTENBERG and GESENIUS.] the land—viz., Syria and Samaria regarded as one (2 Kings 16. 9; 15. 30), just two years after this prophecy, as it foretells. HORSLEY takes it, “The land (Judah and Samaria) of (the former of) which thou art the plague (lit., thorn) shall be forsaken,” &c.; a prediction, that Judah and Israel (appropriately regarded as one “land”) should cease to be kingdoms (Luke 2. 1; Genesis 49. 10) before Immanuel came.

17-25. FATAL CONSEQUENCES OF AHAZ’S ASSYRIAN POLICY. Though temporary deliverance (ch. 7. 16; 8. 4) was to be given then, and final deliverance through Messiah, sore punishment shall follow the former. After subduing Syria and Israel, the Assyrians shall encounter Egypt (2 Kings 23. 29), and Judah shall be the battle-field of both (v. 18), and be made tributary to that very Assyria (2 Chronicles 28. 20; 2 Kings 16. 7, 8) now about to be called in as an ally (ch. 39. 1-6); Egypt, too, should prove a fatal ally (ch. 38. 6; 31. 1, &c.). 18. hiss—whistle, to bring bees to settle (note, ch. 5. 26). fly—found in numbers about the arms of the Nile, and the canals from it (ch. 19. 5-7; 23. 3), here called "rivers." Hence arose the plague of flies (Exodus 8. 21). Figurative, for numerous and troublesome foes from the remotest parts of Egypt, e. g., Pharaoh-necho. bee—(Deuteronomy 1. 44; Psalm 118. 12.) As numerous in Assyria as the fly in marshy Egypt. Sennacherib, Esar-haddon, and Nebuchadnezzar fulfilled this prediction. 19. rest—image of flies and bees kept up. The enemy shall overspread the land everywhere, even in "desolate valleys." thorns—wild, contrasted with "bushes," which were valued and objects of care (see Margin). 20. razor—The Assyrians are to be God's instrument of devastating Judea, as by a razor sweeps away all hair before it (ch. 10. 5; Ezekiel 29. 19, 20). hired—alluding to Ahaz's hiring (2 Kings 16. 7, 8). Tiglath-pileser against Syria and Israel; namely, by them beyond the river—viz., the Euphrates; the eastern boundary of Jewish geographical knowledge (Psalm 72. 8); the river which Abram crossed; the Nile also may be included (v. 18). [G. V. SMITH.] Gesenius translates, "With a razor hired in the parts beyond the river." head . . . feet—the whole body, including the most honoured parts. To cut the "head" is the greatest indignity to an Eastern (ch. 50. 6; 2 Samuel 10. 4, 5; Ezekiel 5. 1). 21-25. THE COMING DESOLATE STATE OF THE LAND OWING TO THE ASSYRIANS AND EGYPTIANS. nourish—i. e., own. young cow—a heifer giving milk. Agriculture shall cease, and the land become one great pasturage. 22. abundance—by reason of the wide range of land lying desolate over which the cows and sheep (including goats) may range. butter—thick milk, or cream. honey—(Note, v. 15.) Food of spontaneous growth will be the resource of the few inhabitants left. Honey shall be abundant, as the bees will find the wild flowers abounding everywhere. 23. where there were, &c.—where up to that time there was so valuable a vineyard as to have in it 1000 vines, worth a silvering (shekel, about 2s. 3d.; a large price) each, there shall be only briars (Song of Solomon 8. 11). Vineyards are estimated by the number of the vines, and the goodness of the kind of vine. Judea admits of a high state of cultivation, and requires it, in order to be productive; its present barrenness is due to neglect. 24. It shall become a vast hunting-ground, abounding in wild beasts (cf. Jeremiah 49. 19). 25. shall be—rather, were once. digged—in order to plant and rear vines (ch. 5. 6). there shall not come—i. e., none shall come who fear thorns, seeing that thorns shall abound on all sides. [MAURER.] Otherwise, "Thou shalt not come for fear of thorns." [GESENIUS.] Only cattle shall be able to penetrate the briery ground. lesser cattle—sheep and goats.

CHAPTER VIII.

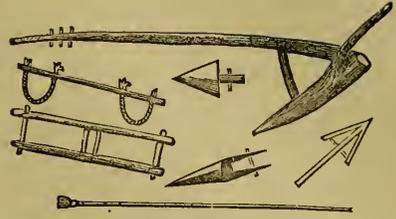

Chapters 8. and 9. 7. The first seven verses of ch. 9. belong to this section. Ch. 8. continues the subject of ch. 7., but at a later period (cf. ch. 8. 4 with ch. 7. 16); implying that the interval till the accomplishment is shorter now than then. The tone of ch. 8. 17, 21, 22, expresses calamity more immediate and afflictive than ch. 7. 4, 15, 22. 1. great—suitable, for letters large enough to be read by all. roll—rather, tablet, of wood, metal, or stone (ch. 30. 8; Habakkuk 2. 2); sometimes coated with wax, upon which characters were traced with a pointed instrument, or iron stylus; skins and papyrus were also used (ch. 19. 7). man's pen—i. e., in ordinary characters which the humblest can read (so Habakkuk 2. 2) Hebrew, enosh means a common man, as contrasted with the upper ranks (Revelation 21. 17; Romans 3. 5). Not in hieroglyphics. The object was that, after the event, all might see that it had been predicted by Isaiah. concerning—the title and subject of the prophecy. Maher-shalal-hash-baz—"They (i. e., the Assyrians) hasten to the spoil (viz., to spoil Syria and Samaria), they speed to the prey." [GESENIUS.] Otherwise, "The spoil (i. e., spoiler) hastens, the rapine speeds forward." [MAURER.] 2. I took—rather, "The Lord said to me, that I should take," &c. [MAURER.] Uriah—an accomplice of Ahaz in idolatry, and therefore a witness not likely to assist the prophet of God in getting up a prophecy after the event (2 Kings 16. 10). The witnesses were in order that when the event should come they might testify that the tablet containing the prophecy had been inscribed with it at the time that it professed. Zechariah—(2 Chronicles 29. 13.) 3. prophetess—perhaps the same as the "virgin" (ch. 7. 14), in the interim married as Isaiah's second wife: this is in the primary and temporary sense, Immanuel is even in this sense distinct from Maher-shalal-hash-baz. Thus nineteen months at least intervene from the prophecy (ch. 7. 14), nine before the birth of Immanuel, and ten from that time to the birth of Maher-shalal-hash-baz; adding eleven or twelve months before the latter could cry, "Father" (ch. 8. 4), we have about three years in all, agreeing with ch. 7. 15, 16. 4. before, &c.—within a year. 6. waters of Shiloah . . . softly—their source is on the south-east of Zion and east of Jerusalem. It means sent, the water being sent through an aqueduct (John 9. 7). Figurative for the mild, though now weak, sway of the house of David; in the highest sense Shiloah expresses the benignant sway of Jehovah in the theocracy, administered through David. Contrast to the violent Euphrates, "the river" that typifies Assyria (v. 7; Revelation 17. 15). "This people" refers both to Israel, which preferred an alliance with Rezin of Syria to one with the kings of Judah, and to Judah, a party in which seems to have favoured the pretensions of the son of Tabeal against David's line (ch. 7. 6); also to Judah's desire to seek an Assyrian alliance is included in the censure (cf. ch. 7. 17). Ver. 14 shows that both nations are meant; both alike rejected the Divine Shiloah. Not "my people," as elsewhere, when God expresses favour, but "this people" (ch. 6. 9). 7. therefore—for the reason given in v. 6, the Assyrian flood, which is first to overflow Syria and Samaria, shall rise high enough to reach rebel Judah also (v. 8). the river—Euphrates swollen in spring by the melting of the snow of the Armenian mountains (cf. v. 6; ch. 7. 20). all his glory—Eastern kings travel with a gorgeous retinue. channels—natural and artificial in the level region, Mesopotamia. 8. pass through—the flood shall not stop at Syria and Samaria, but shall penetrate into Judea. the neck—when the waters reach to the neck, a man is near drowning; still the head is not said to be overflowed. Jerusalem, elevated on hills, is the head. The danger shall be so imminent as to reach near it at Sennacherib's invasion in Hezekiah's reign; but it shall be spared (ch. 30. 23). wings—the extreme bands of the Assyrian armies, fulfilled (ch. 36. 1; 37. 25). thy land, O Immanuel—though temporarily applied to Isaiah's son, in the full sense this is applicable only to Messiah, that Judea is His, was, and still is, a pledge that, however sorely overwhelmed, it shall be saved at last; the "head" is safe even now, waiting for the times of restoration (Acts 1. 6); at the same time these words imply that, notwithstanding the temporary deliverance from Syria and Israel, implied in "Immanuel," the greatest calamities are to follow to Judah. 9. Associate yourselves—rather, Raise tumults, or, Rage, i. e., Do your worst [MAURER], referring perhaps to the attack of Rezin and Pekah on Jerusalem. and . . . be broken in pieces—rather, yet ye shall be thrown into consternation. Imperative in the Hebrew, according to the idiom whereby the second of two imperatives implies the future, viz., the consequence of the action contained in the first (so ch. 6. 9). The name "Immanuel" in v. 8 (cf. v. 10) suggests the thought of the ultimate safety of Immanuel's land, both from its present two invaders, and even from the Assyrians, notwithstanding the grievous flood where-with the previous verses foretell they shall deluge it. The succession of the house of David cannot be set aside in Judah, for Immanuel Messiah is to be born in it as heir of David, of whom Isaiah's son is but a type (ch. 9. 4, 6). give ear . . . for countries—witness the discomfiture of Judah's enemies. The prophecy probably looks on also to the final conspiracy of Antichrist and his supporters against the Heir of David's throne in the latter days, and their utter overthrow. [HORSLEY.] gird yourselves

... gird yourselves—the repetition expresses vehemently the certainty of their being thrown into consternation (not as English Version, “broken in pieces”). 10. the word—of command, for the assault of Jerusalem. God is with us—“Immanuel” implies this (Numbers 14. 9; Psalm 46. 7). 11. with a strong hand—or else, when He grasped me with His hand. [HORSLEY.] MAURER, as English Version, “with the impetus of His hand,” i. e., the felt impulse of His inspiration in my mind (Jeremiah 15. 17; Ezekiel 1. 3; 3. 14, 22; 37. 1). way of . . . people—their distrust of Jehovah, and the panic which led them and Ahab to seek Assyrian aid. 12-16. The words of Jehovah. 13. confederacy—rather, A conspiracy; an appropriate term for the unnatural combination of Israel with Syrian foreigners against Judea and the theocracy, to which the former was bound by ties of blood and hereditary religion. [MAURER.] to all . . . say—rather, of all which this people calleth a conspiracy. [G. V. SMITH.] their fear—viz., object of fear; the hostile conspiracy. be afraid—rather [MAURER], “nor make others to be afraid.” 13. Sanctify—Honour His holy name by regarding Him as your only hope of safety (ch. 29. 23; Numbers 20. 12). him . . . fear—“fear” lest you provoke His wrath by your fear of man and distrust of Him. 12. sanctuary—inviolable asylum, like the altar of the temple (1 Kings 1. 50; 2. 28; Ezekiel 11. 16; cf. Proverbs 18. 10); viz., to those who fear and trust in Him. but . . . offence—i. e., a rock over which they should fall to their hurt; viz., those who would not believe. both . . . houses—Israel and Judah. Here again the prophecy expands beyond the temporary application in Ahaz's time. The very stone, Immanuel, which would have been a sanctuary on belief, becomes a fatal stumbling-block through unbelief. Jesus Christ refers to this in Matthew 21. 44. (Cf. Deuteronomy 32. 4, 15, 18, 30, 31, 37; Daniel 2. 34; Romans 9. 33; 1 Peter 2. 8.) gin—trap, in which birds are unexpectedly caught (Luke 21. 35; 1 Thessalonians 5. 2). So at the destruction of Jerusalem under Titus. 15. stumble . . . taken—images from the means used in taking wild animals. 16. Bind up . . . seal—What Isalah had before briefly noted by inscribing Maher-shalah-hash-baz in a tablet, fixed up in some public place, he afterwards wrote out more in detail in a parchment roll (ch. 30. 8); this he is now to seal up, not merely in order that nothing may be added to, or taken from it, as being complete, but to imply that it relates to distant events, and is therefore to be a sealed and not understood testimony (ch. 6. 9, 10), except in part among God's disciples,” i. e., those who “sanctify the Lord” by obedient trust (Psalm 25. 14). Subsequent revelations would afterwards clear up what now was dark. So the Apocalypse explains what in Daniel was left unexplained (cf. Daniel 8. 26; 12. 9). “The words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end,” but Revelation 22. 10, “Seal not the sayings of the prophecy . . . for the time is at hand” (cf. Revelation 5. 1, 5, 9). testimony—attested by Uriah and Zechariah (v. 2). law—the revelation just given, having the force of a law. disciples—not as MAURER, Uriah and Zechariah (cf. John 7. 17; 15. 15). 17. I—whatever the rest of the nation may do, I will look to Jehovah alone. that hideth . . . face—though He seems now to with-draw His countenance from Judah (the then representative of “the house of Jacob”). Let us wait and trust in, though we cannot see, Him (ch. 50. 10; 51. 8; Habakkuk 2. 3; Luke 2. 25, 38). 18. I and the children—Isalah means salvation of Jehovah; His children's names, also (ch. 7. 3; 7. 14; 8. 3), were “signs” suggestive of the coming and final deliverance. wonders—i. e., symbols of the future (ch. 20. 3; Zechariah 3. 8). “Behold I . . . me” is quoted in Hebrews 2. 13 to prove the manhood of the Messiah. This is the main and ultimate fulfilment of the prophecy; its temporary meaning applied to Ahaz's time. Isalah typically, in v. 17, 18, personates Messiah, who is at once “Father” and “Son.” Isalah and Immanuel, “Child” and “Mighty God,” and is therefore called here a “wonder,” as in ch. 9. 6, “Wonderful.” Hence in Hebrews 2. 13, believers are called His “children,” but in v. 11, 12, His “brethren.” On “the Lord hath given me,” see John 6. 37, 39; 10. 29; 17. 12. which dwelleth in . . . Zion—and will therefore protect Jerusalem. 19. Seek unto—

Consult in your national difficulties. them . . . familiar spirits—necromancers, spirit-charmers. So Saul, when he had forsaken God (1 Samuel 28. 7, &c.), consulted the witch of Endor in his difficulties. These follow in the wake of idolatry, which prevailed under Ahaz (2 Kings 16. 3, 4, 10); he copied the soothsaying as he did the idolatrous “altar” of Damascus (cf. Leviticus 20. 6, which forbids it, ch. 19. 3). wizards—men claiming supernatural knowledge; from the old English, to wit, i. e., know. peep—rather, chirp faintly, as young birds do; this sound was generally ascribed to departed spirits; by ventriloquism the soothsayers caused a low sound to proceed as from a grave, or dead person. Hence the LXX. render the Hebrew for necromancers here “ventriloquists” (cf. ch. 20. 4). matter—moan. should not, &c.—The answer which Isalah recommends to be given to those advising to have recourse to necromancers. for the living, &c.—“should one, for the safety of the living, seek unto (consult), the dead?” [GENSENIUS.] LOWTH renders it, “In place of (consulting) the living, should one consult the dead?” 20. To the law, &c.—the revelation of God by His prophet (v. 16), to which he directs them to refer those who would advise necromancy. if they speak not . . . it is because—English Version understands “they” as the necromancers. But the Hebrew rendered because is not this, but who; and if not ought rather to be shall they not; or, truly they shall speak according to this word, who have no morning light (so the Hebrew, i. e., prosperity after the night of sorrows) dawning on them. [MAURER and G. V. SMITH.] They who are in the dark night of trial, without a dawn of hope, shall surely say so, Do not seek, as we did, to necromancy, but “to the law,” &c. The law perhaps includes here the law of Moses, which was the “Magna Charta” on which prophetism commented. [KITTO.] 21, 22. More detailed description of the despair, which they shall fall into, who sought necromancy instead of God; v. 20 implies that too late they shall see how much better it would have been for them to have sought “to the law,” &c. (Deuteronomy 32. 31). But now they are given over to despair. Therefore, whilst seeing the truth of God, they only “curse their King and God;” foreshadowing the future like conduct of those belonging to the “kingdom of the beast,” when they shall be visited with Divine plagues (Revelation 16. 11; cf. Jeremiah 18. 12). through it—viz., the land, hardly bestead—oppressed with anxiety. hungry—a more grievous famine than the temporary one in Ahaz's time, owing to Assyria; then there was some food, but none now (ch. 7. 15, 22; Leviticus 26. 3-5, 14-16, 20). their king . . . God—Jehovah, King of the Jews (Psalm 5. 2; 68. 24). look upward . . . unto the earth—whether they look up to heaven, or down towards the land of Judea, nothing but despair shall present itself. dimness of anguish—darkness of distress (Proverbs 1. 27). driven to darkness—rather, thick darkness (Jeremiah 23. 12). Driven onward, as by a sweeping storm. The Jewish rejection of “their King and God,” Messiah, was followed by all these awful calamities.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-7. CONTINUATION OF THE PROPHECY IN CHAP. 8. 1. Nevertheless, &c.—rather, “For darkness shall not (continually) be on It (i. e., the land) on which there is (now) distress.” [HENGSTENBERG and MAURER.] The for refers, not to the words immediately preceding, but to the consolations in ch. 8. 9, 10, 17, 18. Do not despair, for, &c. when at the first, &c.—rather, “as the former time has brought contempt on the land of Zebulun and Naphtali (viz., the deportation of their inhabitants under Tiglath-pileser, 2 Kings 15. 29, a little before the giving of this prophecy); so shall the after-coming time bring honour to the way of the sea (the district round the lake of Galilee), the land beyond [but HENGSTENBERG, “by the side of”] Jordan (Perca, east of Jordan, belonging to Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh) the circle [but HENGSTENBERG, “Galilee”] (i. e., region) of the “Gentiles.” [MAURER, HENGSTENBERG, &c.] Galil in Hebrew is a circle, circuit, and from it came the name Galilee. North of Naphtali, Inhabited by a mixed race of Jews and Gentiles of the bordering Phœnician race (Judges 1. 30; 1 Kings 9, 11). Besides the recent deportation by Tiglath-pileser, it had been sorely smitten by Benhadad of Syria, 200 years before (1 Kings 15. 20). It was after the Assyrian deportation colonized with heathens, by Esar-haddon (2 Kings 17. 24). Hence arose the contempt for it on the part of the southern Jews of purer blood (John 1. 46; 7. 52). The same region, which was so darkened once, shall be among the first to receive Messiah's light (Matthew 4. 13, 15, 16). It was in despised Galilee that he first and most publicly exercised His ministry; from it were most of His apostles. Foretold in Deuteronomy 33. 18, 19; Acts 2. 7; Psalm 68. 27, 28, Jerusalem, the theocratic capital, might readily have known Messiah; to compensate less favoured Galilee, He ministered mostly there; Galilee's very debasement made it feel its need of a Saviour, a feeling not known to the self-righteous Jews (Matthew 9. 13). It was appropriate, too, that He who was both "the Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the Glory of His people Israel," should minister chiefly on the border land of Israel, near the Gentiles. 2. the people—The whole nation, Judah and Israel. shadow of death—the darkest misery of captivity. 3. multiplied . . . nation—primarily, the rapid increase of Israelites after the return from Babylon; more fully and exhaustively the rapid spread of Christianity at first. not increased the joy—By a slight change in the Hebrew, its (joy) is substituted by some for not, because "not increased the joy" seems opposite to what immediately follows, "the joy," &c. HENGSTENBERG retains not thus: "Whose joy thou hadst not increased" (i. e., hadst diminished). Others, "Hast thou not increased the joy?" The very difficulty of the reading, not, makes it less likely to be an interpolation. HORSLEY best explains it, The prophet sees in vision a shifting scene, comprehending at one glance the history of the Christian Church to remotest times—a land dark and thinly peopled—lit up by a sudden light—filled with new inhabitants—then struggling with difficulties, and again delivered by the utter and final overthrow of their enemies. The influx of Gentile converts (represented here by "Galilee of the Gentiles") soon was to be followed by the growth of corruption, and the final rise of Antichrist, who is to be destroyed, whilst God's people is delivered, as in the case of Gideon's victory over Midian, not by man's prowess, but by the special interposition of God. before thee—a phrase taken from sacrificial feasts; the tithe of harvest was eaten before God (Deuteronomy 12. 7; 14. 26). as men rejoice . . . divide . . . spoil—referring to the judgments on the enemies of the Lord and His people, which usually accompany revelations of His grace. 4. The occasion of the "joy," the deliverance not only of Ahaz and Judah from the Assyrian tribute (2 Kings 16. 8), and of Israel's ten tribes from the oppressor (2 Kings 15, 19), but of the Jewish Christian Church from its last great enemy. hast—the past time for the future, in prophetic vision; it expresses the certainty of the event. yoke of his burden—the yoke with which he was burdened. staff of . . . shoulder—the staff which strikes his shoulder [MAURER]; or the wood, like a yoke, on the neck of slaves, the badge of servitude. [ROSENMULLER.] day of Midian—(Judges 7. 8-22.) As Gideon with a handful of men conquered the hosts of Midian, so Messiah the "child" (v. 6) shall prove to be the "Prince of peace," and the small Israel under Him shall overcome the mighty hosts of Antichrist (cf. Micah 5. 2-5), containing the same contrast, and alluding also to "the Assyrian," the then enemy of the Church, as here in Isaiah, the type of the last great enemy. For further analogies between Gideon's victory and the gospel, cf. 2 Corinthians 4. 7, with Judges 7. 22. As the "dividing of the spoil" (v. 3) was followed by that which was "not joy," the making of the idolatrous ephod (Judges 8. 24-27), so the gospel victory was soon followed by apostasy at the first, and shall be so again after the millennial overthrow of Antichrist (Revelation 20. 3, 7-9), previous to Satan's last doom (Revelation 20. 10). 5. every battle, &c.—rather, "every grave of (the warrior who is) armed with greaves in the din of battle, and the martial garment (or cloak, called by the Latins sagum) rolled in blood, shall be for burning, (and) fuel for fire." [MAURER.] All warlike accoutrements shall be destroyed, as no longer required in the new era of peace (ch. 2. 4; 11. 6, 7; Psalm 46. 9; Ezekiel 39. 9; Micah 5. 5, 10; Zechariah 9. 9, 10). Cf. Malachi 4. 1, as to the previous burning up of the wicked. 6. For—The ground of these great expectations. unto us—for the benefit of the Jews first, and then the Gentiles (cf. "unto you" (Luke 2. 11), son . . . given—(Psalm 2. 7.) God's gratuitous gift, on which man had no claim (John 3. 16; Romans 6. 23). government . . . upon . . . shoulder—The ensign of office used to be worn on the shoulder, in token of sustaining the government (ch. 22. 22). Here the government on Messiah's shoulder is in marked antithesis to the "yoke and staff" of the oppressor on Israel's "shoulder" (v. 4). He shall receive the kingdom of the earth from the Father, to vindicate it from the misrule of those to whom it was entrusted to hold it for and under the Most High, but who sought to hold it in defiance of His right; the Father asserts His right by the Son, the "Heir of all things," who will hold it for Him (Daniel 7. 13, 14). name . . . called—His essential characteristics shall be. Wonderful—(Note, ch. 8. 18; Judges 13. 18; Margin, 1 Timothy, 3. 16.) Counsellor—(Psalm 16. 7; Romans 11. 33, 34; 1 Corinthians 1. 24; Colossians 2. 3.) mighty God—(Ch. 10. 21; Psalm 2. 8; Titus 2. 13.) HORSLEY translates, "God the mighty man." "Unto us . . . God" is equivalent to "Immanuel" (ch. 7. 14). everlasting Father—this marks Him as "Wonderful," that He is "a child," yet the "everlasting Father" (John 10. 30; 14. 9). Earthly kings leave their people after a short reign; He will reign over and bless them for ever. [HENGSTENBERG.] Prince of Peace—(Note, v. 5; Genesis 49. 10; Shiloh, "The Tranquillizer.") Finally (Hosea, 2. 18). Even already He is "our peace" (Luke 2. 14; Ephesians 2. 14). 7. Of . . . increase . . . no end—His princely rule shall perpetually increase and be unlimited (Daniel 2. 44). throne of David—(1 Kings 8. 25; Psalm 2. 6; 132. 11; Jeremiah 3. 17, 18; Ezekiel 34. 23-26; 37. 16, 22; Luke 1. 32, 33; Acts 2. 30.) judgment . . . justice—It is not a kingdom of mere might, and triumph of force over enemies, but of righteousness (ch. 42. 21; Psalm 45. 6, 7), attainable only in and by Messiah. zeal, &c.—including not only Christ's hidden spiritual victory over Satan at the first coming, but the open one accompanied with "judgments" on Antichrist and every enemy at the second coming (ch. 59. 17; Psalm 9. 6-8).

Ver. 8-21, and chap. 10. 1-4. PROPHECY AS TO THE TEN TRIBES. Delivered a little later than the previous one. The chapters 9. and 10. ought to have been so divided. The present division into chapters was made by Cardinal Hugo, in A.D. 1250; and into verses, by Robert Stephens, the famous printer of Paris, in 1551. After the Assyrian invasion of Syria, that of Ephraim shall follow (2 Kings 16. 9): verses 8-11, 17-20, foretell the intestine discords in Israel after Hoshea had slain Pekah (A.D. 739), i.e., just after the Assyrian invasions, when for seven years it was stripped of magistrates and torn into factions. There are four strophes, each setting forth Ephraim's crime and consequent punishment, and ending with the formula, "For all this His anger is not turned away," &c. (v. 12, 17, 21, and ch. 10. 4). 8. Heading of the prophecy: (v. 8-12), the first strophe. unto Jacob—against the ten tribes. [LOWTH.] lighted upon—fallen from heaven by divine revelation (Daniel 4. 31). 9. know—to their cost: experimentally (Hosea 9. 7). Samarita—the capital of Ephraim (cf. as to phrase, ch. 1. 1). 10. bricks—In the East generally sundried, and therefore soon dissolved by rain. Granting, say the Ephraimites to the prophet's threat, that our affairs are in a ruinous state, we will restore them to more than their former magnificence. Self-confident unwillingness to see the judgments of God (ch. 26. 11.) hewn stones—(1 Kings 5. 17.) sycamores—growing abundantly on the low lands of Judea, and though useful for building on account of their antiseptic property (which induced the Egyptians to use them for the cases of their mummies), not very valuable. The cedar, on the other hand, was odorous, free from knots, durable, and precious (1 Kings 10. 27). "We will replace cottages with palaces." 11. adversaries of Rezin

—the Assyrians, who shall first attack Damascus, shall next advance “against him” (Ephraim). This is the punishment of Ephraim’s pride in making light (v. 10) of the judgment already inflicted by God through Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 15, 29). A second Assyrian invasion (Note on the beginning of ch. 7.) shall follow. The reading “princes” for “adversaries” is uncalled for, join—rather, arm; cover with armour. [MAURER.] His—Rezin’s. 12. Syrians—though now allies of Ephraim, after Rezin’s death they shall join the Assyrians against Ephraim. “Together,” in v. 11, refers to this. Conquering nations often enlist in their armies the subject races (ch. 22, 6; cf. 2 Kings 16, 9; Jeremiah 35, 11). [ABEN-EZRA, GESENIUS.] HORSLEY less probably takes “Syrians before,” as the Syrians to the east, i.e., not Rezin’s subjects, but the Assyrians: “Aram” being the common name of Syrians and Assyrians. Philistines—of Palestine. behind—from the west: in marking the points of the compass, Orientalists face the east, which is before them; the west is behind. The right hand is the south; the left, the north. devour—as a ravenous beast (ch. 1, 20; Jeremiah 10, 25; 30, 16; Numbers 14, 9). For all this, &c.—The burden of each strophe. 13-17. Second strophe. turneth not—the design of God’s chastisements. Not fulfilled in their case: a new cause for punishment (Jeremiah 2, 30; 5, 3). 14. head and tail—proverbial for the highest and lowest (Deuteronomy 28, 13, 44). branch and rush—another image for the same thought (ch. 19, 15). The branch is elevated on the top of the tree: the rush is coarse and low. 15. ancient—the elder. honourable—the man of rank. prophet . . . lies . . . tail—there were many such in Samaria (1 Kings 22, 6, 22, 23; cf. as to “tail,” Revelation 9, 19). 16. leaders, &c.—See Margin, and Note, ch. 3, 12. 17. no joy—the parallelism “neither . . . mercy,” shows that this means, He shall have no such delight in their youthful warriors, however much they be the nation’s delight and reliance, as to save them from the enemy’s sword (ch. 31, 8; cf. Jeremiah 18, 21). fatherless, &c.—not even the usual objects of His pity (Psalm 10, 14, 18; 68, 5; Jeremiah 49, 11; Hosea 14, 3) shall be spared. hypocrite—rather, a libertine, polluted. [HORSLEY.] folly—wickedness (Psalm 14, 1). still—notwithstanding all these judgments, more remain. 18-21. Third strophe. burneth—maketh consumption, not only spreading rapidly, but also consuming like fire; sin is its own punishment. bricks . . . thorns—emblem of the wicked; especially those of low rank (ch. 27, 4; 2 Samuel 23, 6). forest—from the humble shivuberry the flame spreads to the vast forest; it reaches the high, as well as the low. mount up like . . . smoke—rather, “They (the thickets of the forest) shall lift themselves proudly aloft [the Hebrew is from a Syriac root, a cock, expressing stateliness of motion, from his strutting gait, HORSLEY], in (in passing into) volumes of ascending smoke.” [MAURER.] 19. darkened—viz., with smoke (v. 18). LXX. and Chaldee render it, is burnt up: so MAURER, from an Arabic root meaning suffocating heat. no man . . . spare . . . brother—Intestine discord snapping asunder the dearest ties of nature. 20. hungry—not literally. Image from unappeasable hunger, to picture internal factions, reckless of the most tender ties (v. 19), and insatiably spreading misery and death on every side (Jeremiah 19, 9). eat—not kill, but destroy (Psalm 27, 2; Job 19, 22). flesh of . . . arm—those nearest akin; their former support (helper) (ch. 32, 2). [MAURER.] 21. Manasseh, Ephraim—The two sons of Joseph. So closely united as to form between them but one tribe; but now about to be rent into factions, thirsting for each other’s blood. Disunited in all things else, but united “together against their brother Judah” (2 Kings 15, 10, 30).

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-4. Fourth strophe. 1. them that decree—viz., unrighteous judges. write grievousness, &c.—not the scribes, but the magistrates who caused unjust decisions (lit., injustice or “grievousness”) to be recorded by them (ch. 65, 6) [MAURER] (ch. 1, 10, 23). 2. To turn aside, &c.—The effect of their conduct is, to pervert the cause of the needy. [HORSLEY.] In English Version “from judgment” means “from obtaining justice.” take away the right—“make plunder of the right” (rightful claim). [HORSLEY.] 3. what will ye do—what way of escape will there be for you? visitation—of God’s wrath (ch. 26, 14; Job 35, 15; Hosea 9, 7). from far—from Assyria. leave . . . glory—rather, “deposit (for safe-keeping) your wealth.” [LOWTH.] So Psalm 49, 17. 4. Without me—Not having me to “flee to” (v. 3). bow down—bereft of strength they shall fall; or else, they shall lie down fettered. under . . . under—rather, amongst (lit., in the place of). [HORSLEY.] The “under” may be, however, explained, “trodden under (the feet of) the prisoners going into captivity,” and “overwhelmed under the heaps of slain on the battle-field.” [MAURER.]

Chapters 10, 5-34, and 11, 12. DESTRUCTION OF THE ASSYRIANS; COMING OF MESSIAH; HYMN OF PRAISE. Verses 9, 11 show that Samaria was destroyed before this prophecy. It was written when Assyria proposed (a design which it soon after tried to carry out under Sennacherib) to destroy Judah and Jerusalem, as it had destroyed Samaria. This is the first part of Isaiah’s prophecies under Hezekiah. Probably between 722 and 715 B. C. (see v. 27). 5. O Assyrian, &c.—rather, “What, ho [but MAURER, Woe to thee], Assyrian! He is the rod and staff of mine anger (my instrument in punishing; Jeremiah 51, 20; Psalm 17, 13). In their hands is mine indignation.” [HORSLEY, after JEROME.] I have put into the Assyrians’ hands the execution of mine indignation against my people. 6. send him—“Kings’ hearts are in the hand of the Lord” (Proverbs 21, 1). hypocritical—polluted. [HORSLEY.] nation—Judah, against whom Sennacherib was forming designs. of my wrath—objects of my wrath. give . . . charge—(Jeremiah 34, 22.) and to tread, &c.—HORSLEY translates, “And then to make him (the Assyrian) a trampling under foot like the mire of the streets” (so v. 12; ch. 33, 1; Zechariah 10, 5). But see ch. 37, 26. 7. meaneth not so—He is only thinking of his own schemes, whilst God is overruling them to His purposes. think—intend. Sinners’ plans are no less culpable, though they by them unconsciously fulfil God’s designs (Psalm 76, 10; Micah 4, 12). So Joseph’s brethren (Genesis 50, 20; Proverbs 16, 4). The sinner’s motive, not the result (which depends on God), will be the test in judgment. heart to destroy . . . not a few—Sennacherib’s ambition was not confined to Judea. His plan was also to conquer Egypt and Ethiopia (ch. 20; Zechariah 1, 15). 8-11. Vauntings of the Assyrians. Illustrated by the self-laudatory inscriptions of Assyria deciphered by HINCKS. princes, . . . kings—Eastern satraps and governors of provinces often had the title and diadem of kings. Hence the title “King of kings,” implying the greatness of him who was over them (Ezekiel 26, 7; Ezra 7, 12). 9. Is not . . . as—Was there any one of these cities able to withstand me? Not one. So Rabshakeh vaunts (ch. 36, 19). Calno—Calneh, built by Nimrod (Genesis 10, 10), once his capital, on the Tigris. Carhemish—Circesus, on the Euphrates. Taken afterwards by Necho, king of Egypt; and retaken by Nebuchadnezzar: by the Euphrates (Jeremiah 46, 2). Hamath—in Syria, north of Canaan (Genesis 10, 18). Taken by Assyria about B. C. 753. From it colonists were planted by Assyria in Samaria. Arpad—near Hamath. Samaria—now overthrown. Damascus—(Ch. 17.) 10, 11. found—unable to resist me: hath overcome (so Psalm 21, 8). and whose—rather, and their. This clause, down to “Samaria,” is parenthetical. excel—were more powerful. He regards Jerusalem as idolatrous, an opinion which it often had given too much ground for: Jehovah was in his view the mere local god of Judea, as Baal of the countries where it was adored, nay, inferior in power to some national gods (ch. 36, 19, 20, 37, 12). See in opposition, ch. 37, 20; 46, 1. As my hand . . . shall I not, as I have—a double protasis. Agitation makes one accumulate sentences. 12. whole work—His entire plan in regard to the punishment of the Jews (v. 5-7). Zion—the royal residence, the court, princes and nobles; as distinguished from “Jerusalem,” the people in general. fruit—the result of, i.e., the plans emanating from. stout—Hebrew, greatness of, i.e., pride of. glory—haughtiness. 13. I am prudent—He ascribes his success to his own prudence, not to God’s providence. removed bounds—sect aside old, and substituted new boundaries of kingdoms at will. A criminal act, as Jehovah Himself had appointed the boundaries of the nations (Deuteronomy 32. 8). treasures—hoarded treasures. [HORSLEY.] put down . . . inhabitants like, &c.—rather, “as a valiant man, I have brought down (from their seats) those seated” (viz., on thrones; as in Psalm 2. 4; 29. 10; 55. 19). The Hebrew for “He that abideth,” is He that sitteth on a throne; otherwise, “I have brought down (as captives into Assyria, which lay lower than Judea; therefore ‘brought down,’ cf. ch. 36. 1, 10), the inhabitants.” [MAURER.] 14. nest—Implying the case with which he carried off before him. left—by the parent bird. none . . . moved . . . wing—Image from an angry bird resisting the robbery of its “nest.” peeped—chirped even low (ch. 8. 19). No resistance was offered me, of deed, or even word. 15. Shall the instrument boast against Him who uses it? Though free in a sense, and carrying out his own plans, the Assyrian was unconsciously carrying out God’s purposes. shaketh it—moves it back and forward. staff . . . lift . . . itself . . . no wood—rather, “as if the staff (man, the instrument of God’s judgments on his fellow-man) should set aside (Him who is) not wood” (not a mere instrument, as man). On “ho wood” cf. Deuteronomy 32. 21, “that which is not God;” ch. 31. 8 shows that God is meant here by “not wood.” [MAURER.] 16. fat ones—(Ch. 5. 17.) The robust and choice soldiers of Assyria (Psalm 78. 31, where “fattest” answers in the parallelism to “chosen,” or “young men,” Margin). leanness—carrying out the image in “fat ones.” Destruction (Psalm 106. 15). Fulfilled (ch. 37. 36). his glory—Assyria’s nobles. So in ch. 5. 13 Margin; ch. 8. 7. kindle—a new image from fire consuming quickly dry materials (Zechariah 12. 6). 17. 18. light of Israel—carrying out the image in the end of v. 16. Jehovah, who is a light to Israel, shall be the “fire” (Deuteronomy 4. 24; Hebrews 12. 29) that shall ignite the thorns (the Assyrians, like dry fuel, a ready prey to flame). thorns, &c. 18. glory of . . . forest—The common soldiers, the princes, officers, &c., all alike together, shall be consumed (Note ch. 9. 18). in one day—(Ch. 37. 36.) fruitful field—lit., Carmel, a rich mountain in the tribe of Asher. Fig. for Sennacherib’s mighty army. Perhaps alluding to his own boasting words about to be uttered (ch. 37. 24), “I will enter the forest of his Carmel.” soul and body—proverbial for utterly; the entire man is made up of soul and body. as when a standard-bearer fainteth—rather, “they shall be as when a sick man (from a Syrian root) wastes away.” Cf. “leanness,” i. e., wasting destruction (v. 16). [MAURER.] Or, “there shall be an entire dissipation, like a perfect melting” (viz., of the Assyrian army). [HORSLEY.] 19. rest—Those who shall survive the destruction of the host. his forest—same image as in v. 18, for the once dense army. child . . . write—so few that a child might count them. 20–23. The effect on the “remnant” (contrasted with the Assyrian remnant, v. 19), viz., those who shall be left after the invasion of Sennacherib, will be a return from dependence on external idolatrous nations, as Assyria and Egypt (2 Kings 18. 21; 16. 7–9), to the God of the theocracy; fulfilled in part in the pious Hezekiah’s days; but from the future aspect under which St. Paul, in Romans 9. 27, 28 (cf. “short work” with “whole work,” v. 12, here), regards the whole prophecy, the “remnant,” “who stay upon the Lord,” probably will receive their fullest realization in the portion of Jews left after that Antichrist shall have been overthrown, who shall “return” unto the Lord (ch. 6. 13; 7. 3; Zechariah 12. 9, 10; 14. 2, 3; Zephaniah 3. 12). 21. mighty God—(ch. 9. 6) the God who shall have evinced such might in destroying Israel’s enemies. As the Assyrians in Sennacherib’s reign did not carry off Judah captive, the returning “remnant” cannot mainly refer to this time. 22. yet—rather in the sense in which St. Paul quotes it (Romans 9. 27), “Though Israel be now numerous as the sand, a remnant only of them shall return”—the great majority shall perish. The reason is added, Because “the consumption (fully completed destruction) is decreed (lit., decided on, brought to an issue), it overfloweth (ch. 30. 28; 8. 8) with justice,” i. e., the infliction of just punishment (ch. 5. 16). [MAURER.] 23. even determined —“A consumption, and whatever is determined,” or decreed. [MAURER.] midst—Zion, the central point of the earth as to Jehovah’s presence. land—Israel. But LXX., “in the whole habitable world.” So English Version (Romans 9. 23), “upon the earth.” 24. Therefore—Return to the main proposition, Assyria’s ultimate punishment, though employed as God’s “rod” to chastise Judea for a time. O my people—God’s tenderness towards His elect nation. after . . . manner of Egypt—as Egypt and Pharaoh oppressed thee. Implying, too, as Israel was nevertheless delivered from them, so now it would be from the Assyrian Sennacherib. The antithesis in v. 26 requires this interpretation. [MAURER.] 25. For—Be not afraid (v. 24), for, &c. indignation . . . cease—the punishments of God against Israel shall be consummated and ended (ch. 26. 20; Daniel 11. 36). “Till the indignation be accomplished,” &c. mine anger—shall turn to their (the Assyrians’) destruction. 26. slaughter of—stroke upon. Midian—(Ch. 9. 4; Judges 7. 25.) as . . . rod was upon . . . sea—rather, understanding stroke from the previous clause, “according to the stroke of His rod upon the Red Sea” (Exodus 14. 16, 26). His “rod” on the Assyrian (v. 24, 26) stands in bold contrast to the Assyrian used as a “rod” to strike others (v. 5). after the manner of Egypt—as He lifted it up against Egypt at the Red Sea. 27. his burden—the Assyrians’ oppression (ch. 9. 3). Judah was still tributary to Assyria; Hezekiah had not yet revolted, as he did in the beginning of Sennacherib’s reign. because of—(Hosea 10. 15.) the anointing—viz., Messiah (Daniel 9. 24). Just as in ch. 9. 4–6, the “breaking of the yoke of the enemies’ “burden and staff” is attributed to Messiah, “For unto us a child is born,” &c., so it is here. MAURER not so well translates, “Because of the fatness,” an image of the Assyrians’ fierce and wanton pride drawn from a well-fed bull tossing off the yoke (Deuteronomy 32. 15). So v. 16 above, and ch. 5. 17, “fat ones.” 28–32. Onward gradual march of Sennacherib’s army towards Jerusalem, and the panic of the inhabitants vividly pictured before the eyes. come to—come upon as a sudden invader (Genesis 34. 27). Aiath—same as Ai (Joshua 7. 2; Nehemiah 7. 32). In the north of Benjamin; so the other towns also; all on the line of march to Jerusalem. Michmash—nine miles north-east of Jerusalem. laid up . . . carriages—He has left his heavier baggage (so “carriages” for the things carried, Acts 21. 15) at Michmash, so as to be more lightly equipped for the siege of Jerusalem. So 1 Samuel 17. 22; 25. 13; 30. 24. [JEROME and MAURER.] 29. passage—The jaws of the wady or defile at Michmash (1 Samuel 13. 23; 14. 4, 5). lodging—their quarters for the night, after having passed the defile which might have been easily guarded against them. Ramah—near Geba; seven miles from Jerusalem. Gibeah of Saul—his birth-place and residence, in Benjamin (1 Samuel 11. 4), distinct from Gibeah of Judah (Joshua 15. 57). 30. daughter of Gallim—Gallim and her sons (Note ch. 1. 8; 2 Kings 19. 21). “Cry aloud in consternation.” Laish—not the town in Dan (Judges 18. 7), but one of the same name near Jerusalem (1 Maccabees 9. 9). Anathoth—three miles from Jerusalem in Benjamin; the birth-place of Jeremiah. “Poor” is applied to it in pity, on account of the impending calamity. Others translate, Answer her, O Anathoth. 31. Madmenah—not the city in Simeon (Joshua 15. 31), but a village near Jerusalem. removed—fled from fear. gather themselves to flee—put their goods in a place of safety.” [MAURER.] 32. that day—lit., “As yet this (one only) day (is allowed to the soldiers for remaining (halting for rest) at Nob;” north-east of Jerusalem on Olivet; a town of the priests (Nehemiah 11. 32). daughter—rightly substituted for the Chetib reading, house. His “shaking his hand” in menace implies that he is now at Nob, within sight of Jerusalem. 30. bough—lit., the beauty of the tree; the beautiful branch. high ones of stature—“the upright stem,” as distinguished from the previous “boughs.” [HORSLEY.] 34. This verse and v. 33 describe the sudden arrest and overthrow of Sennacherib in the height of his success; v. 18, 19; Ezekiel 31. 3, &c., 14, &c., contain the same image; “Lebanon” and its forest are the Assyrian army; the “iron” axe that fells the forest refers to the stroke which destroyed the one hundred and eighty-five thousand Assyrians (2 Kings 19, 35). The "Mighty One" is Jehovah (v. 21; ch. 9, 6).

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-16. From the local and temporary national deliverance the prophet passes by the law of suggestion in an easy transition to the end of all prophecy—the everlasting deliverance under Messiah's reign, not merely His first coming, but chiefly His second coming. The language and illustrations are still drawn from the temporary national subject, with which He begun, but the glories described pertain to Messiah's reign. Hezekiah cannot, as some think, be the subject; for he was already come, whereas the "stem of Jesse" was yet future ("shall come") (cf. Micah 4, 11, &c.; 5, 1, 2; Jeremiah 23, 5, 6; 33, 15, 16; Romans 15, 12). 1. rod—When the proud "boughs" of "Lebanon" (ch. 10, 33, 34, the Assyrians) are lopped, and the vast "forests cut down" amidst all this rage a seemingly humble rod shall come out of Jesse (Messiah), who shall retrieve the injuries done by the Assyrian "rod" to Israel (ch. 10, 5, 6, 18, 19). stem—lit., the stump of a tree cut close by the roots: happily expressing the depressed state of the royal house of David, owing to the hostile storm (ch. 10, 18, 19), when Messiah should arise from it, to raise it to more than its pristine glory. Luke 2, 7 proves this (ch. 53, 2; Note ch. 8, 6; cf. Job 14, 7, 8). Branch—Scion. He is nevertheless also the "root" (v. 10; Revelation 5, 5; 22, 16. "Root and offspring" combines both, Zechariah 3, 8; 6, 12). 2. Spirit of the Lord—JEHOVAH. The Spirit by which the prophets spake; for Messiah was to be a Prophet (ch. 61, 1; Deuteronomy 18, 15, 18). Seven gifts of the Holy Spirit are specified, to imply that the perfection of them was to be in Him. Cf. "the seven Spirits" (Revelation 1, 4), i. e., the Holy Ghost in His perfect fulness: seven being the sacred number. The prophets had only a portion out of the "fulness" in the Son of God (John 1, 16; 3, 34; Colossians 1, 19). rest—permanently; not merely come upon Him (Numbers 11, 25, 26). wisdom—(1 Corinthians 1, 30; Ephesians 1, 17; Colossians 2, 3.) understanding—coupled with "wisdom," being its fruit. Discernment and discrimination (Matthew 22, 18; John 2, 25). counsel . . . might—the faculty of forming counsels, and that of executing them (ch. 28, 29). Counsellor (ch. 9, 6). knowledge—of the deep things of God (Matthew 11, 27). The knowledge of Him gives us true knowledge (Ephesians 1, 17). fear of the Lord—reverential, obedient fear. The first step towards true "knowledge" (Job 28, 28; Psalm 111, 10). 3. make him of quick understanding—lit., "quick-scented in the fear of Jehovah;" endowed with a singular sagacity in discerning the genuine principle of religious fear of God, when it lies dormant in the yet unawakened sinner (Matthew 12, 20; Acts 10; 16, 14). [HORSLEY.] But MAURER, "He shall delight in the fear of God." The Hebrew means to delight in the odours of any thing (Exodus 30, 38; Amos 5, 21); "smell," i. e., delight in. after . . . sight—according to mere external appearances (John 7, 24; 8, 15; James 2, 1; 1 Samuel 16, 7). Herein Messiah is represented a just Judge and Ruler (Deuteronomy 1, 16, 17). reprove—decide, as the parallelism shows. after . . . ears—by mere plausible hearsays, but by the true merits of each case (John 6, 64; Revelation 2, 23). 4. judge—see that impartial justice is done them. reprove—decide. But LOWTH, "work conviction in." "Judge" may mean here "rule," as in Psalm 67, 4. Cf. "meek . . . earth" with Matthew 5, 5, and Revelation 11, 15. earth—its ungodly inhabitants, answering to "the wicked" in the parallel, and in antithesis to the "poor" and "meek," viz., in spirit, the humble pious (Matthew 5, 8). It is at the same time implied that "the earth" will be extraordinarily wicked when He shall come to judge and reign. His reign shall therefore be ushered in with judgments on the apostates (Psalm 2, 9-12; Luke 18, 8; Revelation 2, 27). rod of . . . mouth—condemning sentences which proceed from His mouth against the wicked (Revelation 1, 16; 2, 16; 19, 15, 21). breath of . . . lips—His judicial decisions (ch. 30, 28; Job 15, 30; Revelation 19, 20; 20, 9-12). He as the Word of God (Revelation 19, 13-15) comes to strike that blow which shall decide His claim to the kingdom, previously usurped by Satan, and "the beast" to whom Satan delegates his power. It will be a day of judgment to the Gentile dispensation, as the first coming was to the Jews. Cf. a type of the "rod" (Numbers 17, 2-10). 5. righteousness . . . girdle—(Revelation 1, 13; 19, 11.) The antitypical High Priest (Exodus 28, 4). The girdle secures firmly the rest of the garments (1 Peter 1, 13). So "truth" gives firm consistency to the whole character (Ephesians 5, 14). In ch. 59, 17, "righteousness" is His breastplate. 6. wolf . . . lamb—Each animal is coupled with that one which is its natural prey. A fit state of things under the "Prince of Peace" (ch. 63, 25; Ezekiel 34, 25; Hosea 2, 18). These may be figures for men of corresponding animal-like characters (Ezekiel 22, 27; 38, 13; Jeremiah 5, 6; 13, 23; Matthew 7, 15; Luke 10, 3). Still a literal change in the relations of animals to man and each other, restoring the state in Eden, is a more likely interpretation. Cf. Genesis 2, 19, 20, with Psalm 8, 6-8, which describes the restoration to man, in the person of "the Son of man," of the lost dominion over the animal kingdom of which he had been designed to be the merciful vicegerent under God, for the good of his animal subjects (Romans 8, 19-22). 7. feed—viz., together; taken from the second clause. straw—no longer flesh and blood. 8. play—lit., delight himself in sport. cockatrice—a fabulous serpent supposed to be hatched from the egg of a cock. The Hebrew means a kind of adder, more venomous than the asp. BOCHART supposes the basilisk to be meant, which was thought to poison even with its breath. 9. my holy mountain—Zion, i. e., Jerusalem. The seat of government and of Messiah's throne is put for the whole earth (Jeremiah 3, 17). sea—As the waters find their way into every cavern of its depths, so Christianity shall pervade every recess of the earth (Habakkuk 2, 14). As v. 1-5 describe the personal qualities of Messiah, and v. 6-9 the regenerating effects of His coming on creation, so v. 10-16 the results of it in the restoration of His people the Jews, and the conversion through them of the Gentiles. 10. root—rather, shoot from the root (cf. Note v. 1; ch. 53, 2; Revelation 5, 5; 22, 16). stand—permanently and prominently, as a banner lifted up to be the rallying-point of an army or people (ch. 5, 26; John 12, 32). the people—peoples, answering to "the Gentiles" in the parallel member, to it . . . seek—diligently (Job 8, 5). They shall give in their allegiance to the Divine King (ch. 2, 2; 60, 5; Zechariah 2, 11). HORSLEY translates, "Of Him shall the Gentiles inquire; viz., in a religious sense, resort as to an oracle for consultation in difficulties (Zechariah 14, 16). Cf. Romans 15, 12, which quotes this passage, "In Him shall the Gentiles trust." rest—resting-place (ch. 60, 13; Psalm 132, 8, 14; Ezekiel 43, 7). The sanctuary in the temple of Jerusalem was "the resting-place of the ark and of Jehovah." So the glorious Church which is to be is described under the image of an oracle to which all nations shall resort, and which shall be filled with the visible glory of God. 11. set . . . hand—take in hand the work. the second time—Therefore the coming restoration of the Jews is to be distinct from that after the Babylonish captivity, and yet to resemble it. The first restoration was literal, therefore so shall the second be; the latter, however, it is implied here, shall be much more universal than the former (ch. 43, 5-7; 49, 12, 17, 18; Ezekiel 37, 21; Hosea 3, 5; Amos 9, 14, 15; Micah 4, 6, 7; Zephaniah 3, 19, 20; Zechariah 10, 10; Jeremiah, 23, 8). Pathros—one of the three divisions of Egypt, Upper Egypt. Cush—either Ethiopia, south of Egypt, now Abyssinia, or the southern parts of Arabia, along the Red Sea. Elam—Persia, especially the southern part of it now called Susiana. Shinar—Babylonian Mesopotamia, the plain between Euphrates and the Tigris: in it Babel was begun (Genesis 10, 1). In the Assyrian inscriptions RAWLINSON distinguishes three periods: 1. The Chaldean; from 2300 B. C. to 1500, in which falls Chedorloamer (Genesis 14), called in the cuneiform characters Kudur of Hur, or Ur of the Chaldees, and described as the conqueror of Syria. The seat of the first Chaldean empire was in the south, towards the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates. 2. The Assyrian, down to 625 B. C. 3. The Babylonian, from 625 to 538 B. C., when

Babylon was taken by the Persian Cyrus. islands of . . . sea—the far western regions beyond the sea. [JEROME.] As to the "remnant" destined by God to survive the judgments on the nation (cf. Jeremiah 46, 28). 12. In the first restoration Judah alone was restored, with perhaps some few of Israel (the ten tribes): in the future restoration both are expressly specified (Ezekiel 37, 16-19; Jeremiah 3, 18). To Israel are ascribed the "outcasts" (masculine); to Judah the "dispersed" (feminine), as the former have been longer and more utterly cast-aways (though not finally) than the latter (John 7, 52). The masculine and feminine conjoined express the universality of the restoration. 13. envy . . . of Ephraim . . . Judah—which began as early as the time (Judges 8, 1; 12, 1, &c.) Joshua had sprung from, and resided among the Ephraimites (Numbers 13, 9; Joshua 19, 50); and the sanctuary was with them for a time (Joshua 18, 1). The jealousy increased subsequently (2 Samuel 2, 8, &c.; 19, 41; 20, 2; 3, 10); and even before David's time (1 Samuel 11, 8; 15, 4), they had appropriated to themselves the national name Israel. It ended in disruption (1 Kings 11, 26, &c.; 12; cf. 2 Kings 14, 9; Psalm 78, 56-71). adversaries of Judah—rather, "the adversaries from Judah;" those of Judah hostile to the Ephraimites. [MAURER.] The parallelism "the envy of Ephraim," viz., against Judah, requires this, as also what follows, viz., "Judah shall not vex Ephraim" (Ezekiel 37, 15, 17, 19). 14. With united forces they shall subdue their foes (Amos 9, 12). fly—as a bird of prey (Habakkuk 1, 8). upon the shoulders—this expresses an attack made unexpectedly on one from behind. The image is the more apt, as the Hebrew for shoulders in Numbers 34, 11 is used also of a maritime coast. They shall make a sudden victorious descent upon their borders south-west of Judea. them of the East—Hebrew, children of the East, the Arabs, who, always hostile, are not to be reduced under regular government, but are only to be despoiled (Jeremiah 49, 28, 29). lay . . . hand upon—take possession of (Daniel 11, 42). Edom—south of Judah, from the Dead Sea to the Red Sea. Moab—east of Jordan and the Dead Sea. Ammon—east of Judea, north of Moab, between the Arnon and Jabbok. 15. There shall be a second exodus, destined to eclipse even the former one from Egypt in its wonders. So the prophecies elsewhere (Psalm 68, 22; Exodus 14, 22; Zechariah 10, 11). The same deliverance furnishes the imagery by which the return from Babylon is described (ch. 43, 20, 21). destroy—lit., devote, or doom, i. e., dry up: for what God dooms, perishes (Psalm 106, 9; Nahum 1, 4). tongue of the Egyptian Sea—the Eubastic branch of the Nile [VITRENGA]; but as the Nile was not the obstruction to the exodus, it is rather the west tongue or Heroöpolite fork of the Red Sea. with . . . mighty wind—such as the "strong east wind" (Exodus 14, 21), by which God made a way for Israel through the Red Sea. The Hebrew for "mighty" means terrible. MAURER translates, "With the terror of His anger;" i. e., His terrible anger. in the seven streams—rather, "shall smite it (divide it by smiting) into seven (many) streams, so as to be easily crossed." [LOWTH.] So Cyrus divided the river Gyndes which retarded his march against Babylon, into 360 streams, so that even a woman could cross it (HERODOTUS, 1, 189). "The river" is the Euphrates, the obstruction to Israel's return "from Assyria" (v. 16), a type of all future impediments to the restoration of the Jews. dry shod—Hebrew, in shoes. Even in sandals they should be able to pass over the once mighty river without being wet (Revelation 16, 12). 16. highway—clear of obstructions (ch. 19, 23; 35, 8). like as . . . Israel . . . Egypt—(Ch. 51, 10, 11; 63, 12, 13.)

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-6. THANKSGIVING-HYMN OF THE RESTORED AND CONVERTED JEWS. Just as Miriam, after the deliverance of the Red Sea (ch. 11, 16), celebrated it with an ode of praise (Exodus 15). 2. Lord Jehovah—Jah, Jehovah. The repetition of the name denotes emphasis, and the unchangeableness of God's character. strength . . . song . . . salvation—derived from Exodus 15, 2; Psalm 118, 14.

The idea of salvation was peculiarly associated with the feast of tabernacles (see v. 3). Hence the cry "Hosanna," "Save, we beseech thee," that accompanied Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem on that day (the fifteenth of the seventh month) (Matthew 21, 9; cf. with Psalm 118, 25, 26); the earnest of the perfected "salvation" which He shall bring to His people at His glorious second appearance at Jerusalem (Hebrews 9, 28). "He shall appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Cf. Revelation 21, 3, "The tabernacle of God is with men." Cf. Luke 9, 33, "three tabernacles: one for thee," &c. (the transfiguration being a pledge of the future kingdom), (Psalm 118, 15; Zechariah 14, 16). As the Jew was reminded by the feast of tabernacles of his wanderings in tents in the wilderness, so the Jew-Gentile Church to come shall call to mind, with thanksgiving, the various past ways whereby God has at last brought them to the heavenly "city of habitation" (Psalm 107, 7). 3. draw water . . . salvation—an expressive image in a hot country. On the last day of the feast of tabernacles the Jews used to bring water in a golden pitcher from the fountain of Siloam, and pour it, mingled with wine, on the sacrifice on the altar, with great rejoicing. This is the allusion in Jesus' words on "the last day of the feast" (John 7, 2, 37-39). The pouring out of water indicated repentance (1 Samuel 7, 6; cf. as to the Jews' repentance hereafter, Zechariah 12, 10). There shall be a later outpouring of the Spirit like the former one on pentecost (Joel 2, 28). wells—not mere streams, which may run dry, but ever-flowing fountains (John 4, 14; 7, 38), "Out of his belly (i. e., in and from himself)—living water" (ch. 42, 18; Psalm 84, 6; Zechariah 13, 1; Revelation 7, 17). 4. make mention—Hebrew, cause it to be remembered. 5. Sing, &c.—alluding to Exodus 15, 21. 6. inhabitant of Zion—Hebrew, inhabitant: so "daughter of Zion," i. e., Zion and its people, in the midst of thee—of Jerusalem literally (Jeremiah 3, 17; Ezekiel 48, 35; Zephaniah 3, 15, 17; Zechariah 2, 10).

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-22. CHAP. 13-23. CONTAIN PROPHECIES AS TO FOREIGN NATIONS.—CHAP. 13, 14, AND 27, AS TO BABYLON AND ASSYRIA. The predictions as to foreign nations are for the sake of the covenant people, to preserve them from despair, or reliance on human confederacies, and to strengthen their faith in God: also in order to extirpate narrow-minded nationality: God is Jehovah to Israel, not for Israel's sake alone, but that He may be thereby Elohim to the nations. These prophecies are in their right chronological place, in the beginning of Hezekiah's reign; then first the nations of Western Asia, on the Tigris and Euphrates, assumed a most menacing aspect. 1. burden—weighty or mournful prophecy. [GROTIUS.] Otherwise, simply, the prophetic declaration, from a Hebrew root to put forth with the voice anything, as in Numbers 23, 7. [MAURER.] of Babylon—concerning Babylon. 2. Lift . . . banner—(Ch. 5, 26; 11, 10.) the high mountain—rather, "a bare (lit., bald, i. e., without trees) mountain:" from it the banner could be seen afar off, so as to rally together the peoples against Babylon. unto them—unto the Medes (v. 17), the assailants of Babylon. It is remarkable that Isaiah does not foretell here the Jews' captivity in Babylon, but presupposes that event, and throws himself beyond, predicting another event still more future, the overthrow of the city of Israel's oppressors. It was now 174 years before the event. shake . . . hand—beckon with the hand—wave the hand to direct the nations to march against Babylon. nobles—Babylonian. Rather, in a bad sense, tyrants; as in ch. 14, 5, "rulers" in parallelism to "the wicked;" and Job 21, 28. [MAURER.] 3. sanctified ones—the Median and Persian soldiers solemnly set apart by me for the destruction of Babylon, not inwardly "sanctified," but designated to fulfil God's holy purpose (Jeremiah 51, 27, 28; Joel 3, 9, 11; where the Hebrew for prepare war is sanctify war), for mine anger—to execute it, rejoice in my highness—"Those who are made to triumph for my honour." [HORSLEY.] The heathen Medes could not be said to "rejoice in God's highness." MAURER translates, "My haughtily exulting ones" (Zephaniah 3. 11); a special characteristic of the Persians (HERODOTUS, l. 88). They rejoiced in their own highness, but it was His that they were unconsciously glorifying. 4. the mountains—viz., which separate Media and Assyria, and on one of which the banner to rally the hosts is supposed to be reared. tumultuous noise—The Babylonians are vividly depicted as hearing some unwonted sound like the din of a host; they try to distinguish the sounds, but can only perceive a tumultuous noise. nations—Medes, Persians, and Armenians composed Cyrus' army. 5. They—viz., "Jehovah," and the armies which are "the weapons of His indignation." far country—Media and Persia, stretching to the far north and east, end of heaven—the far east (Psalm 19. 6). destroy—rather, to seize. [HORSLEY.] 6. day of the Lord—day of His vengeance on Babylon (ch. 2. 12). Type of the future "day of wrath" (Revelation 6. 17). destruction—lit., a devastating tempest. from the Almighty—not from mere man; therefore irresistible. "Almighty," Hebrew, Shaddai. 7. faint . . . melt—So Jeremiah 50. 43; cf. Joshua 7. 5. Babylon was taken by surprise on the night of Belshazzar's impious feast (Daniel 5. 30). Hence the sudden fainting and melting of hearts. 8. pangs—The Hebrew means also a messenger. HORSLEY, therefore, with LXX., translates, "The heralds (who bring word of the unexpected invasion) are terrified." MAURER agrees with English Version, lit., "they shall take hold of pangs and sorrows." woman . . . travaileth—(1 Thessalonians 5. 3.) amazed—the stupid, bewildered gaze of consternation. faces . . . flames—"their visages have the livid hue of flame" [HORSLEY]; with anguish and indignation. 9. cruel—not strictly, but unsparingly just; opposed to mercy. Also answering to the cruelty (in the strict sense) of Babylon towards others (ch. 14. 17), now about to be visited on itself. the land—"the earth." [HORSLEY.] The language from v. 9 to v. 13 can only primarily and partially apply to Babylon; fully and exhaustively, the judgments to come, hereafter, on the whole earth. Cf. v. 10 with Matthew 24. 29; Revelation 8. 12. The sins of Babylon, arrogancy (v. 11; ch. 14. 11; 47. 7, 8), cruelty, false worship (Jeremiah 50. 38), persecution of the people of God (ch. 47. 6), are peculiarly characteristic of the Antichristian world of the latter days (Daniel 11. 32-37; Revelation 17. 3, 6; 18. 6, 7, 9-14, 24). 10. stars, &c.—fig. for anarchy, distress, and revolutions of kingdoms (ch. 34. 4; Joel 2. 10; Ezekiel 32. 7, 8; Amos 8. 9; Revelation 6. 12-14). There may be a literal fulfilment finally, shadowed forth under this imagery (Revelation 21. 1). constellations—Hebrew, a fool, or impious one; applied to the constellation Orion, who was represented as an impious giant (Nimrod deified, the founder of Babylon) chained to the sky. See Note, Job 38. 31. 11. world—the impious of the world (cf. ch. 11. 4). arrogancy—Babylon's besetting sin (Daniel 4. 22. 30). the terrible—rather, tyrants. [HORSLEY.] 12. man . . . precious—I will so cut off Babylon's defenders, that a single man shall be as rare and precious as the finest gold. 13. Image of mighty revolutions (ch. 24. 19; 34. 4; Habakkuk 3. 6, 10; Haggai 2. 6, 7; Revelation 20. 11). 14. it—Babylon. roe—gazelle; the most timid and easily startled. no man taketh up—sheep defenceless, without a shepherd (Zechariah 13. 7). every man . . . to his own people—the "mingled peoples" of foreign lands shall flee out of her (Jeremiah 50. 16, 23, 37; 51. 9). 15. found—in the city. joined—"intercepted." [MAURER.] "Every one that has withdrawn himself," viz., to hide in the houses. [GENSENIUS.] 16. (Psalm 137. 8, 9). 17. Medes—(Ch. 21. 2; Jeremiah 51. 11, 23.) At that time they were subject to Assyria; subsequently Arbaces, satrap of Media, revolted against the effeminate Sardanapalus, king of Assyria, destroyed Nineveh, and became king of Media, in the ninth century B. C. not regard silver—in vain will one try to buy his life from them for a ransom. The heathen Xenophon (Cyrop. 5. 1, 10) represents Cyrus as attributing this characteristic to the Medes, disregard of riches. A curious confirmation of this prophecy. 18. bows—in the use of which the Persians were particularly skilled. 19. glory of kingdoms—(Ch. 14. 4; 47. 5; Jeremiah 51. 41.) beauty of . . . excellency—Hebrew, the glory of the pride of the Chaldees; it was their glory and boast. as . . . Gomorrah—as utterly (Jeremiah 49. 18; 50. 40; Amos 4. 11). Taken by Cyrus, by clearing out the canal made for emptying the superfluous waters of the Euphrates, and directing the river into this new channel, so that he was able to enter the city by the old bed in the night. 20. lit., fulfilled. neither . . . Arabian pitch . . . tent—not only shall it not be a permanent residence, but not even a temporary resting-place. The Arabs, through dread of evil spirits, and believing the ghost of Nimrod to haunt it, will not pass the night there (cf. v. 21). neither . . . shepherds—the region was once most fertile; but owing to the Euphrates being now no longer kept within its former channels, it has become a stagnant marsh, unfit for flocks; and on the wastes of its ruins, bricks and cement, no grass grows. 21. wild beasts—Hebrew, tsiyim, animals dwelling in arid wastes. Wild cats, remarkable for their howl. [BOCHART.] doleful creatures—howling beasts, lit., "howlings." [MAURER.] owls—rather, ostriches; a timorous creature, delighting in solitary deserts, and making a hideous noise. [BOCHART.] satyrs—sylvan demi-gods—half man, half goat—believed by the Arabs to haunt those ruins; probably animals of the goat-ape species. [VITRINGA.] Devil-worshippers, who dance amidst the ruins on a certain night. [J. WOLFF.] 22. wild beasts of the islands—rather, jackals; called by the Arabs sons of howling; an animal standing midway between a fox and a wolf. [BOCHART and MAURER.] cry—rather, answer, respond to each other, as wolves do at night, producing a most dismal effect. dragons—serpents of various species, which hiss and utter dolorous sounds. Fable gave them wings, because they stand with much of the body elevated and then dart swiftly. MAURER understands here another species of jackal. her time . . . near—though 174 years distant, yet "near" to Isaiah, who is supposed to be speaking to the Jews as if now captives in Babylon (ch. 14. 1, 2).

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-3. THE CERTAINTY OF DELIVERANCE FROM BABYLON. 4-23. THE JEWS' TRIUMPHAL SONG THEREAT. "It moves in lengthened elegiac measure like a song of lamentation for the dead, and is full of lofty scorn." [HERDER.] 24-27. CONFIRMATION OF THIS BY THE HEREFORTOLD DESTRUCTION OF THE ASSYRIANS UNDER SENACHERIB; a pledge to assure the captives in Babylon that He who, with such ease, overthrew the Assyrian, could likewise effect His purpose as to Babylon. The Babylonian king, the subject of this prediction, is Belshazzar, as representative of the kingdom (Daniel 5). 1. choose—set His choice upon. A deliberate predilection. [HORSLEY.] Their restoration is grounded on their election (see Psalm 102. 13-22). strangers—proselytes (Esther 8. 17; Acts 2. 10; 17. 4, 17). Tacitus, a heathen (Hist. 5. 5), attests the fact of numbers of the Gentiles having become Jews in his time. An earnest of the future effect on the heathen world of the Jews' spiritual restoration (ch. 60. 4, 5, 10; Micah 5. 7; Zechariah 14. 16; Romans 11. 12). 2. the people—of Babylon, primarily. Of the whole Gentile world ultimately (ch. 49. 22; 66. 20; 60. 9). their place—Judea (Ezra 1). possess—receive in possession. captives—not by physical, but by moral might; the force of love, and regard to Israel's God (ch. 60. 14). 3. rest—(Ch. 28. 12; Ezekiel 28. 25, 26.)

4-8. A CHORUS OF JEWS EXPRESS THEIR JOYFUL SURPRISE AT BABYLON'S DOWNFALL:—the whole earth rejoices; the cedars of Lebanon taunt him. 4. proverb—The Orientals, having few books, embodied their thoughts in weighty, figurative, briefly-expressed gnomes. Here a taunting song of triumph (Micah 2. 4; Habakkuk 2. 6). the king—the ideal representative of Babylon; perhaps Belshazzar (Daniel 5). The mystical Babylon is ultimately meant. golden city—rather, the exactress of gold. [MAURER.] But the old translators read differently in the Hebrew, oppression, which the parallelism favours (cf. ch. 3. 5). 5. staff—not the sceptre (Psalm 2. 9), but the staff with which one strikes others, as he is speaking of more tyrants than one (ch. 9. 4; 10. 24; 14. 29). [MAURER.] rulers—tyrants, 13

the parallelism "the wicked" proves (cf. ch. 13, 2, Note). 6. people—the peoples subjected to Babylon. is persecuted—the Hebrew is rather active, "which persecuted them, without any to hinder him." [VULGATE, JEROME, and HORSLEY.] 7. they—the once subject nations of the whole earth. HUBBARD places the stop after "fir trees" (v. 8), "The very fir trees break forth," &c. But the parallelism is better in English Version. 8. the fir trees—now left undisturbed. Probably a kind of evergreen. rejoice at thee—(Psalm 96, 12.) At thy fall (Psalm 35, 19, 24). no feller—as formerly, when thou wast in power (ch. 10, 34; 37, 24).

9-11. The scene changes from earth to hell. Hades (the Amenthes of Egypt), the unseen abode of the departed; some of its tenants, once mighty monarchs, are represented by a bold personification as rising from their seats in astonishment at the descent among them of the humbled king of Babylon. This proves, in opposition to Warburton, Div. Leg., that the belief existed among the Jews, that there was a Sheol or Hades, in which the "Rephaim" or manes of the departed abode. 9. moved—put into agitation. for thee—i. e., at thee; towards thee; explained by "to meet thee at thy coming." [MAURER.] chief ones—lit., goats; so rams, leaders of the flock; princes (Zechariah 10, 3). The idea of wickedness on a gigantic scale is included (Ezekiel 34, 17; Matthew 25, 32, 33). MAGEE derives Rephaim (English Version, "the dead") from a Hebrew root, to resolve into first elements; so the deceased (ch. 26, 14) ghosts (Proverbs 21, 16). These being magnified by the imagination of the living into gigantic stature, gave their name to giants in general (Genesis 6, 4; 14, 5; Ezekiel 32, 18, 21). "Rephaim," translated in LXX., giants (cf. Note, Job 26, 5, 6). Thence, as the giant Rephaim of Canaan were notorious even in that guilty land, enormous wickedness became connected with the term. So the Rephaim came to be the wicked spirits in Gehenna, the lower of the two portions into which Sheol is divided. 10. They taunt him, and derive from his calamity consolation under their own (Ezekiel 31, 16). weak—as a shade bereft of blood and life. Rephaim, "the dead," may come from a Hebrew root, meaning similarly feeble, powerless. The speech of the departed closes with the next verse. 11. "Pomp" and music, the accompaniment of Babylon's former feastings (ch. 5, 12; 24, 8), give place to the corruption and the stillness of the grave (Ezekiel 32, 27). worm—that is bred in putridity. worms—properly those from which the crimson dye is obtained. Appropriate here; instead of the crimson coverlet, over thee shall be "worms." Instead of the gorgeous couch, "under thee" shall be the maggot.

12-15. The Jews address him again as a fallen once-bright star. The language is so framed as to apply to the Babylonian king primarily, and at the same time to shadow forth through him, the great final enemy, the man of sin, Antichrist, of Daniel, St. Paul, and St. John; he alone shall fulfil exhaustively all the lineaments here given. 12. Lucifer—day star. A title truly belonging to Christ (Revelation 22, 16), "the bright and morning star," and therefore hereafter to be assumed by Antichrist. GESENIUS, however, renders the Hebrew here as in Ezekiel 21, 12; Zechariah 11, 2, howl. weaken—prostrate; as in Exodus 17, 13, "discomfit." 13. above . . . God—In Daniel 8, 10, "stars" express earthly potentates. "The stars" are often also used to express heavenly principalities (Job 38, 7). mount of congregation—the place of solemn meeting between God and His people in the temple at Jerusalem. In Daniel 11, 37, and 2 Thessalonians 2, 4, this is attributed to Antichrist, sides of . . . north—viz., the sides of Mount Moriah on which the temple was built; north of Mount Zion (Psalm 48, 2). However, the parallelism supports the notion that the Babylonian king expresses himself according to his own, and not Jewish opinions (so in ch. 10, 10), thus "mount of the congregation" will mean the northern mountain (perhaps in Armenia) fabled by the Babylonians to be the common meeting-place of their gods. "Both sides" imply the angle in which the sides meet; and so the expression comes to mean "the extreme parts of the north." So the Hindoos place the Meru, the dwelling-place of their gods, in the north, in the Himalayan mountains. So the Greeks, in the northern Olympus. The Persian followers of Zoroaster put the Ai-bordsch in the Caucasus north of them. The allusion to the stars harmonizes with this, viz., that those near the North Pole, the region of the aurora borealis (cf. Note, Job 23, 9; 37, 22). [MAURER, LXX., SYRIAC.] 14. clouds—rather, the cloud, singular. Perhaps there is a reference to the cloud, the symbol of the Divine presence (ch. 4, 5; Exodus 13, 21). So this tallies with 2 Thessalonians 2, 4, "above all that is called God;" as here "above . . . the cloud;" and as the shechinah-cloud was connected with the temple, there follows, "he as God sitteth in the temple of God," answering to "I will be like the Most High" here. Moreover, Revelation 17, 4, 5, represents Antichrist as seated in BABYLON, to which city, literal and spiritual, Isaiah refers here. 15. to hell—to Sheol (v. 6), thou who hast said, "I will ascend into heaven" (Matthew 11, 23). sides of the pit—antithetical to the "sides of the north" (v. 13). Thus the reference is to the sides of the sepulchre round which the dead were ranged in niches. But MAURER here, as in v. 13, translates, "the extreme," or innermost parts of the sepulchre; as in Ezekiel 32, 23 (cf. 1 Samuel 24, 3).

16-20. The passers-by contemplate with astonishment the body of the king of Babylon cast out, instead of lying in a splendid mausoleum, and can hardly believe their senses that it is he. 16. narrowly look—to be certain they are not mistaken. consider—"meditate upon." [HORSLEY.] 17. opened not . . . house . . . prisoners—But MAURER, as Margin, "Did not let his captives loose homewards." 18. All—i. e., This is the usual practice. in glory—in a grand mausoleum. house—i. e., sepulchre, as in Ecclesiastes 12, 5; "grave" (v. 19). To be excluded from the family sepulchre was a mark of infamy (ch. 34, 3; Jeremiah 22, 19; 1 Kings 13, 22; 2 Chronicles 21, 20; 24, 25; 28, 27). 19. cast out of—not that he had lain in the grave and was then cast out of it, but "cast out without a grave," such as might have been expected by thee ("thy"). branch—a useless sucker starting up from the root of a tree, and cut away by the husbandman. raiment of those slain—covered with gore, and regarded with abhorrence as unclean by the Jews. Rather, "clothed (i. e., covered) with the slain;" as Job 7, 5, "My flesh is clothed with worms and clods of dust." [MAURER.] thrust through—i. e., "the slain who have been thrust through," &c. stones of . . . pit—whose bodies are buried in sepulchres excavated amidst stones, whereas the king of Babylon is an unburied "carcass trodden under foot." 20. not . . . joined with them—whereas the princes slain with thee shall be buried, thou shalt not. thou . . . destroyed . . . land—Belshazzar (or Naboned) oppressed his land with wars and tyranny, so that he was much hated (Xenophon, Cyrop. 4, 6, 3; 7, 5, 32). seed . . . never be renewed—rather, "shall not be named for ever;" the Babylonian dynasty shall end with Belshazzar; his family shall not be perpetuated. [HORSLEY.]

21-23. God's determination to destroy Babylon. 21. prepare, &c.—charge to the Medes and Persians, as if they were God's conscious instruments. his children—Belshazzar's (Exodus 20, 5). rise—to occupy the places of their fathers. fill . . . with cities—MAURER translates, "enemies," as the Hebrew means in 1 Samuel 28, 16; Psalm 139, 20, viz., lest they inundate the world with their armies. VITRINGA translates, "disturbers." In English Version the meaning is, "lest they fill the land with such cities" of pride as Babylon was. 22. against them—the family of the king of Babylon. name—all the male representatives, so that the name shall become extinct (ch. 56, 5; Ruth 4, 5). remnant—all that is left of them. The dynasty shall cease (Daniel 5, 28-31). Cf. as to Babylon in general, Jeremiah 51, 62. 23. bitter—rather the hedgehog. [MAURER and GESENIUS.] Strabo (16. 1) states that enormous hedgehogs were found in the islands of the Euphrates. pools—owing to Cyrus turning the waters of the Euphrates over the country. besom—sweep-net. [MAURER.] (1 Kings 14, 10; 2 Kings 21, 13.)

24-27. A FRAGMENT OF THE DESTRUCTION OF THE ASSYRIANS UNDER SENSACHERIB. This would comfort the Jews when captives in Babylon, being a pledge that God, who had by that time fulfilled the promise concerning Sennacherib (though now still future), would also fulfil His promise as to destroying Babylon, Judah's enemy. In this v. 24 the Lord's thought (purpose) stands in antithesis to the Assyrians' thoughts (ch. 10, 7). (See ch. 46, 10, 11; 1 Samuel 15, 29; Malachi 3, 6.) 25. That—my purpose, namely, "that." break . . . yoke—(Ch. 10, 27.) my mountains—Sennacherib's army was destroyed on the mountains near Jerusalem (ch. 10, 33, 34). God regarded Judah as peculiarly His. 26. This is . . . purpose . . . whole earth—a hint that the prophecy embraces the present world of all ages in its scope, of which the purpose concerning Babylon and Assyria, the then representatives of the world-power, is but a part. land . . . stretched out upon—viz., in punishment (ch. 5, 25). 27. (Daniel 4, 35.)

28-32. PROPHECY AGAINST PHILISTIA. To comfort the Jews, lest they should fear that people; not in order to call the Philistines to repentance, since the prophecy was probably never circulated among them. They had been subdued by Uzziah or Azariah (2 Chronicles 26, 6); but in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chronicles 28, 18) they took several towns in south Judea. Now Isaiah denounces their final subjugation by Hezekiah. 28. In . . . year . . . Ahaz died—726 B. C. Probably it was in this year that the Philistines threw off the yoke put on them by Uzziah. 29. Palestina—lit., The land of sojourners. rod . . . broken—the yoke imposed by Uzziah (2 Chronicles 26, 6) was thrown off under Ahaz (2 Chronicles 28, 18). serpent's root—the stock of Jesse (ch. 11, 1). Uzziah was doubtless regarded by the Philistines as a biting "serpent." But though the effects of his bite have been got rid of, a more deadly viper, or "cockatrice" (lit., viper's offspring, as Philistia would regard him), viz., Hezekiah awaits you (2 Kings 18, 8). 30. first-born of . . . poor—Hebraism, for the most object poor; the first-born being the foremost of the family. 31. "first-born of death" (Job 18, 13), for the most fatal Arach. The Jews, heretofore exposed to Philistine invasions and alarms, shall be in safety. Cf. Psalm 72, 4, "Children of the needy," expressing those "needy in condition." feed—image from a flock feeding in safety. root—radical destruction. He shall slay—Jehovah shall. The change of person, He after I, is a common Hebraism. 31. gate—i. e., ye who throng the gate; the chief place of concourse in a city. from . . . north—Judea, north and east of Palestine. smoke—from the signal-fire, whereby a hostile army was called together (the Jews' signal-fire is meant here, the "pillar of cloud and fire," Exodus 13, 21; Nehemiah 9, 19); or else from the region devastated by fire. [MAURER.] GESENIUS less probably refers it to the cloud of dust raised by the invading army. none . . . alone . . . in . . . appointed times—Rather, "There shall not be a straggler among his (the enemy's) levies." The Jewish host shall advance on Palestine in close array; none shall fall back or lag from weariness (ch. 5, 26, 27). [LOWTH.] MAURER thinks the Hebrew will not bear the lowering levies or armies. He translates, "There is not one (of the Philistine watch-guards) who will remain alone (exposed to the enemy) at his post," through fright. On "alone," cf. Psalm 102, 7; Hosea 8, 9. 32. messengers of the nation—When messengers come from Philistia to inquire as to the state of Judea, the reply shall be, that the Lord, &c. (Psalm 87, 1, 5; 102, 16). poor—(Zephaniah 3, 12.)

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 1-9. CHAPS. 15. and 16. FORM ONE PROPHECY ON MOAB. LOWTH thinks it was delivered in the first years of Hezekiah's reign, and fulfilled in the fourth, when Shalmaneser, on his way to invade Israel, may have seized on the strongholds of Moab. Moab probably had made common cause with Israel and Syria in a league against Assyria. Hence it incurred the vengeance of Assyria. Jeremiah has introduced much of this prophecy into his 48th chapter. 1. Because—Rather, Surely; lit. (I affirm), that. [MAURER.] night—the time best suited for a hostile incursion (ch. 21, 4; Jeremiah 39, 4). Ar—meaning in Hebrew, The city; the metropolis of Moab, on the south of the river Arnon. Kir—lit., A citadel; not far from Ar, towards the south. 2. He—Moab personified. Bajith—Rather, "to the temple" [MAURER]; answering to the "sanctuary" (ch. 16, 12), in a similar context. to Dibon—Rather, as Dibon was in a plain north of the Arnon, "Dibon (is gone up) to the high places," the usual places of sacrifice in the East. Same town as Dimon (v. 9). to weep—at the sudden calamity. over Nebo—Rather "in Nebo;" not on account of Nebo (cf. v. 3). [MAURER.] The town Nebo was adjacent to the mountain, not far from the northern shore of the Dead Sea. There it was that Chemosh, the idol of Moab, was worshipped (cf. Deuteronomy 34, 1). Medeba—South of Heshbon, on a hill east of Jordan. baldness . . . beard cut off—The Orientals regarded the beard with peculiar veneration. To cut one's beard off is the greatest mark of sorrow and mortification (cf. Jeremiah 48, 37). 3. tops of . . . houses—flat; places of resort for prayer, &c., in the East (Acts 10, 9). weeping abundantly—"melting away in tears." HORSLEY prefers "descending to weep." Thus there is a "parallelism by alternate construction" [LOWTH], or chiasmus; "howl" refers to "tops of houses," "Descending to weep" to "streets" or squares, whither they descend from the house tops. 4. Heshbon—an Amorite city, twenty miles east of Jordan; taken by Moab after the carrying away of Israel (cf. Jeremiah 48, 3). Elealeh—near Heshbon, in Reuben. Jahaz—East of Jordan, in Reuben. Near it Moses defeated Sihon. therefore—because of the sudden overthrow of their cities. Even the armed men, instead of fighting in defence of their land, shall join in the general cry. life, &c.—rather, "his soul is grieved" (1 Samuel 1, 8). [MAURER.] 5. My—The prophet himself is moved with pity for Moab. Ministers, in denouncing the wrath of God against sinners, should do it with tender sorrow, not with exultation. fugitives—fleeing from Moab, wander as far as to Zoar, on the extreme boundary south of the Dead Sea. HORSLEY translates, her nobility, or "rulers" (Hosea 4, 18). heifer, &c.—i. e., raising their voices "like a heifer" (cf. Jeremiah 48, 34, 36). The expression "three years old," implies one at its full vigour (Genesis 15, 9), as yet not brought under the yoke; as Moab heretofore unsubdued, but now about to be broken. So Jeremiah 31, 18; Hosea 4, 13. MAURER translates, "Eglath (in English Version, "a heifer") Shelishijah" (i. e., the third, to distinguish it from two others of the same name). by the mounting up—up the ascent. Luhith—a mountain in Moab. Horonaim—a town of Moab not far from Zoar (Jeremiah 48, 5). It means the two poles, being near caves. cry of destruction—a cry appropriate to the destruction which visits their country. 6. For—The cause of their flight southwards (2 Kings 3, 19, 25). For the northern regions and even the city Nimrim (the very name of which means limpid waters, in Gilead near Jordan) are without water or herbage. 7. Therefore—Because of the devastation of the land. abundance—lit., that which is over and above the necessities of life. brook of . . . willows The fugitives flee from Nimrim, where the waters have failed, to places better watered. Margin has valley of Arabians, i. e., to the valley on the boundary between them and Arabia Petrea; now Wady-el Arabah. Arabia means a desert. 8. Eglaim—(Ezekiel 47, 10), En-eglain. Not the Agalum of Eusebius, eight miles from Areopolis towards the south; the context requires a town on the very borders of Moab or beyond them. Beer-ellm—lit., The well of the Princes—(so Numbers 21, 16-18). Beyond the east borders of Moab. 9. Dimon—Same as Dibon (v. 2). Its waters are the Arnon. full of blood—the slain of Moab shall be so many. bring more—fresh calamities, viz., the "lions" afterwards mentioned (2 Kings 17, 25; Jeremiah 5, 6; 15, 3). VITRINGA understands Nebuchadnezzar as meant by "the lion;" but it is plural, "lions." The "more," or in Hebrew, additions, he explains of the addition made to the waters of Dimon by the streams of blood of the slain.

CHAPTER XVI.

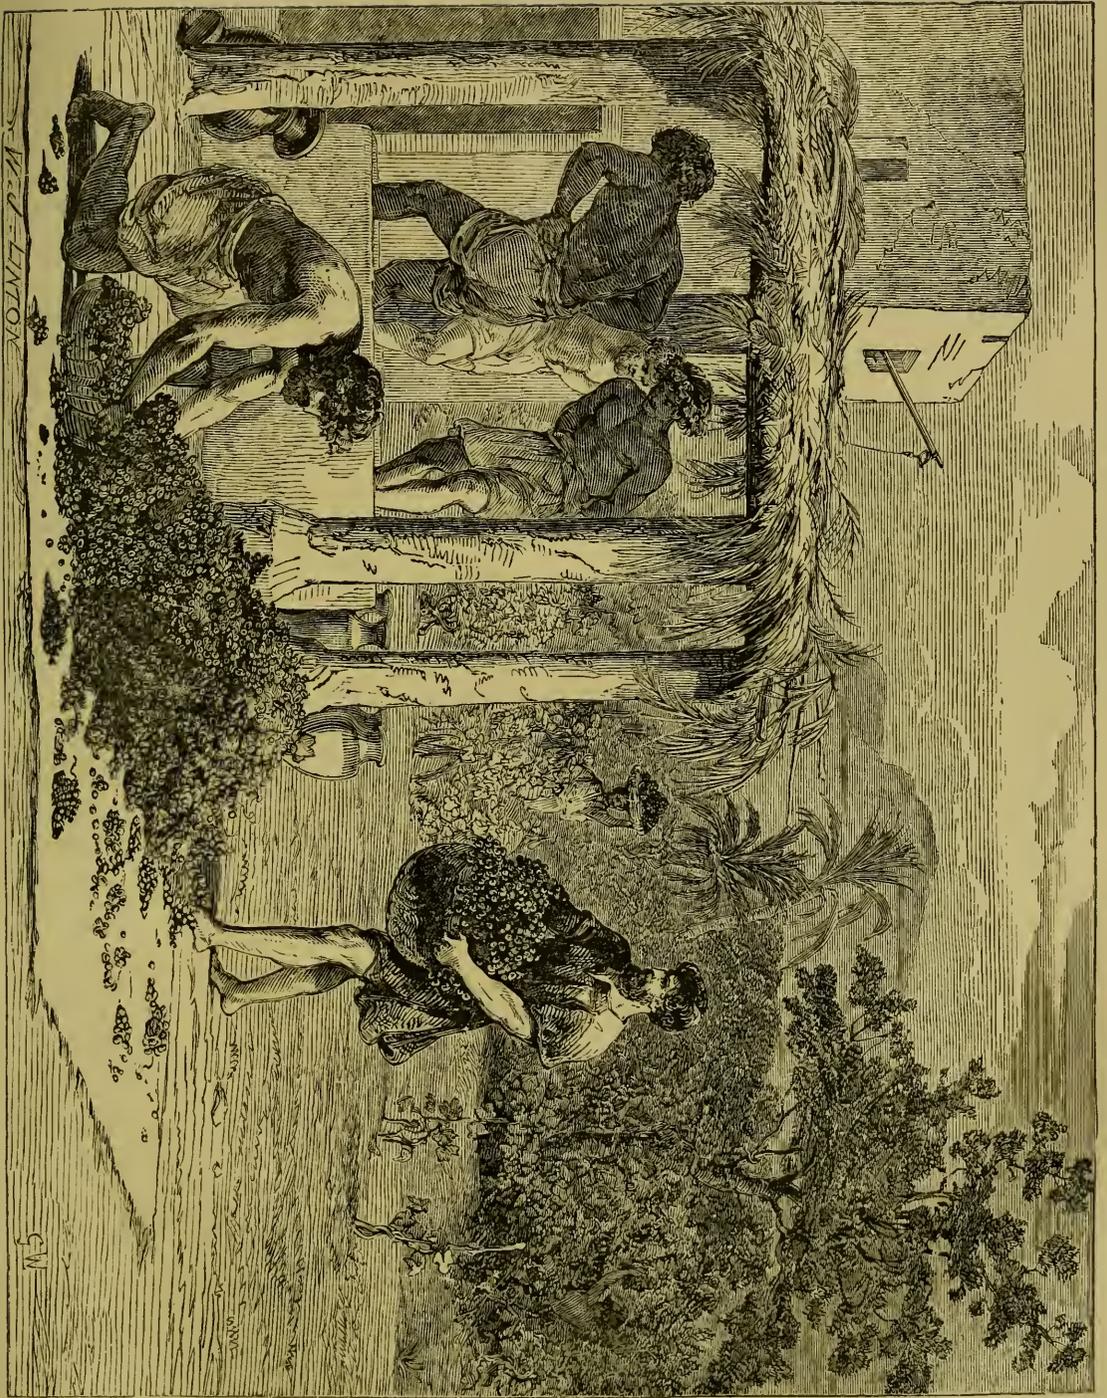

Ver 1-14. CONTINUATION OF THE PROPHECY AS TO MOAB. 1. lamb—Advice of the prophet to the Moabites who had fled southwards to Idumea, to send to the king of Judah the tribute of *lamb*s, which they had formerly paid to Israel, but which they had given up (2 Kings 3, 4, 5). David probably imposed this tribute before the severance of Judah and Israel (2 Samuel 8, 2). Therefore Moab is recommended to gain the favour and protection of Judah, by paying it to the Jewish king. Type of the need of submitting to Messiah (Psalm 2, 10-12; Romans 12, 1). from Sela to—rather, "from Petra through (lit., towards) the wilderness." [MAURER.] Sela means "a rock," Petra in Greek; the capital of Idumea and Arabia Petraea; the dwellings are mostly hewn out of the rock. The country around was a vast common ("wilderness") or open pasturage, to which the Moabites had fled on the invasion from the west (ch. 15, 7). ruler of the land—viz., of Idumea, i. e., the king of Judah; Amaziah had become master of Idumea and Sela (2 Kings 14, 7). 2. cast out of . . . nest—rather, "as a brood cast out" (in apposition with "a wandering bird," or rather, wandering birds), viz., a brood just fledged and expelled from the nest in which they were hatched. [HORSLEY.] Cf. ch. 10, 14; Deuteronomy 32, 11. daughters of Moab—i. e., the inhabitants of Moab. So 2 Kings 19, 21; Psalm 48, 11; Jeremiah 46, 11; Lamentations 4, 22. [MAURER.] at the fords—trying to cross the boundary river of Moab, in order to escape out of the land. EWALD and MAURER make "fords" a poetical expression for "the dwellers on Arnon," answering to the parallel clause of the same sense, "daughters of Moab." 3-5. GESENIUS, MAURER, &c., regard these verses as an address of the fugitive Moabites to the Jews for protection; they translate v. 4, "Let mine outcasts of Moab dwell with thee, Judah;" the protection will be refused by the Jews, for the pride of Moab (v. 6). VITRINGA makes it an additional advice to Moab, besides paying tribute. Give shelter to the Jewish outcasts who take refuge in thy land (v. 3, 4); so "mercy" will be shown thee in turn by whatever king sits on the "throne" of "David" (v. 5). Isaiah foresees that Moab will be too proud to pay the tribute, or conciliate Judah by sheltering its outcasts (v. 6); therefore judgment shall be executed. However, as Moab just before is represented as itself an outcast in Idumea, it seems incongruous that it should be called on to shelter Jewish outcasts. So that it seems rather to foretell the ruined state of Moab when its people should beg the Jews for shelter, but be refused for their pride. make . . . shadow as . . . night . . . in . . . noonday—emblem of a thick shelter from the glaring noonday heat (ch. 4, 6; 25, 4; 32, 2). bevray . . . wandereth—betray not the fugitive to his pursuer. 4. Rather, "Let the outcasts of Moab dwell with thee" (Judah). [HORSLEY.] 4. for the extortioner, &c.—The Assyrian oppressor probably. is at an end—By the time that Moab begs Judah for shelter, Judah shall be in a condition to afford it, for the Assyrian oppressor shall have been "consumed out of the land." 5. If Judah shelters the suppliant Moab, allowing him to remain in Idumea, a blessing will redound to Judah itself and its "throne." truth . . . judgment . . . righteousness—language so divinely framed as to apply to "the latter days" under King Messiah, when "the Lord shall bring again the captivity of Moab" (Psalm 72, 2; 96, 13; 98, 9; Jeremiah 48, 47; Romans 11, 12). hasting—prompt in executing. 6. We—Jews. We reject Moab's supplication for his pride. lies—false boasts. not be so—rather, not right; shall prove vain (ch. 25, 10; Jeremiah 48, 29, 30; Zephaniah 2, 8). "It shall not be so; his lies shall not so effect it." 7. Therefore—all hope of being allowed shelter by the Jews being cut off. foundations—i. e., ruins; because, when houses are pulled down, the "foundations" alone are left (ch. 58, 12). Jeremiah, in the parallel place (Jeremiah 48, 31), renders it "men," who are the moral foundations or stay of a city. Kir-hareseth—lit., A citadel of brick. surely they are stricken—rather, joined with "mourn;" "Ye shall mourn utterly stricken." [MAURER and HORSLEY.] 8. fields—vine-fields (Deuteronomy 32, 32). vine of Sibmah—near Heshbon; viz., languishes. lords of . . . heathen—the heathen princes, the Assyrians, &c., who invaded Moab, destroyed his vines. So Jeremiah in the parallel place (Jeremiah 48, 32, 33).

MAURER thinks the following words require rather the rendering, "Its (the vine of Sibmah) shoots (the wines got from them) overpowered (by its generous flavour and potency) the lords of the nations" (Genesis 49, 11, 12, 22). come . . . Jazer—They (the vine-shoots) reached even to Jazer, fifteen miles from Heshbon. wandered—They overran in wild luxuriance the wilderness of Arabia, encompassing Moab. the sea—the Dead Sea; or else some lake near Jazer now dry; in Jeremiah 48, 32 called the sea of Jazer; but see note there (Psalm 80, 8-11). 9. I—will bewail for its desolation, though I belong to another nation (note, ch. 15, 5). with . . . weeping of Jazer—as Jazer weeps, shouting for . . . fallen—rather, "Upon thy summer fruits and upon thy luxuriant vines the shouting (the battle shout, instead of the joyous shout of the grape-gatherers, usual at the vintage) is fallen" (v. 10; Jeremiah 25, 30; 51, 14). In the parallel passage (Jeremiah 48, 32) the words substantially express the same sense, "The spoiler is fallen upon thy summer fruits." 10. gladness—such as is felt in gathering a rich harvest. There shall be no harvest or vintage owing to the desolation; therefore no "gladness." 11. bowels—in Scripture the seat of yearning compassion. It means the inward seat of emotion, the heart, &c. (ch. 63, 15; cf. ch. 15, 5; Jeremiah 48, 36.) sound . . . harp—as its strings vibrate when beaten with the plectrum or hand. 12. when it is seen that—rather, "When Moab shall have appeared (before his gods; cf. Exodus 23, 15), when he is weary (i. e., when he shall have fatigued himself with observing burdensome rites; 1 Kings 18, 26, &c.), on the high place (cf. ch. 15, 2), and shall come to his sanctuary (of the idol Chemosh on Mount Nebo) to pray, he shall not prevail;" he shall effect nothing by his prayers. [MAURER.] 13. since that time—rather, "respecting that time." [HORSLEY.] BARNES translates it, "formerly," in contrast to "but now" (v. 14): heretofore former prophecies (Exodus 15, 15; Numbers 21, 29) have been given as to Moab, of which Isaiah has given the substance: but now a definite and steady time also is fixed. 14. three years . . . hireling—Just as a hireling has his fixed term of engagement, which neither he nor his master will allow to be added to or to be taken from, so the limit within which Moab is to fall is unalterably fixed (ch. 21, 16). Fulfilled about the time when the Assyrian led Israel into captivity. The ruins of Elealeh, Heshbon, Medeba, Dibon, &c., still exist to confirm the inspiration of Scripture. The accurate particularity of specification of the places 3000 years ago, confirmed by modern research, is a strong testimony to the truth of prophecy.

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1-11. PROPHECY CONCERNING DAMASCUS AND ITS ALLY SAMARIA, i. e., Syria and Israel, which had leagued together (ch. 7, and 8). Already, Tiglath-pileser had carried away the people of Damascus to Kir, in the fourth year of Ahaz (2 Kings 16, 9); but now in Hezekiah's reign a farther overthrow is foretold (Jeremiah 49, 23; Zechariah 9, 1). Also, Shalmaneser carried away Israel from Samaria to Assyria (2 Kings 17, 6; 18, 10, 11) in the sixth year of Hezekiah of Judah (the ninth year of Hoshea of Israel). This prophecy was, doubtless, given previously in the first years of Hezekiah, when the foreign nations came into nearer collision with Judah, owing to the threatening aspect of Assyria. Damascus—put before Israel (Ephraim, v. 3), which is chiefly referred to in what follows, because it was the prevailing power in the league: with it Ephraim either stood or fell (ch. 7). 2. cities of Aroer—i. e., the cities round about Aroer, and under its jurisdiction. [GESENIUS.] So "cities with their villages" (Joshua 15, 44); "Heshbon and all her cities" (Joshua 13, 17). Aroer was near Rabbah-ammon, at the river of Gad, an arm of the Jabbok (2 Samuel 24, 5), founded by the Gadites (Numbers, 32, 34). for flocks—(Ch. 5, 17.) 3. fortress . . . cease—the strongholds shall be pulled down (Samaria especially: Hosea 10, 14; Micah 1, 6; Habakkuk 1, 10). remnant of Syria—all that was left after the overthrow by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 16, 9). as the glory of . . . Israel—they shall meet with the same fate as Israel, their ally. 4. glory of Jacob—the kingdom of Ephraim and all that they rely on (Hosea 12. 2; Micah 1. 5). fatness . . . lean—(Note, ch. 10. 16.) 5. harvestman, &c.—The inhabitants and wealth of Israel shall be swept away, and but few left behind, just as the husbandman gathers the corn and the fruit, and leaves only a few gleanings ears and grapes (2 Kings 18. 9-11). with his arm—he collecteth the standing grain with one arm, so that he can cut it with the sickle in the other hand. Rephaim—a fertile plain at the south-west of Jerusalem toward Bethlehem and the country of the Philistines (2 Samuel 5. 18-22). 6. in it—i.e., in the land of Israel. two or three . . . in the top—A few poor inhabitants shall be left in Israel, like the two or three olive berries left on the topmost boughs, which it is not worth while taking the trouble to try to reach. 7. look to his Maker—instead of trusting in their fortresses—(v. 3; Micah 7. 7). 8. groves—A symbolical tree is often found in Assyrian inscriptions, representing the hosts of heaven (Saba), answering to Asteroth or Astarte, the queen of heaven, as Baal or Bel is the king. Hence the expression, "Image of the grove," is explained (2 Kings 21. 7). images—lit., images to the sun, i.e., to Baal, who answers to the sun, as Astarte to the hosts of heaven (2 Kings 23. 5; Job 31. 26). 9. forsaken bough—rather, "the leavings of woods," what the axeman leaves when he cuts down the grove (cf. v. 6). which they left because of—rather, "which (the enemies) shall leave for the children of Israel;" lit., "shall leave (in departing) from before the face of the children of Israel. [MAURER.] But a few cities out of many shall be left to Israel, by the purpose of God, executed by the Assyrian. 10. forgotten . . . God of . . . salvation . . . rock—(Deuteronomy 32. 15, 18.) plants—rather, nursery-grounds, pleasure-grounds. [MAURER.] set in—rather, "set them," the pleasure-grounds. strange slips—cuttings of plants from far, and therefore valuable. 11. in the day . . . thy plant—rather, "In the day of thy planting." [HORSLEY.] shalt . . . make . . . grow—MAURER translates, "Thou didst fence it," viz., the pleasure-ground. The parallel clause, "Make . . . flourish," favours English Version. As soon as thou plantest it grows. in the morning—i.e., immediately after: so in Psalm 90. 14, the Hebrew, "in the morning," is translated early. but . . . shall be a heap—rather, "but (promising as was the prospect) the harvest is gone." [HORSLEY.] in . . . day of grief—rather, "in the day of (expected) possession." [MAURER.] "In the day of inundation." [HORSLEY.] of desperate sorrow—rather, "And the sorrow shall be desperate or irremediable." In English Version heap and sorrow may be taken together by hendiad, "The heap of the harvest shall be desperate sorrow." [ROSENMULLER.]

Chap. 17. 12-18. 7. SUDDEN DESTRUCTION OF A GREAT ARMY IN JUDEA (viz., that of the Assyrian Sennacherib), AND ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE EVENT TO THE ETHIOPIAN AMBASSADORS. The connection of this fragment with what precedes is: notwithstanding the calamities coming on Israel, the people of God shall not be utterly destroyed (ch. 6. 12, 13), the Assyrian spoilers shall perish (ch. 17. 13, 14). 12. Woe . . . multitude—rather, "Ho (Hark!) a noise of," &c. The prophet in vision perceives the vast and mixed Assyrian hosts (Hebrew, "many peoples," see note, ch. 5. 26): on the hills of Judah (so "mountains," v. 13): but at the "rebuke" of God they shall "flee as chaff": to the rushing . . . that make—rather, "the roaring . . . roareth" (cf. ch. 8. 7; Jeremiah 6. 23). 13. shall . . . shall—rather, "God rebuketh (Psalm 9. 5) them, and they flee—are chased:" the event is set before the eyes as actually present, not future. chaff of . . . mountains—threshing-floors in the East are in the open air on elevated places, so as to catch the wind which separates the chaff from the wheat (Psalm 83. 13; Hosea 13. 3). rolling thing—any thing that rolls: stubble. 14. evening . . . before morning—fulfilled to the letter in the destruction "before morning" of the vast host that "at evening-tide" was such a terror ("trouble") to Judah; on the phrase see Psalm 90. 6; 30. 5. he is not—viz., the enemy, us—the Jews. A general declaration of the doom that awaits the foes of God's people (ch. 54. 17).

CHAPTER XVIII.

Isaiah announces the overthrow of Sennacherib's hosts, and desires the Ethiopian ambassadors, now in Jerusalem, to bring word of it to their own nation, and calls on the whole world to witness the event (v. 3). As ch. 17. 12-14 announced the presence of the foe, so ch. 18. foretells his overthrow. The heading in English Version, "God will destroy the Ethiopians," is a mistake arising from the wrong rendering "Woe," whereas the Hebrew does not express a threat, but is an appeal calling attention (ch. 55. 1; Zechariah 2. 6): "Ho." He is not speaking against but to the Ethiopians, calling on them to hear his prophetic announcement as to the destruction of their enemies. 1. shadowing with wings—rather, "land of the winged bark," i.e., "barks with wing-like sails, answering to vessels of bulrushes" in v. 2; the word "rivers," in the parallelism, also favours it; so LXX. and Chaldee. [EWARD.] "Land of the clanging sound of wings," i.e., armies, as in ch. 8. 8; the rendering "bark," or "ship," is rather dubious. [MAURER.] The armies referred to are those of Tirhakah, advancing to meet the Assyrians (ch. 37. 9). In English Version, "shadowing" means protecting—stretching out its wings to defend a feeble people, viz., the Hebrews. [VITRINGA.] The Hebrew for "wings" is the same as for the idol Cneph, which was represented in temple-sculptures with wings (Psalms 91. 4). beyond—Meroe, the island between the "rivers" Nile and Astaboras is meant, famed for its commerce, and perhaps the seat of the Ethiopian government, hence addressed here as representing the whole empire: remains of temples are still found, and the name of "Tirhakah" in the inscriptions. This island-region was probably the chief part of Queen Candace's kingdom (Acts 8. 27). For "beyond" others translate less lit., "which borderest on." Ethiopia—lit., Cush. HORSLEY is probably right that the ultimate and fullest reference of the prophecy is to the restoration of the Jews in the Holy Land through the instrumentality of some distant people skilled in navigation (v. 2; ch. 60. 9, 10; Psalm 45. 15; 63. 31; Zephaniah 3. 10); perhaps England. Phœnician voyagers coasting along would speak of all Western remote lands as "beyond" the Nile's mouths. "Cush," too, has a wide sense, being applied not only to Ethiopea, but Arabia Deserta and Felix, and along the Persian Gulf, as far as the Tigris (Genesis 2. 13). 2. ambassadors—messengers sent to Jerusalem at the time that negotiations passed between Tirhakah and Hezekiah against the expected attack of Sennacherib (ch. 37. 9). by . . . sea—on the Nile (ch. 19. 5): as what follows proves. vessels of bulrushes—light canoes, formed of papyrus, daubed over with pitch: so the "ark" in which Moses was exposed (Exodus 2. 3). Go—Isaiah tells them to take back the tidings of what God is about to do (v. 4) against the common enemy of both Judah and Ethiopea. scattered and peeled—rather, strong and energetic. [MAURER.] The Hebrew for "strong" is lit., driven out (Margin, Psalm 36. 10; Ecclesiastes 2. 3). "Energetic," lit., sharp (Habakkuk 1. 8; Margin, the verb means to sharpen a sword, Ezekiel 21. 15, 16); also polished. As HERODOTUS (3. 20, 114) characterizes the Ethiopians as "the tallest and fairest of men," G. V. SMITH translates, "tall and comely;" lit., extended (ch. 45. 14, "men of stature") and polished (the Ethiopians had smooth, glossy skins). In English Version the reference is to the Jews, scattered outcasts, and loaded with indignity (lit., having their hair torn off). HORSLEY. terrible—the Ethiopians famed for warlike prowess. [ROSENMULLER.] The Jews who, because of God's plague, made others to fear the like (Deuteronomy 28. 37). Rather, "awfully remarkable." [HORSLEY.] God puts the "terror" of His people into the surrounding nations at the first (Exodus 23. 27; Joshua 2. 9); so it shall be again in the latter days (Zechariah 12. 2, 3). from . . . beginning hitherto—so English Version rightly. But GISENIUS, "to the terrible nation (of upper Egypt) and further beyond" (to the Ethiopians properly so called). meted out—Hebrew, of line, line. The measuring line was used: in destroying buildings (ch. 34. 11; 2 Kings 21. 13; Lamentations 2. 8). Hence, actively, it means here "a people meting out,"—an all-destroying people;"] which suits the context better than "meted," passively. [MAURER.] HORSLEY, understanding it of the Jews, translates it, "Expecting, expecting (in a continual attitude of expectation of Messiah) and trampled under foot:" a graphic picture of them. Most translate, of strength, strength (from a root, to brace the sinews), i. e., a most powerful people. trodden down—true of the Jews. But MAURER translates it actively, a people treading under foot all its enemies, i. e., victorious (ch. 14. 25), viz., the Ethiopians. spoiled—"cut up." The Nile is formed by the junction of many streams in Abyssinia, the Atbara, the Astapus or Blue river (between which two rivers Meroe, the "Ethiopia" here meant, lies), and the Astaboras or White river; these streams wash down the soil along their banks in the "land" of Upper Egypt, and deposit it on that of Lower Egypt. G. V. SMITH translates it, "Divide." HORSLEY takes it fig. of the conquering armies which have often "spoiled" Judea. 3. see ye . . . hear ye—rather, ye shall see—shall hear. Call to the whole earth to be witnesses of what Jehovah ("He") is about to do. He will "lift up an ensign," calling the Assyrian motley hosts together (ch. 5. 26) on "the mountains" round Jerusalem to their own destruction. This (ch. 18.) declares the coming overthrow of those armies whose presence is announced in ch. 17. 12, 13. The same motive, which led Hezekiah to seek aid from Egypt, led him to accept gladly the Ethiopian Tirhakah's aid (ch. 36. 6; 37. 9). Ethiopia, Egypt, and Judea were probably leagued together against the common enemy, 713 B. C. See notes on ch. 22., where a difference of tone (as referring to a different period) as to Ethiopia is observable. HORSLEY takes the "ensign" to be the cross, and the "trumpet" the Gospel trumpet, which shall be sounded more loudly in the last days. 4. take . . . rest . . . consider—I will calmly look on and not interpose, whilst all seems to promise success to the enemy; when fig., "the sun's heat" and "the night dews" ripen their "harvest;" but "before" it reaches its maturity I will destroy it (v. 5; Ecclesiastes 8. 11, 12). like a clear heat—rather, "at the time of the clear (serene) heat." [MAURER.] upon herbs—answering to "harvest" in the parallel clause. MAURER translates, "in the sun-light" (Job 31. 26; 37. 21; Habakkuk 3. 4). like . . . dew—rather, "at the time of the dew-cloud" God's "silence" is mistaken by the ungodly for consent; His delay in taking vengeance for forgetfulness (Psalm 50. 21); so it shall be before the vengeance which in the last day shall usher in the restoration of the Jews (ch. 34. 1-8; 57. 11, end of the verse; 2 Peter 3. 3-10). 5. For—rather, But, perfect—perfected. When the enemy's plans are on the verge of completion. sour grape . . . flower—rather, "when the flower shall become the ripening grape." [MAURER.] sprigs—the shoots with the grapes on them. God will not only disconcert their present plans, but prevent them forming any future ones. HORSLEY takes the "harvest" and vintage here as referring to purifying judgments which cause the excision of the ungodly from the earth, and the placing of the faithful in a state of peace on the earth: not the last judgment (John 15. 2; Revelation 14. 15-20). 6. birds . . . beasts—transition from the image "sprigs," "branches," to the thing meant: the Assyrian soldiers and leaders shall be the prey of birds and beasts, the whole year through, "winter" and "summer," so numerous shall be their carcases. HORSLEY translates the Hebrew which is singular: "upon it," not "upon them;" the "it" refers to God's "dwelling-place" (v. 4) in the Holy Land, which Antichrist ("the bird of prey" with the "beasts," his rebel hosts) is to possess himself of, and where he is to perish. 7. present . . . people scattered and peeled—For the right rendering, see note on v. 2. The repetition of epithets enhances the honour paid to Jehovah by so mighty a nation. The Ethiopians, wonder-struck at such an interposition of Jehovah in behalf of His people, shall send gifts to Jerusalem in His honour (ch. 16. 1; Psalm 68. 31; 72. 10). Thus translate, "a present—from a people." Or translate, as English Version, "the present" will mean "the people" of Ethiopia converted to God (Romans 15. 16). HORSLEY takes the people converted to Jehovah, as the Jews in the latter days. place of the name—where Jehovah peculiarly manifests His glory. Acts 2. 10 and 8. 27 show how worshippers came up to Jerusalem from "Egypt" and "Ethiopia." Frumentius, an Egyptian, in the 4th century, converted Abyssinia to Christianity; and a Christian church, under an abuna or bishop, still flourishes there. The full accomplishment is probably still future.

CHAPTER XIX.

Ver. 1-25. Chaps. 19. and 20. are connected, but with an interval between. Egypt had been held by an Ethiopian dynasty, Sabacho, Sevechus, or Sabacho II., and Tirhakah, for forty or fifty years. Sevechus (called So, the ally of Hoshea, 2 Kings 17. 4) retired from Lower Egypt on account of the resistance of the priests; and perhaps also, as the Assyrians threatened Lower Egypt. On his withdrawal, Sethos, one of the priestly caste, became supreme, having Tanis ("Zaan") or else Memphis as his capital, 718 B. C.; whilst the Ethiopians retained Upper Egypt, with Thebes as its capital, under Tirhakah. A third native dynasty was at Sais, in the west of Lower Egypt; to this at a later period belonged Psammetichus, the first who admitted Greeks into Egypt and its armies; he was one of the dodearchy, a number of petty kings between whom Egypt was divided, and by aid of foreign auxiliaries overcame the rest, 670 B. C. To the divisions at this last time, GESENIUS refers v. 2; and to Psammetichus, v. 4, "a cruel lord." The dissensions of the ruling castes are certainly referred to. But the time referred to is much earlier than that of Psammetichus. In v. 1, the invasion of Egypt is represented as caused by "the Lord;" and in v. 17, "Judah" is spoken of as "a terror to Egypt," which it could hardly have been by itself. Probably, therefore, the Assyrian invasion of Egypt under Sargon, when Judah was the ally of Assyria, and Hezekiah had not yet refused tribute as he did in the beginning of Sennacherib's reign, is meant. That Assyria was in Isaiah's mind appears from the way in which it is joined with Israel and Egypt in the worship of Jehovah (v. 24, 25). Thus the dissensions referred to (v. 2) allude to the time of the withdrawal of the Ethiopians from Lower Egypt, probably not without a struggle, especially with the priestly caste; also to the time when Sethos usurped the throne, and entered on the contest with the military caste, by the aid of the town populations: when the Saitic dynasty was another cause of division. Sargon's reign was between 722-715 B. C., answering to 718 B. C., when Sethos usurped his throne. [G. V. SMITH.] 1. burden—(Note, ch. 13. 1.) upon . . . cloud—(Psalm 104. 3; 18. 10.) come into Egypt—to inflict vengeance. "Egypt," in Hebrew, Misraim, plural form, to express the two regions of Egypt. BUNSEN observes, The title of their kings runs thus: "Lord of Upper and Lower Egypt." idols—the bull, crocodile, &c. The idols poetically are said to be "moved" with fear at the presence of one mightier than even they were supposed to be (Exodus 12. 12; Jeremiah 43. 12). 2. set—stir up. GENESIUS translates, "arm." Egypt against Egypt—Lower against Upper: and Saitic against both. (See ch. 3. 10.) NEWTON refers it to the civil wars between Apries and Amasis at the time of Nebuchadnezzar's invasion; also between Tachos, Nectanebus, and the Mendesians, just before Ochus subdued Egypt. kingdom against kingdom—The LXX. have "nome against nome;" Egypt was divided into forty-two nomes or districts. 3. spirit—wisdom, for which Egypt was famed (ch. 31. 2; 1 Kings 4. 30; Acts 7. 22); answering to "counsel" in the parallel clause. fall—lit., be poured out, i. e., be made void (Jeremiah 19. 7). They shall "seek" help from sources that can afford none, "charmers," &c. (ch. 8. 19). charmers—lit., those making a faint sound: the soothsayers imitated the faint sound which was attributed to the spirits of the dead (Note, ch. 8. 19). 4. cruel lord—Sargon, in Hebrew it is lords; but plural is often used to express greatness, where one alone is meant (Genesis 39. 2). The parallel word "king" (singular) proves it. NEWTON makes the general reference to be to Nebuchadnezzar, and a particular reference to Cambyses, son of Cyrus (who killed the Egyptian god, Apis), and Ochus, Persian conquerors of Egypt, noted for their "fierce cruelty." GESENIUS refers it to Psammetichus, who had brought into Egypt Greek and other foreign mercenaries to subdue the other eleven princes of the dodecarchy. 5. the sea—the Nile. Physical calamities, it is observed in history, often accompany political convulsions (Ezekiel 30, 12). The Nile shall "fall" to rise to its wonted height, the result of which will be barrenness and famine. Its "waters" at the time of the overflow resemble "a sea" (PLINY, H. N., 35, 11); and it is still called El-Bahr, "the sea," by the Egyptians (ch. 18, 2; Jeremiah 51, 36). A public record is kept at Cairo of the daily rise of the water at the proper time of overflow, viz., August: if it rise to a less height than twelve cubits, it will not overflow the land, and famine must be the result. So, also, when it rises higher than sixteen; for the waters are not drained off in time sufficient to sow the seed. 6. they shall turn the rivers—rather, "the streams shall become putrid;" i. e., the artificial streams made for irrigation shall become stagnant and offensive when the waters fail. [MAURER.] HORSLEY, with LXX., translates, "And waters from the sea shall be drunk:" by the failure of the river-water they shall be reduced to sea-water. brooks of defence—rather, "canals of Egypt;" canals, lit., "Niles," Nile canals, the plural of the Egyptian term for the great river. The same Hebrew word, Matzor, whence comes Mitzraim, expresses Egypt, and a place of "defence." HORSLEY, as English Version translates it, "embanked canals." reeds . . . flags—the papyrus. "Reed and rush:" utter withering. 7. paper reeds—rather, pastures, lit., places naked of wood, and famed for rich herbage, on the banks of the Nile. (GESENIUS.) Cf. Genesis 13, 10; Deuteronomy 11, 10. HORSLEY translates, "Nakedness upon the river," descriptive of the appearance of a river when its bottom is bare, and its banks stripped of verdure by long drought: so Vulgate. the brooks—the river. mouth—rather, the source. [VULGATE.] "Even close to the river's side vegetation shall be so withered as to be scattered in the shape of powder by the wind" (English Version, "driven away"). [HORSLEY.] 8. fishers—The Nile was famed for fish (Numbers 11, 5); numbers would be thrown out of employment by the failure of fishes. angle—a hook. Used in the "brooks" or canals, as the "net" was in "the waters" of the river itself. 9. fine flax—GESENIUS, for "fine," translates, "combed;" fine linen was worn by the rich only (Luke 16, 19). Egypt was famous for it (Exodus 9, 31; 1 Kings 10, 23; Proverbs 7, 16; Ezekiel 27, 7). The processes of its manufacture are represented on the Egyptian tombs. Israel learned the art in Egypt (Exodus 26, 36). The cloth now found on the mummies was linen, as is shown by the microscope. WILKINSON mentions linen from Egypt which has 540 (or 270 double) threads in one inch in the warp; whereas some modern cambric has but 160. [BARNES.] networks—rather, white cloth (Esther 1, 6; 8, 16). 10. in the purposes—rather, the foundations, i. e., "the nobles shall be broken" or brought low: so ch. 3, 1; Psalm 11, 3; cf. v. 13, "The princes—the stay of the tribes." The Arabs call a prince "a pillar of the people." [MAURER.] "Their weaving-frames." [HORSLEY.] "Dykes." [BARNES.] all that make sluices, &c.—"makers of dams," made to confine the waters which overflow from the Nile in artificial fish-ponds. [HORSLEY.] "Makers of gain," i. e., the common people who have to earn their livelihood, as opposed to the "nobles" previously. [MAURER.] 11. Zoan—The Greeks called it Tanis, a city of Lower Egypt, east of the Tanitic arm of the Nile, now San; it was one of the nearest Egyptian towns to Palestine (Numbers 13, 22), the scene of Moses' miracles (Psalm 78, 12, 43). It, or else Memphis, was the capital under Sethos. I am . . . son of the wise . . . kings—Ye have no advice to suggest to Pharaoh in the crisis, notwithstanding that ye boast of descent from wise and royal ancestors. The priests were the usual "counsellors" of the Egyptian king. He was generally chosen from the priestly caste, or, if from the warrior caste, he was admitted into the sacred order, and was called a priest. The priests are, therefore, meant, by the expression, "son of the wise, and of ancient kings:" this was their favourite boast (Herodotus, 2, 141; cf. Amos 7, 14; Acts 23, 6; Philippians 3, 5). "Pharaoh" was the common name of all the kings; Sethos, probably, is here meant. 12. let them know—i. e., How is it that, with all their boast of knowing the future (Diodorus, 1, 81), they do not know what Jehovah of hosts, &c. 13. Noph—called also Moph; Greek, Memphis (Hosea 9, 6); on the western bank of the Nile, capital of Lower Egypt, second only to Thebes in all Egypt; residence of the kings, until the Ptolemies removed to Alexandria; the word means the port of the good (Plutarch). The military caste probably ruled in it: "they also are deceived," in fancying their country secure from Assyrian invasion. stay of . . . tribes—rather, "corner-stone of her castes" [MAURER], i. e., the princes, the two ruling castes, the priests and the warriors; image from a building which rests mainly on its corner-stones (v. 10, Note; ch. 23, 16; Psalm 118, 22; Numbers 24, 17; Margin; Judges 20, 2; 1 Samuel 14, 38, Margin; Zechariah 10, 4). 14. err in every work thereof—referring to the anarchy arising from their internal feuds. HORSLEY translates, "with respect to all His (God's) works;" they misinterpreted God's dealings at every step. "Mingled" contains the same image as "drunken:" as one mizes spices with wine to make it intoxicating (ch. 5, 22; Proverbs 9, 2, 5), so Jehovah has poured among them a spirit of giddiness, so that they are as helpless as a "drunken man." 15. work for Egypt—nothing which Egypt can do to extricate itself from the difficulty. head or tail—high or low (v. 11–15, and 8–10). branch or rush—the lofty palm branch or the humble reed (ch. 9, 14, 15; 10, 33, 34). 16. like . . . women—timid and helpless (Jeremiah 51, 30; Nahum 3, 13). shaking of . . . hand—his judgments by means of the invaders (ch. 10, 5, 32; 11, 5). 17. Judah . . . terror unto Egypt—not by itself; but at this time Hezekiah was the active subordinate ally of Assyria in its invasion of Egypt under Sargon. Similarly to the alliance of Judah with Assyria here is 2 Kings 23, 29, where Josiah takes the field against Pharaoh-necho of Egypt, probably as ally of Assyria against Egypt. [G. V. SMITH.] VITRINGA explains it that, Egypt in its calamities would remember that prophets of Judah had foretold them, and so Judah would be "a terror unto Egypt." thereof—of Judah. it—Egypt. 18–22. Suffering shall lead to repentance. Struck with "terror" and "afraid" (v. 17) because of Jehovah's judgments, Egypt shall be converted to Him: nay, even Assyria shall join in serving Him; so that Israel, Assyria, and Egypt, once mutual foes, shall be bound together by the tie of a common faith as one people. So a similar issue from other prophecies (ch. 18, 7; 23, 13). five cities—i. e., several cities, as in ch. 17, 6; 30, 17; Genesis 43, 34; Leviticus 26, 8. Rather, five definite cities of Lower Egypt (v. 11, 13; ch. 30, 4), which had close intercourse with the neighbouring Jewish cities [MAURER]; some say, Heliopolis, Leontopolis (else Diospolis), Migdol, Daphne (Tahpanes), and Memphis. language of Canaan—i. e., of the Hebrews in Canaan, the language of revelation. Fig. for, They shall embrace the Jewish religion: so "a pure language" and conversion to God are connected in Zephaniah 3, 9; as also the first confounding and multiplication of languages was the punishment of the making of gods at Babel, other than the One God. Pentecost (Acts 2, 4) was the counterpart of Babel: the separation of nations is not to hinder the unity of faith; the full realization of this is yet future (Zechariah 14, 9; John 17, 21). The next clause, "swear to the Lord of Hosts," agrees with this view, i. e., bind themselves to Him by solemn covenant (ch. 45, 23; 65, 16; Deuteronomy 6, 13). city of destruction—Onias; "city of the sun," i. e., On, or Heliopolis; he persuaded Ptolemy Philometer (149 B. C.) to let him build a temple in the prefecture (nome) of Heliopolis, on the ground that it would induce Jews to reside there, and that the very site was foretold by Isaiah 600 years before. The reading of the Hebrew text is, however, better supported, "city of destruction;" referring to Leontopolis, the site of Onias' temple: which casts a reproach on that city because it was about to contain a temple rivalling the only sanctioned temple, that at Jerusalem. MAURER, with some MSS., reads "city of defence," or "deliverance;" viz., Memphis, or some such city, to which God was about to send "a saviour" (v. 20), to "deliver them." 19. altar—not for sacrifice, but as the "pillar" for memorial and worship (Joshua 22, 22-26). Isaiah does not contemplate a temple in Egypt: for the only legal temple was at Jerusalem; but, like the patriarchs, they shall have altars in various places. pillar—such as Jacob reared (Genesis 28, 18; 35, 14); it was a common practice in Egypt to raise obelisks commemorating Divine and great events. at the border—of Egypt and Judah, to proclaim to both countries the common faith. This passage shows how the Holy Spirit raised Isaiah above a narrow-minded nationality to a charity anticipatory of gospel catholicity. 20. It—the altar and pillar. a sign—(of the fulfilment of prophecy) to their contemporaries. a witness—to their descendants. unto the Lord—no longer, to their idols, but to Jehovah. for they shall cry—or, "a sign, &c., that they cried, &c., and He sent to them a saviour:" probably, Alexander the Great (so "a great one"), whom the Egyptians welcomed as a deliverer (Greek, Soter, a title of the Ptolemies) out of the hands of the Persians, who under Cambyses had been their "oppressors." At Alexandria, called from him, the Old Testament was translated into Greek for the Greek-speaking Jews, who in large numbers dwelt in Egypt under the Ptolemies, his successors. Messiah is the antitype ultimately intended (cf. Acts 2, 10, "Egypt"). 21. oblation—unbloody. 22. heal—as described (v. 18-20). return—for heathen sin and idolatry are an apostasy from primitive truth. 23. highway—free communication, resting on the highest basis, the common faith of both (v. 18; ch. 11, 16). Assyria and Egypt were joined under Alexander as parts of his empire; Jews and proselytes from both met at the feasts of Jerusalem. A type of gospel times to come. serve with—serve Jehovah with the Assyrians. So "serve" is used absolutely (Job 36, 11). 24. third—the three shall be joined as one nation. blessing—the source of blessings to other nations, and the object of their benedictions. in the midst of the land—rather, earth (Micah 5, 7). Judah is designed to be the grand centre of the whole earth (Jeremiah 3, 17). 25. Whom—rather, Which, viz., "the land," or "earth," i. e., the people of it. [MAUREL.] my people—the peculiar designation of Israel the elect people, here applied to Egypt to express its entire admission to religious privileges (Romans 9, 24-26; 1 Peter 2, 9, 10). work of my hands—spiritually (Hosea 2, 23; Ephesians 2, 10).

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1-6. CONTINUATION OF THE SUBJECT OF CHAP. 19., BUT AT A LATER DATE. CAPTIVITY OF EGYPT AND ETHIOPIA. In the reign of Sargon (722-715 B. C.), the successor of Shalmaneser, an Assyrian invasion of Egypt took place. Its success is here foretold, and hence a party among the Jews are warned of the folly of their "expectation" of aid from Egypt or Ethiopia. At a later period (ch. 18.), when Tirhakah of Ethiopia was their ally, the Ethiopians are treated as friends, to whom God announces the overthrow of the common Assyrian foe, Sennacherib. Egypt and Ethiopia in this chapter (v. 3, 4) are represented as allied together, the result no doubt of fear of the common foe; previously they had been at strife, and the Ethiopian king had, just before Sethos' usurpation, withdrawn from occupation of part of Lower Egypt. Hence, "Egypt" is mentioned alone in ch. 19., which refers to a somewhat earlier stage of the same event; a delicate mark of truth. Sargon seems to have been the king who finished the capture of Samaria which Shalmaneser began; the alliance of Hoshea with So or Sabacho II. of Ethiopia, and his refusal to pay the usual tribute, provoked Shalmaneser to the invasion. On clay cylindrical seals found in Sennacherib's palace at Koyunjik, the name of Sabacho is deciphered; the two seals are thought, from the inscriptions, to have been attached to the treaty of peace between Egypt and Assyria, which resulted from the invasion of Egypt by Sargon, described in this chapter; 2 Kings 18, 10 curiously confirms the view derived from Assyrian inscriptions, that though Shalmaneser began, Sargon finished the conquest of Samaria; "they took it" (cf. 2 Kings 17, 4-6). In Sargon's palace at Khorsabad, inscriptions state that 27,280 Israelites were led captive by the founder of the palace. Whilst Shalmaneser was engaged in the siege of Samaria, Sargon probably usurped the supreme power and destroyed him; the siege began in 723 B. C., and ended in 721 B. C., the first year of Sargon's reign. Hence arises the paucity of inscriptions of the two predecessors of Sargon, Tiglath-pileser and Shalmaneser; the usurper destroyed them, just as Tiglath-pileser destroyed those of Pul (Sardanapalus), the last of the old line of Ninus; the names of his father and grandfather, which have been deciphered in the palace of his son Sennacherib, do not appear in the list of Assyrian kings, which confirms the view that he was a satrap who usurped the throne. He was so able a general that Hezekiah made no attempt to shake off the tribute until the reign of Sennacherib; hence Judah was not invaded now as the land of the Philistines and Egypt were. After conquering Israel he sent his general, Tartan, to attack the Philistine cities, "Ashdod," &c., preliminary to his invasion of Egypt and Ethiopia; for the line of march to Egypt lay along the south-west coast of Palestine. The inscriptions confirm the prophecy; they tell us he received tribute from a Pharaoh of "Egypt;" besides destroying in part the Ethiopian "No-ammon," or Thebes (Nahum 3, 8); also that he warred with the kings of "Ashdod," Gaza, &c., in harmony with Isaiah here; a memorial tablet of him is found in Cyprus also, showing that he extended his arms to that island. His reign was six or seven years in duration—722-715 B. C. [G. V. SMITH.] 1. Tartan—probably the same general as was sent by Sennacherib against Hezekiah (2 Kings 18, 17). GESENIUS takes "Tartan" as a title. Ashdod—called by the Greeks Azotus (Acts 8, 40); on the Mediterranean, one of the "five" cities of the Philistines. The taking of it was a necessary preliminary to the invasion of Egypt, to which it was the key in that quarter, the Philistines being allies of Egypt. So strongly did the Assyrians fortify it that it stood a twenty-nine years' siege, when it was retaken by the Egyptian Psammetichus. sent—Sargon himself remained behind engaged with the Phœnician cities, or else led the main force more directly into Egypt out of Judah. [G. V. SMITH.] 2. by—lit., by the hand (cf. Ezekiel 3, 14). sackcloth—the loose outer garment of coarse dark hair-cloth worn by mourners (2 Samuel 3, 31) and by prophets, fastened at the waist by a girdle (Matthew 3, 4; 2 Kings 1, 8; Zechariah 13, 4). naked—rather, uncovered; he merely put off the outer sackcloth, retaining still the tunic or inner vest (1 Samuel 19, 24; Amos 2, 16; John 21, 7); an emblem to show that Egypt should be stripped of its possessions; the very dress of Isaiah was a silent exhortation to repentance. 3. three years—Isaiah's symbolical action did not continue all this time, but at intervals, to keep it before the people's mind during that period. [ROSENMULLER.] Rather, join "three years" with "sign," a three years' sign, i. e., a sign that a three years' calamity would come on Egypt and Ethiopia [BARNES], (ch. 8, 18). This is the only instance of a strictly symbolical act performed by Isaiah. With later prophets, as Jeremiah and Ezekiel, such acts were common. In some cases they were performed, not literally, but only in prophetic vision. wonder—rather, omen; conveying a threat as to the future. [G. V. SMITH.] upon—reference to, against. 4. buttocks uncovered—BELZONI says that captives are found represented thus on Egyptian monuments (ch. 47, 2, 3; Nahum 3, 5, 8, 9), where as here, Egypt and Ethiopia are mentioned as in alliance. 5. they—the Philistine allies of Egypt who trusted in it for help against Assyria. A warning to the party among the Jews, who though Judah was then the subordinate ally of Assyria, were looking to Egypt as a preferable ally (ch. 30, 7). Ethiopia was their "expectation;" for Palestine had not yet obtained, but hoped for alliance with it. Egypt was their "glory," i. e., boast (ch. 13, 19); for the alliance with it was completed. 6. isle—i. e., coast on the Mediterranean—Philistia, perhaps Phœnicia (cf. ch. 23, 2; 11, 11; 13, 22; Psalm 72, 10). we—emphatical, if Egypt, in which we trusted, was overcome, how shall we, a small weak state, escape?

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 1-10. REPETITION OF THE ASSURANCE GIVEN IN CHAP. 13, AND 14, TO THE JEWS ABOUT TO BE CAPTIVES IN BABYLON, THAT THEIR ENEMY SHOULD BE DESTROYED AND THEY BE DELIVERED. He does not narrate the event, but graphically supposes himself a watchman in Babylon, beholding the events as they pass. 1. desert—the champaign between Babylon and Persia; it was once a desert, and it was to become so again. of the sea—the plain was covered with the water of the Euphrates like a "sea" (Jeremiah 51. 13, 36; so ch. 11. 15, the Nile), until Semiramis raised great dams against it. Cyrus removed these dykes, and so converted the whole country again into a vast desert-marsh. whirlwinds in the south—(Job 37. 9; Zechariah 9. 14.) The south wind comes upon Babylon from the deserts of Arabia, and its violence is the greater from its course being unbroken along the plain (Job 1. 19). desert—the plain between Babylon and Persia. terrible land—Media; to guard against which was the object of Nitocris' great works (HERODOTUS, 1. 185). Cf. as to "terrible" applied to a wilderness, as being full of unknown dangers, Deuteronomy 1. 19. 2. death treacherously—referring to the military stratagem employed by Cyrus in taking Babylon. It may be translated, is repaid with treachery; then the subject of the verb is Babylon. She is repaid in her own coin; ch. 33. 1; Habakkuk 2. 8, favour this. Go up—Isaiah abruptly recites the order which he hears God giving to the Persians, the instruments of His vengeance (ch. 13. 3, 17). Elam—a province of Persia, the original place of their settlement (Genesis 10. 22), east of the Euphrates. The name Persia was not in use until the captivity; it means a horseman; Cyrus first trained the Persians in horsemanship. It is a mark of authenticity that the name is not found before Daniel and Ezekiel. [BOHART.] thereof—the "sighing" caused by Babylon (ch. 14. 7, 8). 3. Isaiah imagines himself among the exiles in Babylon, and cannot help feeling moved by the calamities which come on it. So for Moab (ch. 15. 5; 16. 11). palm—(Cf. ch. 13. 8; Ezekiel 30. 4, 19; Nahum 2. 10.) at the hearing—The Hebrew may mean, "I was so bowed down that I could not hear; I was so dismayed that I could not see" (Genesis 16. 2; Psalm 69. 23). [MAURER.] 4. panted—"Is bewildered." [BARNES.] night of my pleasure—the prophet supposes himself one of the banqueters at Belshazzar's feast, on the night that Babylon was about to be taken by surprise; hence his expression, "my pleasure" (ch. 14. 11; Jeremiah 51. 39; Daniel 5.). 5. Prepare the table—viz., the feast in Babylon; during which Cyrus opened the dykes made by Semiramis to confine the Euphrates to one channel, and suffered them to overflow the country, so that he could enter Babylon by the channel of the river. Isaiah first represents the king ordering the feast to be got ready. The suddenness of the irruption of the foe is graphically expressed by the rapid turn in the language to an alarm addressed to the Babylonian princes, "Arise," &c. (cf. ch. 22. 13). MAURER translates, "They prepare the table," &c. But see ch. 8. 9. watch in . . . watch-tower—rather, set the watch. This done, they thought they might feast in entire security. Babylon had many watch-towers on its walls. anoint . . . shield—this was done to prevent the leather of the shield becoming hard and liable to crack. "Make ready for defence;" the mention of the "shield" alone implies that it is the Babylonian revellers who are called on to prepare for instant self-defence. HORSLEY translates, "Gripe the oiled shield." 6. God's direction to Isaiah to set a watchman to "declare" what he sees. But as in v. 10, Isaiah himself is represented as the one who "declared." HORSLEY makes him the "watchman," and translates, "Come, let him who standeth on the watch-tower report what he seeth." 7. chariot, &c.—rather, a body of riders (namely, some riding in pairs on horses (lit., pairs of horsemen, i. e., two abreast), others on asses, others on camels (cf. v. 9; ch. 22. 6). "Chariot" is not appropriate to be joined, as English Version translates, with "asses;" the Hebrew means plainly in v. 7, as in v. 9, "a body of men riding." The Persians used asses and camels for war.

[MAURER.] HORSLEY translates, "One drawn in a car, with a pair of riders, drawn by an ass, drawn by a camel;" Cyrus is the man; the car drawn by a camel and ass yoked together and driven by two postillions, one on each, is the joint army of Medes and Persians under their respective leaders. He thinks the more ancient military cars were driven by men riding on the beasts that drew them; v. 9 favours this. 8. A lion—rather "(The watchman) cried, I am as a lion;" so as is understood (ch. 62. 5; Psalm 11. 1). The point of comparison to "a lion" is in Revelation 10. 3, the loudness of the cry. But here it is rather his vigilance. The lion's eyelids are short, so that, even when asleep, he seems to be on the watch, awake; hence he was painted on doors of temples as the symbol of watchfulness, guarding the place. Hor. Apollo. [HORSLEY.] 9. chariot of men—chariots with men in them; or rather, the same body of riders, horsemen two abreast, as in v. 7. [MAURER.] But HORSLEY, "The man drawn in a car with a pair of riders." The first half of this verse describes what the watchman sees; the second half, what the watchman says, in consequence of what he sees. In the interval between v. 7 and 9, the overthrow of Babylon by the horsemen, or man in the car, is accomplished. The overthrow needed to be announced to the prophet by the watchman, owing to the great extent of the city. HERODOTUS (1. 131) says, that one part of the city was captured some time before the other received the tidings of it. answered—not to something said previously, but in reference to the subject in the mind of the writer, to be collected from the preceding discourse; proclaimeth (Job 3. 2; Margin, Daniel 2. 26; Acts 5. 8). fallen . . . fallen—The repetition expresses emphasis and certainty (Psalm 92. 9; 93. 3; cf. Jeremiah 51. 8; Revelation 18. 2). images—Bel, Merodach, &c. (Jeremiah 50. 2; 51. 44, 52). The Persians had no images, temples, or altars, and charged the makers of such with madness (HERODOTUS 1. 131); therefore they dashed the Babylonian "images broken into the ground." 10. my threshing—i. e., my people (the Jews) trodden down by Babylon. corn of my floor—Hebrew, my son of the floor, i. e., my people, treated as corn laid on the floor for threshing; implying, too, that by affliction, a remnant (grain) would be separated from the ungodly (chaff). [MAURER.] HORSLEY translates, "O thou object of my unremitting prophetic pains." See ch. 23. 27, 28. Some, from Jeremiah 51. 33, make Babylon the object of the threshing; but Isaiah is plainly addressing his countrymen, as the next words show, not the Babylonians.

11, 12. A PROPHECY TO THE IDUMEANS WHO TAUNTED THE AFFLICTED JEWS IN THE BABYLONISH CAPTIVITY. One out of Seir asks, What of the night? Is there a hope of the dawn of deliverance? Isaiah replies, The morning is beginning to dawn (to us); but night is also coming (to you). Cf. Psalm 137. 7. The Hebrew captives would be delivered, and taunting Edom punished. If the Idumean wish to ask again, he may do so; if he wishes an answer of peace for his country, then let him "return (repent), come." [BARNES.] 11. Dumah—A tribe and region of Ishmael in Arabia (Genesis 25. 14; 1 Chronicles 1. 30); now called Dumah the Stony, situated on the confines of Arabia and the Syrian desert; a part put for the whole of Edom. VITRINGA thinks "Dumah," Hebrew, "silence," is here used for Idumea, to imply that it was soon to be reduced to silence or destruction. Seir—The principal mountain in Idumea, south of the Dead Sea, in Arabia Petraea. "He calleth" ought to be rather, "There is a call from Seir." to me—Isaiah. So the heathen Balak and Ahaziah received oracles from a Hebrew prophet. watchman—the prophet (ch. 62. 6; Jeremiah 6. 17), so called, because, like a watchman on the look-out from a tower, he announces future events which he sees in prophetic vision (Habakkuk 2. 1, 2). what of the night—What tidings have you to give as to the state of the night? Rather, "What remains of the night?" How much of it is past? [MAURER.] "Night" means calamity (Job 35. 10; Micah 3. 6), which, then, in the wars between Egypt and Assyria, pressed sore on Edom; or on Judah (if, as BARNES thinks, the question is asked in mockery of the suffering Jews in Babylon). The repetition of the question marks, in the former view, the anxiety of the Idumeans. 12. Reply of the prophet, The morning (prosperity) cometh, and (soon after follows) the night (adversity). Though you, Idumeans, may have a gleam of prosperity, it will soon be followed by adversity again. Otherwise, as BARNES, "Prosperity cometh (to the Jews) to be quickly followed by adversity (to you, Idumeans, who exult in the fall of Jerusalem, have seized on the southern part of their land in their absence during the captivity, and now deride them by your question)" (ch. 34. 5-7). This view is favoured by Obadiah 10-21. If ye will inquire, inquire—If ye choose to consult me again, do so (similar phrases occur Genesis 43. 14; 2 Kings 7. 4; Esther 4. 16). return, come—"Be converted to God (and then), come" [GESENIUS]; you will then receive a more favourable answer.

13-17. PROPHECY THAT ARABIA WOULD BE OVERRUN BY A FOREIGN FOE WITHIN A YEAR. Probably in the wars between Assyria and Egypt; Idumea and Arabia lay somewhat on the intermediate line of march. 13. upon—i. e., respecting. forest—not a grove of trees, but a region of thick underwood, rugged and inaccessible: for Arabia has no forest of trees. travelling companies—caravans: ye shall be driven through fear of the foe to unfrequented routes (ch. 33. 8; Judges 5. 6; Jeremiah 49. 8 is parallel to this passage). Dedanim—In North Arabia (Genesis 25. 3; Jeremiah 25. 23; Ezekiel 25. 13; 27. 20; a different "Dedan" occurs Genesis 10. 7). 14. Tema—a kindred tribe: an oasis in that region (Jeremiah 25. 23). The Temaens give water to the faint and thirsting Dedanites; the greatest act of hospitality in the burning lands of the East, where water is so scarce. prevented—i. e., anticipated the wants of the fugitive Dedanites by supplying bread (Genesis 14. 18). their bread—rather, "his (the fugitive's) bread:" the bread due to him, necessary for his support; so "thy grave" (ch. 14. 19). [MAURER.] 15. they—the fugitive Dedanites and other Arabs. 16. years of . . . hireling—(Note, ch. 16. 14.) Kedar—A wandering tribe (Psalm 120. 5). North of Arabia Petrea, and south of Arabia Deserta; put for Arabia in general. 17. residue . . . diminished—the remnant of Arab warriors, famous in the bow, left after the invasion, shall be small.

CHAPTER XXII.

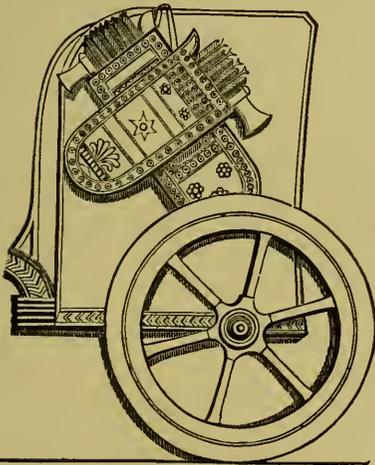

Ver. 1-14. PROPHECY AS TO AN ATTACK ON JERUSALEM: that by Sennacherib, in the 14th year of Hezekiah; v. 8-11, the preparations for defence and securing of water exactly answer to those in 2 Chronicles 32. 4, 5, 30. "Shebna," too (v. 15), was scribe at this time (ch. 36. 3). [MAURER.] The language of v. 12, 13, and 14, as to the infidelity and consequent utter ruin of the Jews, seems rather to foreshadow the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar in Zedekiah's reign, and cannot be restricted to Hezekiah's time. [LOWTH.] 1. of . . . valley of vision—rather, respecting the valley of visions: viz., Jerusalem, the seat of Divine revelations and visions, "the nursery of prophets" [JEROME], (ch. 2. 3; 29. 1; Ezekiel 23. 4, Margin; Luke 13. 33). It lay in a "valley" surrounded by hills higher than Zion and Moriah (Psalm 125. 2; Jeremiah 21. 13). they—the people of Jerusalem personified. house-tops—Panic-struck, they went up on the flat balustraded roofs to look forth and see whether the enemy is near, and partly to defend themselves from the roofs (Judges 9. 51, &c.). 2. art—rather, wert; for it could not now be said to be "a joyous city" (ch. 32. 13). The cause of their joy (v. 13) may have been because Sennacherib had accepted Hezekiah's offer to renew the payment of tribute, and they were glad to have peace on any terms however humiliating (2 Kings 18. 14-16), or on account of the alliance with Egypt. If the reference be to Zedekiah's time, the joy and feasting are not inapplicable, for this recklessness was a general characteristic of the unbelieving Jews (ch. 56. 12). not slain with the sword—but with the famine and pestilence about to be caused by the coming siege (Lamentations 4. 9). MAURER refers this to the plague by which he thinks Sennacherib's army was destroyed, and Hezekiah was made sick (ch. 37. 36; 38. 1). But there is no authority for supposing that the Jews in the city suffered such extremities of plague at that time, when God destroyed their foes. BARNES refers it to those slain in flight, not in open honourable "battle;" v. 3 favours this. 3. rulers—rather, generals (Joshua 10. 24; Judges 11. 6, 11). bound—rather, "are taken," by the archers—lit., by the bow: so ch. 21. 17. Bowmen were the light troops, whose province it was to skirmish in front and (2 Kings 6. 22) pursue fugitives (2 Kings 25. 5); this verse applies better to the attack of Nebuchadnezzar than that of Sennacherib. all . . . in thee—all found in the city (ch. 13. 15), not merely the "rulers" or generals. fled from far—Those who had fled from distant parts to Jerusalem as a place of safety; rather, fled afar. 4. Look . . . from me—Deep grief seeks to be alone; whilst others feast joyously, Isaiah mourns in prospect of the disaster coming on Jerusalem (Micah 1. 8, 9). daughter, &c.—(Note, ch. 1. 8; Lamentations 2. 11.) 5. trouble . . . by the Lord—i. e., sent by or from the Lord (Note, ch. 19. 15; Luke 21. 22-24). valley of vision—(Note v. 1.) Some think a valley near Ophel is meant as about to be the scene of devastation (cf. ch. 32. 13, 14, Note). breaking . . . walls—i. e., "a day of breaking the walls" of the city. crying to the mountains—the mournful cry of the townsmen reaches to (MAURER translates, towards) the mountains, and is echoed back by them. Josephus describes in the very same language the scene at the assault of Jerusalem under Titus. To this the prophecy, probably, refers ultimately. If, as some think, the "cry" is that of those escaping to the mountains, cf. Matthew 13. 14; 24. 16, with this. 6. Elam—the country stretching east from the Lower Tigris, answering to what was afterwards called Persia (Note, ch. 21. 2). Later, Elam was a province of Persia (Ezra 4. 9). In Sennacherib's time, Elam was subject to Assyria (2 Kings 18. 11), and so furnished a contingent to its invading armies. Famed for the bow (ch. 13. 18; Jeremiah 49. 35), in which the Ethiopians alone excelled them. with chariots of men and horsemen—i. e., they use the bow both in chariots and on horseback. "Chariots of men," i. e., chariots in which men are borne, war-chariots (cf. Note, ch. 21. 7, 9). Kir—another people subject to Assyria (2 Kings 16. 9); the region about the river Kur, between the Caspian and Black Seas. uncovered—took off for the battle the leather covering of the shield, intended to protect the embossed figures on it from dust or injury during the march. "The quiver" and "the shield" express two classes—light and heavy armed troops. 7. valleys—East, north, and south of Jerusalem: Hinnom on the south side was the richest valley. in array at the gate—Rabshakeh stood at the upper pool close to the city (ch. 36. 11-13). 8. he discovered the covering—rather, the veil of Judah shall be taken off [HORSELEY]: fig. for exposing to shame as a captive (ch. 47. 3; Nahum 3. 5). Sennacherib dismantled all "the defended cities of Judah" (ch. 36. 1). thou didst look—rather, thou shalt look. house of . . . forest—The house of armoury built of cedar from the forest of Lebanon by Solomon, on a slope of Zion called Ophel (1 Kings 7. 2; 10. 17; Nehemiah 3. 19). Isaiah says (v. 8-13) his countrymen will look to their own strength to defend themselves, whilst others of them will drown their sorrows as to their country in feasting, but none will look to Jehovah. 9. Ye have seen—rather, Ye shall see. city of David—the upper city, on Zion, the south side of Jerusalem (2 Samuel 5. 7, 9; 1 Kings 8. 1); surrounded by a wall of its own; but even in it there shall be "breaches." Hezekiah's preparations for defence accord with this (2 Chronicles 32. 5). ye gathered—rather ye shall gather. lower pool—(Note, v. 11.) Ye shall bring together into the city by subterranean passages cut in the rock of Zion, the fountain from which the lower pool (only mentioned here) is supplied. Note, ch. 7. 3; 2 Kings 20. 20; 2 Chronicles 32. 3-5, represent Hezekiah as having stopped the fountains to prevent the Assyrians getting water. But this is consistent with the passage here. The superfluous waters of the lower pool usually flowed into Hinnom valley, and so through that of Jehoshaphat to the brook Kedron. Hezekiah built a wall round it, stopped the outflowing of its waters to debar the foe from the use of them, and turned them into the city. 10. numbered— rather, ye shall number, viz., in order to see which of them may be pulled down with the least loss to the city, and with most advantage for the repair of the walls and rearing of towers (2 Chronicles 32, 5). have ye broken down—rather, ye shall break down. 11. Ye made . . . a ditch—rather, Ye shall make a reservoir for receiving the water of, &c. Hezekiah surrounded Siloah, from which the old (or king's, or upper) pool took its rise, with a wall joined to the wall of Zion on both sides; between these two walls he made a new pool, into which he directed the waters of the former, thus cutting off the foe from his supply of water also. The opening from which the upper pool received its water was nearer Zion than the other from which the lower pool took its rise, so that the water which flowed from the former could easily be shut in by a wall, whereas that which flowed from the latter could only be brought in by subterranean conduits (cf. Note v. 9; ch. 7, 3; 2 Kings 20, 20; 2 Chronicles 32, 3-5, 30; Ecclesiastes 48, 17). Both were south-west of Jerusalem. have not looked . . . neither had respect—answering by contrast to “Thou didst look to the armour, ye have seen (had respect, or regard to) the breaches” (v. 8, 9). maker thereof—God, by whose command and aid these defences were made, and who gave this fountain “long ago.” G. V. SMITH translates, “Him who doeth it,” i. e., has brought this danger on you—“Him who hath prepared it from afar,” i. e., planned it even from a distant time. 12. did the Lord . . . call—usually the priests gave the summons to national mourning (Joel 1, 14); now JEHOVAH Himself shall give it; the “call” shall consist in the presence of a terrible foe. Translate, shall call. boldness—emblem of grief (Job 1, 20; Micah 1, 16). 13. Notwithstanding Jehovah’s “call to mourning” (v. 12), many shall make the desperate state of affairs a reason for reckless revelry (ch. 5, 11, 12, 14; Jeremiah 18, 12; 1 Corinthians 15, 32).

15-25. PROPHECY THAT SHEBNA SHOULD BE DEPOSED FROM BEING PREFECT OF THE PALACE, AND ELIAKIM PROMOTED TO THE OFFICE. In ch. 36, 3, 22; 37, 2, we find Shebna “a scribe,” and no longer prefect of the palace (“over the household”), and Eliakim in that office, as is here foretold. Shebna is singled out as the subject of prophecy (the only instance of an individual being so in Isaiah), as being one of the irreligious faction that set at naught the prophet’s warnings (ch. 23, -33.); perhaps it was he who advised the temporary ignominious submission of Hezekiah to Sennacherib. 15. Go, get thee unto—rather, Go in to (i. e., into the house to). treasurer—“him who dwells in the tabernacle” [JEROME]; viz., in a room of the temple set apart for the treasurer. Rather, “the king’s friend,” or “principal officer of the court” (1 Kings 4, 5; 18, 3; 1 Chronicles 27, 33; “the king’s counsellor”). [MAURER.] “This” is prefixed contemptuously (Exodus 32, 1). unto Shebna—The Hebrew for unto indicates an accosting of Shebna with an unwelcome message. 16. What . . . whom—The prophet accosts Shebna at the very place where he was building a grand sepulchre for himself and his family (cf. ch. 14, 18; Genesis 23, 49, 29; 50, 13). “What (business) hast thou here, and whom hast thou (of thy family, who is likely to be buried) here, that thou buildest,” &c., seeing that thou art soon to be deposed from office and carried into captivity? [MAURER.] on high—sepulchres were made in the highest rocks (2 Chronicles 32, 33, Margin). habitation for himself—cf. “His own house” (ch. 14, 18). 17. carry . . . away with . . . captivity—rather, “will cast thee away with a mighty throw.” [MAURER.] “Mighty, viz., of a man” (so Job 38, 3). surely cover—viz., with shame, where thou art rearing a monument to perpetuate thy fame. [VITRINGA.] “Rolling will roll thee, i. e., will continually roll thee on, as a ball to be tossed away.” [MAURER.] Cf. v. 18. 18. violently turn and toss—viz., whirling He will whirl thee, i. e., He will, without intermission, whirl thee. [MAURER.] “He will whirl thee round and round, and (then) cast thee away,” as a stone in a sling is first whirled round repeatedly, before the string is let go. [LOWTH.] large country—perhaps Assyria. chariots . . . shall be the shame of thy Lord’s house—rather, “thy splendid chariots shall be there, O thou dlsgrace of thy Lord’s house” [NOYES]; “chariots of thy glory” mean “thy magnificent chariots.” It is not meant that he would have these in a distant land, as he had in Jerusalem, but that he would be borne thither in ignominy instead of in his magnificent chariots. The Jews say that he was tied to the tails of horses by the enemy, to whom he had designed to betray Jerusalem, as they thought he was mocking them; and so he died. 19. state—office. he—God. A similar change of persons occurs (ch. 34, 16). 20. son of Hilkiah—Supposed by ΚΤΜCΗΙ to be the same as Azariah, son of Hilkiah, who perhaps had two names, and who was “over the household” in Hezekiah’s time (1 Chronicles 6, 13). 21. thy robe—of office. girdle—in which the purse was carried, and to it was attached the sword; often adorned with gold and jewels. father—i. e., a counsellor and friend. 22. key—emblem of his office over the house; to “open” or “shut;” access rested with him. upon . . . shoulder—So keys are carried sometimes in the East, hanging from the kerchief on the shoulder. But the phrase is rather fig., for sustaining the government on one’s shoulders. Eliakim, as his name implies, is here plainly a type of the God-man Christ, the son of “David,” of whom Isaiah (ch. 9, 6) uses the same language as the former clause of this verse, and Himself, in Revelation 3, 7, the same language as the latter clause (cf. Job 12, 14). 23. nail . . . sure place—large nails or pegs stood in ancient houses on which were suspended the ornaments of the family. The sense is, All that is valuable to the nation shall rest securely on him. In Ezra 9, 8 “nail” is used of the large spike driven into the ground to fasten the cords of the tent to. throne—resting-place to his family, as applied to Eliakim; but “throne,” in the strict sense, as applied to Messiah the antitype (Luke 1, 32, 33). 24. Same image as in v. 23. It was customary to “hang” the valuables of a house on nails (1 Kings 10, 16, 17, 21; Song of Solomon 4, 4). offspring and issue—rather, “the offshoots of the family, high and low.” [VITRINGA.] Eliakim would reflect honour even on the latter. vessels of cups—of small capacity; answering to the low and humble offshoots. vessels of flagons—larger vessels: answering to the high offshoots. 25. nail . . . fastened—Shebna, who was supposed to be firmly fixed in his post, burden upon it—all that were dependent on Shebna, all his emoluments and rank will fail, as when a peg is suddenly “cut down” the ornaments on it fall with it. Sin reaches in its effects even to the family of the gully (Exodus 20, 5).

CHAPTER XXIII.

Ver. 1-18. PROPHECY RESPECTING TYRE. Menander, the historian, notices a siege of Tyre by Shalmaneser, about the time of the siege of Samaria. Sidon, Acco, and Old Tyre, on the mainland, were soon reduced; but New Tyre, on an island half a mile from the shore, held out for five years. Sargon probably finished the siege. Sennacherib does not, however, mention it among the cities which the Assyrian kings conquered (ch. 36, 37). The expression, “Chaldeans” (v. 13), may imply reference to its siege under Nebuchadnezzar, which lasted thirteen years. Alexander the Great destroyed New Tyre after a seven months’ siege. 1. Tyre—Hebrew, Tsur, i. e., Rock. ships of Tarshish—ships of Tyre returning from their voyage to Tarshish, or Tartessus in Spain, with which the Phœnicians had much commerce (Ezekiel 27, 12-25). “Ships of Tarshish” is a phrase also used of large and distant-voyaging merchant vessels (ch. 2, 16; 1 Kings 10, 22; Psalm 48, 7). no house—viz., left; such was the case as to Old Tyre, after Nebuchadnezzar’s siege. no entering—There is no house to enter (ch. 24, 10). [G. V. SMITH.] Or, Tyre is so laid waste, that there is no possibility of entering the harbour [BARNES]; which is appropriate to the previous “ships.” Chittim—Cyprus, of which the cities, including Citium in the south (whence came “Chittim”), were mostly Phœnician (Ezekiel 27, 6). The ships from Tarshish on their way to Tyre learn the tidings (“it is revealed to them”) of the downfall of Tyre. (At a later period Chittim denoted the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean (Daniel 11, 30). 2. Be still—struck dumb with awe. Addressed to those already in the country, eye-witnesses of its ruin (Lamentations 2. 10); or, in contrast to the busy din of commerce once heard in Tyre; now all is hushed and still. Isle—strictly applicable to New Tyre: in the sense coast, to the mainland city, Old Tyre (cf. v. 6; ch. 20. 6). Zidon—of which Tyre was a colony, planted when Zidon was conquered by the Philistines of Ascalon. Zidon means a fishing station: this was its beginning. replenished—with wealth and an industrious population (Ezekiel 27. 3, 8, 23). Here “Zidon,” as the oldest city of Phœnicia, includes all the Phœnician towns on the strip of “coast.” Thus, Ethbaal, king of Tyre (Josephus, Antiquities, 8. 3, 2), is called king of the Sidonians (1 Kings 16. 31); and on coins Tyre is called the metropolis of the Sidonians. 3. great waters—the wide waters of the sea. seed—grain, or crop, as in 1 Samuel 8. 15; Job 39. 12. Sihor—lit., Dark-coloured: applied to the Nile, as the Egyptian Jeor, and the Greek Melas, to express the dark, turbid colours given to its waters by the fertilizing soil which it deposits at its yearly overflow (Jeremiah 2. 18). harvest of the river—the growth of the Delta; the produce due to the overflow of the Nile: Egypt was the great granary of corn in the ancient world (Genesis 41.; 42.; 43). her revenue—Tyrian vessels carried Egyptian produce got in exchange for wine, oil, glass, &c., into various lands, and so made large profits. mart—(Ezekiel 27. 3.) No city was more favourably situated for commerce. 4. Zidon—called on, as being the parent country of Tyre (v. 12), and here equivalent to Phœnicia in general, to feel the shame (as it was esteemed in the East) of being now as childless as if she never had any. “I (no more now) travail, nor bring forth,” &c. “Strength of the sea,” i. e., stronghold, viz., New Tyre, on a rock (as “Tyre” means) surrounded by the sea (Ezekiel 26. 4; 15. 17; so Venice was called “Bride of the sea;” Zechariah 9. 3). 5. As, &c.,—rather, “When the report (shall reach) the people of Egypt, they shall be sorely pained at the report concerning Tyre” (viz., its overthrow). So JEROME, “When the Egyptians shall hear that so powerful a neighbouring nation has been destroyed, they must know their own end is near.” [LOWTH, &c.] 6. Pass . . . over—Escape from Tyre to your colonies as Tarshish (cf. v. 12). The Tyrians fled to Carthage and elsewhere, both at the siege under Nebuchadnezzar and that under Alexander. 7. Is this silent ruin all that is left of your once joyous city (v. 12)? antiquity—The Tyrian priests boasted in Herodotus’ time that their city had already existed 2300 years: an exaggeration, but still implying that it was ancient even then. her own feet—walking on foot as captives to an enemy’s land. 8. Who—answered in v. 9, “The Lord of hosts.” crowning—crowning: i. e., the city from which dependent kingdoms had arisen, as Tartessus in Spain, Citium in Cyprus, and Carthage in Africa (Ezekiel 27. 33). traffickers—lit., Canaanites, who were famed for commerce (cf. Hosea 12. 7, Margin). 9. Whoever be the instruments in overthrowing haughty sinners, God, who has all hosts at His command, is the First Cause (ch. 10. 5-7). stain—rather, to profane: as in Exodus 31. 14, the Sabbath, and other objects of religious reverence; so here, “the pride of all glory” may refer to the Tyrian temple of Hercules, the oldest in the world, according to Arrian (ch. 2. 16): the prophet of the true God would naturally single out for notice the idol of Tyre. [G. V. SMITH.] It may, however, be a general proposition; the destruction of Tyre will exhibit to all how God mars the lustre of whatever is haughty (ch. 2. 11). 10. a river—Hebrew, the river, viz., Nile, daughter of Tarshish—Tyre and its inhabitants (ch. 1. 8), about henceforth, owing to the ruin of Tyre, to become inhabitants of its colony, Tartessus: they would pour forth from Tyre, as waters flow on the barriers are removed. [LOWTH.] Rather, Tarshish, or Tartessus and its inhabitants, as the phrase usually means: they had been kept in hard bondage, working in silver and lead mines near Tarshish, by the parent city (Ezekiel 26. 17): but now the bond of restraint (for so “strength,” Margin, girdle, i. e., bond, Psalm 2. 3, ought to be translated) is removed, since Tyre is no more. 11. He—Jehovah, kingdoms—the Phœnician cities and colonies, the merchant city—rather, Canaan, meaning the north of it, viz., Phœnicia. On their coins, they call their country Canaan. 12. He—God, rejoice—riotously (v. 7). oppressed—“deflowered,” laying aside the figure taken by storm: the Arabs compare a city never taken to an undefiled virgin (cf. Nahum 3. 5, &c.). daughter of Zidon—Tyre: or else, sons of Zidon, i. e., the whole land and people of Phœnicia (Note v. 2). [MAURER.] Chittim—Citium in Cyprus (v. 1). there also . . . no rest—Thy colonies, having been harshly treated by thee, will now repay thee in kind (Note v. 10). But VITRINGA refers it to the calamities which befel the Tyrians in their settlements subsequently, viz., Sicily, Coreyra, Carthage, and Spain, all flowing from the original curse of Noah against the posterity of Canaan (Genesis 9. 25-27). 13. Behold—Calling attention to the fact, so humiliating to Tyre, that a people of yesterday, like the Chaldees, should destroy the most ancient of cities, Tyre, was not—had no existence as a recognized nation; the Chaldees were previously but a rude, predatory people (Job 1. 17). Assyrian founded it—The Chaldees (“them that dwell in the wilderness”) lived a nomadic life in the mountains of Armenia originally (Arphaxad, in Genesis 10. 22, refers to such a region of Assyria near Armenia), north and east of Assyria proper. Some may have settled in Mesopotamia and Babylonia very early, and given origin to the astrologers called Chaldees in later times. But most of the people had been transferred only a little before the time of this prophecy from their original seats in the north to Mesopotamia, and soon afterwards to South Babylonia. “Founded it,” means “assigned it (the land) to them who had (heretofore) dwelt in the wilderness” as a permanent settlement (so in Psalm 104. 8). [MAURER.] It was the Assyrian policy to infuse into their own population of the plain the fresh blood of hardy mountaineers, for the sake of recruiting their armies. Ultimately the Chaldees, by their powerful priest-caste, gained the supremacy, and established the later or Chaldean empire. HORSLEY refers it to Tyre, founded by an Assyrian race. towers thereof—viz., of Babylon, whose towers, HERODOTUS says, were “set up” by the Assyrians. [BARNES.] Rather, “The Chaldees set up their siege-towers” against Tyre, made for the attack of high walls, from which the besiegers hurled missiles, as depicted in the Assyrian sculptures. [G. V. SMITH.] raised up—rather, “They lay bare,” viz., the foundations of her (Tyre’s) palaces, i. e., utterly overthrow them (Psalm 137. 7). 14. strength—stronghold (cf. Ezekiel 26. 15-18). 15. forgotten—Having lost its former renown, Tyre shall be in obscurity. seventy years—(so Jeremiah 25. 11, 12; 29. 10). days of one king—i. e., a dynasty. The Babylonian monarchy lasted properly but seventy years. From the first year of Nebuchadnezzar to the taking of Babylon, by Cyrus, was seventy years; then the subjected nations would be restored to liberty. Tyre was taken in the middle of that period, but it is classed in common with the rest, some conquered sooner and others later, all, however, alike about to be delivered at the end of the period. So “king” is used for dynasty (Daniel 7. 17; 8. 20): Nebuchadnezzar, his son Evil-merodach, and his grandson, Belshazzar, formed the whole dynasty (Jeremiah 25. 11, 12; 27. 7; 29. 10). shall Tyre sing as . . . harlot—It shall be to Tyre as the song of the harlot, viz., a harlot that has been forgotten, but who attracts notice again by her song. Large marts of commerce are often compared to harlots seeking many lovers, i. e., they court merchants of all nations, and admit any one for the sake of gain (Nahum 3. 4; Revelation 18. 3). Covetousness is closely akin to idolatry and licentiousness, as the connection (Ephesians 5. 5; Colossians 3. 5) proves (cf. ch. 2. 6-8, 16). 16. Same figure to express that Tyre would again prosper and attract commercial intercourse of nations to her, and be the same joyous, self-indulging city as before. 17. visit—not in wrath, but mercy. hire—Infrage from a harlot; her gains by commerce. After the Babylonian dynasty was ended, Tyre was rebuilt; also, again, after the destruction under Alexander. 18. merchandise . . . holiness—Her traffic and gains shall at last (long after the restoration mentioned in v. 17) be consecrated to Jehovah. Jesus Christ visited the neighbourhood of Tyre (Matthew 15. 21); Paul found disciples there (Acts 21. 3-6); it early became a Christian bishopric, but the full evangelization of that whole race, as of the Ethiopians (ch. 18.), of the Egyptians and Assyrians (ch. 19.), is yet to come (ch. 60. 5). not treasured—but freely expended in His service. them that dwell before the Lord—the ministers of religion. But HORSLEY translates, “them that sit before Jehovah” as disciples. durable clothing—Changes of raiment constituted much of the wealth of former days.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE LAST TIMES OF THE WORLD IN GENERAL, AND OF JUDAH AND THE CHURCH IN PARTICULAR. The four chaps. 21-27. form one continuous poetical prophecy: descriptive of the dispersion and successive calamities of the Jews (ch. 21. 1-12); the preaching of the gospel by the first Hebrew converts throughout the world (v. 13-16); the judgments on the adversaries of the Church and its final triumph (v. 16-23); thanksgiving for the overthrow of the apostate faction (ch. 25.), and establishment of the righteous in lasting peace (ch. 26.); judgment on leviathan and entire purgation of the Church (ch. 27). Having treated of the several nations in particular—Babylon, Philistia, Moab, Syria, Israel, Egypt, Edom, and Tyre (the miniature representative of all, as all kingdoms flocked into it)—he passes to the last times of the world at large and of Judah the representative and future head of the churches.

Ver. 1-23. 1. the earth—rather, the land of Judah (so in v. 3, 5, 6; Joel 1. 2). The desolation under Nebuchadnezzar prefigured that under Titus. 2. as with . . . people, so with the priest—All alike shall share the same calamity: no favoured class shall escape (cf. Ezekiel 7. 12, 13; Hosea 4. 9; Revelation 6. 15). 4. world—the kingdom of Israel; as in ch. 13. 11, Babylon. haughty—tit., the height of the people: abstract for concrete, i. e., the high people; even the nobles share the general distress. 5. earth—rather, the land. defiled under . . . inhabitants—viz., with innocent blood (Genesis 4. 11; Numbers 35. 33; Psalm 106. 38). laws . . . ordinance . . . everlasting covenant—The moral laws, positive statutes, and national covenant designed to be for ever between God and them. 6. earth—the land. burned—viz., with the consuming wrath of heaven: either internally, as Job 30. 30 [ROSENMULLER]; or externally, the prophet has before his eyes the people being consumed with the withering dryness of their doomed land (so Joel 1. 10, 12). [MAURER.] 7. mourneth—because there are none to drink it. [BARNES.] Rather, is become capid. [HORSLEY.] languisheth—because there are none to cultivate it now. 8. (Revelation 18. 22.) 9. with a song—the usual accompaniment of feasts. strong drink—(Note, ch. 5. 11.) “Date wine” [HORSLEY]. bitter—in consequence of the national calamities. 10. city of confusion—rather, desolation. What Jerusalem would be; by anticipation it is called so. HORSLEY translates, “The city is broken down; it is a ruin.” shut up—through fear; or rather, choked up by ruins. 11. crying for wine—to drown their sorrows in drink (ch. 16. 9); Joel 1. 5, written about the same time, resembles this. 12. with destruction—rather, crash. [GESENIUS.] “With a great tumult the gate is battered down.” [HORSLEY.] 13. the land—Judea. Put the comma after “land,” not after “people.” “There shall be among the people (a remnant left), as the shaking (the after-picking) of an olive tree:” as in gathering olives, a few remain on the highest boughs (ch. 17. 5, 6). 14. They—Those who are left; the remnant. slung for the majesty of the Lord—sing a thanksgiving for the goodness of the Lord, who has so mercifully preserved them. from the sea—from the distant lands beyond the sea, whither they have escaped. 15. in the fires—VITRINGA translates, “in the caves.” Could it mean the fires of affliction (1 Peter 1. 7)? They were exiles at the time. The fires only loose the carnal bonds of the soul, without injuring a hair, as in the case of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. LOWTH reads, in the islands (Ezekiel 26. 18). Rather translate for “fires,” “in the regions of morning light,” i. e., the east, in antithesis to the “isles of the sea,” i. e., the west. [MAURER.]

Wheresoever ye be scattered, east or west, still glorify the Lord (Malachi 1. 11). 16. Songs to God come in together to Palestine from distant lands, as a grand chorus. glory to the righteous—the burden of the songs (ch. 26. 2, 7). Amidst exile, the loss of their temple, and all that is dear to man, their confidence in God is unshaken. These songs recall the joy of other times, and draw from Jerusalem in her present calamities, the cry, “My leanness,” HORSLEY translates, “glory to the Just One:” then My leanness expresses his sense of man’s corruption, which led the Jews, “the treacherous dealers” (Jeremiah 5. 11), to crucify the Just One; and his deficiency of righteousness which made him need to be clothed with the righteousness of the Just One (Psalm 106. 15). treacherous dealers—the foreign nations that oppress Jerusalem, and overcome it by stratagem (so in ch. 21. 2). [BARNES.] 17. This verse explains the wretchedness spoken of in v. 16. Jeremiah (48. 43, 44) uses the same words. They are proverbial; v. 18 expressing that the inhabitants were nowhere safe; if they escaped one danger, they fell into another, and worse, on the opposite side (Amos 5. 19). “Fear” is the term applied to the cords with feathers of all colours which, when fluttered in the air, scare beasts into the pitfall, or birds into the snare. HORSLEY makes the connection. Indignant at the treatment which the Just One received, the prophet threatens the guilty land with instant vengeance. 18. noise of . . . fear—the shout designed to rouse the game and drive it into the pitfall. windows . . . open—taken from the account of the deluge (Genesis 7. 11); the flood-gates. So the final judgments of fire on the apostate world are compared to the deluge (2 Peter 3. 5-7). 19. earth—the land; image from an earthquake. 20. removed like a cottage—(Note, ch. 1. 8.) Here, a hanging couch, suspended from the trees by cords, such as Niebuhr describes the Arab keepers of lands as having, to enable them to keep watch, and at the same time to be secure from wild beasts. Translate, “Shall wave to and fro like a hammock” swung about by the wind. heavy upon it—like an overwhelming burden. not rise again—not meaning, that it never would rise (v. 23), but in those convulsions it would not rise, it would surely fall. 21. host of . . . high ones—the heavenly host, i. e., either the visible host of heaven (the present economy of nature, affected by the sun, moon, and stars, the objects of idolatry, being abolished, ch. 65. 17; 60. 19, simultaneously with the corrupt polity of men); or rather, the invisible rulers of the darkness of this world, as the antithesis to “kings of the earth” shows. Angels, moreover, preside, as it were, over kingdoms of the world (Daniel 10. 13, 20, 21). 22. in the pit—rather, for the pit. [HORSLEY.] “In the dungeon.” [MAURER.] Image from captives thrust together into a dungeon. prison—i. e., as in a prison. This sheds light on the disputed passage, 1 Peter 3. 19, where also the prison is fig. The “shutting up” of the Jews in Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar, and again under Titus, was to be followed by a visitation of mercy “after many days”—seventy years in the case of the former—the time is not yet elapsed in the case of the latter. HORSLEY takes “visited” in a bad sense, viz., in wrath, as in ch. 26. 14; cf. ch. 29. 6; the punishment being the heavier in the fact of the delay. Probably a double visitation is intended, deliverance to the elect, wrath to hardened unbelievers; as v. 23 plainly contemplates judgments on proud sinners, symbolized by the “sun” and “moon.” 23. (Jeremiah 3. 17.) Still future: of which Jesus’ triumphal entry into Jerusalem amidst hosannas was a pledge. his ancients—the elders of His people; or in general, His ancient people, the Jews. After the overthrow of the world-kingdoms, Jehovah’s shall be set up with a splendour exceeding the light of the sun and moon under the previous order of things (ch. 60. 19, 20).

CHAPTER XXV.

Ver. 1-12. CONTINUATION OF CHAP. 24. THANKSGIVING FOR THE OVERTHROW OF THE APOSTATE FACTION, AND THE SETTING UP OF JEHOVAH’S THRONE ON ZION. The restoration from Babylon and re-establishment of the theocracy was a type and pledge of this. 1. wonderful

—(Ch. 9, 6.) counsels of old—(Ch. 42, 9; 46, 10.) Purposes planned long ago; here, as to the deliverance of His people. truth—Hebrew, Amen; covenant-keeping, faithful to promises; the peculiar characteristic of Jesus (Revelation 3, 14). 2. a city . . . heap—Babylon, type of the seat of Antichrist, to be destroyed in the last days (cf. Jeremiah 51, 37, with Revelation 18, followed, as here, by the song of the saints' thanksgiving in Revelation 19). "Heaps" is a graphic picture of Babylon and Nineveh as they now are. palace—Babylon regarded, on account of its splendour, as a vast palace. But MAURER translates, a citadel. of strangers—foreigners, whose capital pre-eminently Babylon was, the metropolis of the pagan world. "Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, strangers from the covenants of promise" (ch. 29, 5; Ephesians 2, 12; see in contrast, Joel 3, 17). never be built—(Ch. 13, 19, 20, &c.) 3. strong people—This cannot apply to the Jews; but other nations on which Babylon had exercised its cruelty (ch. 14, 12) shall worship Jehovah, awed by the judgment inflicted on Babylon (ch. 23, 18). city—not Babylon, which shall then be destroyed, but collectively for the cities of the surrounding nations. 4. the poor . . . needy—the Jews, exiles from their country (ch. 26, 6; 41, 17). heat—calamity (ch. 4, 6; 32, 2). blast—i. e., wrath. storm—a tempest of rain, a winter flood, rushing against and overthrowing the wall of a house. 5. Translate, "As the heat in a dry land [is brought down by the shadow of a cloud, so] thou shalt bring down the tumult [the shout of triumph over their enemies] of strangers (foreigners); and as the heat by the shadow of the cloud [is brought low], so the branch (the offspring) of the terrible ones shall be brought low." PARKURST translates the Hebrew for "branch," the cutting song. JEROME translates the last clause, "And as when the heat burns under a cloud, thou shalt make the branch of the terrible ones to wither;" the branch withering even under the friendly shade of a cloud typifies the wicked brought to ruin, not for want of natural means of prosperity, but by the immediate act of God. 6. in this mountain—Zion; Messiah's kingdom was to begin, and is to have its central seat hereafter, at Jerusalem, as the common country of "all nations" (ch. 2, 2, &c.). all people—(Ch. 56, 7; Daniel 7, 14; Luke 2, 10.) feast—image of felicity (Psalm 22, 26, 27; Matthew 8, 11; Luke 14, 15; Revelation 19, 9; cf. Psalm 36, 8; 87). fat things—delicacies; the rich mercies of God in Christ (ch. 55, 2; Jeremiah 31, 14; Job 36, 16). wines on the lees—wine which has been long kept on the lees; i. e., the oldest and most generous wine (Jeremiah 48, 11). marrow—the choicest dainties (Psalm 63, 5). well refined—cleared of all dregs. 7. face of . . . covering—image from mourning, in which it was usual to cover the face with a veil (2 Samuel 15, 30). "Face of covering," i. e., the covering itself; as Job 41, 13, "the face of his garment," the garment itself. The covering or veil is the mist of ignorance as to a future state, and the way to eternal life, which enveloped the nations (Ephesians 4, 18) and the unbelieving Jew (2 Corinthians 3, 15). The Jew, however, is first to be converted before the conversion of "all nations;" for it is "in this mountain," viz., Zion, that the latter are to have the veil taken off (Psalm 102, 13, 15, 16, 21, 22; Romans 11, 12). 8. Quoted in 1 Corinthians 15, 54, in support of the resurrection. swallow up . . . in victory—completely and permanently "abolish" (2 Timothy 1, 10; Revelation 20, 14; 21, 4; cf. Genesis 2, 17; 3, 22). rebuke—(Cf. Mark 8, 33; Hebrews 11, 26.) 9. "After death has been swallowed up for ever, the people of God, who had been delivered from the hand of death, shall say to the Lord, Lo, this is our God, whom unbelievers regarded as only a man." [JEROME.] "The words are so moulded as to point us specially to the person of the Son of God, who 'saves' us; as He vouchsafed to Israel temporal saving, so to His elect He appears for the purpose of conferring eternal salvation." [VITRINGA.] The Jews, however, have a special share in the words, This is our God (Note, v. 6). "In day . . . glad . . . rejoice," cf. Psalm 118, 24, which refers to the second coming of Jesus (cf. Psalm 118, 26, with Luke 13, 35). "Waited" is characteristic of God's people in all ages (Genesis 49, 18; Titus 2, 13). 10. rest—as its permanent protector; on "hand" in this sense, cf. Ezra 7, 6, 23. Moab—whilst Israel is being protected, the foe is destroyed; Moab is the representative of all the foes of God's people. under him—Rather, in his own place or country (Exodus 10, 23; 16, 29). for the dunghill—Rather, in the water of the dung-heap, in which straw was trodden to make it manure (Psalm 83, 10). HORSLEY translates either, "in the waters of Madmenah," viz., for the making of bricks; or as LXX., "as the threshing-floor is trampled by the corn-drag" (see Margin, Micah 4, 11-13). 11. he—Jehovah shall spread His hands to strike the foe on this side and on that, with as little effort as a swimmer spreads forth his arms to cleave a passage through the water. [CALVIN.] (Zechariah 5, 3.) LOWTH takes "he" as Moab, who, in danger of sinking, shall strain every nerve to save himself; but Jehovah (and "he") shall cause him to sink ("bring down the pride" of Moab, ch. 16, 6). with the spoils of . . . hands—lit., the craftily-acquired spoils of his (Moab's) hauds. [BARNES.] Moab's pride, as well as the sudden gripe of his hands (viz., whereby he tries to save himself from drowning). [LOWTH.] "Together with the joints of his hands," i. e., though Moab struggle against Jehovah hand and foot. [MAURER.] 12. fortress—the strongholds of Moab, the representative of the foes of God's people. [BARNES.] Babylon. [MAURER.] The society of infidels represented as a city (Revelation 11, 8).

CHAPTER XXVI.

Ver. 1-21. CONNECTED WITH CHAPTERS 24, 25. SONG OF PRAISE OF ISRAEL AFTER BEING RESTORED TO THEIR OWN LAND. As the overthrow of the apostate faction is described in ch. 25, so the peace of the faithful is here described under the image of a well-fortified city. 1. strong city—Jerusalem, strong in Jehovah's protection: type of the new Jerusalem (Psalm 48, 1-3), contrasted with the overthrow of the ungodly foe (v. 4-7, 12-14; Revelation 22, 2, 10-12, &c.). salvation . . . walls—(Ch. 60, 18; Jeremiah 3, 23; Zechariah 2, 5). MAURER translates, "Jehovah makes His help serve as walls," &c. (ch. 33, 20, 21, &c.). bulwarks—the trench with the antemural earthworks exterior to the wall. 2. Address of the returning people to the gates of Jerusalem (type of the heavenly city, Hebrews 12, 22); (Psalm 24, 7, 9; 118, 19). Antitypically (Revelation 22, 14; 21, 25, 27). righteous nation—that had not apostatized during the captivity. HORSLEY translates, "The nation of the Just One," viz., the Jews. 3. mind . . . stayed—(Psalm 112, 7, 8.) Jesus can create "perfect peace" within thy mind, though storms of trial rage without (ch. 57, 19; Mark 4, 39); as a city kept securely by a strong garrison within, though besieged without (so Philippians 4, 7). "Keep," lit., guard as with a garrison. HORSLEY translates, (God's) workmanship (the Hebrew does not probably mean "mind," but "a thing formed," Ephesians 2, 10), so constantly "supported;" or else "formed and supported (by thee) thou shalt preserve (it, viz., the righteous nation) in perpetual peace." 4. Lord Jehovah—Hebrew, Jah, Jehovah. The union of the two names expresses in the highest degree God's unchanging love and power (cf. Psalm 68, 4). This passage, and ch. 12, 2; Exodus 6, 3; Psalm 83, 18, are the four in which the English Version retains the JEHOVAH of the original. MAURER translates, "For JAH (the eternal unchangeable One, Exodus 3, 14) is JEHOVAH, the rock of ages" (cf. ch. 45, 17; Deuteronomy 32, 15; 1 Samuel 2, 2). 5. lofty city—Babylon; representative of the stronghold of the foes of God's people in all ages (ch. 25, 2, 12; 13, 14). 6. poor—(ch. 25, 4), the once-afflicted Jewish captives. "Foot shall tread," is fig. for exulting in the fall of God's enemies (Revelation 18, 20). 7. uprightness—rather, is direct, i. e., is directed by God to a prosperous issue, however many be their afflictions in the mean time (as in the case of the Jewish exiles); the context requires this sense (Psalm 34, 19; Proverbs 3, 6; 11, 5), [MAURER:] thus "way" means God's dealings with the righteous (Psalm 37, 23). most upright—(Deuteronomy 32, 4.) dost weigh—(1 Samuel 2, 3; Proverbs 5, 21.) Rather, thou dost make plain and level [MAURER], removing all obstacles (ch. 40, 3, 4). 8. way of thy judgments—we have wanted for thy proceeding to punish the enemy (v. 9, 10). [MAURER.] HORSLEY translates v. 7, 8, "The path of the Just One is perfectly even; an even road thou wilt level for the Just One, even the path of thy laws, O Jehovah. We have expected thee." name . . . remembrance—the manifested character of God by which He would be remembered (ch. 64. 5; Exodus 3. 15). 9. With . . . soul . . . I—lit., I . . . my soul, in apposition; the faithful Jews here speak individually. The overthrow of the foe, and the restoration of the Jews, are to follow upon prayer on the part of the latter and of all God's people (ch. 62. 1-4, 6, 7; Psalm 102. 13-17). in the night—(Psalm 63. 6; Song of Solomon 3. 1) world . . . learn . . . righteousness—the remnant left after judgments (Psalm 58. 10, 11; Zechariah 14. 16). 10. uprightiness—rather, as in v. 7, prosperity, answering to "favour" in the parallelism, and in antithesis to "judgments in the earth" (v. 9); where prosperity attends the wicked as well as the just, "he will not learn righteousness," therefore judgments must be sent that he may "learn" it. [MAURER.] 11. lifted up—to punish the foes of God's people. They who will not see shall be made to "see" to their cost (ch. 5. 12). their envy at the (i. e., thy) people—LOWTH translates, "They shall see with confusion thy zeal for thy people." fire of enemies—i. e., the fire to which thine enemies are doomed (ch. 9. 18). 12. peace—God's favour, including all blessings, temporal and spiritual, opposed to their previous trials (Psalm 138. 8). 13. other lords—temporal; heathen kings (2 Chronicles 12. 8; 28. 5, 6). Nebuchadnezzar, &c. Spiritual also, idols and lusts (Romans 6. 16-18), by thee only—i. e. it is due to thee alone, that we again worship thee as our Lord. [MAURER.] "(We are) thine only, we will celebrate thy name." [HORSLEY.] The sanctifying effect of affliction (Psalm 71. 16; 119. 67, 71). 14. They—The "other lords" or tyrants (v. 13). shall not live—viz., again. deceased—Hebrew, Rephaim; powerless, in the land of shades (ch. 14. 9, 10). therefore—i. e., inasmuch as. Cf. "therefore" (Genesis 18. 5; 19. 8). 15. hast—prophetic preterite (ch. 9. 3). hast removed . . . far . . . ends of . . . earth—rather, "Thou hast extended far all the borders of the land." [VTRINGA.] 16. visited—sought—poured out (Psalm 62. 8), as a vessel emptying out all its contents. prayer—lit., a whispered prayer, Margin, a secret sighing to God for help (cf. Jeremiah 13. 17; Deuteronomy 8. 16). 17. An image of anguish accompanied with expectation, to be followed by joy that will cause the anguish utterly to be forgotten. Zion, looking for deliverance, seemingly in vain, but really about to be gloriously saved (Micah 4. 9, 10-13; 5. 1-3; John 16. 21, 22). 18. brought forth wind—MICHAELIS explains this of the disease emphysema. Rather, "wind" is a figure for that which proves an abortive effort. The "we" is in antithesis to "thy," "my" (v. 19), what we vainly attempt, God will accomplish. not wrought . . . deliverance in . . . earth—lit., the land (Judea) is not made security, i. e., is not become a place of security from our enemies. nor . . . world . . . fallen—the "world" at large, is in antithesis to "the earth," i. e., Judea. The world at enmity with the city of God has not been subdued. But MAURER explains "fallen," according to Arabic idiom, of the birth of a child, which is said to fall when being born; "inhabitants of the world (Israel, ch. 24. 4; not the world in general) are not yet born;" i. e., the country as yet lies desolate, and is not yet populated. 19. In antithesis to v. 14, "They (Israel's foes) shall not live;" "thy (Jehovah's) dead men (the Jews) shall live," i. e., primarily, be restored, spiritually (ch. 51. 1-3), civily and nationally (v. 15); whereas thy foes shall not; ultimately, and in the fullest scope of the prophecy, restored to life literally (Ezekiel 37. 1-14; Daniel 12. 2). together with my dead body—rather, my dead body, or bodies (the Jewish nation personified, which had been spiritually and civilly dead; or the nation, as a parent, speaking of the bodies of her children individually, Note, v. 9, "I," "My"); Jehovah's "dead" and "my dead" are one and the same. [HORSLEY.] However, as Jesus is the antitype to Israel (Matthew 2. 15), English Version gives a true sense, and one ultimately contemplated in the prophecy: Christ's dead body being raised again is the source of Jehovah's people (all), and especially believers, the spli-ritual Israelites also being raised (1 Corinthians 15. 20-22). awake—(Ephesians 5. 14), spiritually. in dust—prostrate and dead, spiritually and nationally; also literally (ch. 25. 12; 47. 1). dew—which falls copiously in the East and supplies somewhat the want of rain (Hosea 14. 5). cast out . . . dead—i. e., shall bring them forth to life again. 20. enter . . . chambers—When God is about to take vengeance on the ungodly, the saints shall be shut in by Him in a place of safety, as Noah and his family were in the days of the flood (Genesis 7. 16), and as Israel was commanded not to go out of doors on the night of the slaying of the Egyptian first-born (Exodus 12. 22, 23; Psalm 31. 20; 83. 3). The saints are calmly and confidently to await the issue (Exodus 14. 13, 14). 21. (Micah 1. 3; Jude 14.) disclose . . . blood—(Genesis 4. 10, 11; Job 16. 18; Ezekiel 24. 7, 8.) All the innocent blood shed, and all other wrongs done, so long seemingly with impunity, shall then be avenged (Revelation 16. 6).

CHAPTER XXVII.

Ver. 1-13. CONTINUATION OF CHAPTERS 24., 25., 26. At the time when Israel shall be delivered, and the ungodly nations punished, God shall punish also the great enemy of the Church. 1. sore—rather, hard, well-tempered, Leviathan—lit., in Arabic, the twisted animal, applicable to every great tenant of the waters, sea-serpents, crocodiles, &c. In Ezekiel 29. 3; 32. 2; Daniel 7. 1, &c.; Revelation 12. 3, &c., potentates hostile to Israel are similarly described; antitypically and ultimately Satan is intended (Revelation 20. 10). piercing—rigid. [LOWTH.] Flying. [MAURER and LXX.] Long, extended, viz., as the crocodile which cannot readily bend back its body. [HOUBIGANT.] crooked—winding. dragon—Hebrew, *tenin; the crocodile. sea—the Euphrates, or the expansion of it near Babylon. 2. In that day when Leviathan shall be destroyed, the vineyard (Psalm 80. 8), the Church of God, purged of its blemishes, shall be lovely in God's eyes; to bring out this sense the better, LOWTH, by changing a Hebrew letter, reads pleasant, lovely, for "red wine." sing—a responsive song. [LOWTH.] unto her—rather, concerning her (Note, ch. 5. 1); viz., the Jewish state. [MAURER.] 3. lest any hurt it—ask it. [MAURER.] Lest ought be wanting in her. [HORSLEY.] 4. Fury is not in me—i. e., I entertain no longer anger towards my vine. who would set . . . in battle—i. e., he is not to lead the briars, &c. (the wicked foe; ch. 9. 18; 10. 17; 2 Samuel 23. 6), before me! "I would go through," or rather, "against them." 5. Or—Else; the only alternative, if Israel's enemies wish to escape being "burnt together." strength—rather, the refuge which I afford. [MAURER.] "Take hold," refers to the horns of the altar which fugitives often laid hold of as an asylum (1 Kings 1. 50; 2. 28). Jesus is God's "strength" or "refuge" which sinners must repair to and take hold of, if they are to have "peace" with God (ch. 45. 24; Romans 5. 1; Ephesians 2. 14; cf. Job 22. 21). 6. He—Jehovah. Here the song of the Lord as to His vineyard (v. 2-5) ends; and the prophet confirms the sentiment in the song, under the same image of a vine (cf. Psalm 92. 13-15; Hosea 14. 5, 6). Israel . . . fill . . . world—(Romans 11. 12.) 7. him . . . those—Israel—Israel's enemies. Has God punished His people as severely as He has those enemies whom he employed to chastise Israel? No! Far from it. Israel, after trials, He will restore; Israel's enemies He will utterly destroy at last. the slaughter of them that are slain by him—rather, "Is Israel slain according to the slaughter of the enemy slain?" the slaughter where-with the enemy is slain. [MAURER.] 8. In measure—Not beyond measure; in moderation (Job 23. 6; Psalm 6. 1; Jeremiah 10. 24; 30. 11; 46. 28). when it shooteth—image from the vine; rather, passing from the image to the thing itself, "when sending her away (viz., Israel to exile; ch. 50. 1, God only putting the adulteress away when he might justly have put her to death) thou didst punish her." [GESENIUS.] stayeth—rather, as Margin, "when He removeth it by His rough wind in the day," &c. east wind—especially violent in the East (Job 27. 21; Jeremiah 18. 17). 9. By this—Exile of Israel (the "sending away," v. 8). purged—expiated. [HORSLEY.] all the fruit—this is the whole benefit designed to be brought about by the chastisement, namely, the removal of his (Israel's) sin (viz., object of idolatry; Deuteronomy 9. 21; Hosea 10. 8). when He—Jehovah; at the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, His instrument. The Jews ever since have abhorred idolatry (cf. ch. 17. 8). not stand up—shall rise no more. [HORSLEY.] 10. city—Jerusalem; the beating asunder of whose altars and images was mentioned in v. 9 (cf. ch. 24. 10-12). caif feed—(ch. 17. 2), it shall be a vast wild pasture. branches—resuming the image of the vine (v. 2. 6). 11. boughs . . . broken off—so the Jews are called (Romans 11. 17, 19, 20). set . . . on fire—burn them as fuel; "women" are specified, as probably it was their office to collect fuel and kindle the fire for cooking. no understanding—as to the ways of God (Deuteronomy 32. 23, 29; Jeremiah 5. 21; Hosea 4. 6). 12. Restoration of the Jews from their dispersion, described under the image of fruits shaken from trees and collected. beat off—as fruit beaten off a tree with a stick (Deuteronomy 24. 20), and then gathered. river—Euphrates. stream of Egypt—on the confines of Palestine and Egypt (Numbers 34. 5; Joshua 15. 4, 47), now Wady el-Arish, Jehovah's vineyard, Israel, extended according to His purpose from the Nile to the Euphrates (1 Kings 4. 21, 24; Psalm 72. 8). one by one—gathered most carefully, not merely as a nation, but as individuals. 13. great trumpet—image from the trumpets blown on the first day of the seventh month to summon the people to a holy convocation (Leviticus 23. 24). Antitypically, the gospel trumpet (Revelation 11. 15; 14. 6) which the Jews shall hearken to in the last days (Zechariah 12. 10; 13. 1). As the passover in the first month answers to Christ's crucifixion, so the day of atonement and the idea of "salvation" connected with the feast of tabernacles in the same seventh month, answer to the crowning of "redemption" at His second coming; therefore redemption is put last in 1 Corinthians 1. 30. Assyria—whither the ten tribes had been carried; Babylonia is mainly meant, to which Assyria at that time belonged; the two tribes were restored, and some of the ten accompanied them. However, "Assyria" is designedly used to point ultimately to the future restoration of the ten fully, never yet accomplished (Jeremiah 3. 18). Egypt—whither many had fled at the Babylonish captivity (Jeremiah 41. 17, 18). Cf. as to the future restoration, ch. 11. 11, 12, 16; 51. 9-16 ("Rahab" being Egypt).

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 1-29. CHAPS. 28-33. form almost one continuous prophecy concerning the destruction of Ephraim, the impiety and folly of Judah, the danger of their league with Egypt, the straits they would be reduced to by Assyria, from which Jehovah would deliver them on their turning to Him; ch. 28. refers to the time just before the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign, the rest not very long before his fourteenth year. 1. crown of pride—Hebrew for "proud crown of the drunkards," &c. [HORSLEY], viz., Samaria, the capital of Ephraim, or Israel. "Drunkards," lit. (v. 7, 8; ch. 5. 11, 22; Amos 4. 1; ib. 1-6) and metaphorically, like drunkards, rushing on their own destruction. beauty . . . flower—"whose glorious beauty or ornament is a fading flower." Carrying on the image of "drunkards;" it was the custom at feasts to wreath the brow with flowers; so Samaria, "which is (not as English Version, 'which are') upon the head of the fertile valley," i. e., situated on a hill surrounded with the rich valleys as a garland (1 Kings 16. 24); but the garland is "fading," as garlands often do, because Ephraim is now close to ruin (cf. ch. 16. 8); fulfilled 721 B. C. (2 Kings 17. 6, 24). 2. strong one—the Assyrian (ch. 10. 5). cast down—viz., Ephraim (v. 1) and Samaria, its crown. with . . . hand—with violence (ch. 8. 11). 3. crown . . . the drunkards—rather, "the crown of the drunkards." 4. Rather, "the fading flower, their glorious beauty (v. 1), which is on the head of the fat (fertile) valley, shall be as the early fig." [G. V. SMITH.] Figs usually ripened in August; but earlier ones (Hebrew bikkurah, Spanish bokkore) in June, and were regarded as a delicacy (Jeremiah 24. 2; Hosea 9. 10; Micah 7. 1).

while it is yet—i. e., immediately, without delay; describing the eagerness of the Assyrian Shalmaneser, not merely to conquer, but to destroy utterly Samaria; whereas other conquered cities were often spared. 5-13. The prophet now turns to Judah; a gracious promise to the remnant ("residue"); a warning lest through like sins Judah should share the fate of Samaria. crown—in antithesis to the "fading crown" of Ephraim (v. 1, 3). the residue—primarily, Judah, in the prosperous reign of Hezekiah (2 Kings 18. 7), antitypically, the elect of God; as He here is called their "crown and diadem," so are they called His (ch. 62. 3); a beautiful reciprocity. 6. Jehovah will inspire their magistrates with justice, and their soldiers with strength of spirit. turn . . . battle to . . . gate—The defenders of their country who not only repel the foe from themselves, but drive him to the gates of his own cities (2 Samuel 11. 23; 2 Kings 18. 8). 7. Though Judah is to survive the fall of Ephraim, yet "they also" (the men of Judah) have perpetrated like sins to those of Samaria (ch. 5. 3, 11), which must be chastised by God. erred . . . are out of the way—stagger . . . reel. Repeated, to express the frequency of the vice. priest . . . prophet—If the ministers of religion sin so grievously, how much more the other rulers (ch. 56. 10, 12)! vision—even in that most sacred function of the prophet to declare God's will revealed to them. judgment—the priests had the administration of the law committed to them (Deuteronomy 17. 9; 19. 17). It was against the law for the priests to take wine before entering the tabernacle (Leviticus 10. 9; Ezekiel 44. 21). 9, 10. Here the drunkards are introduced as scoffingly commenting on Isaiah's warnings: "Whom will he (does Isaiah presume to) teach knowledge? And whom will He make to understand instruction? Is it those (i. e., does he take us to be) just weaned, &c.? For (he is constantly repeating, as if to little children) precept upon precept," &c. line—a rule or law. [MAURER.] The repetition of sounds in Hebrew tzav latzav, tzav latzav, qav laqav, qav laqav, expresses the scorn of the imitators of Isaiah's speaking; he spoke stammering (v. 11). God's mode of teaching offends by its simplicity the pride of sinners (2 Kings 5. 11, 12; 1 Corinthians 1. 23). Stammerers as they were by drunkenness, and children in knowledge of God, they needed to be spoken to in the language of children, and "with stammering lips" (cf. Matthew 13. 13). A just and merciful retribution. 11. For—rather, Truly. This is Isaiah's reply to the scoffers: Your drunken questions shall be answered by the severe lessons from God conveyed through the Assyrians and Babylonians; the dialect of these, though Semitic, like the Hebrew, was so far different as to sound to the Jews like the speech of stammerers (cf. ch. 33. 19; 36. 11). To them who will not understand God will speak still more unintelligibly. 12. Rather, "He (Jehovah) who hath said to them," this . . . the rest—reference may be primarily to "rest" from national warlike preparations, the Jews being at the time "weary" through various preceding calamities, as the Syro-Israelite invasion (ch. 7. 8; cf. ch. 30. 15; 22. 8; 39. 2; 36. 1; 2 Kings, 18. 8). But spiritually, the "rest" meant is that to be found in obeying those very "precepts" of God (v. 10) which they jeered at (cf. Jeremiah 6. 16; Matthew 11. 29). 13. But—rather, Therefore, viz., because "they would not hear" (v. 12). that they might go—the designed result to those who, from a defect of the will, so far from profiting by God's mode of instructing, "precept upon precept," &c., made it into a stumbling-block (Hosea 6. 5; 8. 12; Matthew 13. 14). go and fall—image appropriately from "drunkards" (v. 7. 6, which they were) who in trying to "go" forward "fall backward." 14. scornful—(Note v. 9, 10.) 15. said—virtually, in your conduct, if not in words. covenant—there may be a tacit reference to their confidence in their "covenant" with the Assyrians in the early part of Hezekiah's prosperous reign, before that he ceased to pay tribute to them, as if it ensured Judah from evil, whatever might befall the neighbouring Ephraim (v. 1). The full meaning is shown by the language ("covenant with death—hell," or sheol) to apply to all lulled in false security spiritually (Psalm 12. 4; Ecclesiastes 8. 8; Jeremiah 8. 11); the godly alone are in covenant with death (Job 5. 28,

Hosea 2, 18; 1 Corinthians 3, 22). overflowing scourge—two metaphors: the hostile Assyrian armies like an overwhelming flood. pass through—viz., through Judea on their way to Egypt, to punish it as the protector of Samaria (2 Kings 17, 4). lies—They did not use these words, but Isalah designates their sentiments by their true name (Amos 2, 4). 16. Lit., Behold me as Him who has laid; viz., in my Divine counsel (Revelation 13, 8); none save I could lay it (ch. 63, 5). stone—Jesus Christ; Hezekiah [MAURER], or the temple [EWALD], do not realize the full significance of the language; but only in type point to Him, in whom the prophecy receives its exhaustive accomplishment; whether Isalah understood its fulness or not (1 Peter 1, 11, 12), the Holy Ghost plainly contemplated its fulfilment in Christ alone; so in ch. 32, 1; cf. Genesis 49, 24; Psalm 118, 22; Matthew 21, 42; Romans 10, 11; Ephesians 2, 20. tried—both by the devil (Luke 4, 1-13) and by men (Luke 20, 1-38), and even by God (Matthew 27, 46); a stone of tested solidity to bear the vast superstructure of man's redemption. The tested righteousness of Christ gives its peculiar merit to His vicarious sacrifice. The connection with the context is, though a "scourge" shall visit Judea (v. 15), yet God's gracious purpose as to the elect remnant, and His kingdom of which "Zion" shall be the centre, shall not fail, because it rests on Messiah (Matthew 7, 24, 25; 2 Timothy 2, 19). precious—lit., of preciousness; so in the Greek, 1 Peter 2, 7, He is preciousness. corner-stone—(1 Kings 5, 17; 7, 9; Job 38, 6); the stone laid at the corner where two walls meet and connecting them; often costly. make haste—flee in hasty alarm; but LXX. have "be ashamed;" so Romans 9, 33, and 1 Peter 2, 6, "be confounded," substantially the same idea; he who rests on Him shall not have the shame of disappointment, nor flee in sudden panic (see ch. 30, 15; 32, 17). 17. line—the measuring-line of the plummet. HORSLEY translates, "I will appoint judgment for the rule, and justice for the plummet." As the corner-stone stands most perpendicular and exactly proportioned, so Jehovah, while holding out grace to believers in the Foundation-stone, will judge the scoffers (v. 15) according to the exact justice of the law (cf. James 2, 13). hall—Divine judgments (ch. 30, 30; 32, 19). 18. disannulled—obliterated, as letters traced on a waxen tablet are obliterated by passing the stylus over it. trodden down—passing from the metaphor in "scourge" to the thing meant, the army which treads down its enemies. 19. From the time, &c.—rather, "As often as it comes over (i. e., passes through), it shall overtake you" [HORSLEY]; like a flood returning from time to time, frequent hostile invasions shall assail Judah, after the deportation of the ten tribes. vexation . . . hear . . . report—rather, "It shall be a terror even to hear the mere report of it." [MAURER.] (1 Samuel 3, 11.) But G. V. SMITH, "Hard treatment (HORSLEY, dispersion) only shall make you to understand instruction;" they scorned at the simple way in which the prophet offered it (v. 9), therefore, they must be taught by the severe teachings of adversity. 20. Proverbial, for they shall find all their sources of confidence fail them; all shall be hopeless perplexity in their affairs. 21. Perazim—In the valley of Itephaim (2 Samuel 5, 18, 20; 1 Chronicles 14, 11), there Jehovah, by David, broke forth as waters do, and made a breach among the Philistines, David's enemies, as Perazim means, expressing a sudden and complete overthrow. Gibson—(1 Chronicles 14, 16; 2 Samuel 5, 25; Margin.) Not Joshua's victory (Joshua 10, 10). strange—as being against His own people; judgment is not what God delights in, it is, though necessary, yet strange to Him (Lamentations 3, 33). work—punishing the guilty (ch. 10, 12). 23. mockers—a sin which they had committed (v. 9, 10). bands—their Assyrian bondage (ch. 10, 27); Judah was then tributary to Assyria; or, "lest your punishment be made still more severe" (ch. 21, 22). consumption—destruction (ch. 10, 22, 23; Daniel 9, 27). 23. Calling attention to the following illustration from husbandry (Psalm 49, 1, 2). As the husbandman does his different kinds of work, each in its right time and due proportion, so God adapts His measures to the varying exigencies of the several cases: now mercy, now judgments; now punishing sooner, now later (an answer to the scoff that His judgments, being put off so long, would never come at all, ch. 5, 19); His object being not to destroy His people any more than the farmer's object in threshing is to destroy his crop; this vindicates God's "strange work" (v. 21) in punishing his people. Cf. the same image, Jeremiah 24, 6; Hosea 2, 23; Matthew 3, 12. 24. all day—emphatic; he is not always ploughing; he also "sows," and that, too, in accordance with sure rules (v. 25). doth he open—supply always. Is he always harrowing? 25. face—the surface of the ground: "made plain," or level, by harrowing. fitches—rather, dill, or fennel, Nigella romana, with black seed, easily beaten out, used as a condiment and medicine in the East. So the LXX., "cummin" was used in the same way. cast in . . . principal wheat—rather, plant the wheat in rows (for wheat was thought to yield the largest crop, by being planted sparingly; PLINY, H. N. 18, 21); [MAURER]; "sow the wheat regularly" [HORSLEY]. But GESenius, like English Version, "fat," or "principal," i. e., excellent wheat. appointed barley—rather, "barley in its appointed place. [MAURER.] in their place—rather, "in its (the field's) border. [MAURER.] 26. to discretion—in the due rules of husbandry: God first taught it to man (Genesis 3, 23). 27. The husbandman uses the same discretion in threshing. The dill ("fitches") and cummin, leguminous and tender grains, are beaten out, not as wheat, &c., with the heavy corn-drag ("threshing instrument"), but with "a staff," heavy instruments would crush and injure the seed. cart wheel—two iron wheels armed with iron teeth, like a saw, joined together by a wooden axle. The "corn-drag" was made of three or four wooden cylinders, armed with iron teeth or flint stones fixed underneath, and joined like a sledge. Both instruments cut the straw for fodder as well as separated the corn. staff—used also where they had but a small quantity of corn: the flail (Ruth 2, 17). 28. Bread-corn—Corn of which bread is made. bruised—threshed with the corn-drag (as contrasted with dill and cummin, "beaten with the staff"), or, "trodden out" by the hoofs of cattle driven over it on the threshing-floor [G. V. SMITH], (Deuteronomy 25, 4; Micah 4, 13). because—rather, but [HORSLEY]; though the corn is threshed with the heavy instrument, yet he will not always be thus threshing it. break it—"drive over it (continually) the wheel." [MAURER.] cart—threshing-drag. horseman—rather, horses: used to tread out corn. 20. This also—The skill wherewith the husbandman duly adjusts his modes of threshing is given by God, as well as the skill (v. 26) wherewith he tills and sows (v. 24, 25). Therefore He must also be able to adapt His modes of treatment to the several moral needs of His creatures. His object in sending tribulation (derived from the Latin tribulum, a threshing instrument, Luke 22, 31; Romans 5, 3) is to sever the moral chaff from the wheat, not to crush utterly; "His judgments are usually in the line of our offences; by the nature of the judgments we may usually ascertain the nature of the sin." [BARNES.]

CHAPTER XXIX.

Ver. 1-24. COMING INVASION OF JERUSALEM: ITS FAILURE—UNBELIEF OF THE JEWS. This chapter opens the series of prophecies as to the invasion of Judea under Sennacherib, and its deliverance. 1. Ariel—Jerusalem; Ariel means Lion of God, i. e., city rendered by God invincible: the lion is emblem of a mighty hero (2 Samuel 23, 20). Otherwise, Hearth of God, i. e., place where the altar-fire continually burns to God (ch. 31, 9; Ezekiel 43, 15, 16). add . . . year to year—ironically; suffer one year after another to glide on in the round of formal, heartless "sacrifices." Rather, "add yet another year" to the one just closed. [MAURER.] Let a year clapse and a little more (ch. 32, 10; Margin). let . . . kill sacrifices—rather, "let the beasts (of another year) go round" [MAURER]; i. e., after the completion of a year "I will distress Ariel." 2. Yet—rather, Then. heaviness . . . sorrow—rather, preserving the Hebrew paronomasia, groaning and moaning. as Ariel—either, "the city shall be as a lion of God, i. e., it shall emerge from its dangers unvanquished; or

"It shall be as the altar of burnt offering," consuming with fire the besiegers (v. 6; ch. 30. 30; 31. 9; Leviticus 10. 2); or best, as the next verse continues the threat, and the promise of deliverance does not come till v. 4, "It shall be like a hearth of burning," i. e., a scene of devastation by fire. [G. V. SMITH.] The prophecy, probably, contemplates ultimately, besides the affliction and deliverance in Sennacherib's time, the destruction of Jerusalem by Rome, the dispersion of the Jews, their restoration, the destruction of the enemies that besiege the city (Zechariah 14. 2), and the final glory of Israel (v. 17-24). 3. I—Jehovah, acting through the Assyrian, &c., His instruments (ch. 10. 5). mount—an artificial mound formed to out-top high walls (ch. 37. 33). Else a station, viz., of warriors, for the siege. round about—not fully realized under Sennacherib, but in the Roman siege (Luke 19. 43; 21. 20). forts—siege-towers (Deuteronomy 20. 20). 4. Jerusalem shall be as a captive, humbled to the dust. Her voice shall come from the earth as that of the spirit-charmers or necromancers (ch. 8. 19), faint and shrill, as the voice of the dead was supposed to be: ventriloquism was doubtless the trick caused to make the voice appear to come from the earth (ch. 19. 3). An appropriate retribution that Jerusalem, which consulted necromancers, should be made like them! 5. Moreover—rather, Yet: yet in this extremity help shall come, and the enemy be scattered. strangers—foreign enemies, invaders (ch. 25. 2). It shall be—viz., the destruction of the enemy. at an instant—in a moment (ch. 30. 23). 6. Thou—The Assyrian army. thunder—&c.—not lit., in the case of the Assyrians (ch. 37. 36); but fig., for an awful judgment (ch. 30. 30; 28. 17). The ulterior fulfillment, in the case of the Jews' foes in the last days, may be more literal (see as to "earthquake," Zechariah 14. 4). 7. munition—fortress. 8. Their disappointment in the very height of their confident expectation of taking Jerusalem shall be as great as that of the hungry man who in a dream fancies he eats, but awakes to hunger still (Psalm 73. 20); their dream shall be dissipated on the fatal morning (ch. 37. 36). soul—simply his appetite; he is still thirsty. 9. Stay—rather, Be astounded: expressing the stupid and amazed incredulity with which the Jews received Isaiah's announcement. wonder—the second imperative, as often (ch. 8. 9), is a threat; the first is a simple declaration of a fact, "Be astounded, since you choose to be so, at the prophecy, soon you will be amazed at the sight of the actual event." [MAURER.] cry . . . out . . . cry—rather, "Be ye blinded (since you choose to be so, though the light shines all round you), and soon ye shall be blinded!" in good earnest to your sorrow [MAURER], (ch. 6. 9, 10). not with wine—but with spiritual paralysis (ch. 51. 17, 21). ye . . . they—the change from speaking to, to speaking of them, intimates that the prophet turns away from them to a greater distance, because of their stupid unbelief. 10. Jehovah gives them up judicially to their own hardness of heart (cf. Zechariah 14. 13). Quoted by Paul, with variations from the LXX., Romans 11. 8. See ch. 6. 10; Psalm 69. 23. eyes, the prophets, &c.—rather, "Hath closed your eyes, the prophets; and your heads (Margin, see also ch. 3. 2), the seers, He hath covered." The Orientals cover the head to sleep; thus "covered" is parallel to "closed your eyes" (Judges 4. 19). Covering the face was also preparatory to execution (Esther 7. 8). This cannot apply to the time when Isaiah himself prophesied, but to subsequent times. 11. of all—rather, "the whole vision." Vision is the same here as revelation, or law: in ch. 28. 15, the same Hebrew word is translated, covenant. [MAURER.] sealed—(ch. 8. 16), God seals up the truth so that even the learned, because they want believing docility, cannot discern it (Matthew 13. 10-17; 11. 25). Prophecy remained comparatively a sealed volume (Daniel 12. 4, 9), until Jesus, who "alone is worthy," "opened the seals" (Revelation 5. 1-5, 9; 6. 1). 12. The unlearned succeed no better than the learned, not from want of human learning, as they fancy, but from not having the teaching of God (ch. 54. 13; Jeremiah 31. 34; John 6. 45; 1 Corinthians 2. 7-10; 1 John 2. 20). 13. precept of men—instead of the precepts of God, given by His prophets; also worship external, and by rule, not heartfelt as God requires (John 4. 24). Cf. Christ's quotation of this verse from the LXX. 14. (Habakkuk 1. 5; Acts 13. 41.) The "marvellous work" is one of unparalleled vengeance on the hypocrites: cf. "strange work," ch. 28. 21. The judgment, too, will visit the wise in that respect in which they most pride themselves; their wisdom shall be hid, i. e., shall no longer appear, so as to help the nation in its distress (cf. 1 Corinthians 1. 19). 15. seek deep to hide—rather, "That seek to hide deeply," &c. (cf. ch. 30. 1, 2). The reference is to the secret plan which many of the Jewish nobles had of seeking Egyptian aid against Assyria, contrary to the advice of Isaiah. At the same time the hypocrite in general is described, who, under a plausible exterior, tries to hide his real character, not only from men, but even from God. 16. Rather, "Ah! your perverseness! just as if the potter should be esteemed as the clay!" [MAURER.] Or, "Ye invert (turn upside down) the order of things, putting yourselves instead of God," and vice versa, just as if the potter should be esteemed as the clay [HORSLEY], (ch. 45. 9; 64. 8). 17. turned—as contrasted with your "turnings of things upside down" (v. 16), there shall be other and better turnings or revolutions: the outpouring of the Spirit in the latter days (ch. 32. 15); first on the Jews; which shall be followed by their national restoration (Note, v. 2; Zechariah 12. 10); then on the Gentiles (Joel 2. 28). fruitful field—lit., a Carmel (Note, ch. 10. 18). The moral change in the Jewish nation shall be as great as if the wooded Lebanon were to become a fruitful field, and vice versa. Cf. Matthew 11. 12, Greek, "the kingdom of heaven forces itself," as it were, on man's acceptance; instead of men having to seek Messiah, as they had John, in a desert, He presents Himself before them with loving invitations; thus men's hearts, once a moral desert, are reclaimed so as to bear fruits of righteousness: vice versa, the ungodly who seemed prosperous, both in the moral and literal sense, shall be exhibited in their real barrenness. 18. deaf . . . blind—(Cf. Matthew 11. 5.) The spiritually blind, &c., are chiefly meant; "the book," as Revelation is called pre-eminently, shall be no longer "sealed," as is described (v. 11), but the most unintelligent shall hear and see (ch. 35. 5). 19. meek—rather, the afflicted godly: the idea is, virtuous suffering (ch. 61. 1; Psalm 25. 9; 37. 11). [BARNES.] poor among men—i. e., the poorest of men, viz., the pious poor. rejoice—when they see their oppressors punished (v. 20, 21), and Jehovah exhibited as their protector and rewarder (v. 22-24; ch. 41. 17; James 2. 5). 20. terrible—viz., the persecutors among the Jewish nobles. scorner—(Ch. 28. 14, 22.) watch for—not only commit iniquity, but watch for opportunities of committing it, and make it their whole study (see Micah 2. 1; Matthew 26. 59; 27. 1). 21. Rather, "Who make a man guilty in his cause" [GESENIUS], i. e., unjustly condemn him. "A man" is in the Hebrew, a poor man, upon whom such unjust condemnations might be practiced with more impunity than on the rich; cf. v. 19, "the meek . . . the poor." him that reproveth—rather, pleadeth; one who has a suit at issue. gate—the place of concourse in a city, where courts of justice were held (Ruth 4. 11; Proverbs 31. 23; Amos 5. 10, 12). just—one who has a just cause; or, Jesus Christ, "the Just One." [HORSLEY.] for a thing of naught—rather, "through falsehood," "by a decision that is null in justice." [BARNES.] Cf. as to Christ, Proverbs 28. 21; Matthew 26. 15; Acts 3. 13, 14; 8. 33. 22. Join "saith . . . concerning the house of Jacob." redeemed—out of Ur, a land of idolaters (Joshua 24. 3). not now—after the moral revolution described (v. 17), the children of Jacob shall no longer give cause to their forefathers to blush for them, wax pale—with shame and disappointment at the wicked degeneracy of his posterity, and fear as to their punishment. 23. But—rather, For. he—Jacob. work of mine hands—spiritually, as well as physically (ch. 19. 25; 60. 21; Ephesians 2. 10). By Jehovah's agency Israel shall be cleansed of its corruptions, and shall consist wholly of pious men (ch. 54. 13, 14; 52. 1; 60. 21). midst of him—i. e., his land. Or else "His children" are the Gentiles adopted amongst the Israelites, his lineal descendants (Romans 9. 26; Ephesians 3. 6). [HORSLEY.] 24. They . . . that erred—(Ch. 28. 7.) learn doctrine—rather, shall receive discipline or instruction. "Murmuring" was the characteristic of Israel's rebellion against God (Exodus 16. 8; Psalm 106. 25). This shall be so no more. Chastisements, and, in HORSLEY'S view, the plety of the Gentiles provoking the Jews to holy jealousy (Romans 11. 11, 14), shall then produce the desired effect.

CHAPTER XXX.

VER. 1-32. CHAPS. 30-32. REFER PROBABLY TO THE SUMMER OF 714 B. C., AS CHAP. 29. TO THE PASSOVER OF THAT YEAR. Jewish ambassadors were now on their way to Egypt to seek aid against Assyria (ch. 30. 2-6, 15; 31. 1). Isaiah denounces this reliance on Egypt rather than on Jehovah. God had prohibited such alliances with heathen nations, and it was a leading part of Jewish polity that they should be a separate people (Exodus 23. 32; Deuteronomy 7. 2). 1. take counsel—rather, as v. 4, 6, imply, execute counsels. cover . . . covering—i. e., wrap themselves in relliances disloyal towards Jehovah. "Cover" thus answers to "seek to hide deeply their counsel from the Lord" (ch. 29. 15). But the Hebrew is lit., "who pour out libations:" as it was by these that leagues were made (Exodus 24. 8; Zechariah 9. 11), translate, "who make a league," not of—not suggested "by my Spirit" (Numbers 27. 21; Joshua 9. 14). that they may add—the consequence is here spoken of as their intention, so reckless were they of sinning: one sin entails the commission of another (Deuteronomy 29. 19). 2. walk—are now setting out, viz., their ambassadors (v. 4). Egypt—See Note, in the beginning of ch. 19. and 20. Pharaoh—The generic name of the kings of Egypt, as Cæsar was at Rome. The word in Egyptian means king (JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 8, 6, 2). Phra, "the sun," was the hieroglyphic symbol and title of the king. shadow—image from shelter against heat: protection (Psalm 121. 5, 6). 3. shame—disappointment. Egypt, weakened by its internal dissensions, can give no solid help. 4. his—Judah's (cf. ch. 9. 21). at Zoan—are already arrived there on their errand to Pharaoh (see ch. 19. 11). came to Hanes—are come there. West of the Nile, in central Egypt: Egyptian Hnes; the Greek Heraclæopolis: perhaps the Anysis of HERODOTUS (2. 137); according to GROTIUS; Tahpanhes contracted (Jeremiah 43. 7-9); the seat of a reigning prince at the time, as was Zoan, hence the Jewish ambassadors go to both. 5. (Jeremiah 2. 36.) 6. burden—the prophecy as to, &c. [MAURER]; so LXX., the fresh inscription here marks emphatically the prediction that follows. Or, rather, Isaiah sees in vision, the ambassadors' beasts burdened with rich presents travelling southwards (viz., to Egypt, Daniel 11. 5, 6), and exclaims, Oh the burden of treasure on the beasts! &c. (Hosea 8. 9; 12. 1). land of trouble—the desert between Palestine and Egypt, destitute of water and abounding in dangerous animals (Deuteronomy 8. 15; Jeremiah 2. 6). flyng serpent—(ch. 14. 29), a species which springs like a dart from trees, on its prey. will carry—rather, Present, carry, viz., as presents to Egypt (1 Kings 15. 19). young asses—rather, full-grown asses. [MAURER.] 7. "Egypt is vanity, and to no purpose will they help." [G. V. SMITH.] strength—Hebrew*, Rahab, a designation of Egypt (ch. 51. 9; Psalm 87. 4), implying her haughty fierceness; translate, "Therefore I call her Arrogance that stteth still." She who boasted of the help she would give, when it came to the test, sat still (ch. 36. 6). English Version agrees with v. 15 and ch. 7. 4. 8. table—a tablet (Habakkuk 2. 2), which should be set in public, containing the prophecy in a briefer form, to be read by all. a book—viz.*, a parchment roll, containing the prophecy in full, for the use of distant posterity. Its truth will be seen hereafter when the event has come to pass. See ch. 8. 1, 16. Notes. for ever and ever—rather read, "For a testimony for ever" [CHALDEE, JEROME, LOWTH]: "testimony is often joined to the notion of perpetuity (Deuteronomy 31. 19, 21, 26). 9. lying—unfaithful to Jehovah, whose covenant they had taken on them as His adopted children (ch. 59. 13; Proverbs 30. 9). 10. (Micah 2. 6, 11; 3. 5). See not—as you now do, foretelling misfortune. Prophecy not . . . right things—Not that they avowedly requested this, but their conduct virtually expressed

it. No man, professedly, wished to be deceived; but many seek a kind of teaching which is deceit; and which, if they would examine, they might know to be such (1 Kings 22. 13). The Jews desired success to be foretold as the issue of their league with Egypt, though ill had been announced by God's prophet as the result; this constituted the "deceits." 11. Depart from the true "way" (so in Acts 19. 9, 23) of religion. cause . . . to cease—let us hear no more of His name. God's holiness is what troubles sinners most. 12. Holy One—Isaiah so little yields to their wicked prejudices, that he repeats the very name and truth which they disliked. this word—Isaiah's exhortation to reliance on Jehovah. oppression—whereby they levied the treasures to be sent to conciliate Egypt (v. 6). perverse-ness—in relying on Egypt, rather than on Jehovah. 13. Image from a curve swelling out in a wall (Psalm 62. 3), when the former gives way, it causes the downfall of the whole wall; so their policy as to Egypt. 14. he—the enemy; or rather, God (Psalm 2. 9; Jeremiah 19. 11). it—the Jewish state. potter's vessel—earthen and fragile. sherd—a fragment of the vessel large enough to take up a live coal, &c. pit—cistern or pool. The swell of the wall is at first imperceptible and gradual, but at last it comes to the crisis; so the decay of the Jewish state. 15. returning and rest—turning back from your embassy to Egypt, and ceasing from warlike preparations. quietness—answering to "wait for Him" (God) (v. 18). 16. flee—not as fugitives, but we will speed our course, viz., against the Assyrians, by the help of cavalry supplied by Egypt (ch. 31. 1). This was expressly against the Mosaic law (Deuteronomy 17. 16; cf. Note, ch. 2. 7; Hosea 14. 3). shall . . . flee—lit., before your enemies; their sin and its punishment correspond. 17. One thousand—A thousand at once, or, As one man. [MAURER.] rebuke—the battle-cry. shall ye—at the rebuke of five shall ye, viz., all (in contrast to the "one thousand") flee so utterly that even two shall not be left together, but each one shall be as solitary "as a signal staff" (G. V. SMITH), or a banner on a hill" (ch. 5. 26; 11. 12). The signal-staff was erected to rally a nation in war. The remnant of Jews left would be beacons to warn all men of the justice of God, and the truth of his threatenings. GESENIUS, from Leviticus 26. 8; Deuteronomy 32. 30, arbitrarily inserts "ten thousand." "At the rebuke of five shall ten thousand of you flee." 18. therefore—on account of your wicked perverseness (v. 1, 2, 9, 15, 16), Jehovah will delay to be gracious. [HORSLEY.] Rather, wait or delay in punishing, to give you time for repentance (v. 13, 14, 17). [MAURER.] Or, Yet therefore (viz., because of the distress spoken of in the previous verses: that distress will lead the Jews to repentance, and so Jehovah will pity them). [GESENIUS.] be exalted—men will have more elevated views of God's mercy; or else, "He will rise up to pity you." [G. V. SMITH.] Or [taking the previous clause as MAURER, "Therefore Jehovah will delay" in punishing you, "in order that He may be gracious to you," if ye repent], He will be far removed from you [so in Psalm 10. 5, far above out of sight], i. e., He will not immediately descend to punish, "in order that He may have mercy, &c. judgment—justice; faithfulness to His covenant. wait—cf. v. 15, wait, viz., for His times of having mercy. 19. (Ch. 65. 9.) The restoration from Babylon only typifies the full accomplishment of the prophecy (v. 18-33). weep no more—(Ch. 25. 8.) thy cry—(Ch. 26. 8, 9; Jeremiah 29. 12-14.) 20. Rather, "The Lord will give;" the though is not in the original. bread of adversity—He will not deny you food enough to save you in your adversity (1 Kings 22. 27; Psalm 127. 2). be removed—rather, "hide themselves;" they shall no more be forced to hide themselves from persecution, but shall be openly received with reverence. [MAURER.] Contrast with this Psalm 74. 9; Amos 8. 11. 21. word—conscience, guided by the Holy Spirit (John 16. 13). 22. covering of . . . Images—rather, images (formed of wood or potter's clay, and covered with silver. Hezekiah, and afterwards Josiah, defiled them (2 Kings 23. 8, 10, 14, 16; 2 Chronicles 31. 1; cf. ch. 2. 20; Deuteronomy 7. 25). 23. rain of—rather, "for thy seed." Physical prosperity accompanies national piety; especially under the Old Testament. The early rain fell soon after the seed was sown in October or November; the latter rain in the spring, before the ripening of the corn. Both were needed for a good harvest. increase—the produce. fat—bread made of the best wheat flour (cf. Genesis 49. 20; Deuteronomy 32. 14). 24. ear—i. e., till. Asses were employed in tillage, as well as oxen (Deuteronomy 22. 10). clean—rather, salted provender. [GESENIUS.] The Arab proverb is, Sweet provender is as bread to camels—salted provender as confectionery. The very cattle shall share the coming felicity. Or else, well-fermented mastic, i. e., provender formed of a mixture of various substances: grain, beans, vetches, hay, and salt. winnowed—not as it is usually given to cattle before it is separated from the chaff; the grain shall be so abundant that it shall be given winnowed. shovel—by which the grain was thrown up in the wind to separate it from the chaff. fan—an instrument for winnowing. 25. Even the otherwise barren hills shall then be well watered (ch. 44. 3). the days, &c.—when the disobedient among the Jews shall have been slain, as foretold in v. 16: “towers,” i. e., mighty men (ch. 2. 15). Or else, the towers of the Assyrian Sennacherib, or of Babylon, types of all enemies of God’s people. 26. Image from the heavenly bodies to express the increase of spiritual light and felicity. “Sevenfold” implies the perfection of that felicity, seven being the sacred number. It shall also be literally fulfilled hereafter in the heavenly city (ch. 60. 19, 20; Revelation 21. 23, 21; 22. 5). breach—the wound, or calamity, sent by God on account of their sins (ch. 1. 5). 27. name of . . . Lord—i. e., Jehovah Himself (Psalm 44. 5; 54. 1); represented as a storm approaching and ready to burst over the Assyrians (v. 30, 31). burden . . . is heavy—lit., grievousness is the flame, i. e., the flame which darts from Him is grievous. Or else (as the Hebrew means an uplifting) the uprising cloud is grievous [G. V. SMITH]; the gathering cloud gradually rising till it bursts. 28. (Ch. 11. 4; 2 Thessalonians 2. 8.) reach . . . neck—the most extreme danger; yet as the head, or capital of Judah, was to be spared (ch. 8. 8), so the head, or sovereign of Assyria, Sennacherib, should escape. sieve of vanity—Rather, the winning fan of destruction [LOWTH]. (ch. 41. 16). bridle in . . . jaws—as prisoners are represented in the Assyrian inscriptions (ch. 37. 29). causing . . . to err—(Ch. 63. 17.) “People,” Hebrew, peoples, viz., the various races composing the Assyrian armies (ch. 5. 26). 29. the night . . . solemnity—As in the passover-night ye celebrate your deliverance from Egypt, so shall ye celebrate your rescue from Assyrian bondage. Translate, “the solemnity” (Exodus 12. 42). goeth with a pipe—or flute. They used to go up to Jerusalem (“the mountain of the Lord,” Zion) at the three feasts with music and gladness (Deuteronomy 16. 16; Ezra 2. 65; Psalm 122. 1-4). 30. Jehovah’s “glorious voice,” raised against the enemy (v. 27), is again mentioned here, in contrast to the music (v. 29) with which His people shall come to worship Him. lighting down of . . . arm—(Y. 32; Psalm 33. 2.) The descent of His arm in striking. scattering—viz., a blast that scatters, or an inundation. [MAURER.] 31. The Assyrian rod which beat shall itself be beaten, and that by the mere voice of the Lord, i. e., an unseen Divine agency (ch. 10. 5, 24). 32. grounded—Rather, deceiv’d, appointed. [MAURER.] staff—the avenging rod. him—the Assyrian; type of all God’s enemies in every age. Margin and MAURER construe, “Every passing through (infliction, ch. 28. 15) of the appointed rod, which, &c., shall be with tabrets,” i. e., accompanied with joy on the part of the rescued peoples. battles of shaking—i. e., shock of battles (ch. 19. 16; cf. “sift . . . sieve,” v. 28). with it—viz., Assyria. 33. Tophet—lit., A place of abomination; the valley of the sons of Hinnom, south-east of Jerusalem, where Israel offered human sacrifices to Moloch by fire; hence a place of burning (2 Kings 23. 10; Jeremiah 7. 31). Latterly Ge-hinnom or Gehenna, i. e., valley of Hinnom, was the receptacle of the refuse of the city, to consume which fires were constantly burning. Hence it came to express hell, the place of torment. In the former sense it was a fit place to symbolize the funeral pyre of the Assyrian army (not that it actually perished there); the Hebrews did not burn, but buried, their dead, but the heathen Assyrians are to be burnt as a mark of ignominy. In the latter sense Tophet is the receptacle “prepared for the devil (antitype to “the king,” ch. 14. 12-15) and his angels,” and unbelieving men (Matthew 5. 22; 25. 41; Mark 9. 43, 44).

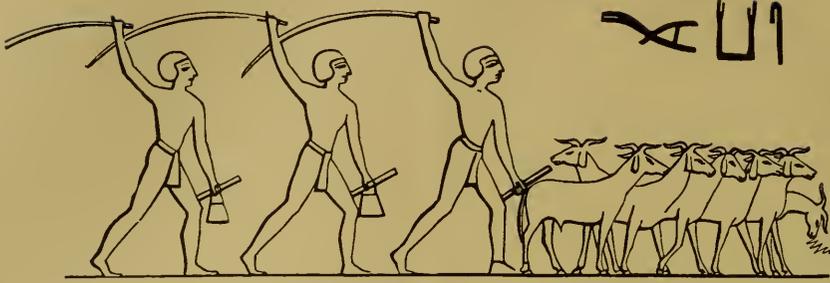

CHAPTER XXXI.

Ver. 1-9. THE CHIEF STRENGTH OF THE EGYPTIAN ARMIES LAY IN THEIR CAVALRY. In their level and fertile plains horses could easily be used and fed (Exodus 14. 9; 1 Kings 10. 28). In hilly Palestine horses were not so easily had or available. The Jews were therefore the more eager to get Egyptian chariots as allies against the Assyrian cavalry. In Assyrian sculptures chariots are represented drawn by three horses, and with three men in them (see ch. 36. 9; Psalm 20. 7; Daniel 9. 13). 2. he also is wise—as well as the Egyptian priests, so famed for wisdom (Acts 7. 22), but who are “fools” before Him (ch. 19. 11). He not only devises, but executes what He devises without “calling back His words” (Numbers 23. 19). house—the whole race. help—the Egyptian succour sought by the Jews. 3. not spirit—not of Divine power (Psalm 56. 4; 146. 3, 5; Zechariah 4. 6). he that helpeth—Egypt. holpen—Judah. 4. (Ch. 42. 13; Hosea 11. 10.) roaring on—grouting over his prey. abase himself—be disheartened or frightened. 5. As in the image of “the lion,” the point of comparison is the fearless might of Jehovah; so in that of the birds, it is His solicitous affection (Deuteronomy 32. 11; Psalm 91. 4; Matthew 23. 37). flying—Rather, which defend their young with their wings; to fly is a secondary meaning of the Hebrew word. [MAURER.] Hovering over to protect their young. [G. V. SMITH.] passing over—as the destroying angel passing over, so as to spare the blood-marked houses of the Israelites on the first passover (Exodus 12. 13, 23, 27). He passed, or leaped forward [LOWTH], to destroy the enemy and to spare His people. 6. The power and love of Jehovah, just mentioned, are the strongest incentives for returning to Him (Ezekiel 16. 62, 63; Hosea 6. 1). ye . . . Israel—The change of person marks that when they return to the Lord, He will address them in more direct terms of communion in the second person; so long as they were revolters, God speaks of them, as more at a distance, in the third person, rather than to them. 7. In the day of trial the idols will be found to render no help, and will therefore be cast away. Cf. as to the future restoration and conversion of Israel simultaneously with the interposition of Jehovah in His defence, Zechariah 12. 9-14; 13. 1, 2. for a sin—i. e., whereby especially you contracted guilt (1 Kings 12. 30). 8. Assyrian—Sennacherib, representative of some powerful head of the ungodly in the latter ages. [HORSLEY.] sword, not of . . . mighty . . . mean man—but by the unseen sword of God. fee—Sennacherib alone fled homewards after his army had been destroyed (ch. 37. 37). young men—the flower of his army. discomfited—Rather, shall be subject to slavery; lit., shall be liable to tribute, i. e., personal service (Deuteronomy 20. 11; Joshua 9. 21). [MAURER.] Or, not so well, shall melt away. [ROSENMULLER.] 9. Rather, “shall pass beyond his strongholds;” he shall not stop to take refuge in it through fear (Judges 20. 47; Jeremiah 48. 28). [GESENIUS.] ensigu—the banner of Jehovah protecting the Jews. [MAURER.] fire . . . furnace—light and fire, viz., of Jehovah’s altar at Jerusalem (ch. 29. 1). Perhaps “furnace,” as distinguished from “fire,” may mean that His dwelling-place (His hearth) was at Jerusalem (cf. ch. 4. 5); or else the fiery furnace awaiting all the enemies who should attack Jerusalem.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Ver. 1-20. MESSIAH’S KINGDOM; DESOLATIONS, TO BE SUCCEEDED BY LASTING PEACE, THE SPIRIT HAVING BEEN Poured OUT. The times of purity and happiness which shall follow the defeat of the enemies of Jehovah’s people (v. 1-8). The period of wrath before that happy state (v. 9-14). The assurance of the final prosperity of the Church is repeated (v. 15-20). 1. king—not Hezekiah, who was already on the throne, whereas a future time is contemplated. If he be meant at all, it can only be as a type of Messiah the King, to whom alone the language is fully applicable (Hosea 3. 5; Zechariah 9. 9; see ch. 11. 3-5, notes). The kingdom shall be transferred from the world-kings, who have exercised their power against God, instead of for God, to the rightful King of kings (Ezekiel 21. 27; Daniel 7. 13, 14). princes—subordinate; referring to all in authority under Christ in the coming kingdom on earth, e. g., the apostles, &c. (Luke 22. 30; 1 Corinthians 6. 2; 2 Timothy 2. 12; Revelation 2. 26, 27; 3. 21). 2. a man—Rather, the man, Christ [LOWTH]; it is as "the Son of man" He is to reign, as it was as Son of man He suffered (Matthew 26. 64; John 5. 27; 19. 5). Not as MAURER explains, "every one of the princes shall be," &c. rivers—as refreshing as water and the cool shade are to the heated traveller (ch. 35. 6, 7; 41. 18). 3. them that see—the seers or prophets. them that hear—the people under Instruction (ch. 35. 5, 6). 4. rash—Rather, the hasty; contrast "shall not make haste" (ch. 28. 16); the reckless who will not take time to weigh religious truth aright. Or else, the well-instructed. [HORSLEY.] stammerers—those who speak confusedly on Divine things (cf. Exodus 4. 10-12; Jeremiah 1. 6; Matthew 10. 19, 20). Or, rather, those drunken scorners who in stammering style imitated Isalah's warnings to mock them [MAURER] (ch. 28. 7-11, 13, 14, 22; 29. 20); in this view, translate, "speak uprightly" (agreeably to the Divine law); not as English Version, referring to the distinctness of articulation, plainly. 5. vile—rather, fool [LOWTH]; i. e., ungodly (Psalm 14. 1; 74. 18). liberal—rather, noble-minded. churl—rather, fraudulent. [GESENIUS.] bountiful—religiously. The atheistic churl, who envies the believer his hope "full of immortality," shall no longer be held as a patriot struggling for the emancipation of mankind from superstition. [HORSLEY.] 6. vile . . . villainy—rather, "the (irreligious) fool—(his) folly." will speak—rather, present; for (so far is the "fool" from deserving the epithet "noble-minded") the fool speaketh folly and worketh, &c. hypocrisy—rather, profligacy. [HORSLEY.] error—impiety, perverse arguments. hungry—spiritually (Matthew 5. 6). 7. churl—the fraudulent; this verse refers to the last clause of v. 5; as v. 6 referred to its first clause. speaketh right—pleadeth a just cause (ch. 29. 21); spiritually, "the poor man's cause" is the Divine doctrine, his rule of faith and practice. 8. liberal—rather, noble-minded. stand—shall be approved under the government of the righteous King. 9-20. Address to the women of Jerusalem who troubled themselves little about the political signs of the times, but lived a life of self-indulgence (ch. 3. 16-23); the failure of food through the devastations of the enemy is here foretold, being what was most likely to affect them as mothers of families, heretofore accustomed to every luxury. VITRINGA understands "women—daughters" as the cities and villages of Judea (Ezekiel 16). See Amos 6. 1. 10. Many days and years—rather, In little more than a year. [MAURER.] Lit., Days upon a year (so ch. 29). 1. vintage shall fall—through the arrival of the Assyrian invader. As the wheat harvest is omitted, Isalah must look for the invasion in the summer or autumn of 714 B. C., when the wheat would have been secured already, and the later fruit "gathering," and vintage would be still in danger. 11. strip you—of your gay clothing. (Note, ch. 2.) 12. lament for teats—rather, shall smite on their breasts in lamentation "for thy pleasant fields" (Nahum 2. 7). [MAURER.] "Teats" in English Version is used for fertile lands, which, like breasts, nourish life. The transition from "ye" to "they" (v. 11, 12) is frequent. 13. (Ch. 5. 6; 7. 23.) houses of joy—pleasure-houses outside of Jerusalem, not Jerusalem itself, but other cities destroyed by Sennacherib in his march (ch. 7. 20-25). However, the prophecy, in its full accomplishment, refers to the utter desolation of Judea and its capital by Rome, and subsequently, previous to the second coming of the King (Psalm 118. 26; Luke 13. 35; 19. 38); "the joyous city" is in this view Jerusalem (ch. 22. 2). 14. palaces—most applicable to Jerusalem (Note, v. 13). multitude . . . left—the noisy din of the city, i. e., the city with its noisy multitude shall lie forsaken. [MAURER.] forts—rather, Ophel (i. e., the mound), the term applied specially to the declivity on the east of Zion, surrounded with its own wall (2 Chronicles 27. 3; 33. 14; 2 Kings 5. 24), and furnished with "towers" (or watch-towers), perhaps referred to here (Nehemiah 3. 26, 27). for ever—limited by thee, "until," &c., next verse, for a long time. 15. This can only partially apply to the spiritual revival in Hezekiah's time; its full accomplishment belongs to the Christian dispensation, first at Pentecost (Joel 2. 28; Acts 2. 17), perfectly in coming times (Psalm 104. 30; Ezekiel 36. 26; 39. 29; Zechariah 12. 10), when the Spirit shall be poured on Israel, and through it on the Gentiles (Micah 5. 7). wilderness . . . fruitful field . . . forest—when Judea, so long waste, shall be populous and fruitful, and the land of the enemies of God shall be desolate. Or, "the field, now fruitful, shall be but as a barren forest in comparison with what it shall be then" (ch. 29. 17). The barren shall become fruitful by regeneration; those already regenerate shall bring forth fruits in such abundance that their former life shall seem but as a wilderness where no fruits were. [QUEEN ELIZABETH'S BIBLE.] 16. judgment—justice. wilderness—then reclaimed. fruitful field—then become more fruitful (v. 15); thus "wilderness" and "fruitful field" include the whole land of Judea. 17. work—the effect (Proverbs 14. 34; James 3. 18). peace—internal and external. 18. sure . . . quiet—free from fear of invasion. 19. Lit., "But it shall hail with coming down of the forest, and in lowness shall the city (Nineveh) be brought low, i. e., humbled." The "hail" is Jehovah's wrathful visitation (ch. 30. 30; 28. 2. 17). The "forest" is the Assyrian host, dense as the trees of a forest (ch. 10. 18, 19, 33, 34; Zechariah 11. 2). 20. Whilst the enemy shall be brought "low," the Jews shall cultivate their land in undisturbed prosperity. all waters—well-watered places (ch. 30. 25). The Hebrew translation, "beside," ought rather to be translated, "upon" (Ecclesiastes 11. 1), where the meaning is, "Cast thy seed upon the waters when the river overflows its banks; the seed will sink into the mud and will spring up when the waters subside, and you will find it after many days in a rich harvest." Before sowing, they send oxen, &c., into the water to tread the ground for sowing. CASTALIO thinks there is an allusion to the Mosaic precept, not to plough with an ox and ass together, mystically implying that the Jew was to have no intercourse with Gentiles; the Gospel abolishes this distinction (Colossians 3. 11); thus the sense here is, Blessed are ye that sow the gospel seed without distinction of race in the teachers or the taught. But there is no need of supposing that the ox and ass here are yoked together; they are probably "sent forth" separately, as in ch. 30. 24.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Ver. 1-24. THE LAST OF ISAIAH'S PROPHECIES AS TO SENNACHERIB'S OVERTHROW (v. 19). Ver. 1, 8, 9, describe the Assyrian spoiler; strong as he is, he shall fall before Jehovah who is stronger (v. 2-6, 10-12). The time is the autumn of 713 B. C. 1. and thou—i. e., Though thou wast not spoiled—though thou wast not dealt treacherously with (Note, ch. 24. 16), thy spoiling and treachery are therefore without excuse, being unprovoked. cease—When God has let thee do thy worst, in execution of His plans, thine own turn shall come (cf. ch. 10. 12; 14. 2; Habakkuk 2. 8; Revelation 13. 10). 2. us; we . . . their . . . our—He speaks interceding for His people, separating himself in thought for a moment from them; and immediately returns to his natural identification with them in the word our. every morning—each day as it dawns, especially during our danger, as the parallel "time of trouble" shows. 3. the tumult—the approach of Jehovah is likened to an advancing thunder-storm (ch. 29. 6; 30. 27); which is His voice (Revelation 1. 15), causing the people to "flee." nations—the Assyrian levies. 4. The invaders' "spoil" shall be left behind by them in their flight, and the Jews shall gather it. caterpillar—rather, the wingless locust; as it gathers; the Hebrew word for "gathers" is properly used of the gathering of the fruits of harvest (ch. 32. 10). running to and fro—viz., in gathering harvest-fruits, he—rather, they. them—rather, it, i. e., the prey. 6. wisdom—sacred; i. e., piety. thy—Hezekiah's; or rather, Judea's. "His" refers to the same; such changes from the pronoun possessive of the second person to that of the third are common in Hebrew poetry. treasure—not so much material wealth as piety shall constitute the riches of the nation (Proverbs 10. 22; 15. 16.) 7-9. From the vision of future glory Isaiah returns to the disastrous present; the grief of "the valiant ones" (parallel to, and identical with, "the ambassadors of peace") men of rank, sent with presents to sue for peace, but standing "without" the enemy's camp, their suit being rejected. (2 Kings 18. 14, 13, 37). The highways deserted through fear, the cities insulted, the lands devastated. cry—(Ch. 15. 4.) 8. broken . . . covenant—when Sennacherib invaded Judea, Hezekiah paid him a large sum to leave the land; Sennacherib received the money and yet sent his army against Jerusalem (2 Kings 18. 14, 17). despised—make slight of as unable to resist him (ch. 10. 9; 36. 19); easily captures them. 9. (Ch. 24. 4.) Lebanon—personified; the allusion may be to the Assyrian cutting down its choice trees (ch. 14. 8; 37. 24). Sharon—south of Carmel, along the Mediterranean, proverbial for fertility (ch. 35. 2). Bashan—afterwards called Batanea (ch. 2. 13). fruits—rather, understand leaves; they lie as desolate as in winter. 10. The sight of His people's misery arouses Jehovah; He has let the enemy to go far enough. I—emphatic; God Himself will do what man could not. 11. Ye—The enemy. conceive chaff—(Ch. 26. 18; 59. 4.) your breath—rather, your own spirit of anger and ambition [MAURER] (ch. 30. 28). 12. (Ch. 9. 19; Amos 2. 1.) Perhaps alluding to their being about to be burnt on the funeral pyre (ch. 30. 33). thorns—the wicked (2 Samuel 23. 6, 7). 13. far off—distant nations. near—the Jews and adjoining peoples (ch. 49. 1). 14. sinners in Zion—false professors of religion among the elect people (Matthew 22. 12). hypocrites—rather, the profane; the abandoned. [HORSLEY.] who, &c.—If Jehovah's wrath could thus consume such a host in one night, who could abide it, if continued for ever (Mark 9. 46-48)? Fire is a common image for the Divine judgments (ch. 29. 6; 30. 30). among us—If such awful judgments have fallen on those who knew not the true God, how infinitely worse shall fall on us who, amidst religious privileges and profession, sin against God (Luke 12. 47, 48; James 4. 17)? 15. In contrast to the trembling "sinners in Zion" (v. 14), the righteous shall be secure amidst all judgments; they are described according to the Old Testament stand-point of righteousness (Psalm 15. 2; 24. 4). stoppeh . . . cars . . . eyes—"Rejoiceth not in iniquity" (1 Corinthians 13. 6; contrast ch. 29. 20; Psalm 10. 3; Romans 1. 32). The senses are avenues for the entrance of sin (Psalm 119. 37). 16. on high—heights inaccessible to the foe (ch. 26. 1). bread . . . waters—image from the expected siege by Sennacherib; however besieged by trials without, the godly shall have literal and spiritual food, as God sees good for them (ch. 41. 17; Psalm 37. 25; 34. 10; 132. 15). 17. Thine—The saints'. king in . . . beauty—not as now, Hezekiah in sackcloth, oppressed by the enemy, but King Messiah (ch. 32. 1) "in His beauty" (Song of Solomon 5. 10, 16; Revelation 4. 3). land very far off—rather, the land in its remotest extent (no longer pent up as Hezekiah was with the siege); see Margia. For Jerusalem is made the scene of the king's glory (v. 20, &c.), and it could not be said to be "very far off," unless the far-off land be heaven, the Jerusalem above, which is to follow the earthly reign of Messiah at literal Jerusalem (ch. 65. 17-19; Jeremiah 3. 17; Revelation 21. 1, 2, 10). 18. meditate—on the "terror" caused by the enemy, but now past. where, &c.—the language of the Jews exulting over their escape from danger. scribe—who enrolled the army [MAURER]; or, who prescribed the tribute to be paid [ROSENMULLER]; or, who kept an account of the spoil. "The principal scribe of the host" (2 Kings 25. 19; Jeremiah 52. 25). The Assyrian records are free from the exaggerations of Egyptian records. Two scribes are seen in every Assyrian bas-relief, writing down the various objects brought to them, the heads of the slain, prisoners, cattle, sheep, &c. receiver—Margin, weigher. LAYARD mentions, among the Assyrian inscriptions, "a pair of scales for weighing the spoils." counted . . . towers—he whose duty it was to reconnoitre and report the strength of the city to be besieged. 19. fierce people—the Assyrians shall not be allowed to enter Jerusalem (2 Kings 19. 32). Or, thou shalt not any longer see fierce enemies threatening thee as previously; such as the Assyrians, Romans, and the last Antichristian host that is yet to assail Jerusalem (Deuteronomy 28. 49, 50; Jeremiah 5. 15; Zechariah 14. 2). stammering—barbarous; so "deeper," &c., i. e., unintelligible. The Assyrian tongue differed only in dialect from the Hebrew, but in the Assyrian levies were many of non-Semitic race and language, as the Medes, Elamites, &c. (Note ch. 28. 11). 20. solemnities—solemn assemblies at the great feasts (Notes ch. 30. 29; Psalm 42. 4; 48. 12). not . . . taken down . . . removed—image from captives "removed" from their land (ch. 36. 17). There shall be no more "taking away" to an enemy's land. Or else, from nomad livers in shifting tents. The saints, who sojourned once in tabernacles as pilgrims, shall have a "building of God—eternal in the heavens" (2 Corinthians 5. 1; Hebrews 11. 9, 10; cf. ch. 54. 2). stakes—driven into the ground; to these the "cords" were fastened. Christ's Church shall never fall (Matthew 16. 18). So individual believers (Revelation 3. 12). 21. there—viz., in Jerusalem. will be . . . rivers—Jehovah will be as a broad river surrounding our city (cf. ch. 19. 6; Nahum 3. 8), and this, too, a river of such a kind as no ship of war can pass (cf. ch. 26. 1). Jerusalem had not the advantage of a river; Jehovah will be as one to it, affording all the advantages, without any of the disadvantages of one. galley with oars—war-vessels of a long shape, and propelled by oars; merchant-vessels were broader and carried sail. gallant—same Hebrew word as for "glorious," previously; mighty will suit both places; a ship of war is meant. No "mighty vessel" will dare to pass where the "mighty Lord" stands as our defence. 22. Lord—thrice repeated, as often; the Trinity (Numbers 6. 24-26). judge . . . lawgiver . . . king—perfect ideal of the theocracy, to be realized under Messiah alone; the judicial, legislative, and administrative functions as king to be exercised by Him in person (ch. 11. 4; 32. 1; James 4. 12). 23. tacklings—continuing the allegory in v. 21, he compares the enemies' host to a war-galley which is deprived of the tacklings or cords by which the mast is sustained and the sail is spread; and which therefore is sure to be wrecked on "the broad river" (v. 21), and become the prey of Israel. they—the tacklings, "hold not firm the base of the mast." then—when the Assyrian host shall have been discomfited. Hezekiah had given Sennacherib three hundred talents of silver, and thirty of gold (2 Kings 18. 14-16), and had stripped the temple of its gold to give it to him; this treasure was probably part of the prey found in the foe's camp. After the invasion, Hezekiah had so much wealth that he made an improper display of it (2 Kings 20. 13-15); this wealth, probably, was in part got from the Assyrian. the lame—even the most feeble shall spoil the Assyrian camp (cf. ch. 35. 6; 2 Samuel 5. 6). 24. sick—SMITH thinks the allusion is to the beginning of the pestilence by which the Assyrians were destroyed, and which, while sparing the righteous, affected some within the city ("sinners in Zion"), it may have been the sickness that visited Hezekiah (ch. 38). In the Jerusalem to come there shall be no "sickness," because there will be no "iniquity," it being forgiven (Psalm 103. 3). The latter clause of the verse contains the cause of the former (Mark 2. 5-9).

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Ver. 1-17. JUDGMENTS ON IDUMEA. Chapters 34, and 35, form one prophecy, the former part of which denounces God's judgment against His people's enemies, of whom Edom is the representative; the second part of the flourishing state of the Church consequent on those judgments. This forms the termination of the prophecies of the first part of Isaiah, ch. 36-39, being historical, and is a kind of summary of what went before, setting forth the one main truth, Israel shall be delivered from all its foes, and happier times shall succeed under Messiah. 1. All creation is summoned to hear God's judgments (Ezekiel 6. 3; Deuteronomy 32. 1; Psalm 50. 4; Micah 6. 1, 2), for they set forth His glory, which is the end of creation (Revelation 15. 3; 4. 11). that come forth of it—answering to "all that is therein;" or Hebrew, "all whatever fills it," Margin. 2. utterly destroyed—rather, doomed them to an utter curse. [HORSLEY.] delivered—rather, appointed. 3. cast out—unburied (ch. 14. 19). melted—washed away as with a descending torrent. 4. (Psalm 102. 26; Joel 2. 31; 3. 15; Matthew 24. 29.) dissolved—(2 Peter 3. 10-12.) Violent convulsions of nature are in Scripture made the images of great changes in the human world (ch. 24. 19-21), and shall literally accompany them at the winding up of the present dispensation. scroll—books were in those days sheets of parchment rolled together (Revelation 6. 14). fall down—the stars shall fall when the heavens in which they are fixed pass away. fig tree—(Revelation 6. 13.) 5. sword—(Jeremiah 46. 10.) Or else, knife for sacrifice: for God does not here appear as a warrior with His sword, but as one about to sacrifice victims doomed to slaughter. [VITRINGA.] (Ezekiel 39. 17.) bathed—rather intoxicated, viz., with anger (so Deuteronomy 32. 42). "In heaven" implies the place where God's purpose of wrath is formed in antithesis to its "coming down" in the next clause. Idumea—originally extending from the Dead Sea to the Red Sea; afterwards they obtained possession of the country east of Moab, of which Bozrah was capital. Petra or Selah, called Joktheel (2 Kings 14. 7), was capital of South Edom (Note, ch. 16. 1.) David subjugated Edom (2 Samuel 8. 13, 14). Under Jehoram they regained independence (2 Chronicles 21. 8). Under Amaziah they were again subdued, and Selah taken (2 Kings 14. 7). When Judah was captive in Babylon, Edom, in every way, insulted over her fallen mistress, and killed many of those Jews whom the Chaldeans had left, and hence was held guilty of fratricide by God (Esau, their ancestor, having been brother to Jacob); this was the cause of the denunciations of the prophets against Edom (ch. 63. 1, &c.; Jeremiah 49. 7; Ezekiel 25. 12-11; 35. 3-15; Joel 3. 19; Amos 1. 11, 12; Obadiah 8, 10, 12-13; Malachi 1. 3, 4). Nebuchadnezzar humbled Idumea accordingly (Jeremiah 25. 15-21). of my curse—i. e., doomed to it. to judgment—i. e., to execute it. 6. filled—glutted. The image of a sacrifice is continued. blood . . . fat—the parts especially devoted to God in a sacrifice (2 Samuel 1. 22). lambs . . . goats—sacrificial animals: the Idumeans, of all classes, doomed to slaughter, are meant (Zephaniah 1. 7). Bozrah—called Bostra by the Romans, &c., assigned in Jeremiah 49. 24 to Moab, so that it seems to have been at one time in the dominion of Edom, and at another in that of Moab (ch. 63. 1; Jeremiah 49. 13, 20, 22); it was strictly not in Edom, but the capital of Auranitis (the Houran): Edom seems to have extended its dominion so as to include it (cf. Lamentations 4. 21). 7. unicorns—Hebrew, reem: conveying the idea of loftiness, power, and pre-eminence (see Note, Job 39. 9), in the Bible; at one time the image in the term answers to a reality in nature, at another it symbolizes an abstraction. The rhinoceros was the original type. The Arab rim is two-horned: it was the oryx (the leucoryx, antelope, bold and pugnacious); but when accident or artifice deprived it of one horn, the notion of the unicorn arose. Here is meant the portion of the Edomites which was strong and warlike. come down—rather, fall down, slain. [LOWTH.] with them—with the "lambs and goats," the less powerful Edomites (v. 6). bullocks . . . bulls—the young and old Edomites; all classes. dust—ground. 8. recompenses for the controversy of Zion—i. e., the year when God will retaliate on those who have contended with Zion. Her controversy is His. Edom had thought to extend its borders by laying hold of its neighbour's lands, and had instigated Babylon to cruelty towards fallen Judah (Psalm 137. 7; Ezekiel 36. 5); therefore Edom shall suffer the same herself (Lamentations 4, 21, 22). The final winding up of the controversy between God and all enemies of Him and His people is also shadowed forth (ch. 61. 2; 63. 4; 66. 14-16; Malachi 4. 1, 3; 2 Thessalonians 1. 7, 8, 9; Revelation 11. 18; 13. 20; 19. 2). 9. Images from the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah (Genesis 19. 24-28; so Deuteronomy 20. 23; Jeremiah 49. 17, 18). 10. 11.—The burning pitch, &c. (v. 9). smoke . . . for ever—(Revelation 14. 11; 18. 18; 19. 3). generation to generation—(Malachi 1. 4) none . . . pass through—Edom's original offence was, they would not let Israel pass through their land in peace to Canaan; God "recompenses them in kind, no traveller shall pass through Edom. VOLNEY, the infidel, was forced to confirm the truth of this prophecy: "From the reports of the Arabs, south-east of the Dead Sea, within three days' journey, are upwards of thirty ruined towns, absolutely deserted." 11. cornorant—the Hebrew is rendered, in Psalm 102. 6, pelican, which is a sea-fowl, and cannot be meant here; some water-fowl (katta, according to BURCKHARDT) that tenants desert places is intended. bittern—rather, the hedgehog, or porcupine [GESENIUS] (ch. 14. 23). owl—from its being enumerated among water-birds in Leviticus 11. 17; Deuteronomy 14. 16. MAURER thinks rather the heron or crane is meant; from a Hebrew root, to blow, as it utters a sound like the blowing of a horn (Revelation 18. 2). confusion—devastation. line . . . stones—metaphor from an architect with line and plummet-stone (Note, ch. 18. 2; 28. 17); God will render to it the exact measure of justice without mercy (James 2. 13; 2 Kings 21. 13; Lamentations 2. 8; Amos 7. 7, 8). emptiness—desolation. Edom is now a waste of "stones." 12. Rather, "As to her nobles, there shall be none there who shall declare a kingdom," i. e., a king [MAURER]; or else, "There shall be no one there whom they shall call to the kingdom" [ROSENMULLER] (ch. 3. 6, &c.). Idumea was at first governed by dukes (Genesis 36. 15), out of them the king was chosen when the constitution became a monarchy. 13. dragons—(Note, ch. 13. 21, 22.) court for owls—rather, a dwelling for ostriches. 14. wild beasts of the desert . . . island—rather, wild cats . . . jackals (ch. 13. 21). screech owl—rather, the night-spectre: in Jewish superstition a female, elegantly dressed, that carried off children by night. The text does not assert the existence of such objects of superstition, but describes the place as one which superstition would people with such beings. 15. great owl—rather, the arrow-snake, so called from its darting on its prey. [GESENIUS.] lay—viz., eggs gather under her shadow—rather, cherishes her young; under, &c. (Jeremiah 17. 11). 16. book of the Lord—the volume in which the various prophecies and other parts of Scripture began henceforward to be collected together (ch. 30. 3; Daniel 9. 2). "Seek" (so ch. 8. 16, 20; John 5. 39; 7. 52). no one . . . fail—of these prophecies (Matthew 5. 18). none shall want . . . mate—image from pairing of animals mentioned, v. 15 ("mate"); no prediction shall want a fulfilment as its companion. Or rather, "none of these wild animals (just spoken of) shall be wanting: none shall be without its mate" to pair and breed with, in desolate Idumea. my . . . his—such changes of person are frequent in Hebrew poetry. them—the wild beasts. 17. east . . . lot—As conquerors apportion lands by lot, so Jehovah has appointed and marked out ("divided") Edom for the wild beasts (Numbers 26. 55, 56; Joshua 18. 4-6).

CHAPTER XXXV.

Ver. 1-10. CONTINUATION OF THE PROPHECY IN CHAP. 34. See introduction there. 1. solitary place—lit., a dry place, without springs of water. A moral wilderness is meant. for them—viz., on account of the punishment inflicted according to the preceding prophecy on the enemy; probably the blessings set forth in this chapter are included in the causes for joy (ch. 55. 12). rose—rather, the meadow saffron, an autumnal flower with bulbous roots; so Syriac translation. 2. glory of Lebanon—its ornament, viz., its cedars (ch. 10. 34). excellency of Carmel—viz., its beauty. Sharon—famed for its fertility. see . . . glory of the Lord . . . excellency—(Ch. 40. 5, 9.) Whilst the wilderness which had neither "glory" nor "excellency" shall have both "given to it," the Lord shall have all the "glory" and "excellency" ascribed to Him, not to the transformed wilderness (Matthew 5. 16). 3. Strengthen . . . hands . . . confirm . . . knees—The Hebrew for "strengthen" refers to the strength residing in the hands for grasping and holding a thing manfully; "confirm," to the firmness with which one keeps his ground, so as not to be dislodged by any other. [MAURER.] Encourage the Jews, now despairing, by the assurance of the blessings promised. 4. fearful—Margin, hasty, i. e., with a heart fluttered with agitation. with—the Hebrew is more forcible than the English Version "God will come, vengeance! even God, a recompense!" The sense is the same. 5, 6. Language fig. descriptive of the joy felt at the deliverance from Assyria and Babylon, lit., true of the antitypical times of Messiah and His miracles (see Margin references). 6. leap—lit., fulfilled (Acts 3. 8; 14. 10). sing—joyful thanksgivings. in . . . wilderness . . . waters—(Ch. 41. 18). 7. parched ground—rather, "the mirage (Hebrew, Sharab, rather, jackals, each—viz., jackal. grass—rather, "a dwelling or receptacle" (answering to the previous "habitation") for reeds," &c. (which only grow where there is water, Job 8. 11). Where once there was no water, water shall abound. 8. highway—such a causeway (raised way, from a Hebrew root, to cast up) as was used for the march of armies; valleys being filled up, hills and other obstructions removed (ch. 62. 10; cf. ch. 40. 3, 4). way of holiness—Hebraism for the holy way. HORSLEY translates, "the way of the Holy One;" but the words that follow, and v. 10, show it is the way leading the redeemed back to Jerusalem, both the literal and the heavenly (ch. 52. 1; Joel 3. 17; Revelation 21. 27); still Christ at His coming again shall be the Leader on the way, for which reason it is called, "The way of the Lord" (ch. 40. 3; Malachi 3. 1). it shall be for those: the wayfaring men—rather, "He (the Holy One) shall be with them, walking in the way." [HORSLEY.] though fools—rather, "And (even) fools," i. e., the simple shall not go astray, viz., because "He shall be with them" (Matthew 11. 25; 1 Corinthians 1. 26-28). 9. No lion—such as might be feared on the way through the wilderness which abounded in wild beasts, back to Judea. Every danger shall be warded off the returning people (ch. 11. 6-9; Ezekiel 34. 25; Hosea 2. 18). Cf. spiritually, Proverbs 3. 17. 10. Language lit., applying to the return from Babylon; fig. and more fully to the completed redemption of both literal and spiritual Israel. joy upon . . . heads—(Psalm 126. 2.) Joy manifested in their countenances. Some fancy an allusion to the custom of pouring oil "upon the head," or wearing chaplets in times of public festivity (Ecclesiastes 9. 8).

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Ver. 1-22. SENNACHERIB'S INVASION; RABSHAKEH'S BLASPHEMOUS SOLICITATIONS; HEZEKIAH IS TOLD OF THEM. This and chaps. 37, 38, 39, form the historical appendix closing the first division of Isaiah's prophecies, and were added to make the parts of these referring to Assyria more intelligible. So ch. 52, in Jeremiah; cf. 2 Kings 25. The section occurs almost word for word (2 Kings 18, 13, 17-20, 97); 2 Kings 18, 14-16, however, is additional matter. Hezekiah's "writing" also is in Isaiah, not in Kings (ch. 38. 9-20). We know from 2 Chronicles 32. 32 that Isaiah wrote the acts of Hezekiah. It is, therefore, probable, that his record here (ch. 36-39) was incorporated into the book of Kings by its compiler. Sennacherib lived, according to Assyrian inscriptions, more than twenty years after his invasion; but, as Isaiah survived Hezekiah (2 Chronicles 32. 32), who lived upwards of fifteen years after the invasion (ch. 38. 5), the record of Sennacherib's death (ch. 37. 38) is no objection to this section having come from Isaiah; 2 Chronicles 32. 15 probably an abstract drawn from Isaiah's account, as the chronicler himself implies (v. 32). Pul was probably the last of the old dynasty, and Sargon, a powerful satrap, who contrived to possess himself of supreme power, and found a new dynasty (see note, ch. 20. 1). No attempt was made by Judah to throw off the Assyrian yoke during his vigorous reign. The accession of his son Sennacherib was thought by Hezekiah the opportune time to refuse the long-paid tribute; Egypt and Ethiopia, to secure an ally against Assyria on their Asiatic frontier, promised help; Isaiah, whilst opposed to submission to Assyria, advised reliance on Jehovah, and not on Egypt, but his advice was disregarded, and so Sennacherib invaded Judea, 712 B. C. He was the builder of the largest of the excavated palaces, that of Koyunjik. HINCKS has deciphered his name in the inscriptions. In the third year of his reign, these state that he overran Syria, took Sidon and other Phœnician cities, and then passed to South-west Palestine, where he defeated the Egyptians and Ethiopians (cf. 2 Kings 18. 21; 19. 9). His subsequent retreat, after his host was destroyed by God, is of course suppressed in the inscriptions. But other particulars inscribed agree strikingly with the Bible; the capture of the "defenced cities of Judah," the devastation of the country and deportation of its inhabitants; the increased tribute imposed on Hezekiah—thirty talents of gold—this exact number being given in both; the silver is set down in the inscriptions at 800 talents, in the Bible 300; the latter may have been the actual amount carried off, the larger sum may include the silver from the temple doors, pillars, &c. (2 Kings 18. 16). 1. fourteenth—the third of Sennacherib's reign. His ultimate object was Egypt, Hezekiah's ally. Hence he, with the great body of his army (2 Chronicles 32. 9), advanced towards the Egyptian frontier, in South-west Palestine, and did not approach Jerusalem. 2. Rabshakeh—In 2 Kings 18. 17, Tartan and Rabaris are joined "with him. Rabshakeh was probably the chief leader; Rab is a title of authority, "chief—cup-bearer." Lachish—a frontier town south-west of Jerusalem, in Judah; represented as a great fortified city in a hilly and fruitful country in the Koyunjik bas-reliefs, now in the British Museum; also, its name is found on a slab over a figure of Sennacherib on his throne. upper pool—the side on which the Assyrians would approach Jerusalem coming from the south-west (note, ch. 7. 3). 3. Eliakim—successor to Shebna, who had been "over the household," i. e., chief minister of the king; in ch. 22. 15-20, this was foretold. scribe—secretary, recorder—lit., one who reminds; a remembrancer to keep the king informed on important facts, and to act as historiographer. In 2 Kings 18. 18, the additional fact is given, that the Assyrian envoys "called to the king," in consequence of which Eliakim, &c., "came out to them." 4. great king—the usual title of the Persian and Assyrian kings, as they had many subordinate princes or kings under them over provinces (ch. 10. 8). 5. counsel—Egypt was famed for its wisdom. 6. It was a similar alliance with So (i. e., Sabacho, or else Sevechus), the Ethiopian king of Egypt, which provoked the Assyrian to invade and destroy Israel, the northern kingdom, under Hoshea. 7. The Assyrian mistakes Hezekiah's religious reforms whereby he took away the high places (2 Kings 18. 4) as directed against Jehovah. Some of the high places may have been dedicated to Jehovah, but worshipped under the form of an image in violation of the second commandment: the "brazen serpent," also (broken in pieces by Hezekiah, and called Nehushtan, "a piece of brass," because it was worshipped by Israel) was originally set up by God's command. Hence the Assyrian's allegation has a specious colour: you cannot look for help from Jehovah, for your king has "taken away His altars." to Jerusalem—(Deuteronomy 12. 5, 11; John 4. 20.) 8. give pledges—a taunting challenge. Only give the guarantee that you can supply as many as 2000 riders, and I will give thee 2000 horses. But seeing that you have not even this small number (Note, ch. 2. 7), how can you stand against the hosts of Assyrian cavalry? The Jews tried to supply their weakness in this "arm" from Egypt (ch. 31. 1). 9. captain—a governor under a satrap; even he commands more horsemen than this. 10. A boastful inference from the past successes of Assyria, designed to influence the Jews to surrender: their own principles bound them to yield to Jehovah's will. He may have heard from partisans in Judah what Isaiah had foretold (ch. 10. 5, 6). 11. Syrian—rather, Aramean: the language spoken north and east of Palestine, and understood by the Assyrians as belonging to the same family of languages as their own; nearly akin to Hebrew also, though not intelligible to the multitude (cf. 2 Kings 5. 5-7). Aram means a high land, and includes parts of Assyria as well as Syria. Jews' language—The men of Judah since the disruption of Israel, claimed the Hebrew as their own peculiarly, as if they were now the only true representatives of the whole Hebrew twelve tribes. ears of . . . people on . . . wall—the interview was within hearing distance of the city. The people crowded on the wall, curious to hear the Assyrian message. The Jewish rulers fear that it will terrify the people, and therefore beg Rabshakeh to speak Aramean. 12. Is it to thy master and thee that I am sent? Nay, it is to the men on the wall, to let them know (so far am I from wishing them not to hear, as you would wish), that unless they surrender, they shall be reduced to the direst extremities of famine in the siege (2 Chronicles 32. 11, explains the word here), viz., to eat their own excrements; or, connecting, "that they may eat," &c., with "sit upon the wall;" who, as they hold the wall, are knowingly exposing themselves to the direst extremities. [MAURER.] Isalah, as a faithful historian, records the filthy and blasphemous language of the Assyrians, to mark aight the true character of the attack on Jerusalem. 13. Rabshakeh speaks louder and plainer than ever to the men on the wall. 15. The foes of God's people cannot succeed against them, unless they can shake their trust in Him (cf. v. 10). 16. agreement . . . by . . . present—rather, "make peace with me;" lit., blessing, so called from the mutual congratulations attending the ratification of peace. So CHALDEE. Or else, "Do homage to me." [HORSLEY.] come out—surrender to me; then you may remain in quiet possession of your lands till my return from Egypt, when I will lead you away to a land fruitful as your own. Rabshakeh tries to soften, in the eyes of the Jews, the well-known Assyrian policy of weakening the vanquished by deporting them to other lands (Genesis 47. 21; 2 Kings 17. 6). 19. Hamath . . . Arphad—(Note, ch. 10. 9.) Sepharvaim—lit., the two scribes: now Siphpara, on the east of Euphrates, above Babylon. It was a just retribution (Proverbs 1. 31; Jeremiah 2. 19). Israel worshipped the gods of Sepharvaim, and so colonists of Sepharvaim were planted in the land of Israel (thenceforth called Samaria) by the Assyrian conqueror (2 Kings 17. 24; cf. 2 Kings 18. 34). Samaria—Shalmaneser began the siege against Hoshea, because of his conspiring with So of Egypt (2 Kings 17. 4). Sargon finished it; and, in his palace at Khorsabad, has mentioned the number of Israelites carried captive—27,280. [G. V. SMITH.] 20. (Cf. ch. 10. 11; 2 Chronicles 32. 19.) Here he contradicts his own assertion (v. 10), that he had "come up against the land with the Lord." Liars need good memories. He classes Jehovah with the idols of the other lands; nay, thinks Him inferior in proportion as Judah, under His tutelage, was less than the lands under the tutelage of the idols. 21. not a word—so as not to enter into a war of words with the blasphemer (Exodus 14. 14; Jude 9). 22. clothes rent—in grief and horror at the blasphemy (Matthew 26. 65).

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Ver. 1-38. CONTINUATION OF THE NARRATIVE IN CHAP. 36. 1. sackcloth—(Note, ch. 20. 2.) house of the Lord—the sure resort of God's people in distress (Psalm 73. 16, 17; 77. 13). 2. unto Isalah—implying the importance of the prophet's position at the time; the chief officers of the court are deputed to wait on him (cf. 2 Kings 22. 12-14). 3. rebuke—i. e., the Lord's rebuke for His people's sins (Psalm 149. 7; Hosea 5. 9). blasphemy—blasphemous railing of Rabshakeh, the children, &c.—a proverbial expression for, We are in the most extreme danger, and have no power to avert it (cf. Hosea 13. 13). 4. hear—take cognizance of (2 Samuel 16. 12). reprove—will punish him for the words, &c. (Psalm 50. 21). remnant—the two tribes of the kingdom of Judah, Israel being already captive. Isalah is entreated to act as intercessor with God. 6. servants—lit., youths, mere lads, implying disparagement, not an embassy of venerable elders. The Hebrew is different from that for "servants" in v. 5. blasphemed me—(Ch. 36. 20.) 7. blast—rather, "I will put a spirit (ch. 23. 6; 1 Kings 22. 23) into him," i. e., so influence his judgment that when he hears the report (v. 9, concerning Tirhakah), he shall return [GESENIUS]; the "report" also of the destruction of his army at Jerusalem, reaching Sennacherib, whilst he was in the south-west of Palestine on the borders of Egypt, led him to retreat. by the sword—(v. 38.) 8. returned—to the camp of his master. Libnah—meaning whiteness, the Blanche-garde of the Crusaders. [STANLEY.] EUSEBIUS and JEROME place it more south, in the district of Eleutheropolis, ten miles north-west of Lachish, which Sennacherib had captured (Note, ch. 36. 2). Libnah was in Judea and given to the priests (1 Chronicles 6. 54, 57). 9. Tirhakah—(see Notes, ch. 17. 12; 18. 6). Egypt was in part governed by three successive Ethiopian monarchs, for forty or fifty years: Sabacho, Sevechus, and Tirhakah. Sevechus retired from Lower Egypt owing to the resistance of the priests, whereupon Sethos, a prince-priest, obtained supreme power with Tanis (Zoan in Scripture), or Memphis, as his capital. The Ethiopians retained Upper Egypt under Tirhakah, with Thebes as the capital. Tirhakah's fame as a conqueror rivalled that of Sesostris; he, and one at least of the Pharaohs of Lower Egypt, were Hezekiah's allies against Assyria. The tidings of his approach made Sennacherib the more anxious to get possession of Jerusalem before his arrival. sent—2 Kings 19. 9 more fully expresses Sennacherib's eagerness by adding "again." 10. He tries to influence Hezekiah himself, as Rabshakeh had addressed the people. God . . . deceive—(Cf. Numbers 23. 19). 11. all lands—(Ch. 14. 17.) He does not dare to enumerate Egypt in the list. 12. Gozan—in Mesopotamia, on the Chabour (2 Kings 17. 6; 18. 11). Gozan is the name of the district, Chabour of the river. Haran—more to the west. Abraham removed to it from Ur (Genesis 11. 31), the Carrae of the Romans. Rezep—farther west, in Syria. Eden—there is an ancient village, Adna, north of Bagdad. Some think Eden to be the name of a region (of Mesopotamia or its vicinity) in which was Paradise; Paradise was not Eden itself (Genesis 2. 8). "A garden in Eden." Telassar—now Tel-afar, west of Mosul. [LAYARD.] Tel means a hill in Arabic and Assyrian names. 13. Hena . . . Ivah—in Babylonia. From Ava colonists had been brought to Samaria (2 Kings 17. 24). 14. spread—unrolled the scroll of writing. God "knows our necessities before we ask Him," but He delights in our unfolding them to Him with filial confidence (2 Chronicles 20. 3, 11-13). 16. dwellest—the Shechinah, or fiery symbol of God's presence, dwelling in the temple with His people, is from Shachan to dwell (Exodus 25. 22; Psalm 80. 1; 99. 1). cherubim—derived by transposition from either a Hebrew root, "Rachab," to ride; or rather, "Barach," to bless. They were formed out of the same mass of pure gold as the mercy-seat itself (Exodus 25. 19, Marginal). The phrase, "dwellest between the cherubim," arose from their position at each end of the mercy-seat, while the Shechinah, and the awful name, JEHOVAH, in written letters, were in the intervening space. They are so inseparably associated with the manifestation of God's glory, that whether the Lord is at rest or in motion, they always are mentioned with Him (Numbers 7. 89; Psalm 18. 10). (1.) They are first mentioned (Genesis 3. 24) "on the edge of" (as "on the east" may be translated) Eden; the Hebrew for "placed" is properly to "place in a tabernacle," which implies that this was a local tabernacle in which the symbols of God's presence were manifested suitably to the altered circumstances in which man, after the fall, came before God. It was here that Cain and Abel, and the patriarchs down to the flood, presented their offerings; and it is called "the presence of the Lord" (Genesis 4. 16). When those symbols were removed at the close of that early patriarchal dispensation, small models of them were made for domestic use, called, in Chaldee, Seraphim or Teraphim. (2.) The cherubim, in the Mosaic tabernacle and Solomon's temple, were the same in form as those at the outskirts of Eden: compound figures, combining the distinguishing properties of several creatures: the ox,
